The expression occurs within a setting and must be understood in the light of its context if properly interpreted. The family of Chloe had contacted the apostle and informed him that the church of God at Corinth was divided into four segments— a Pauline party, a Cephasite clan, an Apollosite auxiliary and a Christite cult. Each person was affirming aloud his affiliation to one or the other of these factions. The apostle wrote, "Every one of you says," and proceeded to show that they were saying they were not of the same party, or for the same leader. His exhortation to speak the same thing simply meant to desist from these factional identifications. It was given to cure a condition and must be understood in the sense of its application to that condition. The statement has not the slightest reference to conformity of opinion or interpretation. One did not have to speak the same thing about eating of meats, or keeping of days, for instance. There was room for differences in such spheres.

The fact is that Paul was not using an ecclesiastical expression when he urges the brethren "to speak the same thing." William Barclay writes, "The phrase he uses is the regular phrase which is used of two hostile states or parties reaching agreement." He translates it, "You should make up your differences." James Moffatt, aware of the historical account of a philosopher who ran into the marketplace to stand between two warring factions of Greeks, and who uttered these very same words, translates, "I beg of you all to drop these party cries."

Richard Francis Weymouth has it, "Now I entreat you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to cultivate a spirit of harmony." The New English Version renders it "agree among yourselves." Hugh J. Schonfield in The Authentic New Testament, puts it, "all hold together." The apostle is not regulating expressions or voicing of ideas among those who are walking together in love. His design is to heal a breach or bridge an existing gap. "To speak the same thing" stands opposed to controversy or contention. "It is reported that there are contentions among you . . . I beseech you to speak the same thing."

Those who quote the passage to apply to enforced conformity and stereotyped expression are always inconsistent. They must leave broad areas where their partisans can say different things and remain in the factional fold. It is only upon the humanly formulated test of loyalty, the party shibboleth, that all must pass muster and walk the verbal chalk line. In the particular movement in which I was reared there are some twenty-five separate and distinct factions. Every one of these parties allows the greatest latitude in opinion (and often in moral and ethical behavior) except in the test of partisan identity. It is only demanded that, if one is to be regarded as "sound in the faith" he must speak the same thing on the issue around which the party rallies as its standard. "The faith" is the orthodox position, the totem pole of the party.

In every one of these parties the adherents differ on a great many things. They do not agree upon divorce and re-marriage, upon Christians bearing arms in war, or upon the qualifications of elders. All of these are considered as grounds for discussion while the party position is regarded as a basis for division. Who makes the decisions as to which things are vital and which are not? Who draws up the lists of things that are immune and exempt, and formulates the limitations and restrictions? Who surveys the extent of the yard to be enclosed by the fence inside of which the children may argue and fight while composing "the brotherhood?" Who is the supreme court to determine upon what bases we may "set at nought a brother" in absolute contradiction to the word of God which forbids it?

Perhaps the most glaring demonstration of inconsistency is found among those who compose the faculty of Liberal Arts Colleges, regarded as church-related schools and maintained by contributions of members of the Churches of Christ. It is generally known upon every campus that certain teachers do not share the views of others. Conflicting and contradictory explanations may be given of certain passages from one classroom to another. Yet, as a body, these have reached an official interpretation of Revelation 20, and one who holds, the pre-millennial view is excluded and often not regarded as in "the Lord's church." It has been decided that the authorized and infallible interpretation of Revelation 20 shall be deemed, and is hereby decreed to be, opposed to the premillennial coming of the Lord, and this dogma shall be a test of fellowship, and of union and communion among the saints. Greater legalism hath no man than this!

The flagrant inconsistency of these college professors is seen in the fact that they laud as "giants" men who were avowedly premillennial in their interpretations. The books written by these worthies of another generation are required reading, yet if the men who wrote the volumes were alive today they would not even be allowed to lecture to a class composed of those who must pass an examination upon what they wrote. Since their day certain views have become part of the dogma. Fortunately, hundreds of alert young men and women in college are seeing through the incompatible and incongruous attitudes imposed by the factional spirit. A revolution has begun to restore Jesus to His position as Lord in practice as well as in word.

Thinking men and women can never be satisfied that all must understand Revelation 20 alike, while they may differ upon every other chapter in the Bible. Who determines the must and the mays? It is only those who twist such expressions as "all speak the same thing" into tools of conformity who must muzzle men's minds in one area of revelation while allowing them to run at will in other sectors. Of course, this all stems from a legalistic attitude which results from fear, not from faith. Men know they will not see every point of interpretation alike. They never have. The libraries of thousands of volumes on religious themes prove it. If it were not so, no theological school would require more than one set of commentaries. It is interesting to see the variety of commentaries offered for sale by bookstores operated in conjunction with journals whose editors unrealistically declaim that we must all speak the same thing. There seems to be a lot of money made from the fact that we do not!

Fruit of Inconsistency

The factional tendency which asserts itself when men realize that they do not always infer the same thing from what they read, is to fasten upon a particular item of belief, and elevate it out of proportion to other items, and even exalt it above the cross of Christ. On this matter they take a positive and definite stand, and judge every person by whether "he speaks the same thing" on this issue. The tragedy of such a procedure is found in the fact that it destroys integrity, both in the intellectual and behavioral realm. When one becomes convinced that his relationship with Jesus is established and sustained, and that his loyalty is determined, by his position on some item of controversy, every other consideration is relegated to secondary status.

Conformity as a basis of unity is a fantasy, whether in the realm of politics, economics, philosophy or religion. Conformity by coercion is the gruesome weapon of tyranny, whether employed by a single ruthless dictator or wielded by an institution which cannot stand dissent. It is contrary to the nature of man and becomes a yoke of intolerance. Thomas Jefferson writing about the *Virginia Act for Religious Freedom in 1786, said, "Subject opinion to coercion: whom will you make your inquisitors? Fallible men; men governed by bad passions, by private as well as public reasons. And why subject it to coercion? To produce uniformity. But is uniformity of opinion desirable? No more than of face and stature."

It is regrettable that legalistic minds searching for a prooftext to reinforce the weak framework of a sermon outline on unity by conformity, have wrested from its context the statement of the apostle that all should "speak the same thing." Nothing is more incongruous than to see partisan leaders quoting this at each other. It would seem the proper thing for them to do would be to provide an example of what they so loudly affirm. Bombarding one another with the same text in an argument is hardly a demonstration of what the apostle meant by speaking the same thing.

A great many students are perplexed by the statement "that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment." Surely if conformity is taught anywhere it is taught in this verse. Again, the problem is one of context. The expression "Be perfectly joined together" is *katartizo, which carries with it the idea of restoring to the original state or condition. It was used as a medical term for reducing a fracture, or setting bones in a joint or socket. We still talk about bones "knitting together." A good example is found in Galatians 6:1, "Brethren, if a man is overtaken in any trespass, you who are spiritual should restore him in a spirit of gentleness."

It is employed in Matthew 4:21 and Mark 1:19 for mending nets. In these cases it is apparent that the idea is to correct a situation so that proper functioning can resume. This is the reason for setting broken bones, for restoring a member discovered in a trespass, and for repairing a net. The appropriateness of this term will be seen when we remember that the word for "divisions" in 1 Corinthians 1:10 is *schisma. This denotes a tear or rent, as in a garment. It is used in Matthew 9:16 for the rent which occurs when unshrunken cloth is used to patch a hole in an old garment. The corresponding verb *schizo, occurs in the word schizophrenia, a type of psychosis resulting in a split personality.

With this background we can grasp the significance of what Paul is saying to the Corinthians. The fabric of brotherhood has disintegrated through cleavage and the formation of parties. It was impossible to discern the one body even when they met together in one place, because they maintained their exclusive partisan associations (Cp. 1 Corinthians 11:18,29). It was necessary to repair their grievous state so that the body could properly function again in the midst of a pagan society. Allow me to paraphrase the passage so you may understand what the apostle is saying to correct the situation.

> I implore you now, my brothers, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you stop your party cries so that the fabric of brotherhood will not be further rent and torn, and that you mend those rents which already exist by cultivating the same attitude and the same good judgment.

The Repair Tools

We recognize that it is difficult for those who have been reared and trained in a legalistic attitude to surrender sermon texts and outlines which have grown hoary with repetition. They will fight to hold on to such heirlooms in spite of their lack of value, simply because they have been in the family so long. Accordingly, when full explanation is made in an open forum of the meaning of the apostle, someone who must make "a last ditch stand" always arises to demand what is inferred by the expression "the same mind and the same judgment." Those who have long postulated unity based upon conformity and scoffed at "unity in diversity" find it a difficult thing to swallow their partisan pride and say, "I have been wrong about the meaning of that scripture all of my life."

I know from experience what happens to an honest man who has been defending an outpost under the mistaken concept that it is the whole territory when he comes face to face with his captain who demands that he haul down the partisan banner from above his walled fortress which he has so proudly defended. I also know the trauma which occurs when one must surrender his stock of ammunition, the scriptural passages with which he has been bombarding various camps of saints on the other side of the hill. I suspect there is ever the temptation to want to retain your side arms and continue to do a little partisan "bushwhacking" in your leisure time. So it never surprises me when a preacher in my audience digs in his heels, wraps the factional rope around his hands and hangs on for dear life while it slowly slips from his clutch and he looks wildly around for reinforcements, hoping the cavalry will come dashing down the slope at the last minute to save the party flag.

However, in this case, my own integrity will not allow me to compromise my conviction. I must insist that the apostle is not advocating conformity across the whole Christian spectrum as essential to oneness. Instead, he is dealing with a specific situation. The community of saints has disintegrated into four warring tribes, making the community of saints militant against itself. The apostle commands a repair job. He begins with an emergency measure calculated to halt the growing cleavage. "Stop these party cries!" (all speak the same thing). He then proceeds to the method of repairing the damage already done. "Mend the rents in the fabric" (be perfectly joined together)

A repair job requires tools. These instruments must be adapted to the task to be performed if the end is to be accomplished. The tool which Paul handed to the Corinthians for their work of restoration is labeled, "the same mind and the same judgment." No other device could fit a situation such as there existed. They must have the same mind as to what they were to try to do. They must have the same judgment as to how to accomplish it. The first refers to purpose, the second to method.

To assume that what was absolutely necessary in correcting a critical emergency is normative for daily living and survival is indicative of shallow thinking. It is like insisting that one should throw away food and live on penicillin shots because this was prescribed when one had pneumonia. If all members of a household are aroused at 3:00 o'clock a.m. to rush one to a hospital with a ruptured appendix, we do not conclude they must all arise at that time each morning to demonstrate they are still members of the same family. Nor do we assume that because they functioned in such perfect unison under special stress they may not disagree with each other about many things and still love each other dearly.

There is room in Christ for differences. There is no room for division. It was division which Paul sought to eliminate in Corinth, but he only sought to palliate differences in Rome (Romans 14). You eliminate disease by curing it, you palliate a condition by easing it without curing it. The treatment for division is rejection of the condition. The treatment for differences is forbearance of your brethren. To differ with brethren is not a sin, to divide the family of God is a sin. We oppose division because we hate sin, we seek to reduce tensions and lessen areas of difference because we love brethren. We must regard division with intoleration while we treat differences in a spirit of toleration. Toleration is not endorsing something which you think to be wrong, it is simply enduring one who thinks it is right. It is a relationship sustained to honest brethren and not to their ideas or thoughts. A brotherhood is composed of thinkers and not abstract thinking.

So long as division exists in the community of saints we share in its shame even while laboring to overcome it. If we condone or defend it we also share in its scandal. No one in the family of God can be wholly free of disgrace as long as strife in the family is exposed to the open gaze of an unbelieving world. Not one individual can justifiably adopt an attitude of indifference or unconcern when the Lord has laid upon all the burden of being peacemakers. This requires much more than being a passive peace lover. It demands an actively pursued campaign to restore peace— to make peace. It is not enough to boast that you have never caused division. You may not have caused anything else either! If division exists in the community where you are, regardless of who created the situation, you are obligated by the authority of God's word to do something to repair the breach.

This involves much more than a halfhearted invitation to another partisan preacher in the community to "Drop over sometime and we'll talk about our problems over a cup of coffee." It includes being able to drink the cup that He drank, and being baptized with the baptism He experienced. Peace must be waged. It must be relentlessly pursued. "Seek peace and ensue it." There must be a strategy of peace in which temporary defeats are never confused with a lost cause and skirmishes are not confounded with the war. Division must be seen in its true nature, as a damnable, destructive, defiant sin against God and the Majesty of His Fatherhood. The campaign for peace is not a game of tiddley-winks. It is an endurance contest which is not a struggle for men with weak hearts and sickly stomachs. Peacemakers must be "strong in the Lord and in the power of His might."

Contrary to the Doctrine

Contents

Any religious group which exists beyond the first generation has certain traditions, because the word tradition means "a handing over, or handing down." A tradition may be either good, bad, or indifferent. Not everything our fathers thought and taught was right, but not all of it was wrong either. It is a fallacy to think that everything old is outmoded. It is as great a fallacy to think that everything new is deserving of praise.

Sometimes traditions develop as to the method of doing things. The sacred scriptures must be implemented. They must be translated into action. The written word must become our flesh. A popular English paraphrase of the scriptures has been called "The Living Bible." Actually, it is no more a living Bible than any other translation, version or paraphrase. The real living Bibles are persons who are reproducing in their daily lives the image of Christ.

The word of God is unchanging. It is recorded in heaven but not necessarily in English. It was recorded there before English was derived and spoken. As men read the word and seek to carry out its implications for their lives they must select and develop means which seem to them best adapted to fulfill the requirements in their time. The means are not the scriptures, and may be altered as circumstances change. However, those who seek to do what God requires may soon confuse the medium with the message and reach the conclusion that to abandon the first is to forsake the second.

As one generation passes away, the succeeding one equates fidelity, not only with trust in God's revelation but with adherence to the methods of the fathers. The tragedy of this is not that men continue to be ruled in what they believe by the living God, but rather that they are governed in how they manifest their faith by men who are dead. The grave has the same power as the glory. There may be nothing unscriptural about the tradition but if the human means no longer accomplish the divine will it is useless to retain them, much less to defend them as the will of God.

Sometimes traditions develop as to the interpretation of certain scriptures. Men in one age, beset by intellectual shortcomings and under constant attack, may search the scriptures for a means of defense of what to them seems God's will for their lives. The constant employment of the meaning they deduce from and assign to a scripture in the heat of debate may become the orthodox explanation, the recognized and official interpretation. Hallowed by usage, the explanation becomes the scripture in the minds of partisan communicants. To question the exposition is to doubt the revelation.

All of this is further complicated by the inborn resistance to change by religious movements which develop ponderous programs and intertwined institutionalism. It makes little difference whether the institutions are church-supported or church-related. They serve as bulwarks against alteration and imprison the movements they profess to liberate. The day an institution accepts a trust fund or creates a foundation it forfeits the freedom to die. It is almost impossible to set a captive movement free when its roots are matted with institutional roots beneath the surface. The legal, political and organizational ties make reformation virtually impossible.

One thing is certain. The cardinal law which governs every religious establishment is self-preservation. The organization is concerned with two things— its image and its perpetuity. To protect itself it erects walls, digs moats and bars gates. Any suggested change is regarded as a threat, any new concept as a challenge. Dissent is treason and the dissenter a heretic. This is the universal stance of the sectarian spirit. Whether or not the sect bears a denomination coined to describe a facet of doctrine or government, or whether it brags of a name found in the scriptures makes no difference. The sectarian spirit is always the same, though "the theology" may differ.

We must recapture a sense of our integrity in the intellectual world. This does not mean setting up a false god of human wisdom or bowing at the shrine of philosophy. It does mean an unrelenting and unceasing quest for truth, and that for truth's sake, regardless of what that truth may do to our cherished positions of the past. The retention of any dross for fear of losing some gold is contrary to the basis of true scholarship and subversive of honesty. We should not hesitate to deposit what we have in the crucible of the present, for that which does not stand the test today was not right yesterday, even though we thought it was. The gold must be tried in the fire, not just in one generation but in every generation.

It is in this spirit of freedom and fearlessness that we are examining again those scriptures which have been twisted to create, condone or continue division. Our thesis is that any use of the written word to defeat the plan, purpose and prayer of the Living Word is an abuse. This calls for a restudy of the bearing and implication of those scriptures. When our application of the word of God produces the very opposite condition of what the word was intended to produce there is something faulty with our application. Thorough study requires time and thought. It cannot be accomplished in a moment and it does not always make for light reading. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in a speech delivered in 1938, said: "Freedom to learn is the first necessity of guaranteeing that man himself shall be self-reliant enough to be free."

Romans 16:17

> Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which you have learned, and avoid them.

Of all the scriptures which have suffered from wresting, twisting and distortion, perhaps this one has suffered more maltreatment than most others. Written for the very purpose of protecting and preserving the church from division, it has become one of the chief instruments of such division. Ignoring the greater context in which it is set as a frame of reference, glib partisans apply it without modesty or reservation, to every honest dissenter from their factional programs.

The passage has been cited as grounds for excommunication of individuals whose consciences no longer allow them to kowtow to legalistic decisions or to "toe the party line." Indeed it has been employed to justify attack upon a congregation, or group of congregations, whose constituents had learned that the will of God was not served by the factional spirit, and whose only sin consisted of asserting their freedom in Christ Jesus. It has been a verbal club in the mouths of partisan leaders to try and "hold in line" those who had continued to study and were no longer interested in goose-stepping to a party tune. In the eyes of a sectarian leader anyone who differs with him is guilty of causing divisions and offences. He is acting "contrary to the doctrine which he learned," for the doctrine he learned was the factional interpretation which the leader taught.

What did Paul mean by "the doctrine which you have learned?" Whatever he meant it was something in which the Romans had previously been instructed before the apostle penned this admonition. The expression is in the past tense. Since Paul had never been to Rome it is obvious that "the doctrine" is what he had taught in the previous part of this epistle, if he referred to what they had learned from him. In spite of that, I have heard this passage quoted and the expression "the doctrine which you have learned" applied to every little element of trivia which has disturbed the saints in the twentieth century. Every sect and faction regards its distinctive, peculiar and particular emphasis as "the doctrine you have learned," and those who subscribe to these partisan hangups are urged and exhorted to "mark" those who do not. Indeed, there is not a rallying point for any sect, regardless of how small and insignificant, which has not been exalted to "the doctrine you have learned," even though it has been taught but a decade or less! Certainly the saints in Rome never learned "the doctrine" which is debated in our day and used as a club to batter into submission or into silence those whose thought processes refuse to stop working!

It is almost unbelievable that thinking men and women could ever be led to believe that the apostle Paul would ever condone such a mishmash or hodgepodge as we have created, much less deliberately prepare the group in which we could sow the seeds of strife. Actually, such a position freezes knowledge at the partisan level. It makes ignorance a virtue and further learning a crime. If we are to listen only to those who agree with us in every particular we can never acquire additional knowledge. If we are to mark and avoid all who do not parrot our own particular party line we must continue at our present level of ignorance. Surely the apostle did not have in mind the creedal and dogmatic interpretation of each faction by the expression "the doctrine you have learned." That would perpetuate the very factionalism he wrote to prevent and offset. It would seem that all rational and sensible persons could see such an obvious fact.

The Doctrine Learned

What is "the doctrine you have learned"? What had Paul been teaching the Romans which would cause them to avoid those who were divisive? The entire frame of reference, the context both adjacent and remote, shows it was the teaching that division among brethren is a sin. The doctrine was that no one should cause division. Briefly summed up, the doctrine which the apostle taught and the Romans heard was "Do not cause division or place an occasion of stumbling in a brother's way."

The content of the four preceding chapters is directed toward advocating, exemplifying and enforcing this doctrine. The basis of the teaching is, "Let us therefore follow after things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another" (14:19). Anyone who disregards this doctrine and insists upon making tests of fellowship where God has not made them (i.e., over days, meats, etc.) should be observed and isolated so his factional attitude cannot divide the body into rival camps over such issues.

The argument of Paul related to Jew and Gentile, and the universal need for justification by faith, concludes with the benediction and "Amen" of Romans 11:36. In chapter 12 he begins his dissertation on the conduct becoming the saints, especially as related to unity and oneness. His doctrine is that God's family should not be divided. Its members should not be occasions of stumbling one to another.

Although many members, yet are we one body in Christ, and every one members one of another (12:5).

We are to love each other without hypocrisy (12:9); be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love (12:10); and be of the same mind one toward another (12:16).

We are to owe no man anything except to love one another (13:8), for love is the fulfilling of the law (13:10).

We are not only to deprecate strife and envying, but actually to abhor them, and put on the Lord Jesus Christ, making no provision for the flesh and the exercise of any harmful passion (13:13,14).

There will be differences among the members. Past environment, the present degree of knowledge, various temperaments, and other factors, will enter in to make adjustment difficult. Chapter 14 is an inspired treatise on those attitudes essential to preservation of unity in spite of differences. The foundation of the approach is laid in verse one.

A man who is weak in his faith is to be welcomed. "Without attempting to settle doubtful points" (New English Version). "Not with the idea of arguing over his scruples" (J. B. Phillips). "Not to determinations or reasonings" (Young's Literal Translation). "Not for controversial arguments" (Authentic New Testament). "Not in order to pass judgment on his doubts" (Weymouth). "Not to pass judgment on his scruples" (Moffatt). "Not to criticize their views" (Charles B. Williams). "Do not discuss his opinions" (Charles Kingsley Williams). "Not for the purpose of deciding doubtful points" (Centenary Translation). "Not for the purpose of passing judgment on their scruples" (Twentieth Century Translation). "Not for disputing opinions" (Rotherham).

We are neither to despise nor judge one another (verse 3). We are to allow each to stand or fall to his own master (verse 4), and reach a personal conviction in his own mind (5). We dare not set at nought a brother, for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ (10). Each will give account of himself to God (12), so I am not accountable for my brother's conviction, nor am I accountable to my brethren for my own convictions. My brother is not answerable for me, and I am not answerable to my brother. Both of us are answerable to God.

The brotherly relationship must be more important to me than any thing upon which we disagree, and must be more important than all those things which threaten its disruption. Under no condition am I to allow any opinion, scruple or personal conviction to destroy a brother for whom Christ died (15). The kingdom of God is composed of values which transcend all matters of argument over things which disturb its citizenry. It is made up of majestic qualities which are universally accepted within the body— righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit— and to elevate any secondary considerations to an equality with these qualities is neither acceptable nor approved (17,18).

Jesus died for persons and not for their opinions or ideas, right or wrong, and those for whom he died must be more important than anything for which he did not die. It is good to do nothing by which a brother stumbles, or is offended, or made weak (21). A man must not do that about which he has personal qualms or doubts, "because his action does not rise from conviction, and anything which does not rise from conviction is sin" (23).

The strong must accept as their own burden the tender scruples of weaker men and not consider themselves (15:1). Each must consider his own neighbor and think what is for his good and will build up the common life together. We are all to accept one another as Christ has accepted us, to the glory of God (15:7). As God accepted us in our weakness, with mistaken ideas, warped views and unhealthful attitudes, so we must accept each other in the same state or condition. We must not make the kingdom of heaven to consist of our convictions attitudes or opinions, but of citizens who must be tolerant of one another in such matters, otherwise there can be no kingdom of heaven at all. The doctrine the Corinthians learned was not to cause division, but to walk in peace, making allowance for differences.

Factional Persons

After having given this extensive teaching on avoidance of division and offences, the apostle recognizes there will be those who will not heed it. Even God cannot provide a doctrine that is proof against dishonest hearts or unscrupulous motives. There will always be some who refuse to serve Christ, but in their egotism and selfishness will create a factional atmosphere and seduce the minds of innocent people with smooth and specious words. There will always be men who set up their own little kingdoms, who recognize as brethren only those who recognize their opinion, and who will drive out the saints who will not bow the knee to them. What should be done with those who disregard the teaching about preserving peace and insist upon having their own way, regardless of the consequences? The answer is plain and forthright.

> Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which you have learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.

A careful analysis of this passage in purely objective research does not indicate that the apostle is advocating public or corporate action at all. He is not telling a congregation that they should excommunicate certain ones. Those who take such a position have to read into the verse their own ideas. Indeed, the Roman letter differs from other epistles in that it is not addressed to a congregation, but to individual saints, as we have shown in a previous chapter. The "avoiding" here recommended to the brethren is individual. They are simply told to steer clear of those who would create division and to stay out of their way.

The factional spirit is like a flame. It must always have additional fuel or it will eventually flicker out. It is like a cancer. If it cannot reach additional healthy cells or tissue it will subside. It is obvious no one can ever create a faction without followers. If all of the brethren will simply hold at arm's length a smooth talker who advocates pulling away, he cannot harm the body.

Factions begin when members start fraternizing and sympathizing with factionalists. It will help us to remember that every factionalist seeks to carve out a body after his own image, and it is easier to carve soap or soft wood. When a factionalist starts wooing you to join a movement to pull away he has chosen you for the same reason that a termite chooses its timber— you are easier to work on! One is complimented when a factionalist passes him by and ignores him. He should examine himself to see what is wrong when he is made the target of a partisan who seeks to manipulate him.

"Mark them which cause division." The word "mark" is from skopeo. This is the form of the word which appears in telescope, microscope, etc. It has to do with vision. It means, "to observe, watch, to keep an eye on." There is not one thing in this word which indicates any action whatsoever upon or against an offender. The action is all upon the part of the observer. It consists simply of keeping another under surveillance.

Divisions is from dichostasia. This is a combined form composed of a word for "apart" and one for "standing." It literally means "standing apart" and here it refers to "alienating one from another." It can be used to designate "divided loyalties" or to describe the condition that occurs when one segment of those who should be together allows a breach to occur which holds them aloof from others. Such a condition is a result and it proceeds from a cause. It is contrary to the will and purpose of God and one who produces the condition disobeys God.

"Offences" is from *skandalon, from which we get our English words "scandal" and "scandalized." The original has an interesting history. At first it referred to the trigger of a trap, the part to which the bait is fastened, and which tripped or sprung the snare when the intended victim took the bait. Later it came to apply to the contrivance or instrument as a whole. It is essential to the efficient working or functioning of a snare that it not be recognized for what it is and its real nature be concealed. W. A. Vine said the word is always used metaphorically in the New Testament of that which arouses prejudice, becomes a hindrance to others, or causes them to fall by the way.

"Avoid" is from ekklino which means "to turn away from, to hold aloof from, to stay out of the way." There is nothing in the word which implies any organized action, or formal discipline of the congregation. Indeed, Vine says, "In exhorting them to turn away from false teachers, the Apostle is not speaking of excommunication, but of personal dissociation from the offenders." Albert Barnes puts it this way: "That is, avoid them as teachers; do not follow them. It does not mean that they were to be treated harshly; but that they were to be avoided in their instructions. They were to disregard all that they could say tending to produce alienation and strife; and resolve to cultivate the spirit of peace and union."

The brethren were urged to avoid involvement with the person under consideration by keeping aloof from him or staying out of his way. If there is no congregational action implied in the terms "mark" and "avoid" there is none to be found in this verse at all. Those who abuse and misuse this passage to separate themselves from another congregation of saints over some point of difference are the perpetrators of division. There is a great deal of difference between keeping an eye on a brother who would make a partisan out of you and staying out of his way, and refusing to have anything to do with another congregation whose members sincerely disagree with some partisan interpretation. That is, there is a difference in keeping an eye on an infected member and taking a meat cleaver to the body.

J. B. Phillips translates the passage: "And now I implore you, my brothers, to keep a watchful eye on those who cause troubles and make difficulties among you, in plain opposition to the teaching you have been given, and steer clear of them."

Adam Clarke says: "Let them have no kiss of charity or peace, because they strive to make divisions, and thus set the flock of God at variance among themselves, and from these divisions, offences are produced, and this is contrary to the doctrine of peace, unity and brotherly love which you have learned."

James MacKnight paraphrases thus: " Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them who set up separate assemblies for worship, and who occasion the weak to fall by false doctrine, or by enjoining things indifferent as necessary, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned from me in this epistle, and avoid them."

In explaining the passage, Macknight says: "The apostle had in his eye the Jewish teachers, who in many churches set up separate assemblies for worship of God (see Jude, verse 19), on pretense of greater orthodoxy and sanctity than others, and who would admit none to their communion but such as joined them in their peculiarities, and who represented all others as erroneous and impious."

How Division is Caused

There is no more prolific cause of division than the orthodox interpretation placed on this passage. All who equate "this doctrine" with a partisan interpretation and dogmatically demand conformity to it are destructive of the peace of the one body and are the chief offenders against unity at the very time they quote the passage to exclude or excoriate others. The church of God has suffered indescribable harm from such prejudicial expositors who have split the disciples asunder under guise of loyalty to Jesus, and driven out humble saints by their arrogant and papistical decrees. Eternity alone can reveal the damage done to the body of Christ by the unscriptural and unscrupulous application of Romans 16:17. Sometimes an example is worth a thousand words. Let us consider one way by which such harm is accomplished.

A humble brother in the Lord prayerfully peruses the sacred oracles and in his study becomes convinced that the Son of God will return to the earth prior to the thousand years spoken of in the Apocalypse. He shares his views with the brethren with whom he meets and learns that others as sincere as himself do not reach the same conclusion. They continue to meet together around the common table with mutual respect and regard for one another. Then a preacher comes into the community and learns that the brother has arrived at a premillennial interpretation which seems to him to best explain what the scriptures express concerning the return of the Lord. The preacher visits him with a view to "setting him straight on what the Bible teaches," but finds that the other insists upon being his own interpreter and refuses to abdicate his right to search the scriptures for himself.

The preacher then begins a series of lectures on "The Millennium" in which he has free rein to express his understanding of the subject without opposition. The other brother must merely sit and listen in silence. He cannot appear before the same audience and express his views. After having set forth his interpretation for several months from the pulpit and on his weekly radio program, the preacher informs the congregation that they have learned from him that the premillennial interpretation is not from God, and it is "time to take a stand for the truth."

He gleans occasional statements from individuals who have espoused the premillennial view, lifts them out of context and applies them to all who believe that Jesus will return before the thousand years. When the brother whom he opposes denies certain extremes he declares that all who adopt the premillennial view are cut from the same pattern and tarred with the same brush. He implies that all of these think more of their premillennial view than of anything else and have more in common with "denominational premillennialists" than they do with "the Lord's church." He insists that one cannot be in the latter and disagree with the orthodox position on the millennial reign.

The trap is now set. The trigger is baited for "scandalizing" the body of Christ and destroying a brother for whom Christ died. But how can this brother be "set at nought"? The preacher informs the congregation that "the loyal churches" will cut them off if they "fellowship premillennialists." He declares that if they do not "put away such wicked persons" the time will come when they cannot even get a "faithful preacher" to conduct a funeral service for their dead. He calls for the congregation to "line up with the faithful brotherhood." Then Romans 16:17 is used as the stick with which to throw the trap. "Mark them which cause divisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which you have learned and avoid them." Now a humble brother whose only sin is that of thinking for himself is hounded out along with those who refuse to bow their knees to despotism, and who regard no one as high priest except Christ Jesus.

Does someone insist that this description is exaggerated? I deny it! The truth is I am describing actual cases of which I have been aware. Who caused the offence, that is, baited the trap? Is it a crime for one to study the word of God for himself? Is it a crime to reach a conclusion from such a study? Is it a crime to retain a conviction until one is personally convinced that he is in error?

Who was at fault when the hierarchy demanded that Galileo, under threat of torture, retract his theory that the earth revolved around the sun? Was the position which obtained at that time— that no person had a right to hold an opinion without consent of the church— a correct one? Is that position correct now? I charge without hesitancy that those who make of the church a mere party to uphold any millennial position as a test of fellowship are the ones who cause division.

A man may be in Christ and know nothing about the millennium. One can be in Christ and be mistaken about the millennium. He can be in Christ and interpret the scriptures from an amillennial or premillennial viewpoint. This does not mean both views are correct. It merely argues that being in Christ Jesus is not contingent upon either view. One is not in Christ because he is right about the millennium, but because he acknowledges Jesus as Lord over his life. It is absurd and asinine for people who trust in the Lord Jesus Christ to fall out over how and when he will come again. This is an event over which neither group can exercise control. It will occur in God's time and manner regardless of our ideas about it.

To form parties around our interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy and set at nought our brethren is sinful, scandalous and sensual. It shows we are babes in Christ, that we are yet carnal and walk as men. It reveals we are still partaking of the works of the flesh. We are stupid and short-sighted when we allow men to use us as partisan pawns about such matters and herd us into factional alignments.

My Position

The doctrine I have learned is that division in the family of God is contrary to the will of God. My Father does not want His children shivered into splinter groups or warring tribes. He loves all of His children as I love both of mine. For that reason I positively refuse to allow any man or group to put a party brand upon me which will separate or segregate me from any of my brethren. I shall keep an eye upon those who try to enlist me in their exclusive little segments and avoid them. I will keep out of their way when they try to get me to be a front man for their little cliques and clans.

I belong to Jesus Christ. He bought me with his blood and I do not intend to sell out to anyone else for anything less. No one can make me believe that I can best love God by mistreating His other children. The ones I shall mark and avoid are those who try to get me to mark and avoid all others outside of their little coteries and circles. I know they are factional and divisive. Their very attitude is contrary to all that Jesus came to accomplish.

It is true that I have learned a lot of other things which commend themselves to me as the doctrine of Christ but I do not intend to defend or denounce them. Having learned that doctrine that division is a sin, I shall mark and avoid all who create schisms and offences contrary to this doctrine. No man can be sound and sectarian at the same time. My aim is to save souls and lead men to Christ. It is not to increase or enlarge any party or faction as such. It is enough with me if the Lord adds men to the one body without me trying to entice them into some party or faction. I intend to stand fast in the freedom wherewith Christ set me free. And I shall defend for others the same freedom I demand for myself! I am not for sale!

I am sometimes asked if this will not create some problems for others in their attitude toward me. It will for those who are not free. Any free man in Christ is a problem for those who are factious. Every faction has to corral and brand all others and one who does not wear a party label of any kind presents a serious problem. The problem is not created by my freedom but by their factionalism. Let them become free and the problem will be solved. Let them tear down their corral fences and remove their artificial barriers and keep an eye on those who would build them up again and remain aloof from them and all of us can be happy in Jesus and with each other.

In the past, instead of marking those who are divisive, it was generally those who were divisive who did the marking, accompanying it with such cutting and slashing as rendered the body a spectacle of shame and disgrace to an unbelieving world.

It is time to stop this form of insanity which makes us bite and devour the body of which we are a part. Jesus died to make Christians— not cannibals!

The apostle describes the characters to be marked and avoided. "Such creatures are no servants of Christ our Lord, they are slaves of base desires; with their plausible and pious talk they beguile the hearts of unsuspecting people" (verse 18). Have we become so hardened against our brethren for whom Christ died that we regard those who differ with us about some point of trivia as "no servants of Jesus Christ our Lord but slaves of their base desires"? Are we so callous that we will thus brand God's children who honestly disagree with us about some method of propagating the gospel or caring for orphans and other needy? Are we so benumbed in spirit and frigid of heart that we conclude that every brother and sister who expects Jesus to come in advance of the millennium is "no servant of Jesus Christ our Lord"? Are we mere robots of steel, case-hardened and unfeeling, so that we can drive out from our midst every saint who testifies to a life-changing experience with the Holy Spirit?

If these do not fall into such a category as Paul describes, why do we twist and wrest this scripture as applicable to them? Have we been chloroformed by our own orthodoxy and paralyzed by partisan prejudice until we cannot see that to employ this passage to project division makes of us the aggressors and the ones to be marked and avoided? Why do factional promoters quote this verse and apply it to others? Is this the way to add brotherly kindness to godliness and love to brotherly kindness? Is this how we fulfill the admonition to speak not evil one of another? Is this the way to eliminate envying and strife and to overcome confusion and every evil work?

I know not what course others may take, but as for myself I have resolved never again to be brought into serfdom to any man or made the slave of any machine. I shall steadfastly refuse to be made a cat's paw for any clan or a carrier pigeon for any party. I will be answerable to God for my thoughts and actions and will allow no one to control my thinking down here who cannot assume responsibility for it up there. If I must answer for it in heaven I shall reserve the right to do it for myself on earth. I can best face the head of the one body by cherishing and nourishing every other member attached unto him. I can best serve the Shepherd by associating with all of the sheep rather than by foraging with a few of them in the arrogance of isolation from the flock.

I shall value a brother in Christ Jesus more highly than I value what he thinks, knowing that the blood of Jesus makes him priceless even while his thoughts are imperfect. All of the brothers I have are "brothers in error." There are no other kind. Those who think they are not are in the worst error of all. But if they were good enough for God to accept they are not too bad for me to acknowledge. They can be my brothers on the same basis they are His children, and I will not stigmatize them as causing division when they are simply victims of it like the rest of us.

I am moved to conclude this chapter with a lengthy quotation from another source. It is my hope that you will not be deterred from reading it in its completeness despite its extended form. I have drawn it verbatim from The Early Days of Christianity, a volume of over 650 pages, written by Frederic W. Farrar, and published in 1884. In addition to being Chaplain in Ordinary to Queen Victoria, the author was also a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; and Archdeacon and Canon of Westminster. The book was dedicated to Robert Browning, the poet, who was an esteemed friend of the author.

> But unity does not exclude diversity— nay, more, without diversity there can be no true and perfect unity. Where there is no unity there is distraction, but where there is no diversity there is death. Where the spirits of the prophets are not subject to the prophets— where every man is conscious only of his own invisible consecration— where, as in the Church of Corinth, every one in his fanatical egotism is anxious to shout down the truths revealed to others, that he may absorb the attention of all by his own "tongue," however barbarous, however dissonant, however unintelligible— where it is ignored that amid the diversities of gifts and ministrations there is yet the translucent energy of one and the same Spirit— there is confusion, and railing, and irreligious strife.

And where, on the other hand, all lips mechanically repeat the same shibboleth for centuries after its significance has been worn away— where the dulness of a self-styled "orthodoxy" has obliterated the many hues of the wisdom of God— where enquiry is crushed under the heel of authority— where, in fact, there can be no independent enquiry because all conclusions are dictated beforehand by the tyranny of an usurped infallibility— there is uniformity indeed, but therewith corruption and decay.

When it is persecution to alter the perspective of a doctrine, and death to leave the cart-rut of a system— when they who question the misinterpretations of Scripture which have been pressed into the service of popular errors must face the anger of startled ignorance— when there is no life left to save the spark which glows in the ashes of the Martyr, or the lamp which flickers in the Reformer's cell— then the caste which has seized the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven may boast indeed of unity, but it is the unity produced by selfishness in the few, and serfdom in the many. The unity so secured is but the stagnancy of the unrippled water, the monotony of the barren sands. It is the unity of the dead plain, "where every molehill is a mountain, and every thistle a forest tree."

In this latter condition there is a deadlier peril than in the former. Even discords can be inwrought into the vast sequences of some mighty harmony, but what great music can be achieved with but a single note? Unbroken unanimity may be the boast of a deadening Buddhism, a withered Confucianism, a mechanical Islam; it cannot exist in a free and living Christianity. If it exists at all, it can only be as a uniformity of indifference and ignorance — a uniformity of winter and of night. The uniformity of the noonday is only for the Infinite. For finite beings, if there be any light at all, there must be the colors of the sunset, and the sevenfold luster of the rainbow, which is only seen when there is rain as well as sun.

Withdraw Yourselves

Contents

The expression "withdraw fellowship" is not found in the sacred scriptures. This ought to give pause to those who claim to "speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where the Bible is silent." The word "fellowship" is our inadequate English translation of koinonia, a Greek term which means "to share a common life." The life which we share in common is eternal life. It dwells with the Father and was made visible to the apostles. One of them wrote, "What we have seen and heard we declare to you, so that you and we together may share in a common life, that life which we share with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ" (1 John 1:3. NEB).

No man or group of men can receive one into this fellowship. No man or group of men can withdraw it. The fellowship can neither be extended nor withdrawn by any being in the flesh. It can only be shared. Men cannot dispense eternal life, nor can they deny it. We are called into the fellowship of Jesus Christ by the Father Himself, and His fidelity is at stake in the call (1 Cor. 1:9). The New English Version aptly renders this, "It is God himself who called you to share in the life of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord; and God keeps faith."

In spite of this legalistic sects in our day continually engage in what they call "withdrawal of fellowship," and indulge in the heady notion that when they exclude an honest dissenter from their number the recording angel in heaven immediately expunges his name from the Lamb's book of life. Those who regard the love letters indited by the apostles as a written code, transform themselves into God's executive board and law enforcement agency, and exercise the power of banishment, without realizing that their petty tyrannical action is given no recognition in heaven, except as a mark against them for such unloving and unbrotherly action.

Every sect is built upon fear, and fear breeds unwholesome attitudes. It promotes suspicion of any new concept and becomes agitated when confronted with dissent. It is an easily provable fact that it was the Roman hierarchy which took the word "heresy" and injected into it the idea that it consists of holding or expressing any view contrary to the orthodox, or official view of the church. The word "heresy" thus became a club to batter and bludgeon into unwilling compliance every original thinker. And the chief threat was excommunication, a word meaning, "out of the fellowship." Rome was the first legalistic sect, and the mother of all sects, and the spirit which she breathed gave life to other legalistic parties, even to those which challenged her claim to primacy.

Any religious group on earth which makes any opinion honestly held as a deduction gleaned from personal study of the sacred scriptures, a test of fellowship or a condition of union or communion, is suckling from the paps of "the hoary mother on the Tiber." Any group which excludes from its number a humble and non-factious brother simply because he differs in his thinking with "the official norm" is practicing on a minor scale the tactics of the Inquisition, and takes its place beside the persecutors of all ages.

Of course, those who make sincere dissent the ground for excommunication do not realize they are enforcing an unwritten creed, as damaging and destructive as all creeds invented to secure uniformity. Actually they assume they are being faithful to the word of God. But whatever a man must believe to be received and recognized by any group is the creed of that group.

Few factional groups realize that they search the scriptures to find some "heavenly" validation for their presuppositions, attitudes and actions, yet this is the accepted procedure of all sectarianism. In the case now under discussion, men with the sectarian spirit lifted an expression from its setting and wove around it an elaborate tissue of traditional dogma which had no relationship to its apostolic significance.

The instruction of Paul, as given in 2 Thessalonians 3:6, by the translators appointed by King James reads thus: "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye received of us." This is a statement appearing in a context, and if fairly interpreted must be interpreted within that context. To better understand how it has been abused let me specify a few things the context does not sanction or teach.

It does not teach "withdrawal of fellowship" by a congregation. It has nothing to do with a public corporate action. It says nothing about writing out charges and demanding a public acknowledgment of guilt. It is not even related to a mistaken view of some scriptural teaching or a deduction from the sacred oracles which may be wrong. In fact, the context gives to the term "disorderly" a specific application, and it has to do with daily conduct and behavior. It is not remotely related to an idea about scripture, whether right or wrong.

The problem is the age-old one of reading back into the apostolic letters modern ideas to justify our present practices. The remedy is to ignore what we "want to prove" and inaugurate an investigation of the conditions which called forth the letter. What situation at Thessalonica demanded correction and prompted the recommendation of the apostle? What did he actually say? What did he mean by what he said? What action did he expect the saints to take? It sounds well and good to raise these questions but it will not be easy to accomplish our purpose in asking them because men are reluctant to admit they have been wrong. Even when forced to admit their application was unjustified they still want to salvage from it some crumb of comfort and save face.

The sincere student who seeks only truth will simply confess that he misunderstood a passage and was wrong about it. It will make no difference how long he taught his mistaken view or how many he influenced to accept it. I have absolutely no hesitancy in stating that I was in error on 2 Thessalonians 3:6 most of my past life. I used it as a basis for driving out from us men and women whose only "sin" was daring to think out loud. Many of the things they said then I accept now. They were ahead of me in many particulars. Unfortunately, I had "zeal, but not according to knowledge." I was wrong in spite of my sincerity. Let me share with you the things I learned which forced me to change.

Background Material

Thessalonica was a city of pride. Location, history and status all contributed to the feeling of self-gratification among the citizens. But some of it was false pride. It was empty and vacuous.

The hot springs gushing from the earth in numerous places gave the city its original name of Therma. The rivulets from these, emptying into the sea, came in contact with the colder water and created a cloud of vapor through which sailing ships appeared as argosies of the skies. It was for this reason the body of water was designated "the Thermaic Gulf." The harbor bustled with the activity created by vessels of lading from many ports.

It was Cassander who changed the name of the city. The son of Antipater he married the daughter of Philip of Macedon. The latter had won a great victory on the very day that a runner brought him news of the birth of a baby girl. He returned word that she was to be called Thessalonica. After she married Cassander, he was assigned the task of slum clearance and modernization in the city which had not carted away the rubble of preceding wars. Not only did he alter the city, but changed its name to that of his wife. In honor of her he issued new coinage on which the form of "Victory" was imprinted. It was no dishonor for a city to bear the name of the sister of Alexander the Great.

In our own United States of America, Highway 66 (now Interstate 44) was long recognized as the chief arterial thoroughfare from coast to coast. Chambers of Commerce advertised their cities along this route with the slogan, "On the Main Street of America." There is some evidence that publicity groups for various municipalities functioned even in apostolic days. If so, the advertisers in Thessalonica could have adopted the phrase, "On the Main Street of the Empire." The famous Via Egnatia, the main artery through which life flowed from the heart of Rome to the remote extremities of the Asian world, passed directly through the center of Thessalonica. It was the largest and most influential city from Dyrrhachium to the Hellespont. Every pulse beat of the empire was felt as it surged through the political and economic veins of the district.

Most important is the fact that Thessalonica was a "free city." This cherished status was granted to but few places in the Greek world. Sometimes it was bestowed as a political gesture because of an illustrious past, as in the case of Athens. Again it was given as a reward for assistance to the armed forces of the empire in a period of crucial struggle, as in the case of Tarsus. This was true also of Thessalonica. After the assassination of Julius Caesar by the republican conspirators, a civil war began which culminated on the plains of the River Strymon, between Philippi and Thessalonica. These plains have been called "The Deathbed of the Roman Republic." Here the imperial forces led by Augustus and Mark Antony completely overwhelmed the army led by Brutus and Cassius.

As a result, Philippi was made a military colony (colonia) and Thessalonica a free city *(urbs libera). There were four distinct privileges accorded a free city. (1) The citizens were self-governing and not subject to a district administrator appointed by Rome. They could determine their own form of government and were wholly responsible for its application. The local magistrates held the power of life and death over the citizenry, but were responsible for any outbreaks of violence. (2) No armed Roman guard was stationed in a free city and the citizens were not subjected to the sight of an occupational force. (3) No Roman insignia, either political or militaristic, could be displayed. This avoided the frequent revolts which occurred elsewhere when the hated symbols violated places held sacred by the populace. (4) In most cases freedom from taxation (libertas cum immunitate) was granted, and direct descendants of original families, as well as retired soldiers, were supported by the dole if they registered and requested it.

If time and space permitted it would be a genuine privilege to show our readers how this background is woven into the very language in Acts describing Paul's encounter in the city, and how it also provides an understanding of many of the very phrases appearing in his two epistles to the Thessalonians. However, we must forego the pleasure to be derived from such a course in the interest of a more limited pursuit. We shall begin by investigating the general effect upon the inhabitants of a city of the declaration of *urbs libera.

Obviously the decree would eliminate a great deal of personal responsibility and provide much time for leisure. In a cultural environment like the one at Athens this afforded the average citizen opportunity for listening to the various philosophers, most of whom conducted their dialogues in the Forum, or marketplace. At Thessalonica, devoid as it was of such scholastic opportunities, the tendency was for many of the men to degenerate into lazy and irresponsible louts and loungers, ready for any excitement which might be aroused to offset the monotony. This type of character is depicted in the references we have seen to the Thessalonians in the literature of the times, and the rabble might well be described in the words of Epimenides concerning the Cretans— "liars, vicious brutes, lazy gluttons" (Cp. Titus 1:12). This will explain what happened in Thessalonica as described by Luke.

> But the Jews, in a fury of jealousy, got hold of some of the unprincipled loungers in the marketplace, gathered a crowd together, and set the city in an uproar. Then they attacked Jason's house in an attempt to bring Paul and Silas out before the people. When they could not find them they hustled Jason and some of the brothers before the civil authorities, shouting, "These are the men who have turned the world upside down and have now come here, and Jason has taken them into his house. What is more, all these men act against the decrees of Caesar, saying there is another king called Jesus!" By these words the Jews succeeded in alarming both the people and the authorities, and they only released Jason and others after binding them over to keep the peace.

A congregation of saints exists within an environment and cannot be wholly disaffected by it. Those who compose it are also victims of their own past conditioning. This will serve to explain why Paul laid such emphasis upon the necessity of securing honest employment, holding it, and earning one's own livelihood. He did this in three ways.

1. By personal command while with the brethren. In his first epistle he directs them to "look after your own business, and to work with your hands, as we commanded you" (4:11). In his second epistle, he says, "For even during our stay with you we laid down the rule: the man who will not work shall not eat" (3:10).

2. By personal example in their midst. "Remember, brothers, how we toiled and drudged. We worked for a living night and day, rather than be a burden to anyone, while we proclaimed before you the good news of God" (2 Thess. 1:9). "You know yourselves how you ought to copy our example. We were no idlers among you; we did not accept board and lodging from anyone without paying for it; we toiled and drudged, we worked for a living night and day, rather than be a burden to any of you— not because we have not the right to maintenance, but to set an example for you to imitate" (2 Thess. 2:7-9).

3. By special admonition in both epistles. "Let it be your ambition to keep calm and look after your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we ordered you, so that you may command the respect of those outside your own number, and at the same time may never be in want" (1 Thess. 4:11,12).

These letters grew out of life situations. They were written to cover actual conditions. The favors for which they express thanks were real. The behavior which was commanded was genuine. The rebukes administered were not for imaginary wrongs. The corrections prescribed were not for fictitious ills. We can visualize the state of the brethren from that which was written to and about them. This fact lays a foundation of a scripture which has been wrested and contorted— 2 Thessalonians 3:6.

> Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye received of us.

On the basis of this passage honest dissenters have been hounded out of every faction and sect. Every disagreement with "the powers that be" and with those "who appear to be somewhat" has been labeled a disorderly walk and action has been taken to "withdraw fellowship." In my own days of factional adherence and bigotry, I misused the passage as justification for refusal to recognize many of my brethren in the Lord Jesus. I was wrong! I am ashamed of the spirit of intolerance which I sought to excuse by this verse. I am also ashamed of the ignorance which prompted that spirit. I am convinced from unbiased research that what is commonly called "withdrawal of fellowship" is not countenanced in the verse and corporate action resulting in excommunication of a brother is not even a consideration in it.

The problem of interpretation centers around the meaning of "walking disorderly." The word for disorderly is ataktos. It occurs in the form of an adverb twice (2 Thess. 3:6,11). It occurs in the verb form ataktein once (verse 7). When applied to the military it means "to break rank, to get out of step." When applied to another orderly arrangement such as a school or business, it means "to play truant." It has to do with a slack and irresponsible attitude. Dr. Barclay mentions its use in the papyri, "in an apprentice's contract in which the father agrees that his son must make good any days on which he absents himself from duty or plays truant."

The context clearly shows that Paul used it to designate the idleness into which the brethren had drifted, or lapsed. Having reached the mistaken view that the return of Christ was imminent, they saw no further need for working. They gave up their jobs and decided to live off the other brethren, even prying into their personal affairs and becoming busybodies in other men's matters. Paul defines "disorderly" by showing both what it is and what it is not. In verse 11 he shows that it consists of "working not at all." In verses 7, 8, he demonstrates that he did not behave disorderly because he did not eat any man's food without paying for it, but supported himself by secular labor engaged in by day and by night.

To walk disorderly, in this context, is to live in idleness and sponge off of the other brethren. To read anything else into it is to ignore the setting entirely and twist the scriptures capriciously and arbitrarily to fit a preconceived idea or notion. But what should be done to a person who simply will not get or keep a job and earn his own bread? The teaching is plain.

1. The brethren are commanded in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to "Withdraw yourselves from every brother who walketh disorderly," that is, who falls into idle habits. The Revised Standard Version renders it, "Keep away from any brother who is living in idleness." Today's English Version says, "Keep away from all brothers who are living a lazy life." The Authentic Version reads, "Shun every brother who behaves as a shirker." Barclay translates, "Keep yourselves from every brother who behaves like a truant." The New English Bible has it, "Hold aloof from every Christian brother who falls into idle habits."

There is not the slightest intimation of congregational or corporate action. It has no relationship to public or formal discipline. It is individual. No action is taken on the idle person. Nothing is done to him. He is simply left where he is while the brethren step back from him. To "withdraw yourselves" means to step back, to retreat, or to retire from the scene. Observe that the one from whom the brethren are to step back or hold themselves aloof is a brother, although a lazy one who is living in idleness. Paul twice refers to the lazy individual as a brother.

"Withdraw" is from stello which means "to gather up." It was used for gathering up and binding one's loose outer garment to keep it from coming in contact with that which would soil or contaminate it. It was used for furling the sails of a ship to keep them from striking together and suffering damage. It is the term which would apply when a mother called her children into the house to protect them from threatened danger. It is easy to see how it came to mean, "to avoid, to hold aloof."

The brethren in Thessalonica were simply commanded to refrain from extending hospitality to loafers and slackers. They were not to feed them for the command was that "if any would not work neither should he eat" (verse 10). If one of these dawdling drones appeared at the front door just before mealtime he was to be offered a job instead of food. If he refused the former he was to be refused the latter. One who shunned honest toll was to be gently shunted from the table. It was just that simple.

2. The idle busybodies were commanded and exhorted to get a job. "That with quietness they work and eat their own bread." The term "busybody" is especially interesting since it is a play upon words. In the original it incorporates the word for "work." In verse 11 Paul uses the verb ergazomai, to work, and follows it with periergazomai, busy-bodies. Those who neglected their own work, which should have been central in their own lives were flitting and buzzing around telling others how to conduct their business. The prefix peri means "around" as in periscope or periphery. W. E. Vine says a free rendering of the passage would be, "Some who are not busied in their own business, but are overbusied in that of others."

"Quietness" is from hesuchia. It implies that tranquillity which arises from within and causes no disturbance of others. The Greeks had a different word for that serenity which proceeds from without but it would not have been as appropriate here. The idle brother was to secure a job and earn his own keep, without creating problems and complications for others in the congregation.

3. "And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed" (verse 14). "Note" is from semeioo, of which W. E. Vine says, "In the Middle Voice, to note for oneself and is so used in 2 Thess. 3:14, in an injunction to take cautionary note of one who refuses obedience to the Apostolic word by the Epistle." In the commentary in which Vine teams up with C. F. Hogg, there occurs this interesting observation, "continuous tense, suggesting that no hasty conclusion was to be drawn from an act, but that the course and general conduct was to be observed."

The phrase "have no company with him" is intended to forbid the extending of hospitality. It would preclude invitations to social gatherings to which the idle might flock and at which they would eat at the expense of others. The word ashamed is from entrepo, and refers to a "wholesome shame which involves a change of attitude and conduct."

4. Although the offender is to be noted and hospitality refused while he persists in idleness, the record says, "Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." Refusal to furnish food for such a person does not mean he is to be treated as a heathen. He is simply a lazy and indolent brother, who must be shunned to save him from his course. When a man cannot be reached through appeal to his heart he may have to be reached through appeal to his stomach. So long as his head is empty and his stomach is full little can be done.

It is almost impossible to imagine how the tangled maze of disciplinary action— boycott, excommunication, accusation, and congregational exclusivism— has grown out of this passage. We can only conclude that when men seek for justification for their sectarian attitudes they will find it. "Withdraw yourselves" provided the handy passage to satisfy their partisan needs because it contained the word "withdraw' and they swooped down and appropriated it as a new weapon in the arsenal of factionalism.

It would be humorous, were it not so serious, that the passage has been used to exclude people for almost every thought that has been expressed, but has never been used to deal with the problem which the apostle had in mind. I have never known of anyone being hailed before the congregation on the charge of laziness. Perhaps it is recognized that, in some places, if idle habits were made a test of fellowship, there might not be enough persons remaining to even have meetings. Again, it has to be remembered that it may be that in most places the membership is too lazy to bring an accusation of laziness.

I suspect the King James Version is partially responsible for our condition and if some of the other versions had been used the brethren might have been saved the embarrassment of confessing their mistaken application. I suggest that those who are really concerned read the third chapter of the Second Thessalonian letter in *The New English New Testament.

Walking in the Light

Contents

> But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin (1 John 1:7).

No discussion of fellowship can ignore this statement. It is apparent that the fellowship mentioned is conditioned upon "walking in the light" and doing so to the extent that God is in the light. But what is the light? What is darkness? What is it to "walk in the light"? An objective analysis of this passage and a proper answer to these questions produces a real surprise to partisan defenders who have merely accepted a traditional explanation without study or investigation.

It is not my intention at present to outline at length the background of this epistle. That belongs more appropriately to the next chapter and my discussion of the implications of 2 John 10, 11. It will suffice now to say that at the time of this writing, the last survivor of the apostles was living in Ephesus. Here he came into direct contact with the sect of the Gnostics who had infiltrated and disturbed every congregation in the Greek world. These philosophic cultists pretended to special insights and claimed to have knowledge of the mystical and elemental structure of the universe. They took their title from gnosis, knowledge. They were the "knowing ones," those on the inside, as opposed to the uninitiated.

Although there were various schools of gnostic thought, all were basically agreed upon the idea underlying their synthetic philosophy, that all matter is essentially evil. On this basis they concluded that God could not have personally and directly created the world because He could have no contact or relationship with evil. By the same token they concluded that Jesus was either a phantom, or that he was born of a union of Joseph and Mary and elevated to Sonship with God at his baptism by John. Under the leadership of Cerinthus and other advocates of that day, this philosophy wormed its way into every congregation in Asia Minor. Wherever it went it destroyed the faith of many in the fact that Jesus had come in the flesh.

Prevalent in the theory was the idea that there could be no possible union between the human and the divine. The former was material, and therefore, evil; and the possibility of fellowship between them was regarded as absurd and ridiculous. God was so far outside of and above the universe which had been created by a demiurge, one of a series of emanations which had gone out from the divine essence, that He was wholly unconcerned about anything on earth and completely without interest in mankind. There could be no direct bridging of the chasm between deity and humanity, and from this stemmed two conclusions. Jesus was not deity manifested in a body of flesh and there was no such thing as a stage of fellowship between God and man. There was no koinonia, no sharing of a common life.

John counters this theory with his gospel record. This will account for the difference between it and the "synoptics." This term is applied to Matthew, Mark and Luke, because their contents can be charted in parallel columns and synchronized. A synopsis can be made which will be true to all three. The gospel according to John does not lend itself to such treatment. It was written for a distinctive purpose and to meet a wholly different need. The first two epistles of John were written for the same purpose. Both specifically deal with the treatment to be accorded to those who "deny that Jesus is the Christ" (1 John 2:22), that is, "that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (2 John 7).

An analysis of 1 John in the light of its background and the circumstances which called it forth, is one of the most rewarding experiences which can come to the dedicated Bible student. John begins by affirming that eternal life, which was with God from the beginning, was manifested and made visible unto men, and that he was one of the selected witnesses who beheld that life embodied in a person and could testify to it. "We have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life." Since eternal life was with the Father from the beginning, and was not merely extension of time, but possessed the quality of personality, the pre-existence of the "Word of life" was thus asserted.

Nature of the Testimony

The fact that prior to the manifestation, the Word was in a different state, does not argue against existence. It serves only to demonstrate that the incarnation revealed to human eyes what previously had been hidden from them. Once accepted, this would deal a blow to elemental gnosticism. But there was a group of gnostics called the Docetics, from dokeo, to appear, to seem. These alleged that Jesus possessed no reality, and that he was immaterial, and a phantom (or phantasy). For their benefit the apostle shows that the Word not only became flesh, but was actually subject to examination by the senses.

He argues against the possibility of the witnesses being deceived or deluded upon the basis of their intimate personal association with the embodied Word. From the standpoint of time, proximity, and conscious interest, they had ample opportunity to examine the validity of His claims. They were with Him long enough and were associated with Him closely enough that they could not be misled. Their own careers and very lives were staked upon His veracity. They had left all and followed Him.

Their examination of eternal life personified in the flesh was audible, visual and manual. "We have heard, we have seen with our eyes, we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life." The best proof is visual, and this is stressed. Not only did they see Jesus with their eyes, but they looked upon him. This has to do with studied investigation or prolonged scrutiny. Theirs was no mere passing glance. They did not simply look at Jesus, but they looked upon him. They knew He was not a phantom. They touched Him and handled Him. The apostles were qualified witnesses. Their testimony met all of the requirements essential to proving a point of fact.

Their experience with the manifested Word made possible a fellowship with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. Eternal life became incarnate in Jesus, and when Jesus took up his abode in them, eternal life became incarnate with them. "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life" (1 John 5:11,12). When the Word of life became embodied, that Word was designated the Son of God. When eternal life dwells in us we are also called sons of God. "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God" (3 :1).

The declaration of what the apostolic witnesses had seen and heard was to make possible the extension of the divine human fellowship unto their hearers and thus provide for them fulness of joy. The essence of the message which had been conveyed unto them by God, and which they, in turn, conveyed to others, was summed up in the words, "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." Since the declaration was to assure fellowship of the human with the divine, and since it consisted of the statement that God is light in the absolute, it is obvious that nothing can be of greater importance than identification of the light. Fellowship with God is conditioned upon walking in that light.

Fellowship is not by word but by walk. It is not the testimony of the lips but of the life. The word "walk" means more than merely making progress in a given direction, or of placing each foot alternately before the other. It involves experience and sharing of thought and life. "And Enoch walked with God, and he was not (found) for God took him" (Genesis 5:24). "Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God" (Genesis 6:9). Inasmuch as God is light, to say that one is in fellowship with God while walking in darkness is to lie and do not the truth. Darkness is the opposite to light.

Identifying the Light

> But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

What is the light? In this context the light is what God is, for God is light. The word "light" is used as a symbol for various qualities or things in the inspired scriptures. Sometimes it is used for divine revelation, and the unrevealed, the mysterious, is darkness. Sometimes it is used for reverence of the living God, and idolatry is darkness. More frequently it is used for knowledge, and ignorance is darkness. Only by studying the frame of reference in which the term is employed can one be certain of its meaning.

In this connection, we can eliminate from consideration anything which it is not possible for man to possess in the same degree as God, that is, in an absolute or perfect degree. "God is light and in him is no darkness at all . . . If we walk in the light *as he is in the light." This immediately excludes knowledge of God's will from consideration. It is obvious that none of us can have the same degree of mental perception as God. The finite mind cannot embrace the scope of the infinite. To walk in the light cannot mean either to perfectly understand God's will or to perfectly do it. This would require something we do not have in the flesh.

Fortunately, we can determine from this brief epistle what light is, as John uses the word. Light is love. It is not, however, affection, sentiment or passion. The love of which John speaks is agape, the love which God had for us which prompted him to send Jesus to die for us in our unworthiness. It is that active and energetic good will which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object. It must be expressed. It can never be passive. It is apprehended in its demonstration which is always outreaching and outgoing. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us" (3:16). It is this in which we must walk. This is the light and Jesus was light embodied.

Light is love and since the opposite of light is darkness, the darkness must be hate. Once this is grasped every sentence in the epistle falls into place like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle and a beautiful picture results. Let us proceed with the proof of our assertion. To abide in the light is to love the brethren. "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him" (2:10). If this is correct, hatred for the brethren will be darkness. "He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother is in darkness even until now" (2:9). This last is the equivalent of saying, "If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie" (1:6). "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar" (4:20).

It may be urged that the completing phrase of verse 6 is "do not the truth." This is correct for if we walk in darkness "we lie and do not the truth." But it is by brotherly love that we know we are of the truth. "And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him" (3:19). To the Greeks, truth was the reality which was at the basis of all appearance. It was the ideal which was behind every semblance.

It was the genuine. John is saying that those who are "in the truth" are obligated to walk according to it, and the reality behind God's whole purpose is love. If we say that we share in the divine nature (have fellowship with God), and walk in darkness (hate our brethren), we lie and do not the truth (miss the reality underlying the whole Christian structure).

Personification of Love

On what premise can we conclude that John introduces the theme of love in conjunction with his affirmation that the Word of life was manifested in a visible person? The answer is simply that it was the love of God which made eternal life manifest unto us. Because he loved us thus, we ought also to love one another. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him" (4:9). "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (3:16). "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another" (4:11).

The Son of God was God manifest in the flesh, reconciling the world unto himself. But that which was manifested was the Word of life which was with God in the beginning, and which was also God. But that light which was manifested was eternal life (1:2). It was this Word of life personalized which constituted the basis of the apostolic message. "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." Eternal life is not extension of time but expression of love! Read the following carefully. "This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light" (1:5). "For this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another" (3:11). "This is the message God is light." "This is the message . . . that we should love." There are not two messages. There is simply the message. It defines the nature of God and outlines the expression of that nature in those who are his sons.

And if it be true that light is love, it must follow that, if God is light, God is love. On this the record is positive. "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (4:16). "He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love" (4:8). To the serious student nothing else should be necessary to identify the light. When a writer says, "God is light," and in the very same letter twice explains what he means by saying, "God is love," it should require little intellectual ability to determine that in the context of that writer, *light is love.

Perfection of Love

We come now to the chief intellectual hurdle and the greatest challenge to the scholarly mind. If light is love, does this not imply that we must possess love in the absolute? Must we not have love in a perfect degree? Whatever light is, we must experience it, that is, walk in it to the same degree as it is manifested in God. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light." That this is absolute is proven by the statement that "God is light and in him is no darkness at all." If we walk in the light as he is in the light there can be none of the opposite effect in us.

We have already eliminated knowledge from consideration as the light because all of us are ignorant in some degree, of the will of God. No one knows as much as God. To assume that light is knowledge of God's will and that darkness is ignorance of it, is simply to make us liars. We would then have to read, "If we say that we have fellowship with him and are ignorant of any part of the divine will, we lie and do not the truth. But if our knowledge is absolute and perfect, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." No sane reasoner would want to hinge his hope of being cleansed from sin upon knowing as much as God knows.

But do we not face the same problem if we regard light as being love? Can we love as God loves? Can we walk in this light as God is in the light? I unhesitatingly affirm that we can. This was the very purpose of John's epistle. It was written to tell us why and how we must do so. The thing that disturbs many is that they regard love as something to be achieved rather than something to be experienced. But no one achieves light. It is a creation of God, a blessing to be bestowed and enjoyed. And that love which is equivalent to light is not something to be attained by human striving. It is a gift of God. It is a commitment unto us of the divine nature. "Love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God" (4:7).

When the love of God was personalized in Jesus, God revealed the possibility of incarnating the divine nature. That nature had always existed but was never expressed before as it was in Christ. "In him the whole fulness of deity dwells bodily" (Col. 2:9). In him the world could see love manifested. The nature possessed by God could now be incorporate in man, for true love was now available. "A new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth" (2:8). The true love was now reality in flesh.

The love that God requires He supplies. It is a fruit of the Spirit. It is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which is given unto us of God (Romans 5:5). It did not originate with man but with God. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us" (1 John 4:10). "We love because he first loved us" (4:19). When God dwells in us His love is perfected in us (4:12). "And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love: and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world" (4:16,17). Our love is made perfect! And as he is, so are we— and in this world!

This does not minimize our responsibility. It does not mean the human factor is eliminated. The provision of love is God's part; the expression of it is our part. God never forces us to act contrary to our will. It is His will to make love ours, it is our to will to love others, and to be like Him. This is proven by the fact that sometimes love is regarded as light which man cannot create, while at the same time man is commanded to walk in that light, that is, to exercise it in his own life. A man can love his brother or he can hate him. The manifestation of love is contingent upon the will of the individual, but one who is completely surrendered and committed to God will spontaneously and naturally walk in love. The secret is the surrender of the will absolutely to God so that the divine nature is incarnated in us as it was in Jesus. The Word must become flesh in us!

Loving Our Brothers

God is light. God is love. One who walked in love walks in light. One who dwells in love dwells in God. God dwells in such a person, so he is in the light and the light is in him. "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (4:16). It is as we love our brothers that we walk in light and move out of darkness— the darkness of hate and animosity. Let us note the things affirmed of such love.

1. To love the brethren is to abide in the light (2:10). The word "abide" is not the word for a temporary dwelling. It is not used of transients who merely stay overnight. It is not a motel enroute, but home. The light is the fixed residence of those who love the brethren. They do not merely pass through the light on their way from one area of darkness to another.

2. Love for the brethren is one of the two distinctive marks of sonship with God. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God" (3:1). "In this the children of God are manifest and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (3:10).

3. Love for the brethren is a waymark to identify the area into which we have come as that of life. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren" (3:14). The expression used here has to do with crossing a frontier. It was used of those returning from an alien country to their native land. When one is able to love the brethren unreservedly, because they are brethren, and not upon other conditions, he can know that he has left the territory where death reigns. He no longer breathes the noxious fumes of hate, he is in a purer atmosphere. He does not wade through the murky swamps of animosity. His feet are on solid ground.

4. Love for the brethren is a criterion by which we can determine if we are of the truth. It is useless to contend we are of the truth when we do not love our brethren. We can memorize the scriptures and be able to quote whole chapters but this does not demonstrate we are of the truth. "And hereby we know we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him" (3:19).

5. Love manifested toward brethren enables God to dwell in us, that is to be in fellowship with us. As we love, the divine love is perfected in us. We must love as God loved. His love was not conditioned upon our sinlessness, our perfection in knowledge, or our freedom from error. The love of God is different from all other forms of love. Love which is composed of sentiment, affection or emotion, is extended to those who are deemed worthy. The love of God creates the worth in itself. The first loves those who are precious, the others are precious because they are loved.

When we tolerate or endure those who disagree with us and love those who do not, we are no better than the despised and outcast publicans (Matt. 5:46). They loved those who reciprocated in kind. Theirs was the mutual sharing of misery.

Our love is to be creative and outgoing. It expends itself because only in so doing can it live. In loving we see God in our own hearts. "No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another God dwells in us, and his love is perfected in us" (4:12).

6. When we are partners in Brotherly Love, Unlimited, we are freed from all torment of fear. This is not true of those who are restrained and restricted by a legalistic concept of the Way. All who seek to live by law, or love by law, will spend their time on earth "bound in shallows and in miseries." Who knows if he has learned all he could learn, done all he could do, or climbed as high as he could by exertion of his own power or ability? There will always be doubt and suspicion, fear and distrust, under such a system. God changed the world by turning love loose. When we do the same we lose all fear of men on earth and of judgment after death. The secret to the carefree life is love unbounded. "Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment . . . . There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love" (4:17,18). Notice that it is only perfect love that can cast out fear. Imperfect love is always frightened and fearful.

Hating Our Brothers

In the context love is a positive, active, energetic and energizing force. It is creative. But hate is negative. Because of its nature love must express itself in positive fashion, but hate need not do so. It can be simply lack of love. Man was made with the ability to love and thus to be like God, who is love. When he fails in this respect he does not cross the frontier. One must do something to leave where he is but he need not do anything to stay where he is. Not to love is to hate! This thesis would be incomplete if we showed the nature of love without studying the nature and results of hate.

1. Hatred for brethren (that is, lack of love) leaves one in darkness. Regardless of how one may assert he is in the light, if he does not love, he lies. "He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now" (2:9). Darkness is simply absence of light. God did not create darkness. He created light.

2. Hatred of our brethren blinds us and makes true perception impossible. No man can ever grasp the import of God's revelation until he loves his brethren as God loves them. To assert that one sees the truth while hating his brothers is like a blind man claiming to view the beauties of nature. "But he that hateth his brother is in darkness and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes" (2:11).

3. Lack of love for the brethren is proof of the fatherhood of Satan in our lives. The realm of hatred is presided over by "the prince of the power of the air." Those who operate in the area of hatred and animosity are on the devil's territory. It is useless to affirm we are sons of God if we do not love God's other sons. "In this the children of God are manifested and the children of the devil" (3:10).

4. Those who do not love the brethren are still in the domain of death. They dwell like lepers in putrid sepulchers, and like the evil spirits of old "abide in the tombs." It is by love that we cross the frontier from death unto life. He who has not learned to love has not learned to live (3:14).

5. One who hates his brother is a murderer. Under the regime of Christ, thought and intent may be taken for the act. Jesus pointed out that those in olden times said, "Thou shalt not kill" but now to be angry against a brother without cause, or to slander or falsely accuse him, might result in losing one's soul. One who hates lacks only the opportunity to do violence to a brother who is the object of his wrath and spite.

6. One who does not love does not know God. He may know about God and be able to catalogue the attributes of deity. But there is a difference in the ability to identify a person and in being identified with him. It is one thing to describe another; a wholly different thing to abide in Him. "He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love" (1 John 4:8).

The Fallacy of Orthodoxy

It was my lot to grow up in a religious movement which had its inception in a sincere attempt to "unite the Christians in all of the sects." It proposed to accomplish this by the very simple expedient of renouncing all formal creeds and ignoring the sects which they had spawned and returning to the original pattern as depicted in the apostolic writings. To assure success in restoring the ancient order the slogan was adopted, "We speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where the Bible is silent."

Unfortunately for such historic efforts, the noble men who conceive them grow old and die, and are succeeded by others who retain the idea without the ideals or character. In order to preserve the gains that have been made, intellectual walls are erected, and soon the very spirit of freedom which gave rise to the effort is proscribed. The love letters of the apostles are converted into a law to be enforced, the movement itself becomes "the Lord's church," and the traditional legalistic interpretations become hallowed precepts, so that "the System" which evolves is confused with the will of God and "the scheme of redemption."

In such a project fear makes all dissent heresy and regards every divergent opinion as a threat. One who thinks becomes a danger and must either be "brought into line" or driven out. Every scripture is commandeered to man the ramparts of orthodoxy and even though it may be wrested from the contextual soil in which it was planted by the Holy Spirit, it will be used as a bludgeon to ward off attacks upon "the System." I have no hesitancy in asserting this is exactly what has happened in connection with 1 John 1:7.

It cannot be denied that the average preacher of "The Church of Christ" regards the light of which John speaks as his own creedal interpretation of the new covenant scriptures! To "walk in the light" is to live up to the traditional factional explanation of the party of which he is a member. To "walk in darkness" is to deviate in some particular, especially that of the special party emphasis, from the unwritten creed. Each party thinks it alone is in the light and all of the others are in darkness. Since "fellowship one with another" is conditioned upon "walking in the light," and since the light is the legalistic code of the faction, fellowship is regarded as ordained of God to be limited to fellow-partisans.

It would be a matter of compassion if only the ignorant and the unlearned were victims of such philosophy, but it becomes tragic when it is realized that this type of exposition is advocated by editors and journalists who have a reputation in their parties. It is even advanced by college professors responsible for teaching the younger saints. The situation would be regrettable if such teaching was given without intent to unduly influence others; it is even more so when it is done with the deliberate design of maintaining division in the family of God, and keeping apart those who would recognize each other as brethren. When the humbler believers indicate a desire to exhibit love for those on the other side of a partisan wall they are discouraged by misapplication of the statement, "If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." Actually the revised factional version should read, "If they will walk in our light as we are in that light, we will have fellowship with them."

The apostle John wrote in a time of crisis to stimulate believers in the Word of life and to encourage fellowship in love. His letter is a majestic treatise on brotherly love, unsurpassed in the whole realm of literature. In spite of this, men under guise of loyalty to Jesus single out a passage and interpret it in such a manner as to make fellowship impossible and to render every claim of the epistle upon our better selves null and void.

I deny that the light in this instance is a written code. God is light but He is not a written code. Not a letter that John wrote was either life or light. If the third epistle was either one, the apostle deliberately withheld life and light from the beloved Gaius, for he declared, "I had many things to write, but I will not with pen and ink write to thee." If the second epistle was to be life or light, it was imperfect, for John wrote. "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink." That the first letter was not intended to convey life is evident. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life" (5:13). Eternal life is not having a copy of the Bible, but having the Son of God. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life" (5:12).

Where is the congregation of believers which will brazenly affirm that it is composed only of those who know as much about God's will and purpose as God Himself? If the light in which we must walk to have fellowship, is knowledge of God's revelation, we must be either as perfect in knowledge as God or we cannot be in the fellowship. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." God is light and in him is no darkness at all." If darkness is ignorance we cannot be ignorant of anything in the universe. We must know all there is to know, and be as wise as God, or else we walk in darkness. If we say we have fellowship with Him and walk in darkness— if we are ignorant about anything— we lie and do not the truth.

The absurdity of this lies in the fact that, on the basis of this philosophy, we will have to baptize people in the morning and exclude them from our number in the afternoon, for if they do not come to a perfect knowledge as soon as they are baptized they are walking in darkness. If the champions of orthodoxy say that we must allow them time to learn, then we ask how long they may walk in darkness and still be accepted? How much of the Bible must one be able to grasp perfectly before he is walking in darkness? How much of it can he misunderstand and still walk in the light?

It is time to quit playing around with such puerile proponents of partisan positions. Where is the preacher who quotes this passage to debar humble saints and discourage an expression of fellowship among brethren, who will dare to affirm that he is as wise as God and as good as God? If he dare not say that he is, by his own admission he is not in the fellowship. Like Haman, he is hanged on the fatal gallows which he constructed to destroy others. I consider the traditional orthodox interpretation placed upon 1 John 1:7 as one of the most dangerous ever palmed off on unsuspecting men and women. It is subversive of the Spirit and a scandal to the church of God. It dooms the body to disintegration and can only damn us all to destruction if we embrace it.

Let us recapture the valid meaning of this warped and wrested passage and use it to promote fellowship, and not pervert it. God is light. God is love. If we walk in the light we walk in God. If we walk in love we abide in God. If we love our brothers we abide in the light. You cannot separate light and love. Neither can you separate those who truly love one another. We quit living together when we quit loving each other. The road to togetherness is the path of love. "And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 John 4:21). When we heed this command, and only then, can it be said "As he is, so are we," and it can be added— in this world."

Let him who aspires to be like God begin by asserting his love for the brethren, all of them. Let him love those who agree with him, and let him love those who do not. Let him place love on a higher plane than that of mere reciprocity such as the pagans exhibit. He who shares love shares God, and he who shares God shares life. Certainly we should share ideas and concepts, but more than anything else, we should share the love that is light and life!

Receive Him Not

Contents

> If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed; For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds (2 John 10,11).

This is one of the more prominent "twisted scriptures." It has become the handle for every factional tool used to pry apart the living stones in the temple of God. It is the murderous knife employed to dismember the body of the Lord. It was written by the apostle of love to protect the flock of God from the prowling wolves who sought to seduce them through denial of the foundational fact that Jesus came in the flesh. It is now used to convert the sheep into snarling dogs, snapping at each other over every stray scrap of doctrine. It has substituted the law of the pack for the love of the flock.

No other passage so well illustrates the danger of ignoring the context. That the leaders of religious thought in some sects should have been betrayed into adopting an interpretation which makes unity impossible and renders ridiculous their vaunted claim to respect for the authority of the word of God, is one of the amazing developments in the restoration movement of which we are heirs. Any use of the written word which makes impossible the fulfillment and realization of the prayer and purpose of the Living Word is abuse and misuse. We can never regain our integrity as scholars until we repudiate the partisan explanation which makes every vagary of thought and dissent an occasion to destroy the fraternal relationship created by the blood of Jesus, and stab love dead at our feet.

What is "the doctrine" which is so transcendent that one who does not attest to it must not be allowed to enter the house, nor be given a greeting on the street or in the marketplace? Or, looking at it from the opposite position, what is it that, when advocated is so heinous and so poison to the fellowship, that to merely salute its opponent is to make one a participant in his vicious works? To this question a medley of things is contributed by factional voices. Every trivial idea which has been magnified out of all proportion to its value and worth is exalted to the status of the doctrine which is to preclude hospitality and make all greeting a violation of the Word of God. So ludicrous are some of these that it serves no good purpose to even mention them.

The depth of one's love for the family of God can be determined by the relative value of those things which will cause one to sacrifice it or to break up the relationship. The triviality of those views elevated to a higher station than the family ties created by the blood of the cross is indicative of the shallowness and superficiality of thought eating like a pernicious cancer at the heart of a wonderful fellowship created by God and inaugurated by the indwelling Spirit.

Who can believe that the apostle who wrote more about brotherly love than any other man, would recommend that we refuse entrance to our homes to those saints who disagree with us over some of the things about which we debate? What sane reasoner can actually conclude that to greet a brother who disagrees with us about these matters is to become a participant in some "evil deed"? The very absurdity of such a conclusion renders obnoxious the common usage of the passage by expositors who should know better.

I do not hesitate to say that so long as men maintain such an unrealistic attitude toward the sacred scriptures they can never make an impact upon the thinking world. They will only be purveyors of prejudice, agents of animosity, and disseminators of distrust. Such explanations are exercises in eisegetics, not exegetics. They inject a meaning into the holy oracles rather than extracting one from them. And while there was a time when dogmatism held men and women in line because the masses could neither read nor write, that day is over. We face another "Great Awakening" in the religious realm. Enlightened people are growing less satisfied with the dry husks thrown out to them by factional debaters.

To what did John refer by "this doctrine"? Who were the wandering teachers who were to be refused entrance when they applied for hospitality? What condition existed at the time which made it imperative that the "elect lady and her children" refrain from giving a greeting to certain teachers? Who were those who "went beyond" and did not remain in the doctrine of Christ? Surely what they denied must have been related to the very fundamental and essential facts upon which the faith was predicated to require such drastic measures to preserve it inviolate.

General Observations

Every reputable scholar known to us believes that John was writing to counteract the pernicious effects of Gnosticism. Upon no other ground can we account for the approach of his gospel record and first two epistles. Who were the Gnostics? What did they teach? Why were they so dangerous to the Christian concept? How did John become involved in the controversy? It is not our purpose here to analyze this synthetic philosophy, interesting though it might be. We shall be content with supplying our readers with sufficient background material to enable them to see the purpose and intent of John and to recognize how modern "interpreters" among us have warped and wrested what the apostle wrote. For your own convenience and to aid the reviewers of what I write I will number the various observations.

1. The word "gnostic" is from gnosis, knowledge. The Gnostics were "the knowing ones." It was believed by the Gnostics that all matter was inherently evil and only spirit was good. Since the spirit was imprisoned in the body, and the body composed of matter, the chief aim was to free or liberate the spirit. Taking their cue from the Greek mystery religions they taught that only by probing the depths and ascending the heights of knowledge, could that which was real be delivered from the material. This required an elaborate secret ritual coupled with painful, arduous and disciplined investigation and research into the mystical infinite wisdom of God. All men were not equipped to do this, either from lack of time, inclination or ability, and the majority of these would continue on a more animal plane. The Gnostics were in a class by themselves. They were the initiated. They could "go beyond."

2. This idea of a spiritual aristocracy made up of specially endowed thinkers who were on "the inside" would wreak havoc upon the idea of fellowship. For this reason John emphasizes over and over that all saints have access to knowledge. They all possess it. The word "know" appears in various forms eleven times in chapter two of the first epistle. "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things" (2:20). "I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth but because ye know it" (2:21). The one who doesn't know where he is going is the one who hates his brother (2:11). In chapter three "know" is found 8 times, in chapter four 7 times, and in chapter five 7 times. In every instance the disciples are comforted with the thought that knowledge is not the special privilege of the few. Note the recurrence of "we know" and "ye know."

3. The Gnostics held that matter was evil. On this basis they speculated that God could not have created the earth because it was material. By the same token the idea of the incarnation was unthinkable. One group held that Jesus was simply an ethereal person, a mere phantom. They insisted he never had a real flesh and blood body, that he was pure spirit. These were called Docetics, from dokeo, to appear, to seem. John attacked this speculation by affirming that the apostles had heard, seen, scrutinized, and handled Jesus with their hands.

4. Cerinthus was the first Gnostic leader whose name has come down to us. He lived in Ephesus where John apparently wrote his epistles. According to Eusebius, the father of church historians, John knew Cerinthus for what he really was. Cerinthus made a distinction between Jesus and the Christ, or Logos. He taught that Jesus was human, the son of Joseph and Mary. But Jesus increased in wisdom and favor with God, which He could not have done if He had been God, according to Cerinthus. (See Luke 2:52). When Jesus was thirty years of age, He had lived in such a state of purity that God adopted Him, publicly announcing that Jesus was His Son in whom He was well pleased. Upon this occasion the Christ (anointing) descended upon Him in the shape of a dove. Cerinthus reasoned that Jesus could not have been God prior to this as He did not have the Spirit of God until it descended upon Him. The Christ came upon him at John's baptism.

He further contended that the Christ (Spirit) could not be killed or made to suffer pain. The human Jesus was nailed to the cross and endured agony but the Christ had withdrawn as He came, and was beyond the reach of men. It is for this reason John insists that, "This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood" (1 John 5:6). It was not just Jesus who came to be baptized but Jesus Christ; it was not just Jesus who was crucified but Jesus Christ. He did not come by water (baptism) only, but by water and blood (crucifixion).

5. The crux of the whole matter as it affected Christian faith lay simply in the fact that a Gnostic could not believe in the incarnation. It was impossible for such a person to admit that the pre-existent Logos was made flesh. This provided a real test. If one, upon being asked, "Do you believe that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh?" answered in the affirmative, you could be sure he was motivated by the Spirit of God. If he denied or hedged, as the record says, "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist" (1 John 4:1-3).

Specific Observations

Having given this meager outline of Gnostic philosophy we turn to consideration of the cult of Gnostics against whom John sought to protect the saints. Let us list some of the things about them which we can learn from his writings.

1. We know that these men pretended to have access to a source of knowledge which made them superior in wisdom to the average member of the body. It was their aim to make the Way intellectually acceptable to the philosophic schools by expressing their concepts of Christ in the language of Oriental mysticism. They belonged to an arrogant group of Philosophic aristocrats who claimed to have the ability to go beyond and penetrate the veil of true learning. The idea that Jesus had come in the flesh was but spiritual pap for infantile mentalities but could not be countenanced by the advanced reasoner. John declared that the true gnosis was the apostolic testimony and the test of knowledge of God was willingness to receive that testimony. "We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us: he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error" (1 John 4:6).

2. We know the Gnostics were respected and received by many and that they were numerous. They were regarded as possessing visionary insight and revelatory power because they were accepted as prophets. For this reason the apostle cautioned the saints to test the spirits "because many false prophets have gone out into the world" (1 John 4:1). John labels them antichrists, and says, "Even now there are many antichrists."

3. We know these men were traveling from place to place as did many of the philosophers and teachers in the Greek world and they no doubt depended upon the homes they contacted in each community to extend them hospitality. Any such home would then be used as a base for their efforts. It is significant that John says, "Many false prophets are *gone out into the world." The false prophets were doing what Jesus commissioned the apostles to do.

4. We know that the Gnostics were separatists and schismatics and that they abandoned the body of saints to create a sect of their own. The unity of the body is based upon acknowledgement of the great fact that Jesus is the Christ. When men no longer are willing to accept this foundation upon which the community of heaven was planted they become antichrists. "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us" (1 John 2:19). It is interesting that, in this context, John shows the one creed which can bind us together, repudiation of which will fragment us. "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son" (2:22). So long as one accepts fully the fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, he remains upon the foundation upon which Jesus said he would construct his community. When he forsakes that foundation he forsakes all that is Christian.

5. We know that even though the Gnostics withdrew they still sought to influence those who allowed that which they had heard from the beginning to remain in them, and continued in the Son and in the Father (2:24). These false apostles were proselytizers. Under the guise of teaching advanced truth they wormed themselves into any home which would receive them, and led those who dwelt there to deny that Jesus was the Christ. It was to warn against such teachers that John wrote, "These things have I written to you concerning them that seduce you" (2:26).

The reply of those who were solicited by these "advanced thinkers" was to be simply that they did not need any man to teach them, but having been anointed by the Holy Spirit they had access to all truth, and that truth was always consistent. The additional truth must be measured by what they had formerly been taught by the apostles. "But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him" (3:27). Those who were taught by the Spirit would abide in Christ, that is, in what they had been taught by the anointing. The Gnostics "went beyond and abode not in the doctrine of Christ" (2 John 9).

All history bears out the truth that during the lifetime of John, and in the very area where he resided and wrote, this synthetic philosophy was presented with ruthless disregard for the unity of the congregations. False prophets insinuated themselves into every company of the saints and promulgated their unhallowed speculations. It became necessary to issue blunt warnings to the saints against extending a welcome to such teachers, or allowing their homes to be used as bases from which to launch war on the elemental fact of the incarnation. This brings us to an analysis of the short epistle known as Second John. It contains the passage with which we are concerned in this article, a passage which has been twisted so that it can be used to stifle thought and stamp out all honest dissent with the partisan status quo.

The Second Epistle

We shall not enter into the controversy as to identity of the addressee of this letter. It is my personal opinion that it was written to a Christian sister and her family. It is altogether possible, and appears even probable, that the congregation of saints met in her home. It will be observed how John speaks of truth and love in the same connection. He does not regard truth as being composed merely of facts which have been verified. Truth is a relationship which transcends human relationships. John loves the elect lady and her children in the truth (verse 1). All others who have known the truth exhibit the same love. The truth dwells in God's children and is age-lasting (verse 2). The trinity of divine blessings— grace, mercy and peace— these are shared in truth and love (3). We walk in truth as required by God (4).

John approaches the primary purpose of his letter of admonition and warning with familiar language. Certain phrases are at once associated with certain writers. One of these phrases used by John is "a new commandment." Every such phrase should be considered in the light of its other appearances. That which John wrote to the elect lady will be correctly understood only in conjunction with what he wrote elsewhere upon the same topic. We must never forget the gospel record and first epistle of John are general. They were written to meet a condition faced by the community of saints at large. The second epistle is specific. It deals with the same condition on a local basis and provides a specific approach to it. But the specific must always be understood in the light of the general. One is not qualified to diagnose and treat a specific cancer until he knows the nature of cancer in general.

1. John filled his gospel record and first two epistles with a dissertation on love (*agape) but these were not written primarily to be treatises on love at all. They were produced to offset a dangerous philosophy which threatened dissolution of the community by destroying the foundation upon which it was built. Love is the antidote to such a condition because it cements and holds the hearts of the saints together in times of greatest stress. One who reads the writings of John about love will derive much pleasure from the observations of the apostle but he will never understand why John injected the teaching as he did until he remembers that love was a prescription for the body at a time when certain errors were becoming epidemic.

2. John besought the elect lady to remember that he wrote no new commandment. He simply reminded her of the commandment heard from the beginning. He identifies that commandment— that we love one another (5). Only if we recall constantly the nature of this commandment which was had from the beginning can we ever understand John properly. In 1 John 2:7, the brethren are told that John will write no new commandment unto them, but an old commandment which they had from the beginning. They are told that the old commandment is the word which they heard from the beginning.

The word is not the new covenant scriptures. They did not have this from the beginning. The new covenant scriptures grew out of needs created by later circumstances. Philemon was a letter of commendation for a runaway slave, Onesimus, who was returning to his master. Philippians was a letter of thanks for assistance to Paul when he was in prison. First Corinthians was written to deal with a demoralizing state of affairs disclosed by the visiting family of Chloe, and to answer queries in a letter brought by Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus. All this came later. The word which was heard from the beginning was "Love one another."

From the beginning Jesus said, "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you" (John 15:12). Again, "These things I command you, that ye love one another" (15:17). John wrote to the elect lady, "This is love, that ye walk after his commandments" (2 John 6). Those who regard the Way as being a legalistic system lay great stress upon this, but they fail to grasp the significance of the following statement "This is his commandment, that, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it." The previous verse tells us that what we heard from the beginning was to love one another. This is the commandment of Christ. What John is here saying is, "This is love, that we walk after his commandments, and his commandment is that we love one another, and walk in love." But why does John use "commandments" (plural) and "commandment" (singular) in the same sense? The answer is found in Romans 13:9 where we are told that all the commandments are summed up in one word, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This lifts the commandments of Christ above the level of law to the plane of love. This is the word we had from the beginning.

3. The reason for the admonition to the lady and her children to walk in love is that, "Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist" (7). Here John pointedly identifies the kind of traveling false teachers against whom he warns the recipients of this epistle. This letter was written to counter the efforts of the Gnostics. "The many deceivers who have entered into the world" are "the many false prophets who are gone into the world" (1 John 4:1). The deceivers of whom he now writes are the seducers of whom he has written. "These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you" (1 John 2:26). The things written identify the personages as antichrists (1 John 2:18). This first century apostolic letter was a pertinent and poignant warning against those who deny the teaching that Jesus was the incarnate Son of God.

The Fundamental Doctrine

4. The elect lady and her children are cautioned, "Look to yourselves, that you may not lose what you (or we) have worked for, but may win a full reward" (verse 8). The purpose of the apostolic message was to build men in love or, the Christhood of Jesus, so that the eternal life they possessed by having the Son might eventually terminate in fulness of joy in His presence. Those who face up to the fact of His divine Sonship in the flesh will be rewarded with fellowship face to face in the future. If we abide in Him here we will abide in His presence over there. But if antichrists seduce us to forfeit our faith in the greatest fact in the universe we will lose all. So fundamental is this fact of faith that rejection of it is the elemental falsehood of this age. "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? (1 John 2:22). There is one foundation of salvation and one foundation of damnation. Both are directly concerned with the same fact. "He that believeth . . . shall be saved he that believeth not shall be damned." (I trust that no carping critic will conclude that I have intentionally devaluated baptism in making this point).

5. "Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son."

To whom does the apostle relate the expression, "Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ?" What is "the doctrine of Christ?" In order to have a better perspective let us notice some of the other translations.

> Anyone who goes ahead and does not abide in the doctrine of Christ does not have God (Revised Standard Version).
>
> No one who has God goes too far and fails to stay by the teaching of Christ (Charles B. Williams).
>
> Whoever goes beyond, and does not remain within Christ's teaching, will not possess God (Authentic Version).
>
> Anyone who runs ahead too far, and does not stand by the doctrine of Christ, is without God (New English Version).

Anyone who is "advanced" and will not remain by the doctrine of Christ, does not possess God (Moffatt).

The man who is so "advanced" that he is not content with what Christ taught, has in fact no God (J. B. Phillips).

It will be noted that these substitute for "transgresseth" (King James Version) such expressions as: goes ahead, goes too far, goes beyond, runs ahead too far, and advanced. Both Moffatt and Phillips indicate by a usage of quotation marks that the term "advanced" is used in a special sense. Those who are under consideration are not really advanced thinkers; they just flatter themselves that they are. These later versions are more nearly correct than the King James Version. The word "transgress" is a translation of parabaino, and it is true that this is found in a few manuscripts. But all of the rest have proagon, which means to go ahead, to advance beyond.

This was the very claim of the Gnostics. They looked with disdain and contempt upon "the common herd" who thought of Jesus as being the Word (Logos) made flesh. They regarded him as an incorporeal emanation from the Creator who led them into advanced thought which made them "the knowing ones."

In their intellectual arrogance they had advanced to the place where they could see that Jesus was not the Christ. Jesus was human. The Christ was spirit. These two were not the same. They did not deny that Jesus existed. They did not deny that the Christ existed. They did not deny that for a period the two had been invested in the same person. But they did deny that Jesus was the Christ or that the Christ was Jesus. Jesus was not the Word (Logos) and had no prior existence to the incarnation, as they viewed it. Therefore there was no incarnation, Jesus did not come in the flesh.

The apostolic declaration was that Jesus had come in the flesh. This was basic, elemental and fundamental. The spirit which confessed this was of God; the spirit that did not confess it was not of God, but was antichrist. This was the test proposed by which to "try the spirits whether they are of God" (1 John 4:1-3). This was the foundation. One who was on that foundation might be mistaken about many things and all of them were, but there could be no mistake about the foundation. It is noteworthy that one was built upon this foundation by a positive action— confession that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (1 John 4:2). The opposite is not denial, which is also a positive action, but simply "not confessing." "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus is come in the flesh is not of God." This eliminates not only positive denial, but also neutrality. One cannot occupy a neutral position as to the identity of Christ and be built upon the foundation. The foundational fact must be confessed— as a fact! One cannot be either a gnostic or an agnostic.

6. We can determine what the "doctrine of Christ" is in this sense by the effect of "going beyond" or "abiding in it." One who advances has not God; one who "abides in it" has both the Father and the Son. The doctrine of Christ, in this case, does not consist of the things Jesus taught, but of the thing taught about Jesus. The ethical and moral values of Jesus are very important. Nothing we say here must be understood as minimizing their value. One must "keep the commandments of Jesus" (John 15:10), and if he loves Jesus he will keep them, naturally, automatically and spontaneously, for this is the only possible reaction of love. Only one who does not love Jesus will not keep His sayings (John 14:24). Yet we must all, without exception, place some qualification upon living up to the requirements of Jesus. "As far as we are able," "to the extent we understand them," "as we learn what he wishes,"— these are all our own qualifications and limitations to explain how we can have God, and how He can have us, while we fail to live up to His perfect example. We often transgress and often disobey. If we did not the Father would not need to administer chastisement. Yet we are told that all of us are partakers of such chastisement, and without this we would but demonstrate that we are bastards, and not sons.

But "the doctrine of Christ" about which John wrote cannot be qualified. It cannot be governed by mitigating circumstances. One who does not abide in it has not God. It is just that plain. It is just that positive. What is the doctrine one absolutely must have in order to have God? Whatever it is, it was possessed by all who had God while the apostles were still alive. It was possessed by "the lady and her children" and by "all others who are in the truth." It could not have been a copy of the new covenant scriptures, for no person on earth possessed that, not even the apostle John. It could not have included the Second Epistle of John for those to whom it was written were already "walking in truth" before John wrote it. This epistle could not have been a part of "the doctrine of Christ" under consideration, for there were those who had already gone beyond that doctrine when this epistle was written.

Fortunately John identifies the doctrine essential to having the Father and the Son. "Who is a liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ. No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also" (1 John 2:23). Jesus is the Christ! This is the foundation of the community of saints, the colony of heaven on earth. Jesus is the Christ! This is the only confession we may scripturally require of any penitent seeking admission to the fellowship of the redeemed. Jesus is the Christ! Every spirit which confesses this is of God. Jesus is the Christ! This is the only creed essential to overcoming the world. Jesus is the Christ! The one who believes this has the witness in himself.

But what of the advanced thinker who denies this great fact, and who poses his syncretism as special knowledge for the initiated? How was the Gnostic teacher to be treated? How was one who did not abide in this doctrine to be regarded by those who did abide in it?

7. "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed; for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds" (10,11).

"Do not receive him into the house or give him any greeting, for he who greets him shares his wicked work" (Revised Standard Version).

"If any one who comes to you does not bring this teaching, do not receive him under your roof nor greet him; for he who greets him is a sharer of his evil deeds" (Weymouth).

"If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not welcome him into your house or give him a greeting; for anyone who gives him a greeting is an accomplice in his wicked deeds" (New English Version).

"If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not receive him into your homes, do not even bid him welcome; for he who bids him welcome shares in his evil deeds" (Authentic Version).

In the face of what has already been said I would not presume upon the intelligence of the reader to further identify "the doctrine." Only those who ignore background, setting, contemporary issues and context, could ever mistake it. The application to other matters could only be made by those with a party axe to grind— those who would fasten upon the phrase "receive him not," to deny their relationship with the very brethren whom Jesus taught us to love. The warping and wresting of this scripture by factional defenders should serve as a warning to us of what happens to those whose hearts are filled with the acid of the party spirit and who search the scriptures for a means to separate and segregate themselves from other brethren in the Lord.

I have already once quoted at length from the pen of Frederic W. Farrar in his book "The Early Days of Christianity." When he produced this noteworthy volume in 1882, he was Canon of Westminster and Chaplain in Ordinary to the queen of England. Perhaps I should be reluctant to burden you with further material from his book, but that volume contains almost a whole chapter dealing with the matter we are now considering. I must omit most of it, as difficult as I find it to do so, and quote for you from his closing paragraphs.

> I know nothing so profoundly irreligious as the narrow intolerance of an ignorant dogmatism. Had there been anything in this passage which sanctioned so odious a spirit, I could not have believed that it emanated from St. John. A good tree does not bring forth corrupt fruit. The sweet fountain of Christianity cannot send forth the salt and bitter water of fierceness and hate. The Apostle of love would have belied all that is best in his own teaching if he had consciously given an absolution, nay, an incentive, to furious intolerance. The last words of Christian revelation could never have meant that these words have been interpreted to mean— namely, "Hate, exclude, anathematize, persecute, treat as enemies and opponents to be crushed and insulted, those who differ from you in religious opinions." Those who have pretended a Scriptural sanction for such Cain-like religionism have generally put their theories into practice against men who have been infinitely more in the right, and transcendently nearer God, than those who, in killing or injuring them, ignorantly thought that were doing God service.
>
> Meanwhile this incidental expression of St. John's brief letter will not lend itself to these gross perversions. What St. John really says, and really means, is something wholly different. False teachers were rife, who, professing to be Christians, robbed the nature of Christ of all which gave its efficacy to the Atonement, and its significance to the Incarnation. These teachers, like other Christian missionaries, traveled from city to city, and in the absence of public inns, were received into the houses of Christian converts. The Christian lady to whom John writes is warned that, if she offers her hospitality to these dangerous emissaries who were subverting the central truth of Christianity, she is expressing a public sanction of them; and by doing this and offering them her best wishes she is taking a direct share in the harm they do. This is common sense; nor is there anything uncharitable in it. No one is bound to help forward the dissemination of teaching what he regards as erroneous respecting the most essential doctrines of his own faith. Still less would it have been right to do this in the days when Christian communities were so small and weak. But to interpret this as it has in all ages been practically interpreted— to pervert it into a sort of command to exaggerate the minor variations between religious opinions, and to persecute those whose views differ from our own— to make our own opinions the exclusive test of heresy, and to say, with Cornelius a Lapide, that this verse reprobates "all conversation, all intercourse, all dealings with heretics"— is to interpret Scripture by the glare of partisanship and spiritual self-satisfaction, not to read it under the light of holy love.

Alas! churchmen and theologians have found it a far more easy and agreeable matter to obey their distortion of this supposed command, and even to push its stringency to the very farthest limits, than to obey the command that we should love one another! From the Tree of delusive knowledge they pluck the poisonous and inflating fruits of pride and hatred, while they suffer the fruits of love and meekness to fall neglected from the Tree of Life. The popularity which these verses still enjoy, and the exaggerated misinterpretation still attached to them are due to the fact that they are so acceptable to the arrogance and selfishness, the dishonesty and tyranny, the sloth and obstinacy, of that bitter spirit of religious discord which has been the disgrace of the Church and the scandal of the world.

Inconsistency of Orthodoxy

If I may be allowed the indulgence of using a specific example to illustrate the unwarranted application of this passage, let me state that I have heard the expression "this doctrine" applied to every item of controversy among the various factions denominating themselves "The Church of Christ." Depending upon the particular party whose champion quoted it, the expression has been related to individual cups in the observation of the Lord's Supper, to Bible classes, colleges, orphan homes, the premillennial viewpoint, instrumental music, missionary societies, and a diversified host of motley issues which have made "the robe of righteousness" a Joseph's coat which puts the rainbow spectrum to shame.

In every instance these partisan exponents have shown themselves to be utterly inconsistent. They have slashed themselves with one side of the knife which they have sharpened in eager anticipation of stabbing others. But their very inconsistency proves that each is better than his unwritten creed. These brethren dare not apply practically what they claim to believe. Take for example the preacher who quotes 2 John 10,11 in condemnation of one who cannot see that instrumental music as an aid in corporate worship is a sin. Does not the one who deplores the use of the instrument receive the other into his house— either the public meetinghouse or his private dwelling?

The fact is that all of the non-instrumental Church of Christ groups I know, not only receive into their houses those who disagree with them, but go to great lengths to try and get them into their houses. When they hold a meeting they spend money on radio and television programs, as well as newspaper advertising, all beamed at the very ones whom they condemn as "bringing not this doctrine." They go from door to door, greeting and saluting all and sundry, and when they find someone who does not agree with their position they urge him to come. They meet him at the door, welcome him warmly, and give him a "chief seat in the synagogue."

If 2 John 10,11 applies to "a Christian Church preacher" as my factional brethren so childishly designate those who use instrumental music, I charge that to even allow him to enter the house (much less invite him to come) makes them "accomplices in his evil deeds." It is such absurd, ridiculous and puerile reasoning which will keep thinking people from seeing the real force and beauty of a plea which began as "a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects." The very essence of sectarianism is exclusiveness, and if anyone is more exclusive than those who twist this scripture to justify their own sectarian prejudices I have yet to meet him. Our brethren should be ashamed to live and afraid to die!

Every party among us, even the most reactionary, will greet any person who attends their meetings— after they get over their surprise. Because of a traditional posture they would not call upon him to pray to the Father who is in all, over all and through all, but the ushers will go halfway across the house to provide him with a songbook already turned to the right page, so he can praise God with the congregation. He cannot pray out loud by himself, but he can pray as loud as he wants with others, if the prayer is set to a tune. I am thankful that literally hundreds of brethren are becoming embarrassed by the imbecility and senselessness of the preposterous position in which they find themselves. The party spirit has driven them so far down a blind alley that at least some are trying to scale the fence at the other end and escape back to Main Street again. This is good and I intend to give them a hand when I can.

I propose to regard all of God's children as my brothers. I intend to treat them as brothers. I have resolved to make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. I shall accuse no one of being an antichrist who is built upon the one foundation simply because he differs with me about such things as instrumental music or the millennium. I will not allow our divergent views upon such matters to keep me from associating with any of my brothers, or helping all of them.

I shall go visit any group to share what I have learned, and to share in what they have learned. I shall go with none of them in partisan alliance, for my allegiance is to Jesus Christ. I am joined to Him and through Him to all others who are joined unto Him. Never again will I be a champion of any party, faction or clique. I refuse to be affiliated with any clan in which my love for these precludes my love for those. He is my all!

Under no circumstances will I apply to those who believe that Jesus is the Christ, those passages written to condemn those who do not confess this fact. My brethren are not Gnostics. They have not gone out from us even though we differ about many issues which disturbed our tranquillity. When brethren come to where I am speaking, I shall not seek to determine where they stand on all of the troublesome issues before I call upon them to pray. These are matters between them and our Lord. If they can explain their position to His satisfaction, they need not try to satisfy me with their explanation. I am not so much interested in where they stand as in the direction they are facing. I shall recognize their right to pray because they are in Him and not because they are in some party. I have no party and no party has me! This last is more important than the first. I know a lot of brethren who claim to have no faction, but a faction has a claim upon them. They stand in jeopardy ever hour!

Upon the one foundation living stones are builded together. These stones are not all the same size, shape, texture or variety. A stone house must be built with the stones available in the area. Since stones vary from one area to another, a house in one location may not look like that in another. The house of God is not made of stones that are uniform in knowledge, perception, ability or aptitude. It is composed of those who are joined together by mutual faith in Jesus and cemented by love. The foundation for all is the eternal abiding principle in confessional form, that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." What a majestic truth! What a glorious fact! "If any man come and bring not this doctrine receive him not into your house, and give him no greeting!"

The One Faith

Contents

It is very difficult for most of us to grasp the real essence of the redeemed life. We are conditioned by environment and experience to resist its simplicity, and to try and mould and make it into a pattern to fit our preconceived notions. We live in a world of automation and systematization. We are dominated by monster machines of our own creation which have, under the guise of making life easier, robbed us of our freedom and individuality. We have become statistics instead of persons, we have numbers instead of names, we are slaves to punch cards which rule our earnings and regulate our disbursements.

It is not to be wondered at, that in such a world, we should be seduced into an attempt to reduce our most intimate relationships to standardized procedures, properly classified and codified. Nor should we be amazed that men forget that the relationships always suffer a tortured and agonizing death, throttled by monotony and tormented by a sense of duty and a fear of forgetfulness. A man who draws up a code of marital responsibility in which he agrees to kiss his wife three times per week, on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, at 7:00 o'clock p.m., Central Standard Time, will soon have no wife to kiss. There are areas in human existence which must be left free for spontaneous expression. There are crannies of the heart which are too sacred for the prying eyes of other administrators to explore in an attempt to legislate what shall occupy them. An effort by another to thrust himself into them will serve only to shatter the fragile vessel.

Our gracious Father in heaven fully understands our needs and yearnings. He knows the manifold complexities of human personality because He made us. In all ages He has adapted His revelation to the needs and conditions of men in their own day. He sent the world of mankind to school for hundreds of years, providing able teachers in the persons of the prophets, who labored in the primary and elementary eras of the world to bring that world to maturity. In this last age He has spoken unto us through His Son.

While preparing the world for the coming of this dispensation, God acted through law in the form of a written code. At the very outset He provided a constitution for Israel, specific in detail and meticulous in its provisions. It is evident that any commonwealth in which justification is to be attempted by law must have that law fully and completely spelled out at the very inception. The commandments cannot be given piecemeal as the people violate the spirit of the arrangement, else men will die because of ignorance of that which has not yet been given.

The advent of Jesus marked a great change. The cross is the "Great Divide" in human history. "Christ is the end of the law for justification" (Romans 10:4). "The law was our custodian until Christ came . . . we are no longer under a custodian" (Gal. 3:24,25). Law was supplanted by faith, but faith is neither a law nor a custodian. If it is either, then Christ died in vain. "For we hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law" (Rom. 3:28). "But now that faith has come we are no longer under a custodian" (Gal. 3:25).

The Christian faith has always faced the same problem which has plagued society. Maturity cannot be measured by the calendar. A great many who should be mature because of age (or the age) reveal that they still have infantile or adolescent traits. At Corinth Paul could not address the brethren "as spiritual men, but as men of the flesh, as babes in Christ." But he wrote, "Yet among the mature we do impart wisdom" (1 Cor. 2:6). The writer to the Hebrews faced the problem. "For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need some one to teach you again the first principles of God's word. You need milk, not solid food; for every one who lives on milk is unskilled in the word of righteousness, for he is a child. But solid food is for the mature, for those who have their faculties trained by practice to distinguish good from evil" (Heb. 5:12-14).

One of the basic needs of the human being is a sense or feeling of security, and from infancy until death, he acts or reacts in such a manner as to provide for it. Some of the reactions may be unconscious, or appear to be unrelated to the need but are governed by it nonetheless. The adolescent, who is conditioned to expect security in the home and as a member of the family, because of the father-child relationship, finds security in specific laws and strict enforcement. He inwardly craves restraint and secretly regards it as a token of affection. Arbitrary laws are essential to his wellbeing.

On the same basis, God's children, having grown up in an age when they are to be treated as men, but suffering from immaturity, seek for security in a legalistic code. Unable to truly exercise the freedom to love and exist on the plane of the Spirit which is above law, they must take the provisions of grace and warp and twist them into a written code, and then exercise police powers over their brethren who are more humble than themselves, to enforce their code in ruthless disregard for the conscience of others. This is equated with being loyal to God and faithful to the Bible when actually it is detrimental to the whole Christian revelation and utterly disruptive of the fellowship which Jesus came to create.

The Relationship of Faith

It is obvious that our relationship is founded upon faith. In Christ we are justified by faith (Romans 5:1). We walk by faith (2 Cor. 5:7). We live by faith (Gal. 2:20). We receive the promise of the Spirit by faith (Gal. 3:14). Indeed it is true that "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is of any avail, but faith working through love." Any misunderstanding of the relationship of faith can be fatal to the whole Christian structure exactly as an entire building can be endangered by weakening the foundation.

This leads us to the examination of what we believe to be a palpable error in the thinking of many brethren in our day. It is manifested in their treatment of the term "the faith" and is especially exhibited in their conclusions concerning Ephesians 4:5, where the apostle informs us there is "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." The "one faith" is frequently explained as being the entire collection of new covenant scriptures, and, what is worse, these scriptures taken as an extended written code, or legalistic system.

The advocates of orthodoxy seem not to realize that the very scriptures which they regard as a written code declare we have no such arrangement. One of the chief writers of the letters embraced in these scriptures, a man who wrote more of them than any other, declared that "God qualified us to be ministers of a new covenant, not in a written code but in the Spirit, for the written code kills, but the Spirit gives life" (2 Cor. 3:6). Again he writes, "But we are discharged from the law, dead to that which held us captive, so that we serve not under the old written code, but in the new life of the Spirit" (Romans 7:6). Jesus did not nail one law to the cross and hand another one down!

It is a common thing to hear the one faith described as "the system of faith including the whole New Testament." Nowhere in the scriptures is our relationship to Jesus defined in such language. No one who speaks as the Bible speaks can justifiably employ this kind of terminology. We are joined to Him in an intimate embrace in spirit as a man is joined to his wife in the flesh. "But he who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit with him" (1 Cor. 6:17). You cannot reduce a person to a system. In reality there is no such thing as a systematic theology or systematic Christian relationship. These are creations of men. They are responsible for most of the spiritual ills in the world.

We have no inclination to verbally assault our brethren who are guilty of trying to cling to the Judaistic philosophy of legalistic justification and who live B.C. lives in an A.D. world. Instead we feel a sense of compassion as we always do for those who still exhibit juvenile tendencies when they are grown men. We realize that all of these carried-over adolescent traits result from fears and frustrations which are unresolved in their hearts. Rather we seek to deliver them from their ingrown inhibitions and partisan impediments so they may grow up in Christ Jesus and act like men.

We have an abiding confidence in the power of truth to dispel error as the dawn drives away the darkness and the rising sun burns away the fog. We do not lose heart when months of repetition are required before our brothers gain a faint glimmer of what is being said. We are content to labor and to wait, to plant and allow God to provide the increase. It is in that spirit we examine the expression "the one faith" to determine its nature and content. We shall seek to provide certain guidelines for our study as we proceed.

Faith and Doctrine

1. The faith by which we are justified was fully proclaimed on the first Pentecost following the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Nothing was ever added to it as a basis for justification. The faith which justifies is "the faith of the gospel" (Phil. 1:27) and the gospel was announced in its fulness and perfection by the heralds of the King on that day. All that was demanded of any alien to become a citizen and to enter into the fellowship of the ransomed ones was contained in this initial message. Those who obeyed its demands did not obey an imperfect gospel.

2. In the early days of the Way, "the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied greatly in Jerusalem, and a great many of the priests became obedient to *the faith" (Acts 6:27). The faith to which the priests became obedient was the faith to which the penitents on Pentecost became obedient. There was but one faith. Thus men embraced the faith twenty years before the first letter was written by an apostle. It is evident that the collection of letters constituting the new covenant scriptures were not a part of the faith.

3. When Paul landed at Cyprus on his first preaching tour, about 48 A.D., he was summoned by Sergius Paulus, the proconsul, who was anxious to hear the word of God. "But Elymas the magician, withstood them, seeking to turn away the proconsul from *the faith" (Acts 13:8). This was four years before Paul wrote his first epistle and there is no indication he ever addressed a letter to Cyprus. Thus it was possible for men to be obedient to the faith, and to be turned away from the faith, years before any part of the new covenant scriptures was written.

4. On that same tour which reached as far as Derbe, Paul returned through Lystra, Iconium and Antioch "strengthening the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith" (Acts 14:22). Thus men were in the faith and able to continue in it before even one apostolic letter was penned. But the faith in which they were to continue was that which Paul had brought them. Fortunately we can learn what it was. At Antioch the apostle referred to David and said, "Of this man's posterity God has brought to Israel a Savior, Jesus, as he promised" (Acts 13:23). Again, "And we bring you the good news that what God has promised to the fathers, this he has fulfilled to us their children by raising Jesus" (verses 32,33). Again, "Let it be known to you therefore, brethren, that through this man forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you, and by him every one that believes is freed from everything from which you could not be freed by the law of Moses" (verses 38,39).

This was the faith which was proclaimed, the faith which they embraced, the faith in which they were to continue. This is the one faith. Paul defines it as "my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret for long ages." He says that this is "made known to all nations, according to the command of the eternal God, to bring about obedience to *the faith" (Romans 16:25,26).

5. Not one of the apostolic epistles was written to introduce men to the faith or to induct them into it. Every letter, without exception, was addressed to those in the faith and because they were in it. For instance, in 1 Corinthians (16:13) the sanctified in Christ Jesus are urged to "stand fast in the faith." In 2 Corinthians (13:5) they are given the instruction, "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith."

6. If the apostolic epistles constituted the one faith, no congregation of saints on earth, during the lifetime of the apostles, could have the faith in its perfection or completeness. These letters were written to different congregations and individuals and were not collected or compiled until long after the apostles were dead.

7. If the epistles constituted the faith only one of the apostles could possibly have known the faith in its fulness. All of them, including Paul had been slain thirty years or more before John wrote the last of the sacred canon. Some of the apostles may never have seen or read a single letter included in the new covenant scriptures, yet all of them proclaimed the faith. Not one of them, except John, knew anything about his three letters or those addressed to the churches of Asia.

8. The first epistle of which we have record is 1 Thessalonians, probably written about 52 A.D., from Corinth. Yet, the year before that, "the churches were strengthened in the faith, and they increased in numbers daily" (Acts 16:5). Before the epistle was sent the Thessalonians were in the faith, for they had "turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God and to wait for his son from heaven." The apostle said he thanked God continually for the fact "that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God which is at work in you believers" (1 Thess. 2:13,14).

The one faith is not a compendium of moral principles, a code of ethics, or a compilation of laws. It is not a collection of letters, even though divinely authorized and produced by agency of the Spirit. It is the firm conviction that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God and that He was "put to death for our trespasses and raised for our justification" (Romans 4:25). The very next statement is, "Therefore, since we are justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Upon no other basis of justification can such peace be secured.

We must honor with our attention the passages cited by honest brothers under the mistaken view that these support their legalistic claims. In doing so we are not attacking men but simply investigating their use, or misuse of the sacred scriptures. It is amazing how men, motivated by partisan considerations, can unwittingly bend the word of God to justify and condone the sin of division and the scandal of schism.

Like Precious Faith

It is urged that 2 Peter 1:1 advocates the idea of conformity and uniformity as God's demand, in the expression "like precious faith." The letter is addressed to them "that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ." The like precious faith is considered to be agreement with the partisan position on whatever matters have been exalted to such a status that a faction has formed about them. Although this will seem utterly ridiculous to real students of the Bible it must still be dealt with because of its propagation by sincere, but misguided advocates of a partisan approach to life.

The second epistle of Peter was written to the same persons as the first (2 Peter 3:1) and these were God's chosen ones scattered throughout Asia Minor (1 Peter 1:1). They believed in God who raised Jesus Christ from the dead and gave Him glory, that their faith and hope might be in God (1 Peter 1:21) They had purified their souls in obeying the truth and had been born again of the gospel which had been preached unto them (1:22-25). But Peter declares that in time past they were not a people, but are now the people of God (1 Peter 2:10). Peter was a Jew as were all of the other apostles. The gospel was first preached to the Jews, and later the Gentiles were admitted to the faith.

It was natural for Peter as "a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ" to address his letter "to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God." James Macknight in his Apostolical Epistles paraphrases this, "Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who have obtained like precious faith in the gospel with us believing Jews . . . . The word for "like precious" is *isotimos, which is a term of quality or nature. It is from *isos, equal; and *time, value or honor. The faith obtained by the Gentiles through the righteousness of God was in no sense inferior to that obtained by the Jews, although the latter had primacy in publication and proclamation. It was a faith equal in value or honor. The term has not one thing to do with those in the faith agreeing upon every detail of understanding and interpretation, desirous as that might be. It is not even related to our being alike. The statement is that all who enjoy the righteousness of God have obtained the same precious faith. There is one faith for both Jew and Gentile.

It is a startling commentary on the destructive violence of the party spirit when one realizes that otherwise good and gentle men are betrayed into equating the faith which all of us share in Christ Jesus with narrow partisan tests of communion. To Peter it was a source of rejoicing that others were included in the like precious faith; to orthodox factionalists it is a matter of loyalty to Christ to use the same passage to exclude believers from their "fellowship." Betrayed by the use of the word "like" in the King James Version the cult of the rubber stamp gleefully raises the banner of conformity over rival institutions, demanding that all who enter bow to the party mandates. One need not be a scholar of reputation to question the partisan usage of the verse. Even a reading of other versions would be enough to make the party application suspect.

"To those who through the justice of our God and Savior Jesus Christ share our faith and enjoy equal privilege with ourselves" (New English Bible).

"To those who have obtained a faith of equal standing with ours" (Revised Standard Version).

"To those who have been given, through the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ, a faith as precious as our own" (The New Testament in Plain English).

"To those who by the beneficence of our God and of our Savior Jesus Christ have obtained a faith equal in privilege with ours" (The Authentic Version).

The Faith Once Delivered

Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints (Jude 3).

It is argued by factional leaders that "the faith" here spoken of is the entire body of new covenant scriptures. In addition, each party includes in "the faith" the particular and peculiar traditional interpretation and deductions which separate and segregate it from all other believers, sects and parties.

The content of the faith which was "once for all delivered to the saints" differs with each contentious party among the saints. No two have the same "faith." Instead of "one faith" there are as many faiths as there are factions.

To differ with the party on the one item which is its distinctive and exclusive test of union and communion is to deny the faith and thus to bring upon one the treatment accorded to "a heathen and a publican." If a congregation divides over a millennial theory, the one who contends for an explanation contrary to the accepted traditional view denies the faith. Regardless of how much he loves Jesus and believes in Him, or how pure his life and how fervent his spirit might be, he has denied the Faith when he cannot in good conscience truckle to the edicts and pronouncements or kowtow in abject submission to those "who seem to be somewhat."

Jude was not even speaking of the apostolic letters, much less of the fanciful farfetched and fitful interpretations placed upon them. The faith once for all delivered had been received before he wrote his letter so it is evident the epistle of Jude was not part of it. We can determine from the immediate context the nature of the faith and the reason for the exhortation to contend for it. The word "contend" is a term of combat. It is epagonizomai in the Greek. W. E. Vine says it "signifies to contend about a thing, as a combatant." We can ascertain the nature of the faith for which contention must be made by the character of the opposition.

The opposers were ungodly men. They had secretly infiltrated the camp of the saints. They perverted the grace of God into licentiousness. They denied our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ. Against such characters, long ago designated for condemnation, "the sanctified, preserved and called ones" (verse 1) were to battle intensely for preservation of "the faith which was once delivered." It is obvious that the faith was related to the proper concept of grace and its function, and the acknowledgment of the Lordship of Jesus Christ. These were the things being perverted and denied which made the earnest contention so essential.

One can hardly think of anything more detrimental to God's purpose or to Christ's prayer for unity than to apply such scriptures to the differences arising between brothers. Are our brothers who differ with us in opinion about the issues which trouble us ungodly persons? Are they the kind of individuals who were long ago designated for condemnation? Do they pervert the grace of God into licentiousness? Have they denied our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ? The truth is that regardless of the right or wrong of the things about which we have debated among ourselves, not one of them is a part of the faith once for all delivered to the saints. To confuse them with the faith is to confound sinners and mobilize the saints for savage civil strife. It is also to reveal the meagerness of our own scholarship and the dearth of our love. Our brethren are all in the faith once delivered. They have not denied it. They cherish it and revere it, although they cannot agree with us about every idea we hold.

The faith delivered once for all is that which produces our common salvation. It is that which initiates us all into the majestic covenantal relationship with the Father and Son. It is that which inaugurates fellowship with Deity and adopts us into the heavenly family. It is this faith based upon grace which severs us from the old life of sin and gives us access to eternal life — "the eternal life which was with the Father and manifested unto us."

Denying the Faith

The acceptance of the revolutionary truth that Jesus is the Son of God and our Master and Lord, by its very nature obligates us to imitate His life as partakers of the divine nature. As truth becomes available unto us we must embrace and apply it to our own life and conduct, or we deny the faith which brings us into relationship with the truth. To deliberately rebel against the life demanded by the relationship we sustain in the faith is to disown that relationship and the faith which creates it.

Faith is the foundation of the Christian life and love is its embodiment. In Christ Jesus "faith which works by love" is what counts. Love is the fulfilling of the law. All the commandments are summed up in it (Romans 13:10). Love must be in deed and in truth, not in mere word or speech. "But if any one has this world's goods and sees his brother in need, yet closes his heart against him, how does God's love abide in him" (1 John 3:17).

This will explain the passage which is often used against our thesis. In 1 Timothy 5 the apostle gives instruction relating to the care of widows. The community of saints is ordered to sustain real widows, that is those who are left all alone and bereft of all immediate relatives. Those widows having children or grandchildren are to be supported by their offspring. The record says, "If any one does not provide for his relatives, and especially for his own family, he has disowned the faith and is worse than an unbeliever" (verse 8).

Many unbelievers, motivated only by a natural affection, would not allow a widowed mother to suffer. A Christian has the additional motive of belonging to Christ Jesus, whose ministry was summed up in the words, "He went about doing good." To refuse to love others is to deny the working principle of the faith which is intended to bind us to Jesus. It is to make our profession empty, shallow and senseless. Rowland Hill was wont to remark that when a man becomes a Christian even his dog knows the difference. E. K. Simpson said, "A religious profession which falls below the standard of duty recognized by the world is a wretched fraud."

Birth and Growth

The faith relates to the life and death of Jesus; the apostolic epistles relate to our own life and death. The faith portrays what Jesus has done and will do for us, and we accept it: the doctrine portrays what we must do for Jesus and we attempt it. One comes by proclamation; the other by indoctrination. Both are the word of God, but the gospel has to do with our begetting, the doctrine with our development. One may be begotten in a minute but continue to grow for a lifetime. One does not digest all of the food God has provided on the day he is born.

To confuse the faith which all must have to be in Christ with knowledge of the word which all must acquire as they grow in Christ is a tragic error. To make fellowship contingent upon uniformity in degree of knowledge is a fatal fallacy. If fellowship is based upon the faith, and the faith consists of every epistle in the new covenant scriptures, then one must fully know every passage or he cannot be in the faith. Yet Paul declares, "If any one imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know" (1 Cor. 8:2). This proves we are all deficient in knowledge, and the one who imagines that he is not is worse off than the others.

Those who plead for uniformity in knowledge of the word of God as a basis for fellowship must either demand perfect knowledge or else they must designate the areas in which one must know to be in the fellowship, as distinguished from those areas in which he may be ignorant and still be justified of God. How much in God's word can one be mistaken about and still be justified? What percentage must he be right about before God no longer recognizes him as in the family? How much must one grow in intellectual attainment in order to continue as a brother? How sick must one become from spiritual vitamin deficiency before the Father disowns him as a child?

To postulate that one must have perfect knowledge of every detail of revelation is to require inerrancy and infallibility and to demand that he be God. This is what I call "the Haman's gallows argument." It is affirmed that fellowship with ourselves is contingent upon knowing all we know and understanding everything as we do, which means that our own fellowship with God is dependent upon knowing all that God knows and understanding everything as He does. Since no one is rash enough to claim this for himself, he admits he is not in fellowship with God, and damns himself by the argument he concocted to deny others. "By what judgment you judge you will be judged."

On the other hand, if he concedes that others do not need to agree upon every matter of doctrinal interpretation in order to be in the fellowship, he must exercise his human judgment as to what portion is essential. When he binds this upon others as a term of communion he exercises the prerogative of God. Was not the revelation of God given to all of the saints? Do others not have the same freedom as ourselves to make those emphases which are commended to their own intellects and consciences as important and relevant to the Christian walk? If, in the physical life, we must recognize the difference in digestive ability and capacity, shall we not do the same in the spiritual realm? Is not growth in the family of God progressive and individual?

Life is more important than food. "Is not the life more than meat?" (Matt. 6:25). The whole purpose of food is to sustain life. Bread which comes from the earth is the staff of physical life. The bread which came down from heaven is the staff of spiritual life. Any use of food to impair life, or any application of a theory of nutrition to destroy life, is criminal. If our emphasis upon physical food is such as to destroy human life and its relationships we have a warped view of the place of both life and bread. In the same manner we must regard the sacredness of the life in Christ Jesus as superior to the given means of growth. Our sense of values must never become so distorted that we sacrifice life for doctrinal correctness, especially when that correctness is determined by our own deductions and interpretations. Bread has not been given for the purpose of pounding the other children over the head. No one but the Great Physician can determine the proper amount of spiritual food intake and rate of growth for each of God's children. Those who berate others may themselves be deficient. Our problem is that we have too many "doctors" practicing without a license, each heading his own little clinic and dispensary.

The true basis of our continuance in corporate unity can never be predicated upon an arbitrarily determined degree of knowledge at a given time. If it is, we shall need to exclude from our fellowship in the afternoon those whom we baptized in the morning. If it be argued that when men come into Christ, we must give them time to grow, the same principle will force us to continue to be patient, forbearing and tolerant with them as long as they are growing in Him. Thus the basis of the corporate functioning in Christ is the faith which creates the state, and a proper attitude toward truth of those within that state. One may love truth and know little of it, or he may know a great deal and have but little respect for it. In the final analysis attitude is the determinant factor between true discipleship and sectarianism. One is not a sectarian because of where he happens to be at a given time, but because of his attitude toward truth regardless of where he is. This must never be forgotten, for if we forget it we will probably be sectarian.

Doctrinal Values

What relationship has the apostolic doctrine upon which we feed, with the faith which produces our life, or, for that matter, is our life? To phrase the question in another fashion, what relationship exists between the seed or sperm by which we are begotten and the food of which we partake after birth? What relationship exists between the pasture upon which a sheep forages and that which makes it a sheep? We propose to face up to these matters frankly, fully and fearlessly. In order for you to follow our reasoning with greater facility we will present our views in numerical sequence.

1. Both the gospel (Good News) which brings us into affinity with eternal life and the apostolic doctrine which sustains us, are the word of God. Paul commended the Thessalonians because they accepted the gospel "not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers" (1 Thess. 2:13). To the Corinthians he wrote, "If any one thinks that he is a prophet or spiritual, he should acknowledge that what I am writing to you is a command of the Lord. If any one does not recognize this, he is not recognized" (1 Cor. 14:37,38). We accept without question or quibble that the Good News of salvation in Christ Jesus and the means of Christian growth are both from the Father of lights.

2. The apostolic letters do not constitute the new covenant, or new testament, and are nowhere said to do so in the sacred writings. The new covenant is not a written code (2 Cor. 3:6). It is not even written with ink (2 Cor. 3:3). The apostolic letters were written with pen and ink (3 John 13). The new covenant is an individual and personal Agreement by which one commits himself to, and is adopted by God into His family, as a child. This covenant is written on human hearts by the Spirit of the living God (2 Cor. 3:3; Heb. 8:10). This divine-human Compact cannot be effected by any other person on earth for another. Neither can it be affected by any other person. Read those two sentences again!

3. Those who heard the Good News on Pentecost, and accepted its implications for their lives entered into the new covenant relationship as fully as any other persons ever did since that time. At the moment, they knew nothing of the apostolic doctrine which was gradually revealed over a period of many years as need arose and abuses were created by those in the covenantal relationship. The gospel which produced the covenantal relationship had to be announced prior to that relationship which it was to create and which grew out of it; while the apostolic doctrine was revealed as a need was felt for information as to conduct and behavior in Christ. The entrance into the life relationship was not contingent upon knowledge of subsequent doctrine. The gospel was to make children of God; the apostolic doctrine was to make children of God better.

4. The Good News was never proclaimed to any person with any other intention or objective than to bring him into covenant relationship with God through Jesus Christ. No apostolic letter was ever written to any person or group to bring such person or group into the covenant relationship. All letters were written to those in the covenant relationship and because they were in it. The very first letter Paul wrote was addressed to those who were in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. The second letter was addressed to the same identical ones.

5. The apostolic epistles are not a pattern or blueprint. They were never intended to be. There is a difference between a love letter and a blueprint. One may contain advice but the other sets forth specifications. A blueprint must always be available in full and in the hands of the builders before construction starts. There were many in Christ Jesus who actually suffered death for Him before the first epistle was written. Congregations of saints had been planted and grew in spiritual stature before letters were ever written to them. Our pattern is a person! Our life is unity with that person! "He who has the Son has life; he who has not the Son has not life" (1 John 5:12). "He is our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30). Our pattern is not external but internal. Our lives are shaped and transformed by the Spirit and not by an external code. We "are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:18).

6. The purpose of the apostolic epistles is to provide, by our assimilation of truth as revealed, for our growth in the divine nature in order that we may automatically and spontaneously act and react to given situations as Jesus would under the same circumstances. It was when congregations responded as Jesus would that Paul wrote them letters of thanksgiving and commendation as he did to Philippi, "Let your bearing toward one another arise out of your life in Christ Jesus" (2:5). It was when they did not that he wrote them of the dangers attendant upon such a course. "But that is not how you learned Christ" (Eph. 4:20). Christianity is not Jesus pointing us to a book as a pattern, but a book pointing us to Jesus as our pattern.

This will make all of the difference in the world in our attitude toward each other. Every sincere person thinks he understands and does just what the book teaches. His stock-in-trade remedy for disunity is the platitude, "If everyone will just take the Bible for what it says, and do just what it teaches we will all be one." This old cliche has been proven unrealistic and unworkable. Those who mouth it are most divided and strifetorn. In spite of the sincerity of each, what is actually meant is, "If everyone will just take the Bible for what I say it means, and do just what I teach it requires, we will all be one." All of our confusion stems from the fact that every one who regards the Bible as our pattern thinks he perfectly grasps that pattern while others labor in ignorance, stubbornness and stupidity. All of us have seen communities where there are five or six different groups who say that if everyone will take the Bible for what it says, unity will result, and yet none of the six have anything to do with any of the others. The world is catching on to such childishness and inconsistency.

Once we recognize that Jesus is the pattern, it follows that the greater our sincerity the more humbly will we admit that we fall far short of this example, and the easier it is to recognize that none of us are perfectly following the pattern. Thus we can receive each other in Christ as equals— not in knowledge, understanding or perception— but in our need of grace to save. It creates a lot of difference in attitude if we think that some of us are already on higher ground tossing a rope to those who are floundering about in the waves, or if we recognize that all of us are still in the deep and are all struggling together to reach a goal or ideal. We need to be careful that we do not secretly pride ourselves that it is by our grace others can be saved.

The real criterion is not at all our knowledge of a code or book, even though divinely given. It is love for a person. In the school of Jesus it is not mastery of a text but affection for the teacher which brings recognition. Knowledge inflates self, but love inspires imitation of another. As the apostle puts it, "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up. If anyone imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know. But if one loves God, one is known by him" (1 Cor. 8:1-3). Of course if we truly love Him we will want to hear what He says and do what He asks us to do. We will not do this because of legalistic demands but because of loving commands.

7. Nothing we have said herein is intended to derogate the apostolic epistles. It is written simply to place doctrine in proper perspective, to enable us to regard it as God intended. To say that life does not originate with bread is not to speak disparagingly of bread. To observe that family relationship is not created by food is in no sense to undervalue food. The man who truly grasps what we are saying will find the revealed will of God growing more precious unto him day by day. This has been our personal experience in the freedom we enjoy from the pettifogging trivia which legalistic attitudes convert into tests of communion. "Christ sets us free, to be free men. Stand firm, then, and refuse to be tied to the yoke of slavery again" (Gal. 5:1). We intend to study God's precious truth for ourselves. We shall allow no one to do our thinking on earth who cannot answer for us at the judgment. And this very resolution makes every word within the sacred pages pulsate with life and glow with the light of new meaning and relevance in our own life.

Doctrine and Fellowship

Every person who truly loves the Father will want to know all that the Father has said. While it is true that one who commits himself to Christ obligates himself by that very act to familiarize himself with all that God has taught, he will not do so out of a sense of obligation but as a joyful privilege. It is one thing to study to be a shrewd lawyer, and a wholly different thing to study to be a loving and affectionate son. Such a son will be as tolerant of others in their deficiencies as the Father is of his weaknesses. He will not set up a standard for others which God has not set up for all. This warrants the following observations.

1. The word of God has a meaning and the doctrine of God can be understood. Such understanding can only result from diligent investigation by earnest students who examine the text of the revelation and apply to their research those rules of logical interpretation which govern such matters. When proper examination has been made, free from preconceived bias, the result must be conceded to be the doctrine of Christ as given through the holy envoys, the apostles.

2. In view of the fact that such conclusions must depend in part, or in whole, upon the deductions made from the sacred scriptures, and thus represent the sacred oracles as filtered through human rational processes, the conclusions cannot be constituted conditions of union or communion, or tests of one's relationship to the Father. They must not be regarded as the basis for life but of growth, and that rate differs with each individual who is in Christ.

3. The deductions from the sacred revelation as made by one individual, or a group of individuals conducting research in concert, are not formally binding upon any other individual, unless commended unto such individual by his own investigation, perception and conscience. They can be shared with others but not saddled upon them, for they can be binding only to the degree and in the measure that they are personally grasped and comprehended. If this be not true the following evils will result.

a. Individual responsibility will be destroyed and men will be subjected to creedal tests and criteria arbitrarily imposed.

b. Those who concur with such imposition upon themselves will repose their faith in the wisdom of men rather than in the wisdom of God.

c. The supreme court of appeal will be "the infallible interpretation" of each party, a thought as reprehensible as "an infallible interpreter," or pope.

4. No opinion, honestly held by a child of God can be made a basis of fellowship or a test of it. Such an opinion must never be bound upon others as a creed, nor must others threaten excommunication of one who holds such opinion if he does not relinquish it. The sword of the Spirit must never be used to kill or destroy those who are indwelt of the Spirit. Separation upon the basis of opinion must never be condoned. The called out ones are never called out from among the called out.

All of God's children are my beloved brethren. I have no brothers who are not beloved. I have no half-brothers, step-brothers, or brothers-in-law in Christ Jesus. Many of my brothers disagree with me about some things, and some of my brothers disagree with me about many things. On every controversial issue which has disturbed our tranquility some of my brothers take one position, while some take another.

They are all my brothers, not because of any of their views but in spite of all of them. I shall recognize them as brothers publicly and privately. I will call upon them to pray and participate in my meetings. I will love them and cherish them. I will maintain my personal convictions about all of our troublesome problems, but I will not allow these to negate or deny the sublimity of our relationship.

We are members of the same body. We are branches of the same Vine. We are sheep of the same flock. We are children of the same Father. No one will ever herd me into a corral where I must set at nought or boorishly treat some of my brothers to be recognized and used by a group of others. I value the Lord and His love too highly. The price one pays for factionalism is too great. The Christ whom I serve is not a party chieftain but Lord of the whole church. He is not the president of a faction but the head of the whole body— every member of it!

I have no perfect brothers. They are all brothers in error. All of them are as weak and fallible, as helpless and remiss, as myself. Some are in error on some things, some on other things, but none of them know all there is to know, and none are free from error. No, not one! It is foolish and arrogant for brothers in error to label others as "brothers in error" as if those who slapped on the label were free from error. Such men, knowing their own failures and shortcomings should bow in abject humility before the Father of all and entreat for His forgiveness.

If I am in the fellowship with any brothers at all they are brothers in error. This does not bother me because it is this kind of persons to whom grace is extended. Those who are as perfect as God will not need the blessings of grace. I do not love error. I deplore it. I simply love my brothers and I do not intend to deny brotherhood on the basis of imbecility, lack of understanding or mistaken views. If life in Christ consisted of being right about everything and every point of doctrine, I would have to confess I have never lived, and the "I" of today would have to sever all relationship with the "Me" of yesterday.

I do not plead that my brethren accept anything which cuts across personal conscience or is contrary to conviction. I simply plead that they quit playing God and accept all of God's children as their brothers. God does not tell us how to treat the lengthy catalogue of disturbing items. He does tell us how to treat our brothers. I might be right about all of these things and go to hell because I did not show love for my brothers, or, I might be mistaken about a lot of things and go to heaven because I love my Father and all of His children.

We live in Christ through the faith, the one faith, the faith once for all delivered. That faith is created by the cross. It is not a faith based upon being in the right position about everything, but upon being in the right Person. I shall elevate nothing higher than the cross. I will allow nothing to overshadow it. I will permit the blood of the cross to blot from my life those things which hinder, but I will permit none of those to blot out the blood of the cross. The life is in the blood. I will use the cross to batter down walls between brethren but I will not use it to batter down brethren.

It is the cross which made me free to love and to serve. It is the cross which made it possible for me to accept all others as God accepted me, not because I was worthy, but in spite of my unworthiness. I will cling to the cross and through it I will cling to every other person who does the same. The greatest unifying instrument in this fragmented world is the cross of Jesus. With it we can stop the silly division and the inane fighting which has made us to appear ridiculous in the eyes of the pagan world. One in Christ! One at the cross! This is what the faith once delivered is all about!

The Great Problem

Contents

It has been said more than once in this volume that "fellowship" is the English term most often used as a rendering for the Greek koinonia. It is not the equivalent of koinonia, for equivalent means "equal in value or power," and there is no single English word capable of capturing the full meaning of koinonia. The translators who gave us The New English Bible knew this and used the expression "sharing in the common life." My own investigation leads me to endorse this as the best rendering known to me.

Fellowship is composed of the two words "fellow" and "ship." Fellow is from the Anglo-Saxon felagi, comrade or partner. It has been surmised that it may have originally signified those who bound themselves together by a blood-covenant. If this is so, the word signified more than a casual partnership in land or business, but there is no real evidence to sustain this. "Ship" is a suffix indicating state or condition. Sonship is a state in which we share as sons, companionship is a state in which we share as companions. Fellowship is a state in which we share as fellows, that is, as associates or peers.

The word "fellow" shows it is a relation of persons to each other, and not of persons to ideas or things. No one ever asks, "Do you companionship automobiles"? Nor does one ever ask, "Do you partnership the common market theory"? But that is no more ridiculous than to ask, "Do you fellowship instrumental music in corporate worship?" or "Do you fellowship premillennialism"? It would be just as absurd to ask, "Do you partnership your associate in the service station"? Yet we constantly hear those who are ignorant of the significance of fellowship asking, "Do you fellowship this individual or that?" You may be in partnership with your associate, and in the fellowship with your brethren, but we need to keep our language straight unless we wish to demonstrate that our ideas are warped.

In the context of the new covenant, fellowship is the state or condition of sharing in the life of Jesus Christ into which we are called by God (1 Corinthians 1:9). God issued the call through the gospel (2 Thess. 2:14), a distinct proclamation of seven historical facts designed to establish the most sublime truth of all ages, that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God. The response to this call is belief of the fact and submission to the lordship of Jesus in one act, immersion in water under His authority or name. Every person in the universe who believes with all of his heart that Jesus is the Messiah and God's Son, and who is immersed in validation of that faith is in the fellowship. He is in it by an act of God. He is received of the Lord to the glory of God (Romans 15:7).

We are called as individuals, we respond as individuals, and we are received as individuals. But we are not simply called out of the world, we are also called together in Christ. We share in the common life of the Father and Son, which is eternal life, but because we do we also share with all others who share that life (1 John 1:3). We are not joined to Jesus because we are joined to others, but we are joined to others because we are joined to Jesus. Our relationship on the horizontal plane does not create our relationship on the vertical plane, but our relationship on the vertical plane creates our relationship on the horizontal.

This means that what one does or thinks on the horizontal plane need not affect the vertical relationship of another at all unless he personally condones or endorses it. No one is held responsible for anything which he disavows. Jesus plainly taught that individuals could be in a congregation which was dead and whose works were not perfect before God, and still walk with him in white because they were worthy (Revelation 3:1-4). Indeed, He also taught that persons could be in a congregation where a woman taught and seduced his servants to commit fornication, but if they refused her doctrine and practice and kept His word to the end, they would be blessed.

Obviously there will be some things occur among brethren in which one cannot participate because of conscience. One must never violate his personal conviction by sharing in any view or act which appears to him to be contrary to the will of God. But such differences will not affect the fellowship which results from our relationship to Jesus unless one or the other denies the Son of God or renounces His rule. Our fellowship with God is not conditioned upon seeing everything alike or upon doing everything in the same fashion but upon receiving Jesus as the Messiah and His Son. So long as we do not deliberately repudiate this conviction by word or deed the fellowship remains intact.

Fortunately we have a good example of this in the letter Paul addressed to the Romans. There were those who could freely eat meat and others whose consciences would not allow them to do so. Certainly the latter could not jointly participate with the former in this action. But this did not affect the fellowship, for the simple reason that God had received them. "Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him" (Romans 14:3). One of our human problems has always been the false assumption that if we could not jointly participate in some things we could not work together in anything.

What has been overlooked is that God's children can differ in Christ although they cannot differ about who He is. They need not regard everything alike, but everything they regard must be to the Lord. "He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it." So long as two persons exalt their relationship to the Lord above their differences they can keep both their differences and one another. It is only when what they think means more than what God did for them that they fall apart. This is not so much an indication of fidelity to God's word as it is a sign of egotism. It is a form of idolatry in which men worship their opinions more than they respect God's power and purpose. It is always a sin to destroy a brother for meat or for anything else!

We do not create the fellowship for God has done that. He invites us to share in it by becoming His sons and daughters through faith. Our task is to demonstrate the beauty and strength of a fellowship based upon faith, to a cold and cynical world. We can best do this by manifesting an unbroken love for and attachment to those who differ with us about many things. The world expects those who see everything alike to work together, but to see those laboring in unity who do not concur with each other proves that they have discovered a dynamic more powerful than the carnal nature. It is for this reason that all division within the family of God is condemned. Such division is never once authorized as the solution to fraternal disagreement. Christ is not divided and those in Christ must not be.

It is the thesis of this book that opinions and doctrinal interpretations are occasions for differences, but never for division. It is no sin to differ but it is a sin to divide. Congregations should provide an umbrella of love under which saints with divergent views can find shelter and be loved and cherished. We must make a distinction between a man and his rationalizations. We are not called upon to agree with one's ideas but to accept his person in Christ. Jesus died for men, not for opinions. When I receive men upon their faith in Jesus, I acknowledge the efficacy of His work, but I need not acknowledge the validity of their reasoning.

My only creed must be Christ. Jesus is the gospel and the gospel is Jesus. The crowning truth of the gospel is that He is the Son of God and, therefore, Lord of all. If I demand that one adopt my view or explanation of a secondary matter, or surrender his own, in order to be received by me, that thing becomes my creed. Whatever one must believe or subscribe to in order to be accepted by any group is the creed of that group, and like all human creeds it is exalted to a position of prominence above the divinely-established fact that Jesus is the Messiah and God's Son. The only basis of koinonia is the relationship with the Son created by faith in Him. It is not orthodoxy of opinion, interpretation or explanation.

An Important Question

All history and experience prove that not all men will respect their vows, covenants, pledges or commitments. In the social realm some will begin well but will turn into criminals. In the political realm there will be traitors. In the economic realm there will be crooks. In the military realm there will be deserters. There is no societal relationship composed of human beings which will not be undermined and suffer tragedy because of the irresponsible. God ordained the home and marital relationship on a convenantal basis and yet the land is strewn with the wreckage of broken homes.

The community of believers, composed of strangers and pilgrims who are men and women in the flesh, must expect that from among themselves "men will arise speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." Many of the congregations during the lifetime of the apostles were faced with serious problems created by those who had known Christ but who returned to their former state to walk after the flesh. Not a few of the letters addressed to congregations and individuals were written to deal with such situations.

This gives rise to a major question. Are there grounds upon which a community of saints can openly and publicly declare that one of their number will no longer be regarded as in their company? Laying aside the unscriptural expression "withdrawal of fellowship," what are the bases for the solemn terminal act of "delivering one unto Satan"? I believe there are three specifications upon which association can be declared no longer possible, and only three. To go beyond this is to go beyond the scriptures and to substitute human caprice for divine authority. Before I deal with the three reasons it seems appropriate to discuss why these are so serious that toleration, forbearance and longsuffering can no longer be accorded to the guilty.

Faith in Jesus is the door to fellowship with the Father and the Son. This involves an acceptance or reception of Jesus as God's Anointed and Lord of the whole life. "God hath made that same Jesus both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). There is not one door into the relationship and another one leading out. God does not have one door marked "Entrance" and another marked "Exit." There is only one door. If one desires to leave he simply reverses his decision. He entered by believing in Jesus, he goes out by denying Him. He was ignorant of a lot of things when he came in, he will continue to be ignorant of a lot of things until he dies. The only children God has are ignorant children, although they are ignorant about different things. Their ignorance did not keep them out of Christ and their continued ignorance will not put them out, unless it is deliberate and leads them to rebellion against Jesus.

God's children can remain in, even with their errors and problems, so long as they are willing and eager to be under the lordship of Jesus. Their mistakes are of the head and not of the heart. The Father does not expect them all to be "straight-A" students. He never runs them off because they are imbecilic, which means weak or feeble-minded. None of them know all there is to know, most of them do not know all they could know. And that covers the entire spectrum from the preacher in the pulpit to the custodian in the broom-closet.

To renounce the lordship of Jesus and refuse longer to confess faith in Him destroys the very foundation of our relationship. God will not retain in His fellowship one who is guilty of such rebellion. No congregation of believers can be true to God and continue to receive one whom God refuses. There are two ways by which one openly shows his faith in Christ— by what he says and by what he does. He demonstrates his rejection of Jesus in the same two ways. The scriptures set forth only three grounds for the congregational dissociation from one previously accepted as one of the redeemed.

1. Denial of Gospel Facts

A much better way to state this is to say, "the advocacy of doctrines which separate from God." Such doctrines are humanly-contrived systems of philosophy which overtly or covertly deny the faith, belief of which brings one into the divine-human relationship, the sharing of the life of God, eternal life. Although many mistaken views may be held, and even expressed, these do not separate from God unless they proceed from or lead to a denial of the right of the Son to be head of the body and Lord of life.

The historical facts of the gospel are seven in number, all of them directly involved in the personality of Jesus, and the implications growing out of this magnificent concept. They are the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification of Jesus. The first five were attested by human witnesses, the last two by the Holy Spirit upon Pentecost. These facts, for which credible testimony is available, are summed up in the grandest truth to which the human mind can assent, that "Jesus is the Anointed, the Son of God." One who believes this with all of his heart may be wrong about many things, and so long as he is in the flesh will be, but this will not destroy the relationship. It is not based upon being right about a number of things, but upon being in Christ through faith.

Paul delivered Hymenaeus and Alexander unto Satan that they might learn not to blaspheme. They had divorced themselves from faith and a good conscience and made shipwreck of their faith (1 Timothy 2:19,20). He warned against Hymenaeus and Philetus whose gangrenous words resulted from a grave error concerning the truth. By affirming that the resurrection was already past they destroyed the faith of others (2 Timothy 2:17,18). John spoke of those who denied the incarnation, and referred to them as antichrists seducers and false prophets.

The term "false teacher," which in the Greek is didaskalos occurs only once in the new covenant scriptures. It occurs then as a description of a certain kind of character. False teachers were those who denied the Lord that bought them, secretly brought in damnable heresies, and caused the truth to be blasphemed (2 Peter 2:1,2). Despite the sparing use of this derogatory expression, the term is frequently used today for everyone who utters anything contrary to a traditional pattern. There are those who seemingly cannot distinguish between a false teacher and mistaken brother. And they may be more dangerous than those whom they condemn. They seem never to have learned that *pseudo, false, applies to that which is deliberately calculated and intended to deceive, mislead, and beguile, and has no reference to those who are honestly and innocently mistaken. To fill the air with "railing accusations" against such makes the railer a greater threat to the harmony of the saints than are the accused ones.

Espousal of an opinion which does not separate from God should not separate His children from each other. If God is willing to tolerate and forbear one who loves Jesus but is mistaken about some matter, we ought to be willing to do the same. Admittedly, all differences of opinion create tensions but they should not result in termination of relationship. They are not problems of fellowship, but problems in the fellowship. The fellowship is more important than a proper solution to the difficulty and must never be allowed to become secondary to it. But one who denies the facts about Jesus, essential to entrance into the fellowship with God, cannot be retained in a community founded upon affirmation of those facts.

2. Moral Turpitude

All facts to which testimony is given and sustained by evidence involve certain implications for the life and conduct of one who believes the testimony. It is not sufficient to give mere mental assent or pay lipservice to the testimony. One must commit himself to the object of the testimony and order his conduct in such a way as to exemplify that commitment. Faith is trust in a person or principle which impels one to surrender himself to that person or principle regardless of cost or sacrifice.

Jesus is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. To follow Jesus is not merely to embrace a way of life, but to share in the life of the Way. To return to a life-style utterly opposed to the moral and ethical values enunciated and exemplified by Jesus is to renounce the lordship of Jesus. It is the equivalent of saying, "I will not have this man reign over me." It is to become a rebel, a revolutionary, a mutineer.

We must be careful at this point for it is easy to equate every lapse or every sin, regardless of circumstances, with rebellion. All sin is sin, but the motivation is not always the same. Certainly the citizens of a country like the United States are not all rebels, but all of them at some time or other break a law or violate a statute. The apostle John cautions us against saying that we have not sinned or that we have no sin. Instead of acting like hardened and defiant rebels we are often reduced to shame and tears by our own carefree and thoughtless grieving of the Spirit.

But there are those in whom the spirit of self still reigns. Peter refers to such persons as "slaves of corruption." He declares it would have been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them (2 Peter 2:21). He declares that they are spots and blemishes, that they have eyes full of adultery, and they cannot cease from sin.

The life in Christ is a new life. When those in Christ dethrone Him in their hearts and deliberately choose to walk according to the course of this world, enthroning the spirit which works in the children of disobedience, they forfeit the right of association with those who are filled with the fulness of God. In 1 Corinthians 5, the action to be taken by a congregation of saints troubled with such an anarchistic spirit is clearly detailed.

That community of believers had within its confines a man who openly boasted of sexual relations with his father's wife. It was so blatant that Paul said it was a matter of common knowledge. Such a type of carnality was not even sanctioned by the pagans. Paul used five terms to express what action the congregation should take. Such action was to be a public renunciation of the sinner and his sin. It was to be taken "when ye are gathered together."

The saints were to deliver the guilty person unto Satan (verse 5). They were to purge out the old leaven (verse 7). They were not to company with him (verse 9). They were not to eat with him (verse 11). They were to put away from among themselves that wicked person (verse 13). There is no question about the way a community of saints must act in a case of open rebellion where the individual deliberately adopts a lifestyle which makes him "a wicked person."

What must be realized is that not all in the body of Christ who sin are "wicked persons." They are sinners but they are not that kind of persons. Indeed, the congregation at Corinth must have had a number who sinned. The apostle was hesitant about returning, much as he loved the brethren. He was afraid he would find "debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, and tumults (2 Cor. 12:21). But he was also afraid he would need to mourn over "many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed" (verse 22). If many were guilty of such deviations from the path of moral rectitude the congregation was in a sad state of affairs. Yet Paul indicated that he would "weep o'er the erring one, lift up the fallen."

There is a danger that we will associate the term immoral only with sexual offences. Indeed, when the word is used we seem automatically to think of sexual acts. This is not justified by the facts. Actually the word immoral is applicable to anything that is discordant with ethical principles, and to the disciples of Christ this means those principles enunciated and exemplified by Jesus. Anything which is contrary to the nature attributable to the life of our Lord while in the flesh is immoral.

The apostle includes along with the fornicator, the covetous, the idolater, the railer, the drunkard and the extortioner (1 Cor. 5:11). Again it must be remembered that he is here assessing a lifestyle rather than an occasional or isolated instance of sin. It is a matter of interest that the list generally deals with those things which are inimical to a social relationship. The fornicator appropriates for gratification of his lust the body of another. The covetous feels an inordinate desire for what belongs to another. The idolater bestows a devotion upon something which belongs to another. A railer reviles in harsh, abusive language and thus destroys the peace and dignity of another. A drunkard makes himself obnoxious by his irrationality which destroys communion with others. An extortioner obtains by force, illegality or ingenuity the property of another.

The attitude enjoined by Jesus is summed up in the admonition to do unto others as you would have them do unto you. In the community of the saints each must esteem others better than himself, in honor preferring one another. It is obvious that the body cannot exist if the members destroy one another for selfish ends. Such a course is not only inimical to the congregation but destructive of the divine purpose. Therefore, while patience is required with the weak, the unlearned and easily tempted, one who deliberately chooses to live in defiance of the divine nature no longer has any claim upon the intimate companionship and communion of those whose citizenship is in heaven.

3. The Factional Spirit

The third thing which renders one unfit for continuation in the company of the believers is the unbridled and stubborn sectarian spirit. The purpose, will and pleasure of God is to unite in one all things in Christ (Ephesians 1:9,10). The Holy Spirit is dedicated to the achievement of this goal. The unity we are to maintain is the unity of the Spirit (Ephesians 4:3). The fellowship of which we are to partake is the fellowship of the Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14).

The sectarian spirit is opposed to the Holy Spirit. It is divisive, schismatic and separative. It is a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). Jude declares that those who separate themselves are sensual, having not the Spirit (verse 19). Paul instructs that an individual who exhibits the schismatic spirit should be rejected after having been given at least two admonitory warnings. He declares that one who will not heed and insists upon fragmenting the saints has turned aside from the real purpose of our calling, and persists in sinning, even while his very attitude is self-condemnatory (Titus 3:10,11)

One is not factional merely because he does not agree with the status quo. It is not sinful to entertain and even cherish an opinion which runs counter to the orthodox position. It is not wrong to express one's opinion to others in the proper spirit. None of this is schismatical or heretical. It only becomes so when one solicits adherents to his view for the purpose of building up a party to propagate and defend it, thus causing a cleavage among the saints.

What is not often recognized is that one can be factional even though his views are correct. The sectarian spirit is not related to the validity of the ideas expressed. One is not necessarily a sectarian because he is wrong, but he is wrong because he is a sectarian. His brain may be clear and his heart clouded. The sectarian spirit is a disease of the heart rather than of the mind. To try and "line up" fellow-partisans, and weld them into a cohesive unity devoted to the task of defending some truth to the neglect of the whole body of truth, is a sin against God's eternal purpose.

One can be sectarian and not be in a sect. All sects grow out of the sectarian spirit and the spirit precedes the sect. The sectarian spirit is always exclusivistic and it creates exclusive sects. When one regards the party with which he is affiliated as containing all of God's children to the exclusion of all others, he is sectarian. One can be in a sect and not be sectarian at all. If he recognizes that the body of Christ is greater than any sect, including the one in which he finds himself, and that it contains all of the saved upon earth, he is not a sectarian.

Obviously it is easier to give lipservice to such an ideal than it is to implement it. One may enunciate a belief that the body is made up of all the saved, but if he confines his love, affection and recognition only to those of his own sect, he is still sectarian because he allows the sectarian spirit to govern his actions.

No honest opinion held by one who is in Christ Jesus is factional or heretical. No one who holds such an opinion is a subject of admonition from others. It is not their business. They can no more tell a man what he must think than they can tell him what kind of car to drive. To tell a man that he must give up his opinion, or that he must confess it is a sin to hold it, makes those who do so the sectarians, rather than the one who entertains the opinion or deduction. Opinions are private possessions and are not subject to trespass by others, not even preachers or elders.

Only when a man sets out to gather a clan or clique composed of those who would separate themselves in order to preserve and perpetuate an opinion or deduction should he be given warning. If he persists in his divisive action he should be rejected as inimical to the unity of the Spirit. Even then, he must never be rejected because he holds a certain deduction arrived at by human judgment, but only because of his deliberate attempt to form a party around it. It is just as essential to protect the freedom of an individual to think for himself as it is to protect a congregation of saints from one who tries to think for everyone else.

"Do all things without grumbling or questioning, that you may be blameless and innocent, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom you shine as lights in the world, holding fast the word of life . . . " (Philippians 2:14-16).

TALKS TO JEWS AND NON-JEWS

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Index of Books

- Title Page
- Preface
- My Debt to Jews
- Are There Three Gods?
- A Personal Messiah
- Judaism As the Messiah
- The Prince of Peace
- Christianity Challenged
- Potpourri of Questions
- The Problem of Sin
- The Great Antidote
- The Better Way
- The Power of the Son
- Better Than Angels
- Signs of an Apostle
- The World to Come
- The Problem of Suffering
- The Great Liberator

TALKS TO JEWS AND NON-JEWS

Contents

Originally Published by

STANDARD PUBLISHING

Cincinnati Ohio

ISBN: 0-87239-162-0

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 77-74-7493

©1977. The STANDARD PUBLISHING COMPANY, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Division of STANDEX INTERNATIONAL CORPORATION.

Preface

Contents

Mark Twain wrote that Adam had a good thing; when he said something great, he knew that nobody had said it before. We in this generation arrived on the scene too late to say very much that has not been said before, and perhaps said a lot better. For that reason I lay no claim to originality in thought or superiority of expression. My consolation is found in the words of Thomas Carlyle who wrote that the merit of originality is sincerity rather than novelty.

Opportunities often come to those who are ill-equipped to embrace them, and two such opportunities came to me. Through God's gracious providence I was invited to bear witness to my faith to a company of Jews, men and women of reputation in their community. In all, I have testified to my faith in the revelation of God and in the messiahship of Jesus some thirty times before Jewish audiences. These were composed of both those who had accepted Jesus and those who did not.

In this volume I am going to share that testimony, including some of the questions they asked, and my answers. I have sought to present a balanced perspective by compressing a great deal of material into a limited space. Every word was spoken, every question asked, and every reply made, but not always in the exact order here given. There were occasions of tension, as there ought to be in such confrontations between honest men, but there never was an untoward incident. The friendship of those who sincerely differed was unabated.

Soon after I began the meetings with Jewish students, I was invited to deliver a series of lectures based on my understanding of the purpose of the letter to the Hebrews. This invitation came chiefly because some of the men in a group of Christians had heard me present a talk on Hebrews at a retreat. Once again I felt the sense of my own inadequacy, but implored divine aid and proceeded with the task.

In each case I felt a door had been opened to me by the Holy Spirit, and that God's grace was sufficient, so that His strength could be manifested by my very weakness. I eagerly pray that those who read these simple messages may experience a little of the thrill that was mine in delivering them. I have preserved them in the same style and format as they were given orally, with the hope that the reader may feel a more personal relationship with the author. I am conscious of the imperfections of the presentations, but, as John Ruskin wrote, by banishing imperfection we may also destroy expression, check exertion, and paralyze vitality.

My Debt to Jews

Contents

Your gracious invitation to me, to present a series of addresses concerning the basis of my personal faith and hope, places me very deeply in your debt. I am honored beyond my ability to express it, yet I must confess to some trepidation. This is not to say there is any lack of trust in my own conviction. Rather, I am concerned that I may not be able to communicate it to you in a manner that will allow you to question meaningfully what I hold as truly basic.

First of all let me state that I am perfectly aware of the conditions accompanying your invitation. After delivering one introductory message of a general nature, I am to address myself to specific questions that you will raise and wish to hear discussed. I am to hold myself open to any direct questions that you may pose.

This is eminently fair. I do not like hit-and-run tactics, and deplore the idea of making the speaker's rostrum a place from which to fire away in a one-sided duel. I shall welcome your questions, and I trust that you will feel under no constraint of modesty or respect for my person, but will "pour in the grape shot." I am as anxious as you are to find the weak spots in my armor, and you will be my best friends if you will point out any errors in my thinking. Henri Frederic Amiel wrote in his Journal that the condition of real knowledge is the emancipation from error.

By way of introduction, I should like to do two things: detail for you my past experience and relationship with Jews in matters pertaining to religion; and tell you how I expect to conduct myself, along with my reason for choosing this course. I can assure you that my concern for Jews does not stem from a mass psychosis, or a guilt complex occasioned by the way Jews have been treated by some who have professed to be Christians. Much of the shameful history of pogroms and purges I would like to blot out, for I do not condone it. Nevertheless, its sordid stain remains upon the pages of human behavior.

If I were inclined to feel a sense of guilt over such matters, I would have ample grounds for doing so. I grew up in a provincial mining community, among people who were prejudiced for the most part. This feeling was projected toward any who were not white Anglo-Saxon Protestants. Anyone who was "foreign" and "different" was an object of suspicion, calumny, and hostility.

As a boy, I never heard of a black person who was designated anything but "a nigger." Apparently all whose skin was dark were regarded as damned, for I cannot recall a black man being called simply "a nigger." It was always "a damned nigger."

This feeling extended in some degree to all others who were regarded as foreigners and usurpers. In the absence of police, children were threatened by being told, "Old Toby will get you, if you don't behave!" Toby was a harmless Syrian pack-peddler, who traveled through the country selling packets of needles, spools of thread, combs, lace, and other imported articles. He was polite and deferential, but his skin was darker than ours; he spoke an alien dialect; so we were afraid of him.

We called Hungarians who worked in the mines "Hunkies." We called Germans "Krauts," and the Jewish merchants who sold us our shoes and clothing, "Kikes" or

"Sheenies." I am now aware of how vulgar and ignorant such expressions are, but we were that kind of people. It was a long time before I learned that the boorish term "kike" was actually bestowed merely because of the ending of Russian-Jewish names. It didn't matter that some who bore those names were the greatest benefactors of the human race.

I will not forget the day when I came to realize that the word "Sheeny," which was bandied about in our uncouth way, probably was derived from the Yiddish, sheyneh layt. This means "beautiful people," a term used to designate the educated, the cultured, and the wealthy.

Our prejudice was not limited to racial or ethnic differences, however. We felt such hatred toward Roman Catholics. We repeated all of the unfounded stories about their "underhanded plot to capture America." Popular were the scare sheets of yellow journalism that constituted our news media. These served to inflame passions and, on occasion, to incite riots against people whose only crime was that they were different. We were fully convinced that the basement of every Catholic church building was an arsenal for arms, and that the people went to Mass to learn the secret passwords, so that when the time came they could march forth and conquer our fair land for papal domination!

I am grateful for having been delivered from all of this, and I attribute it to the grace of God. Those of you who are humanists will have a different explanation, and it may be necessary for me to explain my position at another time. Presently my concern is to assure the psychologists in our group that I am not approaching these dialogues as a means of purging my conscience of guilt complex stemming from my early environment. Obviously, I am ashamed and deeply regretful of the unwholesome attitudes it engendered. The rays of the sunlight of love have driven from my heart those mists of prejudice and hatred. I am able to love you all, and to do so sincerely.

Several years ago I reached the decision that I must cultivate an understanding of my Jewish friends. I resolved to go among them and enhance the friendship I felt toward them. In high school I was captain of a debating team, and my immediate colleague was an outstanding Jewish student. We were together a great deal, much of the time in his home. I found him a man of scholarly depth.

When I began to feel the need of closer association, I started with the Reformed Jews, and frequently attended the largest and most prominent temple in our city. Several of you are members of it. As I became better acquainted with the rabbi and the minister of education, I was often asked to speak words of greeting to the congregation gathered for Sabbath services. The principal research for one of my books was done in the temple library.

I enrolled in the annual School of Judaism, and became the only non-Jew in the classes. I eagerly sought to learn the Jewish mind and heart. Eventually I went to the Hillel Foundation House, where I could have a share in the open discussions with students at the university. These were meaningful encounters with sharp young minds, some of them recently having come from kibbutzim in Israel. The rabbi was good to me, and we became close friends. Later I visited the president of Beth Abram, an Orthodox synagogue, and he permitted me to come after the evening prayers and talk at length with the cantor and himself. I felt quite Jewish indeed, when I donned the yarmulke in order to enter the building. I mention these things so that you will all realize that, both by reading and by personal experience, I have been preparing for this occasion. I am still learning, for your traditional proverb is correct: "The Torah has no bottom."

GROUND RULES

Now I must tell you some things I will not do, or even attempt, in these talks. I will not forget that we have been reared in different backgrounds, and that our cultural variances have deep roots, reaching far back into the history of all of us. I will not ignore the frame of reference into which you have been taught to fit life, but will respect it even as I respect all of you. We have met for mutual investigation, not for the imposition of one upon the other.

I shall not refer to myself as a Gentile, since some of you do not like the word as a designation. All of us are aware that words change their connotation, and frequently maintain an aura from the past. I shall speak of Jews and non-Jews, and you will have no difficulty in knowing of whom I speak when I refer to the non-Jewish community.

Another thing that I will not do is quote what I refer to as the New Covenant Scriptures as authoritative for you. I recognize them as the complement of the Jewish Scripture, and personally hold that they furnish a fulfillment of the prophetic Scriptures, which some of you cherish. But you do not regard them as representative of a New Covenant. To do so would mean that the covenant made with your ancestors at Sinai has been superseded, and this you will not concede.

No body of writings can be used as a standard of arbitration unless its authority is recognized by both parties involved. I must either convince you that what I refer to as the New Covenant Scriptures are a revelation from God, or I must not use them as I would in any dispute with those who profess to be Christians. There are such disputes, as I am certain you know.

I am fully aware that not all of you recognize the Jewish Scriptures as being genuine. Two of you have informed me that you are atheists, and several have told me you are agnostics. While it seems almost inconceivable to me that a Jew could be an atheist, we invite those of you who claim to be, to be our guests, and to ask any questions that you wish. In replying to such questions however, I shall quote from the Jewish Scriptures as authoritative. Our present dialogue does not involve the question whether there is a God, but whether an historical figure, Jesus of Nazareth, is the Messiah and Son of God. I shall proceed upon the basis that God exists, and if I cannot prove that He does, no atheist can prove that He does not.

We welcome the honest agnostics in this forum, for in some aspects and areas of life we all are agnostic. All of us are forced to say that we do not know about many things. It is no sin to be an agnostic, but it is a sin to remain one deliberately, when you can know. To be an agnostic of convenience in order to evade the responsibility that results from knowing, is to be a little less than honest. I have no quarrel with one who is blind, but I am suspicious of one who does not see only because he will not open his eyes.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

I come now to a point that needs emphasizing, although it may require more explaining to the disciples of Jesus who are present than to the rest of you. I am not the least bit interested in designating Jews as "Christians." There is a stigma attached to the word in your minds, and this is with some justification. There were crimes committed in history by those whom you regard as Christians. My statement does not proceed from the fact that the name is abhorrent to you, however. My indifference results from the fact that I have no intention of being caught up in a semantic wrangle. If Jesus is who He claimed to be, and if He validated His claim by His resurrection from the dead, He deserves our allegiance.

Whether or not those who grant such allegiance are called by a particular designation is of little consequence. The first followers of Jesus were Jews, plus a few proselytes to Judaism. Many of these were persecuted, and some of them even died for their faith in Jesus as the Messiah. They never were designated as Christians and never knew that anyone ever would be. The first man to die for his faith in the messiahship of Jesus was a Hellenistic Jew named Stephen. He knew nothing of being called a Christian, and would not have recognized the name if he had heard it

It was not until the message of Jesus was taken to the non-Jews, that this word was applied to His followers. It is still a question whether it was a term of derision given by the opposers, or a name of divine sanction. Some of the arguments on both sides of that issue are weak and unconvincing to the honest researchist. In any event, if thousands of Jews became disciples of Jesus and lived and died as such without ever being designated Christians, thousands more may do so with the sanction of the Holy Spirit.

I want every person on earth to know Jesus as I know Him, but if those Jews who come to trust in Him constitute simply a Messianic synagogue rather than what the world designates "the Christian church," I shall be as thrilled to know that we are one in Him. It is not necessary that you abandon your culture or others seek to become Jews in order to be members of the one body. Our relationship with God and with one another in the Messiah is not to be organizational or institutional, but personal.

If you are in the Messiah and desire to circumcise your sons on the eighth day, that is both your privilege and your liberty. You have a perfect right to thus remind your offspring that they are descended from Abraham after the flesh, and are in the lineage of the fathers, Isaac and Jacob. Even Jesus was circumcised, you know.

In the Messiah, you may observe the Sabbath, if you desire. This will call to mind that on this day your fathers began the exodus from the slavery of Egypt and became a free people. I cannot help remarking that, if some of you began to observe the Sabbath in the Messiah, it would be more than you do outside of Him. You would likewise continue to observe Sedar, and set the family table with the roast lamb, the bitter herbs, and matzos. This is your celebration of freedom from enslavement by a cruel nation and its ruler. I am not about to judge you regarding holy days, sabbaths, or new moons, just as I refuse to be judged by others in respect to these matters.

When we come to trust in the righteousness of God, rather than in our own righteousness by law-keeping, it is important to place life in proper perspective. We must realize that it is not a mere matter of doing or not doing things. Rather, it is the transformation from within that makes it possible for us to use the provisions of the world without abusing them. A tree is a beautiful creation, providing much for the comfort and relief of man. Carved into an idol and worshiped, however, it becomes a frightful object. We always must maintain things in their proper place.

Above all else, I do not want any of you to feel that an acceptance of Him whom I regard as the Messiah is in any way related to becoming artificial, American, cultural non-Jews. Whether or not you ever set foot inside an American-style religious edifice is not at all important to me. If you are born from above, as I believe that all of us must be, and come into that life which is the light of men, I will praise God. I will continue to praise Him if you never constitute anything visible but a synagogue of Messianists.

WHO AM I?

I do not pretend to be bringing anything new or different to you. The Messiah whom I proclaim is either the one of whom the prophets spoke, or He is a sham and a pretender. Therefore I cannot place you in debt to myself. On the contrary, I am deeply indebted to you, and in so many ways that it would be impossible to enumerate them. Actually, what I seek to do is to take what you have cherished as your heritage and have given to the world, and return it with proper interest. Those of you who are in financial and investment circles know that when you deposit your treasure, it is out of your sight and even out of your care for a while. At a later date it returns to you with proper accrual.

I regard myself as a messenger to deliver back to you what you bestowed upon humanity, with an accrued blessing. All I have to bring to you is what your fathers generously gave to the world. The prophets all maintained that their message was not the end, but merely the harbinger of greater things to come. Theirs was a message of hope to be realized later. I have no intention, therefore, of imposing upon you an alien system or a non-Jewish philosophy. Instead, I seek to enter into that fullness which was read in the Torah, the haftarah, and the Hagiographa. This is not to imply that we have a superior insight, so that we can come and explain your prophecies to you. They are our prophecies also, when we embrace them in their fruition. Surely he who breaks bread of the heads of grain has nothing to boast of over him who planted the grain, or even the original seed and stalk. None of us has aught of which to boast, for all we have, including life itself, has been given to us. All of us simply share in the grace of the one God, and all of us are equally in need of it.

I owe my special thanks to the Jews for the rich heritage they have preserved for humanity. They are beloved for the sake of their fathers. It was Abraham who, having heard the call of God, forsook an idolatrous world and became God's pilgrim, searching for a better land. He was the first person of whom it was said that he believed God, and his faith was counted to him for righteousness. Thus, the very idea of justification by faith originated with Abraham. If I can capture this magnificent thought for my life, I can be said to walk in the steps of Abraham.

To me, the brotherhood of faith is more meaningful than that of the flesh. The latter is involuntary, an accident of birth, but the other is by choice. I cannot attain righteousness by having been permitted to enter the world as a part of a certain family strain. No combination of genes and chromosomes can provide admission to God's grace. Our standing will not be by paternity or pedigree, but by the power of God.

I am also grateful that the oracles of God were committed to Israel, and were preserved inviolate through all their encounters. From a child I have known these sacred writings, and they have thrilled my being. My heroes became these ancient worthies, and as I grew in years I grew in respect for their staunch devotion to the God of Abraham.

It is my conviction that the preservation of the Jews is a direct proof of the continued providence of God. The Jews, found in almost every country under Heaven, stand as a continual testimony to the unchangeable promise of God. Driven by fate and harassed by human hate, they have survived indescribable torture and cruelty.

Many of the people who enslaved the Jews have faded into the gray mists of history. Not a single one of their progeny remains on the earth. But the promise of God was that, as long as the sun shone and the moon beamed, He would not forget His promise to Jacob. So I trust that you will forgive me if I say that my heart beats with renewed hope as I look into your faces this day. The fact that you live is an additional proof to me that our God is a living God. I am also convinced that your people will survive until the sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon shall be turned into blood.

THE ISSUE AT HAND

We have come to the moment when I shall, without hesitation, acknowledge my gratitude to you for providing the one Person who means everything to me, but whose spiritual identity you disclaim. This is not to say that you deny there was a figure in history whose name was Jesus, and whose boyhood town was Nazareth. No really intelligent person denies this. One cannot even date a letter or check without acknowledging that He lived. A few modern gnostics, like their ancient counterparts, seek to explain away the significance of His life, but they are now a bedraggled minority.

Jesus was cradled in the womb of a Jewish girl, who delivered Him into this suffering world in the little town of Bethlehem. We know who the Roman Caesar was, we know who the Jerusalem Herod was, at that time. We know how long Jesus lived, and we know when and how He died. The attestation for these facts is so strong that to deny them would obligate us to deny anything else that happened at the same time or previously.

Our real problem is not whether or not there was such a person. It is rather a question of who He was, His real identity. Was He the Son of God? If so, how can we know for certain? If He was, what difference will it make in my life now? It is absurd to pretend that there are no problems among us. When two people meet and one of them affirms that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God and the Messiah of the prophets, and the other denies both, obviously a problem exists.

I refuse to be guilty of that form of subterfuge called compromise. In the past this has been indulged in as an attempt to make both sides feel good. Generally such compromise takes the form of admitting that Jesus was "a son of God," in much the same sense that all of us are sons of God. He believed in God and sought to order His life in conformity to the will of God, and thus He could be referred to as a son, a follower, or a disciple of God.

I reject this as wholly untenable. When I speak of Jesus as the Son of God, I mean that He was such in the unique sense. I regard Him as divine, and hold that in Him the fullness of Godhood was embodied. On this matter there can be no surrender. I must stand or fall by this conviction. If Jesus is not who He professed to be, the whole superstructure of which I am a part must come tumbling down.

My future is not dependent upon my subscription to a sounder philosophy or a superior code of morals. I do not rest my hopes nor risk my soul upon a system of rationalization about spiritual matters, but upon reconciliation with God, made possible by the atonement of Jesus. If He is not the Son of God, my hope rests in a house of cards held together by wisps of anxiety, and doomed to dissolution and disillusionment. If Jesus is proven to be a sham, I have nothing to offer you that should command your attention.

So I have placed my all on one prime fact, the greatest in the universe: God broke through the horizontal history of men on the vertical, and where He bisected it, He left a cross. It is in this cross I glory, and it is this conviction I must defend. I am prepared to defend it in our subsequent gatherings. I shall welcome your questions for our future meetings, and I sincerely pray that God will bless all of you, and those who are dear to you, until we meet again.

Are There Three Gods?

Contents

I am happy indeed to appear for this second in our series of personal sharing sessions. As you know, in this and future meetings I am to address my remarks to questions that you have submitted. I should like for our meetings to be as informal as possible. If there arises a question in your mind that is so relevant it cannot be postponed, you must feel free to interject it.

I believe that all of us are sufficiently mature that we will not turn these gatherings into verbal exchanges over trivia. I am certain that you will pose questions of real value, and I promise you I will reply in a spirit of seriousness and respect. You realize, of course, that there are several preliminary matters to which I must devote attention.

Some of you heard the dialogue between an eminent university professor and myself, following our other meeting. My respected friend is a humanist. It is his opinion that the need for God grew out of the superstitions and fears of primitive peoples. They were confronted with circumstances for which they could not account, and in their ignorance they invented gods to explain what to them was unexplainable. His feeling is that science will unravel more and more of the mysteries of life. Thus the need for God will be felt less and less, until He will be retired and go out of business.

The great difference between us lies in the fact that I believe God created man in His image, while my friend holds that man created gods in his image. Between these two postulates there is a great gulf. It is upon the plateaus of life as it is lived on either side of the chasm that the greatest difference will be seen and felt. It is not my purpose, nor would it be my policy, to take advantage of a formal presentation in which to reply to my friend, and I mention our little encounter merely in passing and by way of introduction.

My position is that God existed as the living source of all life in the universe. From Him came all things, and to Him all will return. He is above all, through all, and in all who humbly seek His face. He is destined to be "all in all" when the last enemy is destroyed. It is with the divine nature that I must deal today, for you have lost no time in pinpointing one of the great questions.

TRINITARIAN?

As finally boiled down, the question is: Do not Christians actually worship three Gods, and if not, how do you reconcile the idea that to be a Christian you must recognize God, Jesus of Nazareth, and the Holy Spirit as Gods?

Before answering, it will come as a surprise to you to know that I am doing something today that I have never done, and will not do, with fellow believers in Jesus as the Son of God. Formerly I have steadfastly refused to be drawn into controversy over the nature of Deity. There are several reasons for this, not the least of which is that, being possessed of a finite mind, I am far too limited in scope and breadth of knowledge to encompass the infinite. As Isaiah put it in the long ago, "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? there is no searching of his understanding" (Isaiah 40:28). I doubt that one ever explains God. One simply accepts Him on the basis of evidence and faith.

The kind of a deity whom I could get safely in my little mental box is not the God of the universe whom I revere and before whom I bow. I am not a Trinitarian, and neither am I a Unitarian. These are appellations used to designate formal schools of thought, often antagonistic and hostile to one another. They grew up in the ferment of contention, and too often it was a strife about words. By creating categories into which their respective defenders could be pushed or driven, it became easy to assault the party without especially examining the evidence submitted by individuals in both.

It will help you to keep in mind that any attack you may make upon Trinitarianism as a formal doctrine may not be touching my own position. It may actually constitute an evasion of it. I expect to receive you as individuals, to listen to what you say, and to weigh it as carefully as I can. No man must be charged with acceptance of what he disclaims. No one must be charged with a consequence of his personal position when he personally disavows that consequence. Only by such an attitude can we maintain the dignity and secure the freedom of each one of us.

Now, to answer the question, I do not believe there are three Gods. I can recite, and often have recited, without a twinge of conscience, the Shema: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deuteronomy 6:4). But I do not limit God to one expression or manifestation, for to do this is to seek to confine Him by my finite power of rationalization. I would do no honor to Him by such action; rather, I would make Him less than supreme.

It is my conviction that, in the Scriptures that we all hold sacred, God seeks to show us that He is a composite and united being. The account of the origin of our universe begins with the words, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Genesis 1:1). The word for God is Elohim, which is plural. It is a remarkable term, occurring for the most part in the plural, but usually connected with a singular verb. I do not think that this word affords a conclusive proof as some Trinitarians do. In view of the following context, I simply say that it affords ground for real study.

The record continues by informing us that, while creation was in a chaotic state, "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (v. 2). At the very beginning of the sacred writings we have Elohim, a plural word, and ruach, translated "spirit." I mention this to introduce what I believe is the general tenor of the revelation of God. I do not contend that one can positively affirm that it was the intention here to allude to a personal distinction in what I shall refer to as the Godhood, that is, Deity.

I must frankly tell you that, as I read the Scriptures, it seems to me that there is a constant intimation of a more singular nature of the God of the universe. You will immediately say that this is because I approach the Scriptures with a presupposition, and that I have been conditioned to read them thus. But that objection can be made of yourselves as well. For that reason, I am simply going to enunciate my views, with no dogmatism. I would not want you to accept anything solely upon the basis of my views.

Allow me to cite an example of what I mean. In Isaiah 63:7-10, the prophet begins a recitation of the lovingkindness of Yahweh, as demonstrated to the house of Israel. He attributes the blessings to the mercies of God. He portrays God as saying of Israel, "Surely they are my people, children that will not lie," adding, "So he was their Saviour" (v. 8). You will recognize that the Hebrew word for "Savior" is cognate with the word "Jesus." Actually, you can translate it with no linguistic injustice, "He became their Jesus." But the prophet continues, "In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them: in his love and in his pity he redeemed them." As one studies all of the references to the "angel of God," he becomes convinced that here was a personal manifestation of God in another form. It was this "angel" with which Jacob wrestled, and he declared, "I have seen God face to face" (Genesis 32:30).

It is significant that when Jacob was nearing death, he summoned the sons of Joseph and blessed them. In doing so, he specifically mentioned God as "the God before whom his fathers, Abraham and Isaac, walked." Jacob called Him the God who had shepherded him during his whole life until that day, and then he called upon the "angel" who had redeemed him from all evil to bless the sons. Thus there are two expressions of God as capable of bestowing a blessing upon mankind.

Further Scriptural research will reveal that the "angel of God's face" is identified with the "Rock" in which Israel was to trust. To those of you who do not believe there is a God, or to those who deny that the Bible contains a divine revelation, this will have no appeal. Those of us who do believe in God, and accept the Torah and haftarah as a communication from God, must reckon with the fact that Moses repeatedly spoke of the "Rock of salvation" as personal.

Some of you are familiar with the rabbinic tradition that, after Moses had provided water from the rock to quench the people's thirst, this rock followed the people and continued to provide them with water. I am sure that most of you were taught this tradition from your childhood. The rock became their savior, but this is affirmed of the "angel of his presence" in Isaiah 63:9. So God manifested himself and His saving power in more than one personality, according to both the Torah and the prophets.

Now, I am going to make an affirmation that may startle you when you hear it. I hold that the idea of a triune God, that is, the manifestation of Deity in three persons, is not contrary to the Hebrew Scriptures at all. It is in harmony with them, and represents their correct teaching. The problem lies, not with what God revealed, but with man's interpretation of it, or, in this case, with one man's translation or rendition of it.

THE SECOND MOSES

The non-Jews in my audience, and perhaps even some Jews, are not aware that to a great degree modern Judaism is dependent for its form upon one who was honored to such an extent that he has been called the "second Moses." Moses ben Maimon, generally referred to as Moses Maimonides, was born in Cordova, Spain, about 1135. When he was thirteen years old, Spain came under Muslim rule, and the Koran was bound upon Jews and Christians alike. The family of Maimonides was fortunate enough to escape, and after years of wandering, settled in Cairo.

By this time, Maimonides had established a reputation as a scholar, philosopher, and physician. He was made both the Rabbi of Cairo and personal physician to Saladin, the reigning sultan. He undertook the task of synthesizing revelation and human wisdom, of blending faith and reason into a harmonious whole, by reconciling the tenets of rabbinic Judaism with the rationalization of Aristotelian philosophy. If we had the time, I could tell you how this affected Thomas Aquinas, who undertook to do for Catholicism what Maimonides did for Judaism.

It is enough for me to say that, since the revolutionary impact of these men, neither Judaism nor Catholicism is an attempt to recapture primitive purity. They are now systematized. What passes now for Catholicism is actually Thomism. Modern Judaism is an attempt to establish the validity of the doctrinal deductions of Maimonides, as set forth in his thirteen articles of faith and in the monumental work, Guide to the Perplexed.

One of the thirteen articles of faith accepted and repeated in the Jewish liturgy is, "I believe with a perfect faith that the Creator, blessed be His name, is an absolute one." The Hebrew word used here for "absolute one" is yachid. It literally means "only one," or "absolute one" as the ultimate reality, indivisible and inseparable. For eight centuries your fathers, and your fathers' fathers, have repeated this creedal statement, and yet it is not what God revealed through Moses in the Torah. It is the very opposite.

In the Shema, as contained in Deuteronomy 6:4, God laid down a principle of faith to represent the divine revelation of the nature of Deity: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord," or better, "The Lord our God, the Lord is one." The word for "one" is achad. This means a "united one." The first Moses used achad (united one), while the "second Moses" used yachid (only one). The first Moses revealed the word of God, while the second was trying to produce a human synthesis of thought.

One need not be a profound scholar to see that if what I am saying is true, it makes a great deal of difference. The idea of God as a united one signifies a personality manifesting itself in more than one form, yet perfectly joined in a unity or oneness unique in our universe. This is of vital concern to our exploration, for it could mean that the Lord God, who is one, could manifest himself in the form of a Son without destroying the cardinal truth that He is one.

This is as important to the Jewish mind as it is to the non-Jewish mind. Rabbinical tradition always has had to wrestle with such passages as the prophecy of Isaiah: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace" (9:6). Was Isaiah, who condemned idolatry in such vitriolic terms, affirming that a child to be born was to be another God?

Certainly the import of the passage as the Messianic prophecy has been dulled by the suggestion that it is a reference to a kingly heir born in the lineage of David. Liberal theology, espoused by both Jews and non-Jews, has sought to explain it away as purely allegorical, or as a paean of praise for the coronation ceremony of a mere earthly monarch. Such explanations never can satisfy those who believe that Isaiah "heard the voice of the Lord" (6:8). There was a child to be born who would be designated "The mighty God" and "everlasting Father." Who was that child? The rabbis declared it was to be the Messiah.

YACHID

Let me validate the distinction to be made between the words yachid and achad by an appeal to those Scriptures which we all regard as sacred. Let us examine first the implications of the word yachid. This is the word used by Moses Maimonides to translate the word "one." I have said it means "absolute one" or "singularly one." Do the Scriptures bear this out?

This word occurs in Genesis 22:12, where God forbids Abraham to proceed in offering Isaac. "And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me." Isaac was unique as the son of promise. In this respect he had no peer. He stood absolutely alone.

The same usage occurs in Amos 8:10, where the prophet predicts the calamity to befall the kingdom of Israel: "I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation; and I will bring up sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head; and I will make it as the mourning of an only son, and the end thereof as a bitter day."

Also in this connection consider Jeremiah 6:26, where the prophet said, "O daughter of my people, gird thee with sackcloth, and wallow thyself in ashes: make thee mourning, as for an only son, most bitter lamentation: for the spoiler shall suddenly come upon us."

These uses of yachid point up singularity, a oneness, that is not shared. In view of the need for sons to preserve the genealogy, to maintain the tribal distinctions, and to perpetrate the inheritance, the mourning for an only son was more intense. Those who lost an only son could not allay their grief by giving attention more fully to other children.

If God had used this word in the Shema, a point might be made linguistically for opposition to the deity of Jesus. It could not destroy it if it is a fact, for facts cannot be set aside merely by linguistic usage. Yet, it must be conceded that, if the Scriptures had used yachid, a more positive case could have been made for the opposite contention.

ACHAD

But the Scriptural term is achad. I now propose an examination of the tenor of its usage to determine if it is possible to establish a general rule or criterion to be used in measuring the word. I refer to Genesis 2:24 as a point of beginning. When God made woman and presented her to Adam, marriage was instituted for the joy and well-being of the human family. It was then said, "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh."

No one can deny that here achad signified a oneness that is achieved by the union of two persons. It was a union in which the parties were to deem themselves as entirely and indissolubly united. It was as if they were in reality one person, one soul, and one body. Yet the very word signifying such a union is that the Lord is one.

Let us examine another passage. When Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, went to visit some of her Hivite girl friends, she fell for Shechem, a son of the local sheik. Shechem seduced her and wanted to marry her, but her angry brothers decided to kill off all the men in the tribe. They devised a ruse to get the Hivite males to be circumcised, then they could kill them while they were still in pain and unable to fight. In proposing this they said, "Then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people" (Genesis 34:16). Here again it is obvious that achad achieves oneness by uniting. It is not a oneness stemming from an absoluteness of personality. It is a oneness of unity.

When we say, "The Lord is one," the word conveys the same thought of a united one, a composite one. When Moses said, "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord," he used achad. He did not mean to question the nature and sovereignty of God, which could express itself in any form or manner. His purpose was to uphold monotheism, as opposed to the polytheism of the heathen nations.

In the same direct context Moses writes, "Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you" (Deuteronomy 6:13, 14). There is a great difference between the one true and living God manifesting himself in various personalities, and other gods invented and created by man.

I believe with all my heart that there is one God. I am unalterably opposed to other gods. I make a great distinction, however, between the worship of other gods contrived and constructed by the ingenuity of men, and the worship of the one God in any form in which He reveals His grace, benevolence, and saviorhood.

My humble contention is that God was in Christ reconciling this world to himself. The God who was in Christ was the one God. He is the one Lord of the Shema, which you believers recite every day. I know there are differences between us, grave differences. I propose to explore them honestly and openly. I have no desire to smooth them over at the expense of truth. But there is no difference between us in our mutual affirmation that our Lord is one, and beside Him there is no other. On this matter I am in harmony with the best of Judaism.

The sacred book of Judaism, the Zohar, bears me out in its comments made on the Shema. It asks the question, "Why is there need of mentioning the name of God three times in this verse?" It then provides the answer: "The first Jehovah is the Father above. The second is the stem of Jesse, the Messiah who is to come from the family of Jesse through David. And the third one is the way which is below, and these three are one." I take it that "the way which is below" is the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, who reveals to us "the way." I am in agreement with the Zohar in its interpretation of the Shema.

I see we have a hand raised. May we have your question?

Do I understand you to say that a Jew can believe that Jesus is the Messiah, and also the Son of God, whatever that means, and still say the Shema without having his fingers crossed?

That is exactly what I mean. It is not a matter of keeping your fingers crossed, but getting your mind uncrossed. A Jew who accepts Jesus as the Messiah of the prophets is no less a Jew than he was before. He can read the same Scriptures that he always has read. He can revere them as much as he always has revered them. The only difference is that the Scriptures will have greater meaning to him, for he will see and know their fulfillment. As it is, my Jewish friends always are on the way to school and never meet the Teacher.

We must not forget that the message of Jesus as the Messiah was first taken to Jews, and that it was done in the very center of Judaism. It was here, where He was best known, that Jews first acknowledged Him. All who announced Him were Jews. All who believed in Him, or into Him, were Jews. They still recited the Shema, they still observed the Sabbath, they still observed the feasts. They circumcised their children on the eighth day. Having accepted Jesus as the one of whom the prophets spoke, having been baptized into His name, and having entered into a vital relationship with Him, they now constituted a synagogue of Messianists. The temple was still standing, and they went to it daily at the designated times of prayer.

These Jews did not love the rest of the Jewish community less because they loved the Messiah more. When they gathered on the first day of the week to eat and drink together in memory of Jesus, they did not do so as "Christians," for that designation had not been coined. They came together as Jews who trusted in Jesus because they firmly believed what the prophets had spoken concerning Him. They believed then what I believe now, that Jesus fulfilled the prophecies, and gave meaning to them in His birth, His life, and His death.

I see we have another question.

On what ground do you assume that the Messiah was to be a person? Could not the principles set forth in the Torah accomplish all that was prophesied as to the cleansing of the earth and the unity of mankind?

Thank you! You really have asked two questions, and both are very important. I shall address myself to these at our next meeting, since our time is up. May God bless you all until that time.

A Personal Messiah

Contents

I have been thinking about the uniqueness of this forum. I know of no other place where Jewish men of reputation in a thriving community are willing to sit down with non-Jews to discuss their divergent concepts regarding God's revelation. I am distinctly honored to be invited to share my own heartfelt convictions.

It is obvious that no one could impose his thinking upon this assembly. I assure you I have no desire to do so. You are thoroughly capable of thinking for yourselves. I do not want you to feel a need for unscrewing your heads and placing them under your chairs while I speak. My approach will be rational. It will be in love and deep respect for every one of you. If you cannot conscientiously agree with what I say, I would never ask you to violate your conscience. I will love you whether or not you concur with what I say. As long as these are sharing sessions, I will come. When they become manipulative, I will be conspicuous by my absence.

Today I am to address myself to a two-part question, the first part being the grounds on which I assume the Messiah was to be a person. Before zeroing in on that directly, I would like to suggest a few thoughts for your consideration by way of background.

History will bear out that the ancient Jews all believed in a personal Messiah. There was no idea that the Scriptures taught anything else. Gradually, men who lived in a land exposed to persecution and overthrow by foreign powers began to sigh for a leader who could free their nation from oppression. It was an easy step to expect the Messiah to be a conquering hero, one who would set up an earthly kingdom. It is my personal opinion that this presupposition militated against the Jews' acceptance of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. I state this without desire to criticize. It is simply my commentary on what transpired. I believe that Jesus fulfilled the prophecies in the haftarah, but it is obvious that He did not meet the popular image that had been conjured up in the public mind. It was easy for the Jews to reject Him as Messiah on this ground.

As a kind of parenthetical observation, let me remind you that scholarly Judaism always has had difficulty with the prophecies. Some of these portrayed the Messiah as a ruler, upon whose shoulders the government would rest. Others affirmed He would be a suffering servant, "smitten for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities," as expressed by Isaiah. In an attempt to reconcile this apparent contradiction, many rabbis developed the theory of a twofold Messiah, one in a state of poverty and suffering, the other in glory and splendor.

This view postulated that one would be born as Messiah ben Joseph, of the tribe of Ephraim. He would fight against Gog and be slain by Armillus. The other would be Messiah ben David, of the tribe of Judah. He would overcome and kill Armillus, resurrect the first Messiah, assemble all Israel to Palestine, and rule all nations with a rod of iron from Jerusalem. I suspect this expedience was adopted because of a mistaken view of the nature of the heavenly kingdom, which never was intended to be a kingdom of this world. An earthly monarchy requires an earthly monarch, and one who conceives of an earthly kingdom must invent an earthly king.

My purpose in mentioning this is neither to analyze or to criticize. It is simply to show that the position I occupy as to the personality of the Messiah is in harmony with ancient Judaism. It is the modern Jew who has departed from the traditional view. It is one of the anomalies of our meeting that many of the Jews here present have forsaken the very basis of primitive Judaism, while I am a firm defender of it. What a switch it is that, on the grounds of the faith of your fathers, I am the Jew and you are the non-Jew!

Let me again affirm that all of the ancient Jews held the concept of a personal Messiah, coming with power and in the glory of God. Even those later rabbis who sought to harmonize what they considered irreconcilable prophetic statements did not abandon the idea of a personal Messiah, but came up with two persons instead of one.

FALSE MESSIAHS

The real reason why some of you no longer believe in a personal Messiah is that you no longer regard the Jewish Scriptures as genuine revelation. In your view, the prophets were not sent from God; they were simply perceptive individuals with deeper social consciousness, rebelling against the culture. I regard them as holy men of God who spoke as they were motivated by the Spirit of God.

The pseudo-Messiahs, who have periodically risen and obtained such a following, are a testimony to the Jewish belief in, and a yearning for, a personal Messiah. Just as there can be no counterfeit without the genuine coin, so there could be no false Messiah without at least a concept of a genuine Messiah. If false Messiahs have been accepted because they are persons, this is indicative that the Messsiah expected on the ground of prophetic revelation is conceived of as a person.

Beginning with Coziba, who changed his name to Bar Cochba, there have been more than two dozen false Messiahs. Simon Bar Cochba is a good example of how the Jewish people have been willing to follow a man. When Emperor Hadrian undertook to Romanize Judea in the year 132, a revolution was sparked, and this projected Coziba into a position of leadership at once. He proclaimed himself to be the "Star" mentioned by Balaam (Numbers 24:17). He declared that he was sent from Heaven to overthrow Roman tyranny and restore the liberty and glory of the nation. Akiba ben Joseph, one of the most influential rabbis of that day, declared that Bar Cochba, which means "Son of the Star," was the Messiah and King of the Jews. Almost half a million Jews rallied to his call. They defeated the Romans under Finnius Rufus, capturing more than fifty towns.

Hadrian then summoned his most famous general, Julius Severus, and after a long and bitter struggle the Jews were defeated. Bar Cochba was killed at Bethar in August, 135. Half a million Jews were killed. Thousands of women and children were sold into slavery. The harsh measures of the Romans forced hundreds of thousands of Jews to flee Palestine. This was the final exile, or dispersal, which left Palestine under alien rule until the Republic of Israel was formed in 1948, the very same year that you began meeting.

Time would fail me to tell of Moses Cretensis, Ishmael Sophus, Salomo Macho, or Sabbatai Sevi, all of whom proclaimed themselves to be the Messiah, only to bring woe upon those who followed them. My point is simply that, since these men claimed to be the Messiah, it is obvious that they believed in a personal Messianic figure. Since so many regarded each in his turn as the Messiah proves that the people also regarded the Messiah as a man. This proves nothing about the deluded claims of messiahship. It does prove that I am not alone in interpreting the Messianic Scriptures as alluding to a man.

MESSIANIC PROPHECY

As I approach the matter of specifying the grounds upon which I assume the Messiah to be a person, I will cite the unadorned statements of the prophets. These convinced all of your fathers that the Messiah was to be a person, not a moral code, system, or an ethical principle. This testimony was so conclusive that many rabbis of several centuries ago believed the Messiah had come. They thought He remained concealed because the sins of the Jews disqualified them to receive Him.

In 1590, the very learned chief rabbi of Vienna, Simon Luzzato, said of the predictions of Daniel, "The consequence of a too extended and profound investigation on the part of Jewish scholars would be that they would all become Christians; for it could not be denied that, according to Daniel's limitation of the time, the Messiah must already have appeared." I think I have never read a more revealing statement.

I would like to produce the prediction of Israel himself, that prince of God who was called Jacob originally. He became the father of twelve sons, and these became the heads of the twelve tribes. The life of Jacob was an eventful one. When he was introduced to the pharaoh of Egypt by his son Joseph, he told that monarch, "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage" (Genesis 47:9).

When this aged patriarch sensed that death was approaching, with the characteristic attitude of a desert sheik he summoned his family to his bedside. Calling his sons to him he said, "Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days" (49:1). With a prescience given by God, he then issued prophetic forecasts of the nature and fate of each tribe, beginning with Reuben, the eldest son. Jacob said that Judah would be especially reverenced by his brethren. He would be successful in battle against his enemies, and would earn the respect of the other tribes. His forecast begins, "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise" (49:8). There is a play on words here, since "Judah" means praise, as you know. It was like saying, "Judah, your name is praise, and praised you will be." If you are familiar with the Jerusalem Targum, you will recall the free translation, "Judah, to thee shall all thy brethren confess, and by thy name shall all Jews be called."

For the sake of time, we will pass by the portrayal of the tribe of Judah in its three stages of development, referred to by Jacob under the symbol of a young lion, a mature lion, and an old lion. Perhaps the reference is to the tribal status in three eras, the first under judges or deliverers, the second under David, and the third under Solomon. It is interesting for me to see that, in depicting the standards of the tribes, Jewish artists portray a lion on the standard of Judah. Early Jewish Christians referred to Jesus as "the lion of the tribe of Judah."

THE SCEPTER

I now come to Genesis 49:10, which I consider to be one of the most important passages in the Scriptures relating to the Messiah. Let me quote the words of Jacob: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." I want to analyze this point by point, mindful as I do so that there are excellent scholars present, most of whom are opposed to my position.

What is the scepter? Whatever it was, it was not to depart from the tribe of Judah until the Shiloh came. The word shebet signifies primarily "rod" or "staff." It was employed for that with which a master might beat a slave (Exodus 21:20); for a father to punish his son (Proverbs 23:13); for a farmer to beat out his grain (Isaiah 28:27); and for a shepherd to herd and mark his sheep (Leviticus 27:32).

Since a king carried a short rod or staff as a badge of authority, shebet is also translated "scepter" in passages like

Psalm 45:6. Thus it came to be applied to the rulers, and then by extension to the tribes over which they ruled or presided. No doubt this stemmed from the phenomenon described in Numbers 17:2, 3. A dispute had arisen over Aaron's exclusive right to the special priesthood. God instructed the head of each tribe to take a rod and write his name upon it. The rods were collected by Moses and laid up in the tabernacle all night. The next morning it was found that Aaron's rod had budded, blossomed, and produced almonds. The right of the tribe of Levi to the priesthood was thus decided. The word for "rod" gradually began to be applied to the tribes. It came to be the symbol of tribal identity. I believe it is in that sense it is used here. The intimation is that some of the tribes would lose their identity before the Shiloh came. They would disappear or be amalgamated, but the tribe of Judah would be identifiable. A consequence of this is of tremendous significance. It follows logically that if the tribal identity of Judah can be established no longer, if the tribe itself cannot be isolated, and if Jews cannot prove their tribal relationship to it, the Shiloh must have come. If the existence of a thing, state, or condition is made contingent upon the coming of a certain person or event, it would seem that when that thing or state no longer exists, it is prima facie evidence that the other has come.

The staff of tribal identity would not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver go forth from between his feet, until Shiloh came. "Lawgiver" is from mehokek, as you know. It refers to a maker of statutes, a teacher of legal precepts. All of us are aware that Moses, who pronounced statutes, judgments, and commandments to the people, was of the tribe of Levi. When Israel wanted knowledge of the law they did not go to Judah. They went to the priests and Levites. No maker of statutes ever proceeded from the loins of Judah, and none was to do so until Shiloh arrived. This suggests that the Shiloh would be a teacher of commandments and that He would supersede Moses. The statutes would come from Judah and not from Levi. We can see how important the Shiloh was to be.

Let me make a positive statement, and you may feel free to examine it at your leisure. All believers in the revelation of God among the ancient Jews unqualifiedly accepted this as a Messianic prediction. The chief of the Targumists actually translated it thus. The Chaldean Version rendered it, "One having principality shall not be taken from the house of Judah, nor a scribe from his children's children, until the Messiah come, whose the kingdom is." The Jerusalem Targum renders it, "Kings shall not fail from the house of Judah, nor skilful [sic] doctors of the law from their children's children, till the time when King Messiah shall come."

While I differ from the interpretation placed on some of the phraseology by the ancient Targumists, we are in absolute agreement that the reference is to the coming of the Messiah.

Please pardon this interruption. I am a visitor today and am not a Jew. I do not know what you mean by the Targums.

You are certainly welcome, and so is your question. The word targum is an Aramaic term meaning "interpretation." When Hebrew ceased to be spoken generally by the Jews in Babylon and Palestine, and was supplanted by Aramaic, the common people could not understand the Scriptures in the original. Accordingly, the scribes and teachers began to paraphrase in the Aramaic tongue, and these paraphrases were used for study and instruction the synagogues. The Targums are explanations of the meaning of Scriptures as understood in that day. But the Targumists relied upon tradition as well as the written word.

Only a small portion of the great mass of oral Targums survived. Those that did furnish us material on many parts of the Scriptures. The Jerusalem Targum, from which I quoted, is an incomplete one on the Pentateuch. It is important because it establishes the fact that the traditional and accepted view of Genesis 49:10 was that the Shiloh was to be the Messiah.

Now, what is the meaning of Shiloh? The root shalah means "to be quiet, secure, or peaceful." The Shiloh was to be the pacifier, the peacemaker. He was the one who would reconcile, mediate, and produce tranquillity. I happen to believe that the aged Jacob was permitted by Heaven to foretell the coming of Him who would be God's agent for restoring peace and harmony. This peacemaker was to come from the tribe of Judah. He was to succeed Moses as a statute-bringer. With His coming, tribal differences and distinctions would pass away.

I submit to you that the Shiloh was to be a person, not a system, organization, or ethical code of values. The patriarch was explicit. To him would the gathering of the people be. I concur with all of the Jewish interpreters of yesterday, the wise men of old, that the Shiloh was to be the Messiah, God's anointed one, bringing peace and reconciliation to a ripped-off world. I cannot see how anyone reading objectively can deduce logically that it speaks of anything but a person who was to come and achieve the divine purpose. I realize that I am reading it some twenty centuries after Jesus came, but I trust that I am not reading back into it merely my own yearnings.

The arrangement of God with your fathers was temporary. The covenant given at Mount Sinai never was intended to be universal or timeless. It was to lead and protect those who believed in monotheism until the great Lawgiver and Peacemaker should arrive. Tribal distinctions were not merely arbitrary or capricious. They were purposeful and prophetic. The standard of Judah would not disappear until the scion of David came. Moses would be eclipsed by the Messiah. The love of law would give way to the law of love. If Jacob spoke the truth, and if the Shiloh of whom he spoke was the Messiah, no Jew can be faithful to Jacob and refuse to accept the Messiah when He is identified.

What you have said today may interest a student of the Torah, which I'm not. But so far you haven't said one thing to convince me that the Messiah was Jesus, and I don't think you can.

Thank you for your statement. Bless your heart, I'd feel a lot better if you were a student of the Torah. I am sure you study your insurance manuals, for you are a successful broker. But the Torah was given to help men live, and an insurance salesman ought to be especially interested in that. But please remember that in these statements I did not set out to prove that Jesus was the Messiah. My task, based upon the prior question, was to show that the Messiah was to be a person, not a system or cultural code. If the Messiah was not to be a person, it would be absurd to point to any person as the Messiah. When Moses Mendelssohn, the "German Socrates," translated the Torah and other sections of the Bible into German in 1783, he paved the way for the Jews to rid themselves of their ghetto parochialism and enter the European community, where they imbibed the modern spirit. Unfortunately, as I view it, this first modern champion of Jewish emancipation had become the captive of German rationalism, and opened the door for modernism as well as for modern living. There is a difference between being rational and being rationalistic. The first is the correct exercise of the mental powers; the second is the exercise of a definite bias in the use of those powers.

Mendelssohn laid the foundation upon which Abraham Geiger advanced the reform movement while serving as rabbi in Breslau, from 1840 to 1863. A majority of you are affiliated with this school of thought, and no longer regard the Torah as a real law from God. You seek only ethical considerations, and while I am sure some of you would deny it, in the final analysis you make every man his own Torah. You no longer look for a personal Messiah, but are content to believe that peace and brotherhood will result from universal dissemination of the principles and attitudes embraced in Jewish thought. This is your "Messiah."

If you will be patient and understanding of my bluntness, I would like to say I am persuaded that you will not only resent any proof I may present that Jesus is the Messiah, but some of you will resist the very thought of a personal Messiah. Neither resentment nor resistance will change my feeling toward you, nor diminish my love for you. Dr. Marcus Bach wrote a book entitled The Will To Believe. I suppose we must take into account that the negative corollary to this is the will not to believe. I do not have a desire to impose my own convictions upon you. What I propose to do is to lay out before you the basis of my own faith. You can then examine it and determine if it is valid. The final judge for all of us is the God of glory.

If you come to believe that the promised Messiah was a person, it seems to me that you will either need to accept the claim of Jesus to be that Messiah, or surrender your hope. If Jesus is not the Messiah, there will never be another who can stake out a claim to that right. Jesus fulfilled the prophecies as no other ever did or can. Alfred Edersheim was a learned Jew who came to believe that Jesus was the Messiah. In September 1883, in a preface to his volumes, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, he wrote, "Lord, to whom shall we go? The words of eternal life hast Thou!"

It seems to me it would be impossible for any person now to establish his own descent from the tribe of Judah. Not one of you present can identify yourself as to your original tribal ancestry. I know that Mr. Cohen, who sits at the table, can argue from his name, which means "priest," that he must be a descendant of the tribe of Levi. But that cannot be proven in view of the fact that the conquerors of the Jews imposed upon them priests from other tribes. In some cases, the Jews themselves chose people from other tribes to minister because those of the tribe of Levi refused to mingle idolatry with service to the true and living God. The scepter has departed from Judah. Surely, then, the Shiloh has come.

Is it not strange that the first persons on earth to accept the claims of Jesus were all Jews? They had seen Him personally. They knew His life and works. Thousands of them from every walk of life pledged their allegiance to Him. Many priests, the teachers of the Torah and the arbiters of the people, embraced the faith that was first proclaimed only to Jews and by Jews. If those who knew Him best accepted Him, upon what ground can those who know Him least reject Him? Surely we cannot argue that these Jews were ignorant. They were not a mere rabble. They knew of the schools of Shammai and Hillel, taught in the temple precincts. Every synagogue was a school where the sacred teachings were inculcated. Both the promises of God and the traditions of the rabbis relating to the Messiah were freely discussed. In regarding Jesus as the Messiah, I am not anti-Jewish. Instead, I take my place with the thousands of Jews who were part of the Messianic synagogues.

It is indeed regrettable that we have allowed ourselves to be maneuvered into opposing camps. Each of us needs the insights of all the rest of us. All of us are smarter than any one of us! What do we have to lose by sitting at the same table and bending our heads together over the pages of the Torah, seeking to drink deep of the waters of life? I revere the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. I accept Him as the one God. I regard every word that He addressed to your fathers as sacred. Though they may be your fathers in the flesh, they are my fathers in faith. It is because of these Scriptures that I regard Jesus as the Messiah. I have no strange volume from which to draw my conclusions. I read from the same text that you read from every Sabbath and is taught in your temple Sunday schools.

My time is expired, and I apologize for running over a little bit. But before I close, let me remind you that I have the other part of the question that was posed, which is to give my reasons for believing that the ethical values of Judaism, great as they are, can never secure peace and brotherhood in the world. In this regard it does not fall behind or show itself to be inferior to any code of human behavior on earth. In fact, I regard it as God-given. I respect it for what it has accomplished in the lives of those who have subscribed to it. I will deal with this further. Until we meet again, then, may the God who created Heaven and earth and all things therein be your shield and buckler. May He lead you beside still waters. May He lift up His countenance upon you, and give you peace. Shalom!

Judaism As the Messiah

Contents

It is a privilege to be with you, and I note with pleasure that two of you have brought your wives. Let me compliment you both for marrying women who look so much younger than yourselves. My good friend in the realm of jurisprudence has asked permission to make a statement and pose a question before I address you on the theme for today.

I have listened to you as carefully as I would to an attorney pleading a case in court. It was my hope that I might hear something of importance, something worthwhile. I confess my disappointment. You have presented your own position a little more cleverly than others, you are fluent and persuasive, but underneath it all is the unprovable idea that Jesus was the Messiah. I understand that you refer to Him as "The Prince of Peace." There has been no peace since He was born. He has not brought peace in any century. If, when the Messiah comes, He is to bring peace, what kind of Messiah is it who has seen more bloody wars since He came than ever occurred before?

Thank you, Your Honor. You are plain and positive in your statements. One does not need to speculate about your meaning, and I respect that fact. If you achieve nothing else, you will make me a better man. I shall try to avoid arrest, lest I be brought into your court. This is a forum of free men. You must feel under no compulsion to agree with me against your conscience. Your Honor will no doubt recall the statement by Judge Learned Hand, in the Oliver Wendell Holmes Lecture, at Harvard in 1958: "In the end it is worse to suppress dissent than to run the risk of heresy."

Your Honor, you have put your finger on a real problem. I have no intention to evade it. I will face it as squarely as I can. But with your permission I will attend to the prior issue, and when I have dealt with it, I will return to your question.

I am to examine whether or not Judaism, as a system involving ethical or moral values, can ever achieve on earth the state of things regarded by the prophets as "the kingdom of God." In doing so, I shall give some attention to why I think there was a grave change in modern Jewish thought from the traditional concept of a personal Messiah. I recognize that many of your Orthodox brethren would "rather fight than switch." They still cling to the hope of a personal Messiah, a hope that you have surrendered.

You are not responsible for the change of thought. You inherited it. You are responsible, however, for examining it critically to see whether or not it is the truth. As Henri Amiel put it in his Journal, "Truth above all, even when it upsets and overwhelms us." I want to explore with you today the roots, growth, and fruits of the system of thought that has enticed so many of you to abandon the faith of your fathers. I realize that you regard your present position as a sign of maturity. You feel that you have outgrown, intellectually, the ideas with which your predecessors were comfortable. You no longer need the "security blankets" that you think were woven of myth and fantasy in a childhood age of the world.

I am not so sure you have improved your position. It is possible for man to shiver in the nakedness of despair, if he casts aside the covering that I believe God prepared for him. And I think that both Jews and non-Jews in our day are victims of forces that operated before we were born, to sell a man on the idea that he is his own God, and outside of him there is no other.

I am not so foolish as to deny that history often is shaped by its recording more than by happening. Both the one who writes and the one who reads the record interpret it. You may disagree with my interpretation and violently oppose it, but that will not upset me one bit. My love for you will not be abated by your lack of concurrence. Your conformity with my views is not a condition of my addressing you.

VICTIMS OF PHILOSOPHY

Both Jews and non-Jews played a part on the stage of reason that served to minimize faith and maximize human rationality. Although rationalism had its origin in Greek philosophic thought, in its modern sense it was first explicitly stated by the French scientist, Rene Descartes, who died in 1650. A devout Roman Catholic, he rejected, however, the method of scholasticism. He enunciated this principle: "In our search for the direct road to truth, we should busy ourselves about no object about which we cannot attain a certitude equal to that of the demonstrations of arithmetic and geometry." Descartes determined to hold nothing true until he had established ground for believing it true. As alluring as this seems, a little thought will show that it will eventually eliminate faith as a vital element in human action.

The Cartesian philosophy greatly affected Baruch Spinoza, who was born in Amsterdam, where he was educated carefully in Jewish theology. When Spinoza developed his philosophy, he became alienated from Orthodox Judaism and withdrew from the synagogue. He was excommunicated by the rabbis, who secured also his banishment from the city. Living in abject poverty outside the urban sprawl, and supporting himself by grinding optical lenses, Spinoza wrote tracts and treatises. These eventually served to inspire some well-known philosophers and poets, among whom were Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, William Wordsworth, and Percy Bysshe Shelley.

I have not the time, nor do you the interest or patience, to review the writings of Spinoza. Perhaps his greatest work was Ethics Demonstrated With Geometrical Order. None of us can know to what lengths others will carry our thinking when we are gone. No doubt Spinoza, who died in 1677 at the age of forty-five, would be astounded if he could return to our world and see some of the material that is credited to the principles he enunciated.

Before Spinoza's death, the writings of Descartes had affected the thinking of a brilliant German baron, Gottfried Wilhelm von Leibnitz. He discovered the fundamental principles of infinitesimal calculus in 1675. Seven years later, he invented a calculating machine capable of performing operations in multiplication, division, and extraction of square root. It was with von Leibnitz that the rationalistic concept entered Germany. Here it was destined to become systematized by Baron Christian von Wolff, who brought it into sharp controversy with the existing ideas about God's revelation.

From the roots of this philosophy grew the religious system called Deism, which eventually was espoused by our own statesmen, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson. Deists, however, designates a group of British writers of the eighteenth century who rejected the belief in a revelation from God. It was their contention that by an understanding of nature, and through employment of human reason, an individual may determine for himself the religious idea suitable for an expression of his personality. Scripture, to the rationalist, was not a revelation from God. It was the historical record of man's own striving for meaning in the world of his existence. Miracles were ruled out.

With the advent of the evolutionary theory, the need for an intelligent Creator to explain the origin of the universe was eliminated. It was but one step more in the direction toward the humanism of our day, in which man becomes his own God, and human reason is enshrined as the ultimate criterion of morality and influence.

TAINTED THEOLOGY

All of these pursuits affected the entire theological realm, so-called. They sharply divided the Protestant segment, eventually influenced Catholicism, and infiltrated the thought of Jewish intellectuals. The result was an abandonment by many of the very principles that had given your people hope and continuity during centuries of persecution and suffering. As a result of drinking from a stream that had been poisoned, you became infected with the same virus that afflicted a great part of the loosely dubbed Christian world.

So that I shall not be charged with exaggeration, or with building a case out of cobwebs, let me tell you what was taught when I attended the School of Judaism, as the only non-Jew enrolled. The eminent rabbi suggested that Moses was a clever political manipulator. He took advantage of a conveniently occurring earthquake, accompanied by a thunderstorm, to go up on top of Mount Sinai and remain hidden for almost six weeks. Afterward he came down with a couple of rocks he had chiseled and passed off as sacred stones. This was an imitation of some of the heathen priests of that day. This was the origin of the Torah, according to one of your most brilliant instructors. It is no wonder that wild, pie-eyed thinkers, like the author of Chariots of the Gods, would postulate that the ark of the covenant was actually a receiving set for messages from outer space, with the cherubims on the mercy seat acting like antennae to pick up transmissions from other planets.

This kind of thinking was not original with the rabbi. It was absorbed by him in a theological school. The same thing is taught in Protestant seminaries, which really do not deserve the designation, since they no longer protest anything. Some of them exhibit the truth of the adage, "If you do not stand for something, you will fall for anything!"

If you can tolerate me for saying it, I hold that your philosophers and thinkers, like those in the modern non-Jewish world, became victimized by both naturalism and humanism. Their denial of the supernatural betrayed them into the renunciation of a personal and intelligent First Cause as the source of life and being. God became only a nonpersonal force, something like magnetism or electricity, unexplainable and yet handy for us. Albert Einstein stated this position clearly when he asserted that he did not believe in a God who rewards good and punishes evil. He stated, "The presence of a superior reasoning power . . . revealed in the incomprehensible universe forms my idea of God."

Scrapping the idea of a personal God who could reveal His will and purpose also washed down the drain the hope for a personal Messiah. To some, the prophets became mere idle dreamers or fanatical enthusiasts. The sacred Scriptures were no longer sacred. Max Nordeau said of the Bible, "We find collected in this book the superstitious beliefs of the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, with indistinct echoes from Indian and Persian fables, mistaken imitations of Egyptian theories and customs, historical chronicles as dry as they are unreliable, and miscellaneous poems, amatory, human, and Jewish-national, which are rarely distinguished by beauties of the highest order, but frequently by superfluity of expression, coarseness, bad taste, and genuine Oriental sensuality."

Some of you still entertain a hope of "saving" mankind, and many of you do not. For those who do, that hope is centered on an emphasis on social justice and equity, which you believe is inherent in Judaic cultural thought. Before I discuss this further, let me make three of my convictions clear.

1. I do not deprecate the need for social justice. I contend for it as sincerely as you do.

2. I do not deny the great contribution made by Jewish thought in this field.

3. I do not believe that any code of human ethics, regardless of its magnitude, can ever unite the world.

Judaism cannot transform the world. My first reason for believing that the ethical code of Judaism cannot transform the world spiritually is that it failed to transform your fathers. Even in a locked-in culture, separated and segregated from the heathen around them, they did not practice the moral values you project. Instead, they were constantly rebuked by the prophets for immorality, cupidity, and idolatry of the grossest kind. It would seem to me that, if there were a redemptive value in the system based on the Torah and haftarah, it would have exhibited itself under the circumstances that then obtained. Instead, the opposite was the case, and the people stoned the very prophets who called for justice and mercy.

Judaism is not effective. If a moral code had no effect when there was at least a nominal belief in and respect for God, on what grounds can we assume that it will have the desired effect when responsibility to God has been abrogated? The strength of any moral code is the authority behind it. If the only authority is that of consensus, and if modern man thinks of himself as a mere animal, a trousered ape, then consensus is simply "the law of the pack." The survival of the fittest will become the law of the future.

Judaism cannot forgive sin. Man exhibits universally a sense of alienation. He is alienated from the very world of mankind itself, and he exhibits it in hostility. He is at odds with himself, and he knows the anguish of a battlefield inside his own spirit. The problem is sin, which is ignored and even denied in our day of theorization. Sin separates from God. It leaves man dangling hopelessly over a cliff from which he cannot claw his way back to solid ground.

In one of our after-sessions, some of you challenged the very concept of sin. One of you quoted the statement of Oscar Wilde that there is no sin except stupidity. If that were true, the author of the aphorism would be the chief of sinners. Although he was educated at Trinity College in Dublin, and Magdalen College in Oxford, he ended up arraigned and convicted on a charge of sodomy. He served two years in prison, after which he fled from Great Britain. He finished out his unhappy days under the assumed name of Sebastian Melmoth. Laughing at sin does not eliminate it. Treating it lightly no more eradicates it than scoffing at smallpox makes that disease go away. Sin is an offense against the majesty of God. It is the attempt of the created to dethrone the Creator and inject himself into His place. Until man is reconciled to God, he cannot be reconciled to others. No code of behavior can produce that reconciliation because it cannot provide forgiveness. If I agree to pay cash from now on, that does not take care of my debts contracted in the past.

It seems absurd to act as if there is no God, when there is an innate sense crying out that there must be. Only a personal Messiah, assuring a love so deep that it transcends all other considerations, can bring healing. Moral codes, regardless of how good they may be, only produce frustration in the unforgiven. They tend to increase the guilt consciousness by the very futility of attempting to live up to them.

Judaism cannot provide an ideal. Man needs an ideal toward which he can strive, by which he can be challenged. That ideal cannot be found in a mere moral code. Such a code only encourages one to become his own ideal. Man knows he is not ideal, and his abject failure in seeking justification by law enforces the thought. The world will never be brought to a sense of oneness until there is a central figure in the universe, recognized as Lord of all, exemplifying all that is best in mankind. We follow leaders, and as we do we move in a common direction toward a common goal.

You postulate that man will become better by education, and I would never speak disparagingly of education. Aristotle declared, "All who have meditated on the art of governing mankind have been convinced that the fate of empires depends on the education of youth. Educated men are as much superior to uneducated men as the living are to the dead." Yet, unless the heart is changed, and the inner being given a new sense of direction, education increases our problem instead of alleviating it. An educated criminal is the worst kind of criminal, and an educated fool is the worst kind of fool. You will argue that moral education is not within such a category, and you may be right. Still, education in moral values, without a spiritual regeneration to enable a person to attain such values, may only aggravate the human predicament. Furnishing a book on survival to a man at the bottom of a well is not the answer to his problem. What he needs is a rope let down from above by a hand that is powerful enough to lift him up. Man can learn better how to live when he knows what life is and where it is. There must be a point of reference.

It is not the mere teaching of law, but the teaching of the law as of God, that makes the difference. The Torah without the Shema is simply another form of philosophy. To your pious fathers, the knowledge of God was everything. To know God was to know the very secret of life. The word of God was given to a covenant people. It had to be taught, not simply to make life easier or happier, but to enable those who learned to exhibit the qualities of a people adopted by God and brought into covenant relationship with Him.

The Jews have been dispersed throughout the nations of the world. I mention this as a fact of history. I do not condone, but rather deplore, the unfortunate persecutions and captivities that have sometimes caused it. Yet the Jews never have converted a single nation. The Judaic principle never has transformed a people, except as it has reached it fulfillment in the Christian faith. Based upon the past, there is no real ground for expecting the leaven of Judaism to affect the world lump for good.

I am bound by conviction to reject the hope of world transformation and peace, except on the basis of acceptance of the divine penetration in the person of the Messiah. The Messiah who was promised by your prophets and seers cannot be a system or a code. It was for this reason that Isaiah declared, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." As you are aware, I believe that the Messiah has come, and I believe it upon the testimony of Jews. All that I know about Jesus, with very few exceptions, I have learned from Jews. During His life span upon earth, Jesus only once crossed over the Palestinian border. He was reared by Jews, He lived and associated with Jews, and sent His chosen representatives during His lifetime only to Jews. Jews were dispatched to Jews, and forbidden to go to goyim.

My conviction results from what Jewish prophets foretold, and from the testimony of Jewish nationals that it was fulfilled. I come, then, with no non-Jewish propaganda to try to influence you to accept a non-Jewish faith as valid. I believe that "salvation is of the Jews," if I may borrow that phrase. I do not believe that it stems from anything the Jews have yet to offer, although they have much to give. I believe it is from Someone whom they have already given, and from the recognition that He is the atonement and our hope.

Jesus did not come to destroy the Torah, but to fulfill it. I do not believe that a Jew who accepts Him as the Messiah denies the Torah, but becomes fulfilled in the goal of the Torah.

What you are asking me to do is to turn my back upon my best friends, deny my parents and accept another religion, which means nothing to me. What would I gain by doing that? I would be crazy to fall for that!

I know it is very difficult for any of us to listen dispassionately when the very inner being is in revolt against what we think is an attempt to sway us. I am happy that you have such an emotional reaction, for it demonstrates that you think very deeply about matters relating to your life. Perhaps it will help you a little if I point out that you are mistaken on three counts. I am not asking you to turn your back upon any friend whom you cherish. I am not asking you to deny your beloved parents. Surely you could not do that. I am not asking you to accept another religion at all.

The fact is, I do not believe that Jesus came to bring another religion into the world. He is not the author of a new religion. When He came, your fathers had a good religion, and He participated in it. He was circumcised on the eighth day, presented in the temple, and made His bar mitzvah. It turned into a gala occasion, with all of His friends and relatives going up to Jerusalem to celebrate it. Jesus attended the synagogue meetings, participated in the reading of the haftarah in His home synagogue, and generally conducted himself as an iluy, a scholar.

The religion of your fathers was a good religion. It was God-given. It had all of the ritual, liturgy and pontifical majesty generally associated with religion. But Jesus came to put an end to religion as an approach to God. He came to make possible a relationship instead of a religion. He came to offer men a new dimension of life, the life of God, the abundant life.

It is true that when I accepted the offer of life on the God level, I was deserted by some of my friends. They deserted me, however. I did not leave them. I loved them more intensely than before. I had been reared in a background where men still sought to please God, or to placate Him, by stated and stately performances conducted by a clergy, or special priesthood. I gave it up for life! My mother thought I had lost my mind. My companions thought I was "off my rocker." But I was confronted with the historical fact of Jesus. My very integrity demanded that I accept Him. The attitude of my loved ones toward me is a matter between themselves and God. One cannot choose the consequences of his acts. He can only respond and accept the consequences.

You ask me what you would gain by becoming a disciple of Jesus. I can answer that question only by telling you what I have experienced. I have gained an inner sense of peace, of justification and acquittal. Jesus of Nazareth has been the bridge over troubled waters. He has made me to lie down in green pastures. He has restored my soul. Once I sought acquittal upon the basis of my own goodness. My righteousness was an attempt to be good by law, to be perfect by precept. Then I learned that God sent Jesus to be my righteousness. What I needed was to trust in Him.

I have gained a freedom to love all men, even my enemies. One has to be free to do that. Although we are grown men from varied backgrounds, professional men in the community, pragmatic, practical, and sometimes hard-nosed, I can say unashamedly that I love you. I do not love you because you are good. I do not love you because I am good. I love you because our Father loves you. He loves you as you are, not because you are the people He would have you to be. That is also the way He loves me. He paid sin's penalty for all of us, and thus made the divine overture of love. I accept that overture.

Because I am firmly committed to His nature and approach, I make the overture of love to all of you. I do not ask that you come to me. I come to you. I do not ask that you love me. I simply say that I love you. I shall continue to do so. I yearn for all of you to be my brothers, not in that washed-out, faded kind of sense in which we are caught up together in the human perspective, but in the real sense of being members of one family. Let me make it clear to you, however, that the price of my regard for you is not that you accept what I say. I shall love you regardless of how you react to my words.

I ask you not to fall for anything that you think would make you less responsible, or lacking in intelligence. The implication that you would be crazy to fall for what I am saying is based upon your failure to grasp the implication of what I say. It is my hope that, as we continue to think and study together, I may clarify this matter. We have a wide chasm, across which I seek to throw slender threads of thought to make it possible for us to bridge the expanse. We have not touched upon our problems very deeply.

You will recall your old saying, "The Torah has no bottom." Learning as an art has a place of beginning, but there is no end to it. I do not want to be an amorets, an ignoramus, and neither do you. The Talmud has a saying, "Better a learned bastard than an ignorant priest." I am not anxious to be either of the two, but I would like to see all of us sit at "East Wall." I crave for all of you that you shall be sheyneh yidn, beautiful Jews, in the fullest meaning of that term, orderly, dignified, and harmonious. To this end I pray for you, and ask your prayers in my behalf as well.

The Prince of Peace

Contents

While traveling through the country, have you ever turned off on a side road, and found the scenery more attractive than that along the main highway? I think that is what has happened to some of us today. Those of us who arrived early for the forum have been holding a rap session, as the "now" generation puts it. I confess that the subject of our informal talk may be more intriguing than the things I came prepared to say.

One of the number voiced the idea that the coming of Jesus, who claimed to be the Messiah, may have taken the world by surprise. This seemed to be the consensus of opinion. While I hesitate to appear as an oddball, I have to differ. The fact is that one can prove by historians, quite apart from the New Testament writers, that the world was in a state of expectancy and anticipation. People were looking for one to come as an answer to predictions that had been made, someone who would "put it all together."

Let me mention in connection with this the name of Flavius Josephus. Among all those I have met so far during these meetings, I am the only person who has read his complete works. I not only read them, but underlined numerous passages I wanted to remember.

Josephus, who was the son of Matthias, in the priestly order, was born about four years after the death of Jesus of Nazareth. He was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and many times walked about outside the walls exhorting the besieged to surrender. After the capture of the city, he returned to Rome with Titus, and there wrote his treatises on Jewish Antiquities and Wars of the Jews. In the latter history, he records an abortive effort of the Jews, led by a weaver named Jonathan, which occurred two years after the fall of the city. He attributes the fanatical attempt to a fervent expectation of the Jews that their Messiah was to come. Here are his words: "The chief thing which invited them to that war was an ambiguous prophecy found in the Holy Scriptures, that, about that time, one of their country should be monarch of the whole world."

Josephus was a political opportunist. Since he wrote under the patronage of the emperor, he declared that his countrymen were deceived in their interpretation of the oracle, and that the allusion was to Vespasian. The Romans, however, also had the same opinion current among them, and it was known throughout the Greek world. Let me cite two historians in proof of this, although I hope you will not think I am imposing a history class upon those of you who dreamed of getting out of school and away from that.

The first of these is Tacitus, whose full name was Caius Cornelius Tacitus. In 78 he married the daughter of Julius Agricola, the famous consul whose governorship of Britain was so outstanding. Tacitus received many political honors, being praetor of Rome under Domitian, and consul under Nerva. His writings, which brought him renown, included a history of the Roman Empire from the year 69 to the assassination of Domitian in 96. Of particular interest to me are his Annals, probably consisting of sixteen books originally, about half of which are still available.

It is in the fifteenth volume that Tacitus reveals a great deal about the Christians, whom Nero blamed for the conflagration that ravaged more than two-thirds of the city of Rome. I cannot refrain from one quotation:

"But neither all human help nor the liberality of the Emperor, nor all the atonements presented to the gods, availed to abate the infamy he lay under of having ordered the city to be set on fire. To suppress, therefore, the common rumor, Nero procured others to be accused, and inflicted exquisite punishments upon those people, who were in abhorrence for their crimes, and were commonly known by the name of Christians. They had their denomination from Christus, who in the reign of Tiberius was put to death as a criminal by the procurator Pontius Pilate."

This alone is sufficient to give the lie to those who deny the authenticity of the record of the disciples of Jesus. The most eminent pagan historian validates the origin and spread of the Christian faith, and becomes a witness to the time and nature of the death of Jesus. Let no one again urge against the faith of those of us who accept Jesus as the Messiah, that there is no historical basis for it outside of what they designate "prejudiced accounts" contained in the New Testament.

Tacitus hated the Christians. He was a pagan and an idolater. It is for that reason his testimony is so valuable. In describing the reason why the Jews resisted the might of the Roman army, he declares in his Historiae, "But the most had a strong persuasion that it was said in the ancient writings held by the priest, that at that very time the East should prevail, and that someone who would come from Judea should obtain the empire of the world."

The second historian I will mention is Suetonius, whose full name was Gains Suetonius Tranquillus. Suetonius was in a position to gain inside information, for he was a good friend of Pliny the Younger, a governor of Bithynia. He was private secretary to the Emperor Trajan until dismissed from office in the year 121. Suetonius was a prolific author, but none of his books remain except Lives of the First Twelve Caesars, and a fragmentary work of biography dealing with the stories of outstanding orators.

It was in his record of the life of Vespasian that he mentioned "the ambiguous oracle," referred to by Josephus and Tacitus. He writes, "There had been for a long time all over the East a prevailing opinion that it was in the fates that at the time someone from Judea should obtain the empire of the world. By the event, it appeared that a Roman emperor was meant by that prediction. The Jews applying it to themselves went into a rebellion."

It is my very decided conviction that the writings of the prophets, translated into Greek and circulated all over the Roman Empire, constituted the so-called "ambiguous oracle." Daniel had accurately predicted the time when the Messiah would make His advent. It is thus no wonder to me that poets and other scholars in the Roman Empire were in such a state of expectancy that Virgil, who wrote close to the very time that Herod the Great was in power, penned the words:

> "The last age, decreed by Fate, is come; And a new frame of all things does begin, A holy progeny from heaven descends— "

The fact that the poet applied this to Salonius, the new-born son of the Consul Pollio, with whom he sought to gain political favor, does not set aside the point I am making. Jesus was not rejected because He was unexpected, but because He was unconventional. Based upon the prediction of Daniel, the world was in a state of anticipation, but Jesus did not act as they expected a Messiah to act. He did not come riding in on a prancing steed, but entered Jerusalem meek and lowly, riding on an ass.

JESUS AS PEACEMAKER

I am sure all of this is more interesting to me than it is to you, and lest I bore you to distraction with historical commentary, I will move on to consideration of the qualifications of Jesus to be the "Prince of Peace." My good friend, the able jurist, has posed a question that must be met. He suggests that Jesus cannot be the Messiah of the prophets, because that Messiah was to bring peace, whereas there has been little except war since the birth of Jesus.

I am seeking no escape from reality when I say to you that it seems to me that my Jewish friends should be the last to speak critically on this score. They do not accept Jesus as arbiter of their lives, and have never recognized His leadership in the role of peacemaker. With due respect for all involved, I suggest that, unless you are willing to work for the peace that one seeks to promote, you should not judge Him too harshly if peace does not ensue. I am quite certain that Jesus laid down principles of human behavior that would make war abhorrent, but it is not principles stated but principles practiced that brings about the desired change in states and conditions.

When Isaiah prophesied that the one who sat upon the throne of David would be designated "Prince of Peace," he was simply foretelling the nature and character of His rule. He would not extend His sway or increase His territory by bloodshed or the use of armaments. He would employ peace as a strategy and produce peace as a result. Being a prince of peace, shedding no blood but His own, would distinguish Him from all political princes in the world. The princes known to Isaiah made war, but he spoke of Him who would be called the Wonderful Counselor, and whose sole plea would be for peace.

Wars and fighting are the result of sin. If sin is conquered, the cause for war will be removed, and peace will be the result. All wars exist in human hearts before they are transferred to the battlefield with its tragic carnage. The problem with man's attaining peace is that man cannot overcome sin by his own power. He cannot lift himself up by his own bootstraps. It is my conviction that only through trust in Jesus, the sinless one, can man get rid of the guilt and stain of his own sin.

In the final analysis, peace is personal. One can have peace within, even while the world around him is falling apart, coming unglued, and blowing away. I must tell you that a sense of my own relationship to God through trust in Jesus Christ has brought to me an inner serenity and tranquillity obtainable by no other means nor from any other source. I am never with distraught persons, Jew or non-Jew, without wishing they could experience the same love, joy, and peace that have come to me.

WHERE SHALL WE TURN?

Your reply to what I say will be the reply your fathers have made. You will contend that Judaism contains within it the philosophic basis of peace. Once Judaism is disseminated throughout the world, universal peace will ensue. But the facts are against this. Judaism has not brought peace even where it has been proclaimed. It has inspired dissent, argument, and even war. There is not a single indictment you can make against the ability of Jesus to secure peace on earth that cannot also be made against Judaism.

Man will not be changed by a code of ethics, regardless of how good that code may be. He may learn to perform with all of the social graces, and yet be "ripped off" inside. A classical example is the New York actor who recently attended a cocktail party, at which someone said, "He was his old urbane, witty, and charming self." In the wee hours of the morning, he went straight from the party to his apartment, placed a revolver against his temple, and blew out his brains.

Before we sit in judgment upon Jesus as having failed to live up to advance prophetic billing as the "Prince of Peace," perhaps we need to understand what peace is. I have no desire nor inclination to define it in such a manner as to "get Jesus off the hook." I do not think He has muffed the peace assignment at all; but it is important to me as a person to understand what is implied in the term shalom. This is so often pronounced as a greeting, and may by its common usage have become as empty and inane an expression as many other such greetings.

You will think I am presumptuous when I refer to the original implications of a Hebrew word in the presence of Jewish teachers and professors such as some of you. I feel no reluctance to do so, because I know you are in a position to correct any misapprehension under which I labor, and above all else I want to be correct. What may appear to be brashness in your sight may actually be my willingness to make myself vulnerable, for the sole purpose of helping us all to greater heights of understanding.

Shalom is not a shallow term. It is one of several words in the Hebrew to indicate wholeness, completeness, or perfection. It is translated "peace" 172 times in Scripture. Isaiah so uses it twenty-three times, and Jeremiah eighteen times. A study of the word as used by the prophets will show that it was a term used to describe the greatest and highest good that could come to the people of God. Let me cite an example. In the height of his strength, David subdued the maritime region of Palestine, and captured the cities held by the Philistines along what we now call the Gaza Strip. He then directed his might against what is now Arab territory, and overthrew Hadadrezer, a wealthy desert chieftain. When he had finished this conquest, the king of Hamath, another sheik who had been harassed by Hadadrezer, sent his oldest son to see David. The Bible says, "He sent Hadoram his son to king David, to inquire of his welfare, and to congratulate him" (1 Chronicles 18:10). The word rendered "welfare" is shalom.

There is an interesting usage of the same word in Jeremiah 38:4. The prophet of God got himself into serious trouble with the politicians and the clergy in the national capital by telling the truth, not an uncommon thing even in our day. The Chaldean army, which had swept everything before it, was approaching Jerusalem from the north, descending through Syria. The prophet had revealed that Jerusalem would be destroyed because of the wickedness and idolatry of the people. The leaders refused to accept this as true and conspired to keep it from the ears of the people by suppressing the news media. Their method was quite effective. Any reporter who weakened morale by suggesting the overthrow of the city would be killed under a trumped-up charge of treason.

But Jeremiah was a prophet of God. One time he became discouraged because the people laughed at him and ridiculed him as a gloomy fanatic. He resolved to keep his mouth shut and speak no more in the name of the Lord. But the word of the Lord was as a fire in his bones. He became weary from holding in. He had to speak or burst. Even the threat of death could not deter him. He knew there were four government spies trailing him everywhere he went, taking down what he said for evidence.

But he told the people that the Lord had revealed to him that those who remained in the city, under the false hope that it could not be taken, would die by the sword, by famine, or disease. Those who abandoned the city and surrendered to the Chaldeans would live. He emphatically said, "This city shall surely be given into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which shall take it." The secret service representatives hurried away and told the king, "We petition you to kill this man at once. He is destroying the morale of our soldiers and creating unrest among the citizens by encouraging them to give up and desert the city. This man is not seeking the welfare of the people, but their hurt."

Jeremiah was proven to be right by subsequent events, but our purpose in citing this incident is to call attention to the fact that the word rendered "welfare" is shalom. In Psalm 38 is an apt description of a conscience burning and troubled under the weight of sin. The bard of Israel says, "Neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin" (v. 3). The word "rest" is a translation of shalom.

During the troublesome times that ensued in Israel after Saul was slain and David ascended the throne, rivalry occurred between two factions. One was led by Joab, the other by Amasa. Joab plotted to kill Amasa, and feigned friendship with him in order to get close enough to murder him with his sword. A description of their meeting is given in 2 Samuel 20:9: "And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him." It is not necessary to continue with the gory details. My point is served when I tell you that the word "health" is a rendering of shalom.

What I am saying to you is actually very simple. You object that Jesus of Nazareth cannot be the Messiah because the Messiah was to be the "Prince of Peace." You cite the wars that have been fought since the advent of Jesus as proof that He cannot qualify. Yet the word for "peace" is not limited to cessation from hostilities on the battlefield. It is not restricted to a truce or pact hammered out by delegates from nations engaged in armed conflict. The word shalom, which was used by Isaiah, has many applications, and Jesus could be the prince of peace by qualifying in any one of them.

If Jesus outlined for mankind a way toward universal welfare, He is the prince of peace. If He provided rest from a guilty conscience, He is the prince of peace. If His way is the way of health, wholeness, and restoration of the good life, He is the prince of peace. To your fathers, shalom meant much more than cessation from strife. It was a positive force within, which stemmed from a sense of a right relationship with the Eternal One.

I think that Jesus has manifested every characteristic required of a prince of peace. A prince is one who directs and governs a principality, and Jesus has shown himself to be an exemplar and ruler of the principality of shalom. He reconciled us to God. He became the lifeline by which we return to the relationship of righteousness. He spanned the chasm eroded by sin and by the consequent fear of death. He is the "bridge over troubled waters."

If God has ordained that the Messiah be the prince of peace, and if Jesus is the Messiah, the fact will not be altered by either our acceptance or rejection of it. A truth is no less a truth if it is denied by all. It is my contention that you cannot base your rejection of the Messianic claim of Jesus of Nazareth purely upon the basis of war, in a world that has rejected His leadership and direction. You may sincerely deny that Jesus is the Messiah, but you must examine honestly and openly all of the testimony, without endorsing a position on the basis that it supports either a prejudice or presupposition.

What about the numerous prophecies that the Jews who associated with Jesus claimed He fulfilled? Can we casually dismiss specific predictions as to time and place on the ground that our own interpretation of the scope and nature of His rule seems to conflict with the state of world affairs subsequent to His coming?

EDERSHEIM

Assisted by his daughter, Dr. Edersheim spent seven years writing. He did meticulous research of what might be considered points of minor significance. On the morning of Easter Sunday, 1883, he penned the final words of the two large volumes bearing the title The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah. I would like to share his closing passage with you:

> "Our task is ended, and we also worship and look up. And we go back from this sight into a hostile world, to love, and to live, and to work for the Risen Christ. But as earth's day is growing dim, and, with earth's gathering darkness, breaks over it heaven's storm, we ring out, as of old they were wont, from church-tower, to the mariners that bugged a rock-bound coast— our Easter bells to guide them who are belated, over the storm-tossed sea, beyond the breakers, into the desired haven. Ring out, earth, all thy Easter-chimes; bring your offerings all ye people; worship in faith, for—

'This Jesus, which was received up from you into heaven, shall so come, in like manner as ye beheld Him going into heaven.' 'Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly!'"

I do not argue that Jesus is the Messiah from the standpoint that a brilliant Jew and erudite student such as Dr. Edersheim accepts Him as such. I do say, however, that if one so thoroughly familiar with the teaching of the prophets as to qualify as a lecturer in the Septuagint at Oxford concludes that Jesus was the Messiah, it should make the rest of us cautious about denying it. We should be particularly cautious if the basis of our opinion is that world conditions in the political world negate His claim.

I fear that the problem is much deeper than appears on the surface. While I would not want to be found guilty of stereotyping or generalizing, candor demands that I disclose my real feeling. The modern Jewish mind has revolted against the whole concept of the supernatural, until it has rejected the idea that the oracles given to your fathers constituted the Word of God. Lip service is paid in the synagogue and temple to that for which there is no corresponding place of reverence in the heart.

The same naturalistic and humanistic philosophy, which has eaten like a cancer at the core of the Christian faith, has also attracted you. It has left you with nothing to which you may cling for hope, except mere finite rationalization. This is not new. In 1796, David Levi, a learned Jew, wrote a book entitled Dissertations on the Prophesies of the Old Testament. In that work he affirmed that Deism and infidelity had made such large strides in the world that they had reached even the Jewish nation. He declared that so many Jews were infected by skepticism through reading the works of Bolingbroke, Hume, and Voltaire, that they scarcely believed in revelation.

GOD, NOT CHRIST

Article Six of the confession drawn up by Moses Maimonides reads, "I believe with a perfect faith, that all the oracles of the prophets are true." It is not enough to repeat this, if deep inside you do not concede that God exists as a personal being, nor that He has revealed His will through the prophets as His chosen servants. If you will pardon me for my bluntness, I do not think the problem with the present Jewish and non-Jewish world is a problem of Jesus Christ at all. The problem is God.

If you do not accept the existence of God, it would make no difference what testimony I presented from your own Scriptures to validate the claim of anyone to be the Messiah. You will not regard one as a Son if you do not believe there is a Father. It is not enough to hold that God is "the ground of being," or "the sum of human experience," or "the composite of human reasoning."

I would not widen the gap between us. My purpose is to narrow it until we can at least shake hands across it. But I feel obligated to tell you that I believe with all my heart that God is a divine being with all of the attributes of personality. I believe that He possesses an infinite mind, that He is omniscient, and that He has revealed himself to man. It is no problem for me to accept Jesus. He alone, of all the millions who have trodden the surface of the earth, is the key figure to the glorious prophecies vouchsafed the descendants of Abraham.

At the risk of being repetitious, let me make it clear again. If Jesus is proven to be the Messiah by His fulfillment of predictions divinely given, I doubt that we can honestly disclaim this on the basis of an arbitrarily imposed definition of peace. To me, He is all that the prophets declared He would be. His claims are validated in my life and experiences, as certainly as I believe them to be in the testimony of those Jews with whom He associated while on earth. If Jesus of Nazareth is not the Messiah, there will be no Messiah, for the simple reason that the conditions imposed have been fulfilled in history. It is not a question of Jesus or someone else. It is a question of Jesus or no one else.

Christianity Challenged

Contents

I think you will agree that there is nothing static in the way these forums are conducted. No one can accuse us of a tightly programmed format, for we hardly know from one meeting to the next which way our path will lead. I think that is good. To illustrate, let me read a portion of a letter from a friend who has attended regularly, but prefers to remain anonymous. His question is this:

I have just finished reading Those Incredible Christians, by Hugh J. Schonfield, and I wonder how you would answer his accusation that Jesus did not found Christianity at all, that what you advocate is a distortion of the message. He charges that Jesus never once proclaimed what you claim to be the ideal of Christianity. Is it possible that the whole Christian bit is the result of cleverly contrived propaganda introduced by Paul, as a renegade Jew, and has no real basis of fact, in either the life or the teachings of Jesus? I think you ought to face up to the possibility that what you believe may be based upon fraud and deceit.

That is plain enough, isn't it? But I am perfectly willing to accept the invitation, or challenge, if it was intended to be such, to express myself regarding the implications made by Dr. Schonfield in his book. You must recognize, however, that this introduces a new dimension into our discussion. I can hardly examine charges made against Paul without referring to his writings. I have sought to avoid direct quotations from what I regard as the New Covenant Scriptures, for you do not accept them as authoritative. But it is hardly fair to review accusations without allowing the accused to testify in his own behalf. I shall consider myself free, then, to freely quote Paul and allow him to speak for himself, as long as I am replying to this question.

Before I proceed with the immediate question, I think there are two other questions that require answers. The first concerns the identity of Dr. Hugh J. Schonfield. The second concerns the thesis propounded in the book to which my esteemed friend calls attention.

Who is Hugh J. Schonfield? The answer is that Dr. Schonfield is a Jew who personally affirms that He is a Nazarene, since for him Jesus is the Messiah. He is the author of many books, not all of which are religiously oriented. One of his earlier volumes bore the title The Suez Canal. When Those Incredible Christians appeared in 1968, he resided in London, where he served as president of The Commonwealth of World Citizens, of which he was also the founder. That he is a writer of tremendous skill in the fields of history and biography there can be no doubt. Indeed, he is like God in that "he calls the things that be not as though they were."

I first became acquainted with his authorship when I read a series of three volumes which he linked together as a trilogy. The first was called Jesus— a Biography. The second was Saints Against Caesar, which purported to be the story of the first Christian community. The third was The Jew of Tarsus, a biography of Paul. In all of these, I learned many things of interest and value, because of the insights of a Jewish mind whetted to a keen edge by study and research. But I must confess that I labored under the constant conviction that the author was stating as fact certain deductions that were wholly unwarranted by his quotations and projections. He seemed to be drawing milk from imaginary cows, and trying to retail it as the pure and unadulterated product.

When he translated the New Testament into what was called The Authentic Version, I was one of the first persons in the United States to import one of these from England, and I have read it with pleasure and profit. But when The Passover Plot came from the press, I recognized that Dr. Schonfield not only read between the lines, but between the lines was the only place he did read. He did not even know the lines were there. Now this new book is advertised as one that begins where The Passover Plot left off. Book Week calls it "another shocker" and says, "The incredible Dr. Schonfield has done it again." This may be correct in a way not intended. "Incredible" means "impossible to believe." The charge made by the author against the Christians in the Roman Empire thus comes home to reflect against himself in his own publicity.

A FICTITIOUS CHRIST?

Just what is the theme of this book which is described so freely by such terms as "daring" and "explosive"? I do not want to let you down too hard, but the truth is, there is really nothing new in the postulate of Dr. Schonfield. It is as old as Jewish opposition to the faith in Jesus as the Messiah and God's Son. It goes back as far as the first proclamation of the hope of Israel to the Greek world.

Boiled down, simmered away, and skimmed off, the idea advanced by Dr. Schonfield is that Paul developed a fictitious Christ, who was not at all like the one who was born in Bethlehem of Judea. He insists that the real Jesus was not concerned with posing as the Son of God in a unique way. Any record that indicates otherwise is not genuine, but altered and doctored to foster a growing myth. The author thinks that Jesus did not rise from the dead, but that the grief-stricken followers only imagined that they had seen and spoken with someone whom they later assumed to be the Master.

Dr. Schonfield has a "thing" about Saul of Tarsus. In his book, The Jew of Tarsus, he advances the idea that Saul was mentally ill, and fervently convinced that he was to be the Messiah. This diagnosis at this late date is that Saul suffered from megalomania. When he learned that Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, Saul developed an insane rage against those who propagated this "falsehood," and thereupon resolved to stamp them from the earth. There was room for only one Messiah, and Saul thought he was that one. After he had the Damascus road experience, which Dr. Schonfield thinks may have been an epileptic seizure, Saul began to think of himself as the vice-Messiah, or medium through whom Jesus now communicated.

The idea that Paul took the faith off on such a tangent and warped it to make it acceptable to the Gentiles, whom he considered to be his special charge, always seems to have a special fascination for the Orthodox Jewish mind. It was difficult for Jews, who believed that Judaism was the final revelation of God, to accept the idea of further revelation as an enlargement of and perfection of what they had. The general idea was to make the followers of Jesus merely another sect within the Jewish fold, where sectarianism was not looked upon with disfavor at all. Those who wished to recognize Jesus as the Messiah could become proselytes by being circumcised and promising allegiance to the Torah.

Those who held this view were called Nazarenes, since the name "Christian" was not bestowed until the gospel was established in the pagan environment of Syria. The destruction of Jerusalem by Titus was preceded by the flight of many of the Nazarenes to Transjordan, where they seem to have established a colony in Pella. Here the Jewish believers in the Messianic role of Jesus came to be known as the Ebionites. The word literally means "the poor men." I choose to believe it referred to their poverty caused by having to abandon their worldly goods and chattels before the onslaught of the Roman forces.

With the passing of time they began to deny the divinity of Jesus, believing Him to be merely the son of Joseph and Mary. They also came to think of Paul as an apostate, rather than an apostle. His writings seemed to conflict with the law, which they originally hoped to keep intact while being Nazarenes. I suspect that a good many of you who are present in this audience fit into that frame of reference. Obviously that produces a sharp contrast with those, like myself, who hold that justification (a sense of right relationship with God) is by faith in Jesus, and not by works of law. It was this message that became the basis of Paul's message to the whole world, to Jews and non-Jews. When Dr. Schonfield speaks of Paul's version of Christianity, he implies that Paul drummed it up and refined it to meet the challenge of the Roman Empire, to which he was constantly being subjected.

Long before Schonfield wrote, George Bernard Shaw said in his preface to Androcles and the Lion (1912), "The conversion of Paul was no conversion at all: it was Paul who converted the religion that has raised one man above sin and death into a religion that delivered millions of men so completely into their dominion that their common nature became a horror to them, and the religious life became a denial of life." Shaw also said, "There is not one word of Pauline Christianity in the characteristic utterances of Jesus."

I beg to differ with the implications of these men, and others like them, that Paul thwarted the purpose of God and invented a pseudo-Christianity which he palmed off upon an unsuspecting world as the authentic product. Dr. Schonfield candidly refers to his material contained in The Passover Plot as conjecture, and I do not think he limited his speculation to that volume.

The fact is that Paul labored constantly and tirelessly to avoid a division between Jewish and non-Jewish believers. He declared that the gospel he proclaimed was "the power of God unto salvation," to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. He affirmed that in Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek, but all are one in Christ. What these modern authors brand as fanaticism I regard as fervency of spirit; what they label as heresy I regard as honesty.

There was not one message for Israel and another for the rest of humanity. Peter declared on the Day of Pentecost following the death of Jesus that God had raised Him up and made Him both Lord and Christ. Paul constantly declared the same thing, first in the synagogue and then in the marketplace. Dr. Schonfield speaks of fraud and forgery, and of falsified and concocted records, but he fails to build a case for his contention. His bias against the resurrection of Christ shapes his thinking. It is he who must make unjustifiable deductions to sustain a theory that would be laughed out of court, if it were not for its serious consequences in the hearts and lives of carnal and uninformed readers.

There were moss-covered skeptical speculations that the account of Jesus' resurrection was a part of the myth and folklore of the age, rife with the stories of "risen saviors." There never will be an adequate explanation of the testimony recorded by three Jews and one non-Jew. There are some facts that such speculations cannot explain, if the resurrection was a mere figment of the imagination or a vain delusion of superstitious minds.

Speculations and insinuations cannot explain the unadorned testimony of the simple men who knew Jesus best. They claimed that they saw Him, conversed with Him, touched Him, walked with Him, ate with Him, and spent forty days in earnest conversation with Him after He had risen from the dead. These witnesses were Jews.

Such insinuations cannot explain why these men, who were once frightened and intimidated by a political mob, would suddenly stand forth in public without flinching, and boldly affirm the fact of the resurrection at the risk of incarceration or death. And these witnesses were Jews.

Such insinuations cannot explain why more than three thousand persons, in the very city where these events occurred, gave public assent to their faith by reforming their lives and submitting to baptism in the name of Jesus, fifty days after His alleged resurrection. And lest it be suggested that those who did this were members of an illiterate fringe group, remember that the number quickly multiplied to five thousand. These included many priests, the scholarly intellectuals of their day. And all of these were Jews!

Such an insinuation cannot explain the rapidity with which the message of Jesus swept over the known world, putting down roots in Rome, the city of the Caesars, and establishing itself in the very centers of Greek philosophy. If all of this was a hoax, we must admit that error is more powerful than truth, and a mental mirage is more appealing than reality. The circulation of the message was not the result of Greek philosophers witnessing to Jews, but of Jews witnessing to philosophers.

The insinuations made by enemies of the faith I cherish have been borrowed by Dr. Schonfield. He also is unable to explain how the men who carried the message, including Saul of Tarsus, freely laid down their lives, sealing their trust in that message with their own blood. It is true that submitting to the hangman's noose or to the headman's ax does not establish the validity of testimony, but it certainly proves beyond doubt the faith of the one who would prefer death to recantation.

For this reason I do not regard The Passover Plot as having originated with Jesus, but with Hugh J. Schonfield. It was not conceived by one who wanted to be the Messiah in the first century in Jerusalem. It was conceived by one whose fertile brain hatched it out in the last half of the twentieth century in London. While I would not like to launch a personal attack upon such an eminent author, there is some indication that he has become infected with the virus of sensationalism. Perhaps he likes to see such words as "explosive," "boldy original," and "another shocker," on the covers of his books. I agree that The Passover Plot was boldly original and it originated with Dr. Schonfield. There is not one iota of evidence to indicate that Jesus ever dreamed of such a crazy plot and conspiracy.

I shall now exercise the liberty Dr. Schonfield claims for himself. Twenty centuries after Paul sealed his faith by his blood, Dr. Schonfield can now sit in judgment and refer to the feverish brain of an apostle which produced a christological scheme. I have read all that was written by Paul which is available to me, and I have read all that was written by Dr. Schonfield that is available to me. Let me freely say that if Paul produced a christological scheme such as the feverish brain of Dr. Schonfield drummed up in The Passover Plot, you would have a good reason to attack the New Covenant Scriptures, and I would lead the attacking forces.

FAITH UNDER FIRE

I take a great deal of satisfaction from the consideration that the faith that I hold has been around for nineteen centuries. It has been subjected periodically to minute research and massive attacks. Brilliant minds have assailed it, ridiculed it, and held it up as an object of scorn. But the detractors have faded into oblivion. The grave has swallowed their physical forms, and the dust has collected upon their manuscripts. But the faith still stands, a comfort to believers, and a source of perplexity to the unbelievers. I am convinced that whatever men may say or do after two thousand years will not destroy the witness of that faith. If I must choose between The Incredible Christians of Dr. Schonfield and the unconquerable disciples of the apostle Paul, the choice for me is an easy one. I have already made it.

The day will come, and it is not too far distant, when the book by Dr. Schonfield will not be remembered or recognized. One day you will search for it in vain in the bookstores of our land. It will go out of print and disappear with its author, leaving no permanent mark upon the earth. The "shocker" of today will shock no one tomorrow. But the writings of the one-time Jewish rabbinical student who met Jesus on the Damascus road will live on. His poignant statement made after this momentous event, "He which persecuted us . . . now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed" (Galatians 1:23) will give courage to the hearts of millions yet to come, if Jesus does not return first.

I am going to suggest something now, which I fervently pray you will not misinterpret. Perhaps I should put it in the form of an entreaty rather than a suggestion. I invite and urge you, and even challenge you, to read the personal account of Saul of Tarsus, as he describes his encounter with Jesus of Nazareth. Be your own judges. Determine if this reads like the ravings of a diseased brain or a warped mind. Shall we brand as a hopeless fanatic every individual who alters his whole life as a result of the influence of one whose life was without flaw, and whose moral values are hailed as superb by His very detractors?

I know men who repeat the charges made against Saul who have never read one word written by this disciple of Jesus. They are thoroughly familiar with the writings of George Bernard Shaw and H. G. Wells, who were implacable foes of the apostle. They can recite by rote the statement of the former: "There has really never been a more monstrous imposition perpetrated than the imposition of the limitations of Paul's soul upon the soul of Jesus." They have never pored over one letter of the apostle and pinpointed the "monstrous imposition." Did it ever occur to you that what Paul wrote was like an icy finger pointing at the guilty hearts of these modern philosophers, whose immoral conduct is now so well known?

Shaw wrote, "No sooner had Jesus knocked over the dragon of superstition than Paul boldly set it on its legs again in the name of Jesus." The prejudiced mind will grasp at such pronouncements, but the unprejudiced mind will investigate. Surely the Jews through the centuries have been the victims of such prejudice and persecution as to make the very terms obnoxious. Shall we then perpetuate such a bias in our own hearts toward a Jew who wrote, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain"? Would it not be fair to read what was written by this graduate of the original Hillel School, and allow him to testify in his own behalf?

Do not base your judgment upon the testimony of either George Bernard Shaw or myself! Examine the evidence for yourself. Ignore the frowns of friends and the criticism of contemporaries. It is one thing to know what Hugh Schonfield said about Paul. It is a wholly different thing to know what Paul said about Jesus!

Potpourri of Questions

Contents

I confess that I do not know how to categorize or designate such a meeting as this one today. Perhaps we should label it "a spiritual smorgasbord." No program has been formulated, and no set address was prepared. Instead, you are free to ask whatever is in your heart, and you yourselves will determine the path we shall take and the direction that we travel in our mutual discussion. Do not feel reluctant to ask anything that may seem trivial or out of place. Whatever is important to you certainly will not be foolish to me.

Will you repeat what you said some time ago about your indifference to Jews becoming "Christians" and elaborate upon it for my benefit?

Yes, indeed. What I said then and what I maintain now is that I am not all "hung up" on what Jews call themselves when they reach the personal conclusion that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah of whom the prophets spoke. The earliest disciples of Jesus were all Jews or proselytes. They were not designated as Christians. They were called Nazarenes, believers, disciples, or brethren. None of these was a title. In the aggregate, they were known as people of "the Way." Perhaps all of us should abandon our sectarian labels and become once more followers of the Way. Hundreds of primitive disciples of Jesus actually died for their faith and never knew they were expected to be designated Christians. It is a fact that only after the message was taken beyond the borders of Palestine into a pagan environment that the term "Christians" was applied to the believers. Luke informs us that the disciples, or believers, were first called Christians at Antioch.

In spite of the ingenious rationalization of some of my friends who like to think the name was bestowed by the Lord, I doubt that it was predicted by the prophets or pronounced by divine revelation. I suspect it was contrived by the populace of Antioch. It may have been even given in jest, as a nickname. Certainly history bears out that the inhabitants of the area were addicted to such characterizations. The ending of the word with ianoi merely means "to be affiliated with," or "to be a member of the party of someone." The believers in the messiahship of Jesus were regarded as members of the party of the Messiah, to distinguish them from those who did not believe in Him.

The designations "Messianic Jews" or "Jews for Jesus" is sufficient for me. If there are connotations of the word "Christian" that violate your conscience, making it either abhorrent or inexpedient for you, do not become uptight about it. I want you simply to share in the reconciling power of God's grace that was made available to us through the atoning sacrifice of Jesus. What you call yourselves is a matter of indifference to me, as long as you truly glorify God. I do not want you to become non-Jews, nor to become like me, except in my trust in the Nazarene as the Messiah as foretold by the prophets. You are Jews, and while no human parentage or ancestry will justify us before God, you must be what you are and not something else!

You do contemplate that those Jews who accept Jesus as the Messiah should become members of some Christian church, do you not?

No Sir, I do not! The whole concept expressed by the term, "some Christian church," is contrary to my thinking. It runs counter to all I believe about the eternal purpose of God. In the first place, I doubt that the word "church" should be in our spiritual vocabulary. It is not at all a translation of the word it purports to represent. That word in the Greek is ekklesia, which comes from the term ek, meaning "out," and kaleo, "to call." So ekklesia simply refers to those who have been "called out" and called together by response to the good news of God's great move in history to form a people for himself. The word corresponds to the Hebrew kahal, an "assembly," or "assemblage."

I do not want to become technical or theological. God called Abraham out of the idolatrous world, of which he was a part, in order to create for himself a nation, a special people to keep alive on earth the belief in one God. Even so, "in the fulness of time" He called out a people composed of Jews and non-Jews to witness to mankind that the Messiah has come. It is enough that you hear the call and heed it as did Abraham, and thus become one of the "called out." If you have to be identified, why not be simply a synagogue of the Messianists? Above all else, do not feel that it is essential to identify with "some church," and thus unwittingly lend your influence to further the sectarian spirit which is so carnal and immature. God has only one called-out people. There is but one body, and never can be another. Just be content to remain where God receives you, and do not feel obligated to become something that men try to make you become.

Let me tell you sincerely that when you respond to the gospel by faith in the greatest fact ever proclaimed (that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God), and when you are baptized in validation of your faith in that fact, you are my brother, regardless of what you call yourself. I am concerned only that all of us be the people of God. It is this for which we are called. There is only one family because there is only one Father. Anyone who is born from above surely is in that family. Let us just be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Let us be brothers and sisters in the majestic family of God. Let those of us who have become friends of Jesus be friends of one another, and not become enemies over what designations we paint on our humanly-erected signboards. I pray that all of us will become "people of the Way." It is on that basis I receive you, for it is thus that God received us all. The call of the ages is echoing through the corridors of time. Hear it, heed it, and let us walk together unto His marvelous glory.

If you entertain such feelings as you say you do, how do you account for the terrible persecutions to which Jews have been subjected by Christians?

I do not want to be evasive, nor do I want to condone actions that are cruel, regardless of who perpetrates them. But I think you labor under a misapprehension. It occurs to me that many Jews in the western world assume that everyone who is not a Jew is a Christian. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Perhaps you think of the occidental world as a Christian realm. It is not. America is not a Christian nation. It is pagan in its culture and, regardless of its claim to be Christian, it has false gods and false "isms" to which it defers and pays homage. You are not a separate people living in a Christian world. Both of us are living in a pagan world.

Spain, under Ferdinand and Isabella, was not a Christian nation. Thomas of Torquemada was not a Christian, although he was the prior of a Dominican monastery. The pope who inaugurated the Inquisition at his behest, and made him grand inquisitor for Castile and Aragon, was not a Christian. It was not a Christian people who tortured the Jews and finally banished them in 1492, so that a modern historian wrote the sad words, "The galleons of Columbus setting out for the New World passed the ships taking the Jews into a new dispersion."

Germany, under the one-time paperhanger who took the name of Hitler, was not Christian. The frightful holocaust was not the work of Christians, but of sin-blighted pagans. You may believe me or not, but no true follower of Jesus ever persecuted Jews or anyone else. Indeed, Jesus taught His disciples to love their enemies, to do good to those who would despitefully use them and persecute them. Regardless of one's profession, if he engages in persecution, he is not a follower of Jesus. It is shameful that men have cloaked themselves under the garb inscribed with the name Christian to cover up their dastardly crimes. You cannot identify the criminal by the disguise he has stolen from the innocent.

The follower of Jesus suffers himself to be defrauded, rather than to defraud. He endures illegal confiscation of his goods, rather than to confiscate the possessions of another. The disciple of the Nazarene would rather meet death than to take life. In Christ, racial and ethnic differences lose their significance. To the extent that racial prejudice exists in a man's heart, he is not truly a follower of Him who died for us all. The purpose of the Spirit of God is to pour out in our hearts the love of God, until we see all men as our Creator sees them.

Is not the main difference between Christianity and modern Judaism the fact that Christianity is a "pie in the sky" religion? Modern Judaism encourages one to do all the good he can on earth because death brings only the peace of non-being. I am talking about the philosophic distinction, not about the theological spread between them.

That is a big question. I have no doubt it is an important one. My answer will probably not satisfy you, but surely you can be cheered in knowing that a few years ago it would not have satisfied me either. I must confess that I am not too interested in any philosophic clash between Christianity and Judaism of the modern stripe. I regard both of them as corruptions of God's revelation. Christianity is a term coined to designate a complex system. It is composed of accretions of human explanations, traditions, interpretations, and socially acceptable ethics and has snowballed through the ages. Just as barnacles are not a part of a vessel, so these are not a part of what God intended. Modern Christianity is no more the simple faith proclaimed by the envoys of Jesus than the socialistic state of modern England is the monarchy of the past. I confess I am not too "high" on the conglomerate mess lumped off under the general label of Christianity.

By the same token, I am equally turned off by what is dubbed "modern Judaism." Maybe it is because I flinch when I see the suffix ism attached to any term of religious significance. It is the tail that wags religious dogs, and who wants to go to the dogs? Judaism, whether it be the brand in vogue yesterday or the current article, is not the system revealed to your fathers at Sinai and delivered to Moses by the hand of angels. It is a synthetic distillate composed of one part revelation and nine parts rationalization, there being nine times more human than divine in it. Its empty rituals can no more satisfy the longings of the human soul than can the hollow liturgies of organized Christianity. It is time to ask both sects in the words of Isaiah, "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" (55:2).

I represent no sect, party, splinter, or philosophic clique in modern "Christianity." I am not interested in having you embrace it. My only creed is Jesus the Nazarene. I accept His life and seek to reproduce it in my own feeble and imperfect existence. The life of Jesus has promise, in this world and in the world to come. I do not wait for "pie in the sky," although the "pie" I share now is big enough that I cannot exhaust it in these few years of mundane existence. I receive a hundredfold more in this life for what I sacrifice for His sake, but in the world to come I shall have life eternal in its fullness. It is a travesty on justice to make it appear that the faith in the Messiah causes one to stumble blindly along through life, with no reward here and only a nebulous hope of blessing beyond the grave.

You were very perceptive in your use of the term "modern Judaism," for what you have is not what your fathers trusted in at all. You have heard the song of the same sirens that echoed in the ears of the proponents of institutionalized Christianity. You have been lured to shipwreck on the same rocks.

In the eleventh century, Moses Maimonides drew up a summary of the Jewish creed in thirteen articles, and these were accepted as a universal confession of faith among Jews.

Article Twelve states, "I believe, with a perfect faith, in the advent of the Messiah, and though he should tarry, yet I will patiently await every day till he come." Article Thirteen states, "I believe, with a perfect faith, that there will be a revivification of the dead, at the period when it shall please the Creator, blessed be his name, and let his remembrance be exalted forever and ever!"

What has happened to modern Jews to make them disregard, and even deny, these statements from the celebrated rabbi who was hailed as "the eagle of the doctors" and "the lamp of Israel"? Certainly there are many in this generation who do not patiently wait for the Messiah every day. They have rejected the idea of a personal Messiah, and have substituted as an expedient a system they hope will somehow leaven the social structure of which they are a part.

What has happened to the "perfect faith" that the sleeping dead will arise? Many modern Jews, betrayed by the "evolutionary process" into believing that man is merely a superior animal, reject the idea of a life beyond the tomb. To them man dies like a beast, and his end is extinction.

Modern Judaism, like modern Christianity, so-called, is the result of men coming under the influence of clever sophists, whose skeptical writings cut the heart out of faith in a divine being and in the supernatural. David Levi was a learned Jew who published a memorable work called Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament, twenty years after the American Revolution broke out. In his book he declares that Deism and infidelity had made such great strides in the world that they reached even to the Jewish nation. The result was that many became so infected with skepticism by reading Bolingbroke, Hume, Voltaire, and others that they "scarcely believe in a revelation, much less have they any hope in their future restoration."

We must face the fact that the Jewish and Christian faiths have come under attack from infidelity for the same reason. They have a common origin. Both were revealed to men by divine power. I would like to make it clear that I accept the veracity of the message given at Sinai with the same degree of fervor that I believe in the message of the chosen envoys of Jesus. Both conveyed hope. The first held forth the hope of a Messiah who would put all things together, the second conveyed hope of man's eternal sharing with the divine when death was conquered and destroyed.

Is it not true that Jesus borrowed from philosophers and priests before His day, and there was nothing really distinctive or new in the system He devised and which you defend?

You remind me of the old anecdote of the man who imbibed a little too much liquor, and in his semidrunken state began to brag and bluster about his physical prowess. He announced that he could whip anyone in town. There was no response, so he broadened the scope of his challenge to include anyone in the county. Again there were no takers. "I can whip anyone in this whole state," he said. Upon hearing this, a little man stepped out of the crowd and knocked him down. The inebriated individual clambered slowly to his feet and said, "You will have to excuse me, please. I took in too much territory that last time."

That is what you have done in your question. The implication is that everything Jesus taught was appropriated from prior human sources, and there was nothing distinctive about the system He inaugurated. That takes in too much territory upon both counts. It would make of Jesus a peddler of secondhand precepts and used concepts. It would have been ridiculous for one who was the animate embodiment of all truth to deny any truth man had discovered. Truth is truth, regardless of who asserts it, and all truth is consistent with itself. Jesus was concerned about truth for its own sake, and not as a means for personal renown. Man had lived for thousands of years and had received revelations from God through the prophets. Philosophers and wise men had discovered principles of moral and ethical conduct that were becoming to mankind.

In the endorsement and restatement of such principles, Jesus did not endorse either the philosophers or their systems. If He had refused to state a truth because of its prior discovery, He would have come under censure as being either ignorant or inconsistent. Jesus did not profess there were no truths before He came. To the contrary, He frequently said, "It has been written." He asked the question, "Have you not read?" Certainly He brought to light truths never before ascertained, but He did not thereby renounce any truth previously asserted.

At the risk of seeming simplistic, let me say that I believe Jesus revealed for us the truth of the real nature of God. He also helped us to understand the gravity of sin as God regards it, and the alienation that results from it. Best of all, He made clear to us the means of reconciliation with God, giving us a new kind of hope never before experienced. So, while it is a fact that Jesus acknowledged all truth previously known as valid, it is just as certain He brought truths to light never before understood.

Why are you so interested in converting the Jews? Is there a peculiar kind of satisfaction in seeing a Jew give up his Jewishness?

Perhaps I do not understand the import of your question, but I shall answer what I think you meant. If I miss the point you can bring me into line on it. I suspect there are people who think there is an "open season" on Jews, stalking them in the hope of capturing them and bringing them into some "Christian" camp, and making statistics out of them. I have no inclination to go "scalp-hunting" for any specific group on earth. I love Jews and non-Jews alike. Because I believe that true joy is found in the Messiah, I want all whom I love to share in that joy. But I am like the Lord, in that I make no difference between Jew or Greek.

I have a deep conviction, based upon what I regard as the revelation of God, that life is to be found in God's Son. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John 5:12). If a researchist in a laboratory discovered the secret of longevity, or the fountain of youth, and guarded the secret, he would be considered a selfish criminal. I have found the secret of the new creation, of life in the fourth dimension. I want you to participate in it, to know the grace and peace that come through the Messiah, but I also want everyone else to know the new life in God's Messiah as well.

I must protest your misconception that I want Jews to dispense with their Jewish identity. That is the last thing I want. I maintain that God raised up the nation of Israel as a special vessel so that the Messiah could be brought to the world. No other nation could have done so. Salvation is of the Jews. The oracles given through Moses, the writings of the prophets, the songs of your eminent poets, all of these were bestowed as gifts of God to prepare mankind for the crowning act of blessing humanity through the Jews— the advent of the Messiah. Israel was the cradle of God in which the Messianic dream was rocked. As long as I regard Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah foretold by your ancient seers, I want you to remain Jews. Your very Jewishness is a testimony to the world of the marvelous program and providence of God.

Not for anything the world has to offer would I deliberately arouse antipathy in your hearts. I will do all that is right to allay the improper attitudes of all of us toward each other. I eagerly hope that you will not become incensed when I tell you that, as I view it, you can actually be better Jews in Jesus than you can be out of Him. This is true, regardless of how you may be looked upon by the modern Jewish community. It is no adverse reflection upon you to take the step of faith in the messiahship of Jesus. Thousands of Jews did this very thing immediately after His ascension to the Father. They did not feel that in so doing they were surrendering their standing as Jews, for they recognized Jesus as a Jew, as far as His earthly relationships were concerned.

Many decades ago the learned Jew, Alfred Edersheim, in his book The Temple wrote, "At the close of these studies, I would say, with humble and heartfelt thankfulness, that step by step my Christian faith has only been strengthened by them; that, as I proceeded, the conviction has always been deepened that Christ is indeed the end of the Law for righteousness, to whom all the ordinances of the Old Testament had pointed, and in whom alone, alike the people and the history of Israel find their meaning."

How I wish that I might persuade all of you of the truth of this profound discovery. You do not maintain your real Jewishness by rejecting the Messiah, but by accepting Him. All of the illustrious history that your fathers lived converges upon Him. It is a tragedy to search all of your generations for the pearl of greatest price, and then die in reach of it without ever touching it.

But this must suffice for this meeting. A week from now, if God wills, we shall draw our dialogue to a close.

The Problem of Sin

Contents

Today we begin our last session of sharing for the present time. I commend you for your interest and faithfulness, and I assure you of my deep appreciation for your spirit of frankness and concern. I look forward to our future meetings, but right now we must get on with this one. I do not want to be in the position of the arm-waving orator who said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I speak for posterity!" A man on the back row of seats stood up and said, "If you don't quit pretty soon, posterity will be here before you finish!" Who has the first question?

What do you think about sin? Is it a reality, or is it a concept dreamed up by religious leaders to make men have a sense of guilt so they can be exploited?

You have certainly asked about a matter with which all of us are familiar. Regardless of how far removed some of us have been from certain areas of discussion, when we talk about sin we are getting very close to home, for every one of us. I wish I could tell you that sin has been proven to be a figment of the imagination, a goblin of the past, a ghost invented by primitive man. But sin is real. Its causes are real. Its effects are real. The suffering that results is real. The ultimate price we must pay for it is real.

In its original, "sin" is from a word meaning "to miss the mark." This is an obvious allusion to the practice of archery, in which men use a bow to discharge arrows toward a mark on a target. There are various ways in which one can miss a mark. He can shoot over it, and there is a word to describe this kind of moral dereliction. It is called "transgressions," which means "to go beyond." One can fall short of the mark. The word "disobedience" is used to designate such a failure. One can have a good aim, but his arrow is deflected by a gust of wind or by a hanging limb. The word "err" is used to describe this. It means "to swerve from the path." Then there is the word "iniquity," which seems to be used to cover the whole area of sinful existence.

In furtherance of our analogy, we can say that it is the field in which we practice the art of moral archery. The original Hebrew word points up the lack of rectitude or integrity, and this the whole ground for man's departure from the righteousness God demands. It is rendered in such terms as "unjust," "unrighteous," "ungodly," and "perverse." Twelve times it is translated "wicked" or "wickedness."

There was no wondering about the reality of sin among the prophets who were raised up and sent to your fathers. In the series of woes pronounced upon the house of Israel and the men of Judah, Isaiah said, "Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope" (5:18). The skeptics hauled sin after them, even while challenging God to do anything about it, as the succeeding verse shows.

In Isaiah 30:1, the prophet wrote, "Woe to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me; and that cover with a covering, but not of my Spirit, that they may add sin to sin." This puts the finger squarely on the problem. Sin is the result of rebellion, the disposition not only to disregard but to revolt against the divine will, and to look to other sources for guidance. The prophet says, "Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you" (59:2).

It is affirmed by Solomon that "fools make a mock at sin." I take this to mean they laugh at it, scoff at it, and make fun of it. One is in a grave condition when he jokes about his sin, like a sick comic. He is like a man with cancer of the lungs who keeps on smoking cigarettes, sucking tar into his diseased organs while ridiculing those who try to point out the folly of his persistence. Sin is as real as God's condemnation of it. It is as real as His power to forgive it!

In his book, Old Testament Synonyms, Dr. Girdlestone wrote:

> "The Hebrew Bible meets us with a full acknowledgment of these manifold aspects of human suffering, and blends wrongdoing and suffering to a remarkable degree, setting forth sin in its relation to God, to society, and to man's own self, depicting it in its negative aspect as iniquity and unrighteousness, and in its positive aspect as rebellion and a breach of trust."

The author of sin never achieved a more powerful conquest through sin than he did when he beguiled men into thinking there is no sin.

What makes a thing sin? Why should one human action be labeled a sin while another human action is regarded as harmless?

Sin always is related to authority, and in the human being it stems from the fact that man has been made in the image of God. He is invested with the responsibility of glorifying God by his life. Man does not belong to himself. He has been made by another, and is subject to the will of his Creator. It is inherent in the human consciousness, I think, to recognize that one is a product of the creative genius of another, and so to strive to reproduce the nature of the Creator who made him. Anything that reflects against the nature and character of the Creator, or is in defiance to the will of the Creator, is missing the mark. It is sin!

If it is conceded that there was a time when man did not exist but was made through the exercise of the will of another, it would appear that the will of the Creator should be the will of the creature. The Creator should determine the purpose of the one whom He brought into existence as a rational being. This makes the mark at which we aim not our own. It has been planted by divine authority and will be the criterion by which we are measured. It is not our mark that we miss, but God's mark for us. A thing is a sin because it is done in violation or in defiance to the authority of God, and that authority as relates to human conduct is found in the sacred Scriptures.

If those Scriptures do not contain a revelation of God, there is no such revelation, for nothing else can qualify as a revelation. If there is no revelation, man is doomed to wander through an alien world, without ever understanding his relationship to it. It then follows that the Creator who made him has abandoned him upon a storm-tossed sea, without rudder or compass. That may be the position of some who are here today, but it is not my position. I am fully committed to the divine will for my feeble existence on this planet. To the extent I can grasp it, I shall eagerly follow it. My sin will be of the head and not the heart!

Why did God make man so he would sin? If He knew everything from the beginning, could He not have created a being who would not sin? Is not the God you preach responsible for all the suffering in the world?

We find ourselves in deep water when we begin to probe why God did certain things in certain ways, and why He did not do them otherwise. I am reluctant to pit my finite mind against His infinite one, or to appear judgmental of His means or methods. I confess that I dread this question more than any other. This is not to say there is any resentment against the question, for it is the very type of thing about which any rational person will be curious. I do not shy from it because of any personal lack of confidence in the eternal purpose of God. I am only reluctant to deal with the matter, lest I exhibit some measure of irreverence by treading upon holy ground, where I should be removing my shoes.

The prophet Isaiah wrote, "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! . . . Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands? Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What has thou brought forth?" (45:9, 10). Let me say, then, I do not question the power or ability of God to form a creature of any kind. He is the potter, and He could spin the clay on the wheel and produce any kind of vessel He wanted to design and take shape under His hands.

Our inability to explain definitely why God exercised His sovereign power as He did need not deter us from using the rational ability He bestowed upon us to consider some of the probabilities involved. God wanted a being who could worship Him by personal choice and not by compulsion. There is no glory to be derived from one who expresses respect because he is helpless and cannot do otherwise. There is a difference between the genuflection of one who bows from personal adoration, and the kneeling of a puppet whose actions are controlled by strings pulled from behind a curtain. Choice is an act of the will, and one who has the power of will may choose the wrong course. If one is not free to make a mistake he is not free at all. One who cannot choose to do wrong cannot choose to do right!

God could have created a fleshly automation, a kind of computerized zombie. But such a creation would not have been a man. It would have been a machine. Any response by such a creature would have been a compulsive reaction and not a manifestation of love or personal concern. God made man a personality. He presented him with options and alternatives. He informed him in advance of the consequences of his actions. He set before him light and darkness, bitter and sweet, life and death.

God did not create sin. Sin is the result of man's own choice. He chose not to listen to God but to self. He chose to supplant God's will with his own will. The suffering that results from sin was not caused by God. It is a part of the package deal that Satan offered. Man bought it, lock, stock, and barrel. One can choose to be and to do what he pleases, but he cannot choose the consequences. Death is the built-in ultimate consequence of sin. The very fact that man is conscious of his failure and is aware of his sin is proof that he is not a mere animal. Neither a one-celled being in primordial ooze nor the most advanced primate in a zoo ever questions why he was so made. Only one creature bears the image of his Creator and can probe the purpose of his creation. Sin never was affirmed of animals. The very fact of sin in the universe proves that man is more than an animal.

Those of you who are philosophically inclined will not be satisfied with what I have said. Two of you are esteemed teachers of philosophy and are humanists. You will not be happy with my statements. The problem of the entrance of sin into an order of things which had been pronounced "very good" by the God who created it, is an age-old one. Hundreds of books have been written about it in the past, and new ones come pouring from the press every year. None of them are wholly satisfactory, for if one appeared with all of the answers there would be no further questions and no other books.

I am not inclined to speculate. There is nothing wrong with the word "speculate" in its origin, for it means "to spy out" or "observe." In our day, however, it generally means to theorize from conjectures without sufficient evidence. My speculation may prove to be no more valid than that of others. What I prefer to do is to accept apparent facts and to allow Scripture to be my guide in what has gone before. From my own tragic experiences, as well as from divine revelation, I am convinced that sin is all too real. You may call it by some other name, but that will not change its nature. It was Shakespeare who said, "A rose by any other name will smell as sweet." That may be paraphrased to read, "A skunk by any other name will smell as rank." Perhaps that is more appropriate with relation to sin.

I am a moral agent as a result of my humanity and rationality. I do not use the term "free moral agent," for one who is not free is not a moral agent. I am responsible as a being, a person. I am answerable for my thoughts and the actions that they beget. I do not charge God for my own dereliction. I do not cry out to Him, "Why have You made me like this?" I am grateful for His love in providing a consciousness of forgiveness in His Son. In fact, I am grateful for consciousness. I accept myself as I am, for it is the way He accepted me. He straightened out the identity problem for me.

Why is it that Christians differ about what constitutes sin? Could you not make a list of sins and distribute it so that all of us could check our conduct by it? The more I hear Christians talk about sin, the more confused I become.

I am fully aware that many professed disciples of the Messiah tend to confuse the minds of men by their endless debates and disputes about what are called specific sins. I am not sure that Christians really differ about sin. They acknowledge that it is rebellion against God and His authority. They realize that sin involves dethronement of God in the heart, and enthronement of self as a usurper of the scepter. You probably would not get a great deal of debate about the nature of sin in the abstract.

It is in the application of the term to various aspects of behavior that wide divergencies occur. Sometimes these differences occur because of traditional taboos. Sometimes they result from differences in social pressures. A few days ago some of us were talking informally about the use of alcoholics as table beverages. I remarked at the time that anyone who could not get along with alcohol should get along without it. He has lost control and transferred it to a bottle opener. I am a teetotaler by choice. This is not because I think beverage wine at your dinners is a sin. No Christian can show that it is, and informed ones would not attempt it. Drunkenness is repeatedly condemned in the Scriptures, however. It is a sin. It is a work of the flesh. But drunkenness results from lack of moderation, from imbibing to excess.

Christians who regard the moderate use of wine as a sin are reading their own attitudes, feelings, and opinions back into God's revelation. The same thing holds true with many other items branded as a sin. God has not given us a meticulous list of do's and don'ts. Under Christ, God has not laid down a catalog of precise rules to be obeyed, but has enunciated pure and elevated moral principles to govern our conduct.

It is unfortunate that most men prefer exact rules and specification. They want to be told precisely what is expected of them, what they may do and what they must avoid. This removes from them the need for making decisions based upon a careful consideration of alternatives. It also precludes them from being responsible for their behavior. Jesus did not specify a great number of prohibitions, since He was instituting an era of grace, as distinguished from one of law.

Under the law of Moses, your fathers were told what to do when they came across a stray ox or sheep, the kind of clothing to wear, how to construct a roof on a house and what to do when they found a bird's nest with eggs or fledglings in it. In Christ, we do not have a "computer printout" of sins. God has not filed a "bill of particulars" for us. In fact, attitudes and intentions can be as condemning as the actions themselves.

I would not be so presumptuous as to compile a list of sins for distribution. Some behavior is always sinful, some is never sinful. Some may or may not be, depending upon the circumstances, the conscience, and/or the motivation of the one performing the act. Another consideration is the long-range effect of the act. I am personally responsible for ascertaining the will of God to the extent of my ability, and for carrying it out to the extent of my capability. You have the same obligation. It is enough for me to know that divine forgiveness is available through penitence and prayer. It is not available because of my own merit but because of the Messiah. I do not want to usurp the place of God by imposing upon mankind my own judgment as to the classification of sins.

How can you justify your idea of God allowing Jesus, who was innocent, to die for something others had done? Is not this the greatest act of injustice in history, and would it not make God a murderer if it were true?

I have a great deal of hesitancy about entering into a discussion in which it may appear that I am critically examining either the motives or actions of God. I plead again my human limitations. I never can fully grasp the infinite purpose, the pleasure, and will of God. Neither can I even adequately communicate to others the depth of the feelings welling up within my own soul. I can be grateful for thoughts too profound to express them in mere words.

I suspect that your question ignores the gravity of sin in the universe as God regards it, and the nature of absolute mercy and justice when combined in the character of one personality. Sin distorts the whole creation of God. It erodes the relationship between man and his Maker, and erects walls between man and his fellows. It is delusive, divisive, and degrading. As long as it exists, the creative purpose of God will remain thwarted.

I think that in a world as distorted by sin as ours, the innocent always will suffer along with the guilty. Who does not know of a father or mother who has gone to an untimely grave, weeping over a wayward child? Many a pure wife has endured the disgrace and suffered the shame inherent in the love for an errant spouse. Is it not true that in times of war, the unassuming and inoffensive have been called upon to die for greedy and selfish persons whom they have never seen? A world of sin is a disordered world. It is a topsy-turvey world in which values are overturned and reason is disordered. What God must do in an order corrupted by man, to restore it to the divine intent, is different from what He would have done if man had not known sin.

We are not capable of absolute justice or absolute mercy. We are never sure that we have all the facts in a case, and we are never certain that our mental weighing of them is equitable. The jurists in this audience are always aware of the shortcomings of law when applied to specific cases. In a world of sin and misdemeanor, our judgments are sometimes partial and relative. This carries with it the idea that we shall play down some sins, judged purely by their effect upon the society that we are elected to protect.

Only God is just, and justice demands that for every sin there must be a penalty. The ultimate penalty is death. Since we all have sinned, we all are doomed. Yet God is merciful, and mercy requires not that sin be overlooked, but that the sinner be dealt with in compassion and forgiveness. Mankind was in a predicament. Either every person must die for his own sins, or one who was guiltless could die for the sin of the whole race. Only the Son of God could qualify. As the lamb of God, He could make atonement.

He took upon himself the sins of mankind. According to Isaiah, God laid on His own Son the iniquity of us all. With His death, the demand of justice was satisfied and divine righteousness upheld. Mercy could be accorded to man without restriction. I do not think God was a murderer, but I regard Him as my benefactor. He acted out of love for the stricken world, and I praise His name for such loving-kindness. He set me free from the law of sin and death.

You are Jews and I am a non-Jew, but there is one place where we meet, and that is in the need for someone to ransom us from our sins. In this respect there is no difference. It is because of this fact that I accept as the Messiah the one whom you gave to the world as the seed of David, the seed of Abraham. I trust that the day will come when there will be no difference in our state, but that all of us may accept Him and praise the name of the one God through Him. This is my fervent and eager prayer!

The Great Antidote

Contents

I am both profoundly honored and humbled by your gracious invitation to deliver this series of talks on the letter to the Hebrews. You have advertised them to the community as lectures, but I shall refer to them as talks. I doubt that I could qualify as a lecturer. The term seems to conjure up a mental image of an erudite professor speaking to a class of young intellectuals. While I am sure you are intellectuals, it is obvious from where I stand that you are not all young. In any event, I prefer to visit with you informally and share with you quite simply some of my views about a letter in the New Covenant Scriptures which is one of my favorites.

Your arrangement for this kind of session proves that you are abreast of the times and sailing with the tide. A great change for the better has taken place in the past several years, and there is a resurgence of interest in the study of the book that we call "The Bible." There are regular gatherings for this purpose in many dormitories in universities where, only a few years ago, this Book was held up to ridicule and scorn. I know groups of businessmen who meet at the noon hour for Bible study. Thousands of women in our land gather in groups for what are called "Bible coffees" every week. We do not meet for such studies merely because it is the "in thing" for our day, but I am thrilled to live in a day when this kind of thing is in.

Before I start talking about a specific letter, I want to speak briefly about how all of the letters came to be written.

When I was quite young, I thought the Bible was let down from Heaven in a basket. It seemed to me that God had handed it to us bound in black leather, stamped in gold, and wrapped and tied with white tissue and blue ribbon. It was a bit of a shock when I came to realize the truth about it.

The New Covenant Scriptures are not really made up of twenty-seven "books." What we call "books" are actually letters. Some of these were written to communities of believers in Christ, such as the one in Corinth, or the one composed of mustered-out soldiers of the Roman army in Thessalonica. One was addressed to a group of such communities situated in a province called Galatia, an area infiltrated and inhabited by wild, reckless, and overemotional Gauls, who had swarmed down from the north.

Some were written to individuals. Among these were the two written to Timothy while Paul was incarcerated in the Mamertine Prison in Rome. One was addressed to Philemon, who resided at Colosse, and another to Titus, who had been left on the Isle of Crete, to correct some deficiencies and establish order among the communities of saints located there. Each of these letters grew out of life conditions in which the recipients were involved. They were written to show how followers of Jesus should behave themselves, if they followed the example of Jesus in the midst of a pagan culture. The letters were guidelines to help believers solve their problems while caught up in the human predicament.

Once I thought of them as constituting a written code of laws, a compilation of statutes, judgments, and decrees, such as was handed down to Israel at Mount Sinai. I no longer believe that. Paul, who wrote more of the letters than any other person said, "We are not under law, but under grace." These are personal letters. There is a difference between a legalistic code and a personal letter written out of a heart filled with concern, love, and joy. That is why Paul could drop in a little home remedy prescription for Timothy's upset stomach, and why he could ask him to stop by and pick up his topcoat. Paul had left it hanging in the closet at the home of Carpus, with whom he had lodging in Troas.

What I am saying upsets a lot of people. Perhaps they think it cheapens the Bible to admit that it was written to deal with common, everyday problems in which we become involved in our daily human routines. They may have grown up in a home where the family Bible was kept on a library table, and was treated like the ark of the covenant. No one touched it except to enter another name in the family register, or to tuck in a lock of the baby's hair, or hide the recipe for banana pudding. It was too sacred to read.

I am not upset by the fact that the letters were written to grapple with problems such as unemployment, job-hunting, sex, overeating, and laying up money for your children. It does not cheapen Jesus for me to realize that He became tired, hungry, thirsty, and that He sometimes cried. It helps me to know that He was tempted in all points as I am, and was without sin. I wish I could say that about myself. I am glad the living Word was clothed in the same kind of flesh in which I live, and I am happy that the written Word deals with mundane circumstances that "bug" me.

You probably recall the story of the shipwrecked foreign visitor who was treated kindly by a tribe of aborigines. When he was rescued and returned to his homeland, he decided to send his superstitious benefactors a token of his gratitude. Having observed that they had no way of calculating time, he presented them with a sundial. In their reverence for it, they built a roof over it. That is what many have done with the Word of God. Instead of using it, they have made an idol of it. Bibliolatry is as wrong as any other form of idolatry.

THE STUDY AT HAND

Having come to the end of this little stroll down a pleasant bypath, we can now return to the main road, and devote our attention to the letter to the Hebrews. Immediately we find ourselves with a few problems on our hands. From the time I was a lad I was always taught that one should not plunge headlong into a Scriptural letter without first settling a few preliminary matters. These include an identification of the author, the addressees, and additional information such as the geographical area and the historical background. As an aid to memory, we referred to them as the "Five P's in the interpretation pod." They consisted of the person writing, the people written to, the place, purpose, and period of the writing.

But the letter to the Hebrews is different! We can determine from the text who wrote the letter to the Romans. It starts with the words, "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ," and in the seventh verse says, "To all that be in Rome." The first letter sent to the Corinthians identifies the writers at once. They were Paul and Sosthenes. The second letter was written by Paul and Timothy. But there is no way of positively determining who wrote the letter we are to study. A good many able students think it was written by Barnabas. Several ancient writers assign it to his authorship. Others think it was written by Apollos, the Jew from Alexandria, Egypt, who was said to be "eloquent and mighty in the scriptures" (Acts 18:24). They call attention to the style of writing, and affirm that it is characteristic of the Alexandrian School.

In recent years I have become aware of an increasing number who speculate that Aquila and Priscilla may have collaborated in producing it, as a husband and wife team. Perhaps your Bible has the superscription, "The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews." This may be significant, but it is not conclusive. It probably was affixed some time after the letter began to be circulated. The fact remains, there is no way by which we can now establish the authorship beyond question. Even in his day, Origen said, "Who wrote the Letter to the Hebrews, only God knows for certain."

When I am pinned down, and my arm is twisted, and am virtually forced into giving an opinion, I opt for Paul. I have read all that has been written in favor of his authorship, and all that has been written on the other side. After weighing it all, for me the scales are still tipped on the side of Paul. It is not essential for me to take the time to detail the store of internal and external evidence upon which I base my conclusion.

The same kind of mental quandary faces us in trying to identify the recipients of the letter. The writer nowhere says it was written "to the Hebrews." It was written to Jews who were thoroughly familiar with the law given to Israel, and with the history of those who lived under that law. They were children of the fathers to whom God spoke by the prophets, as we are informed in the opening sentence. The letter is a compendium of allusions to the law, priesthood, and tabernacle service. These would have been wholly unintelligible to the non-Jewish world, but every Orthodox Jew would have understood them without explanation.

I believe the letter was written to the "Hebrews," but who were the Hebrews? I think the answer is found in the book of Acts. When the number of the disciples in Jerusalem was multiplied, the first case of dissension arose. Luke, the author, writes, "There arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration" (6:1). The saints had disposed of their real estate holdings and deposited the sale proceeds with the apostles, who purchased food and dispensed it daily to every person, according to his need.

The Grecians were Hellenistic Jews. They had been born in such places as Mesopotamia, Pontus, Asia, Egypt, and Libya.

They spoke the language of the land of their nativity as well as Hebrew, in which their synagogue worship generally was conducted. The Hebrews were Palestinian Jews. Most of them were monolingual, speaking only the dialect of Palestine. I think the letter we are studying was addressed to the Palestinian Jews, especially to those who were residents of Jerusalem. I do not think the letter was written to the Diasporan Jews, those who were scattered abroad. James and Peter both wrote to the dispersed Jews, but the letter to the Hebrews was not for them.

The addressees had accepted Jesus as Lord, as is evident from many references in the body of the letter. But they were in grave danger of falling away and relapsing into Judaism, while renouncing the validity of the claims of Jesus as "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession" (3:1). Perhaps the pomp and ceremony, the panoply and pageantry of the temple, proved irresistible with the passing of the years. The disciples of Jesus constituted a despised minority. They were victims of harassment by the priests and politicians, and were regarded as outcasts and social pariahs. They may have looked with longing eyes at the splendor of the temple as the pilgrims convened for the high holy days, and contrasted all of this with their own gatherings in upper rooms and dingy dwellings on back streets as a kind of underground movement.

Whatever their reasoning might have been, many of them were in desperate danger of renouncing the faith and returning to their former status under the law. That is why the letter is full of admonitions and warnings. "We ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip" (2:1). "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God" (3:12). "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it" (4:1).

These are but a few statements from the first four chapters, but they portray the urgent purpose of this letter. They could be multiplied to great length, but these will serve to show that the Jewish believers were in imminent danger of "flaking off" or "flacking out" on the faith, as the "now" generation would describe it. I am sure you will at once rush to the conclusion that believers are always in danger of returning to their past life, and every apostolic epistle is a warning against that tendency. That may be true, but there is a special dimension involved in this case. Properly understood, the letter will come alive. Without consideration of it, we may not grasp the meaning of what is said. Along with a great many scholars more eminent than I, I maintain that this epistle was written to Jewish believers in Jesus a very few years before the city of Jerusalem was besieged and destroyed by the Roman army under Titus. That was when the beautiful temple, which Herod the Great had spent forty-two years restoring and refurbishing, was utterly destroyed. This event brought to an effective conclusion the system of Judaism, which centered around the animal sacrifices on the brazen altar, and forever left unrivaled the atonement at the cross, which is God's only altar.

Jesus had predicted this cataclysmic event before His death. He had warned that Jerusalem would be surrounded with armies, that her desolation was near (Luke 21:20). He told His disciples that those who were in Judea should flee to the mountains. Those on the housetops should not come down to rescue personal belongings. Those in the field should not return home for their clothing. Because of the hardships involved, they were to pray that their flight would not be in the winter, nor on the Sabbath Day, when the gates of the city were shut. They would then encounter hostility from the Jews, who resented any person's making more than a Sabbath Day's journey.

Obviously, those who renounced their faith in Christ and remained in the city would be destroyed in a frightful period of tribulation unlike any other in history. This letter was written to encourage the disciples not to put their trust in Jerusalem, but to abandon the city when the time came. It was pointed out that Jesus suffered outside the gate, and the admonition was given, "Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (13:13). Observe the significance of the statement, "Let us go forth . . . for here have we no continuing city." The earthly Jerusalem was doomed. It could provide no safety.

FORSAKING THE ASSEMBLY

The fact of the city's destruction also explains another passage, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching" (10:25). A great many people forget that this was written to Hebrew believers at a certain time and for a certain purpose. They think it was written to us who are living in the United States of America in the twentieth century. "The day approaching" was the day of destruction of Jerusalem. It was essential for the saints not to grow cold, or to drop out of the ranks, but that they seek the companionship of others to gain strength to resist the coming trials. They were not to exhort one another to assemble, but they were to assemble to exhort one another.

The writer is not talking about the weekly meetings, which became traditional in western culture when we were a frontier people. He wrote about daily gatherings, perhaps in small groups, to bolster one another in the resolution to remain firm. He says, "Exhort one another daily, while it is called Today; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin" (3:13).

Certainly the letter had some effect. Eusebius, the "father of church history," informs us that the disciples of Jesus, having been warned by him, fled to Pella and other places across the Jordan. There is evidence that not a single Christian perished in the siege or in the bloody aftermath. I think the letter to the Hebrews was written for the specific purpose of encouraging the saints to resist enticements to leave the faith and return to Judaism. The importance of the letter to us is found in the admonition, "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession" (4:14).

W. E. Vine writes, "The Epistle is written to provide the great antidote to meet the dangers both of the true Hebrew believer and of those who were tending to become apostates." This is why I call this talk "The Great Antidote."

The Better Way

Contents

Let us suppose for a few minutes that you have been instrumental in leading a colony of emigrants from an area beset with distressing problems, into a new region that offered them real hope for the future. After a little time had passed, word was conveyed to you that some of them were becoming dissatisfied and were considering returning to their previous homeland. You knew that if they did so it would mean disillusionment and death. What kind of an appeal would you make to them in an attempt to get them to remain where they are?

It seems to me that the most effective thing you could do would be to present incontrovertible proof that their new state was better than the old, and that to revert to their former condition would be foolish. If you could cite the special features and advantages of their new state, it would have a greater effect in stabilizing them than anything else you could do. That is exactly the strategy employed by the author of the letter to the Hebrews. There are thirteen chapters in the letter, as we have divided it, and the word "better" occurs thirteen times.

I am not implying that each chapter contains the word "better," but it is an interesting fact that each chapter points up a way in which Jesus and the faith of which He is in the center are superior to the previous economy under which the Hebrews lived. We must be careful here. We dare not suggest that there was nothing good about their prior state. It was God who ordained the law, and wrote the basic covenant with His own finger upon two tablets of stone. It was God who set up the tabernacle worship in the wilderness, after showing Moses a pattern by which this amazing tent was to be constructed. It would be rash to say that God created something of no value. The word "better" is a comparative term. It does not suggest that there is no good at all in the inferior element of the comparison. The law of Moses was perfectly adapted to the purpose for which it was instituted. The system it inaugurated was designed to fulfill the divine purpose until Jesus could come. The writer of Hebrews argues that by calling the present covenant a new one, God made the first one obsolete (8:13).

The New Covenant Scriptures deal with real human problems, and the letters that comprise these sacred writings are ideally constructed to solve those problems. The emphasis in each is different, and often one can determine the purpose of a letter by a word or phrase that recurs frequently. A good example is the letter to the Ephesians. It begins by defining the purpose, will, and pleasure of God, which is to unite all things in Heaven and earth together in one, even Christ (Ephesians 1:10). The word "together" is a key word throughout the letter. Since the letter to the Hebrews was intended to keep those who received it from relapsing into Judaism, we are not surprised to see the word "better" occurring over and over.

In the first chapter we are told that Jesus is better than angels (v. 4). This is very important because the Hebrews believed that God engraved the two tablets of stone through the agency of angels, and that angels conveyed the tablets to Moses. Stephen said they had received the law by the disposition of angels (Acts 7:53). Paul said, "It was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Galatians 3:19). The writer strikes at the very heart of his argument when he lays down the premise that Jesus was superior to the very origin of the law. In the second chapter of Hebrews we are told that the message of Christ is better than that conveyed by angels under the first covenant. It is admitted that what the angels spoke was effective. Their message was the message of God, and it was binding. Those who did not pay heed to it paid a penalty for disregarding it. Every transgression and disobedience received prompt and certain punishment. It is reasonable to conclude that, if such were the case under a system proclaimed by inferior beings, there will be no escape from the consequences of disregarding a message proclaimed by the Lord.

In the third chapter we are told that Christ is better than Moses. Moses was the apostle of God to ancient Israel. The word "apostle" refers to one sent on a mission. God called Moses at the burning bush and sent him to deliver His people from bondage. While Moses was the lawgiver, he could not be the high priest. His brother Aaron was accorded that honor. Jesus, however, is both "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession" (v. 1). It is admitted that Moses was faithful in God's house, but his faithfulness was that of a household servant working for another.

On the other hand, Jesus was a Son over His own house. He built His house of living stones, and was therefore deserving of more honor than the house. Just as a son is superior to a servant, so Jesus was to be honored above Moses. It is significant that the writer declares of Jesus, "whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (v. 6). That "confidence" is faith in Jesus. That "hope" is the joyful anticipation based upon that faith. To surrender faith in Jesus, to go back to a life of servitude under Moses, would mean forfeiture of the right to be a part of the house Jesus erected. The faithfulness of Moses is not derogated by the writer. He is simply placed in proper perspective with Jesus.

In the fourth chapter we are told that we have a better rest than that provided by Joshua in Canaan. Moses led the people out of slavery, and Joshua led them into a land that flowed with milk and honey, but there remained a greater rest than that. It is pointed out that God rested from His creative efforts upon the seventh day. He did not resume working. The rest He then began is ceaseless and unbroken. It is unending and perpetual. This rest has been promised to the people of God.

The Seventh Day Adventists, preoccupied with the law given through Moses in order to validate their special observation of the seventh day of the week, are mistaken about the "rest" we are promised. It is not the seventh day of the week, but the rest that God began on that day into which we may enter. When we enter into that rest, we will not work creatively again. Our work will be ended, just as God ended His work: "For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his" (v. 10). The admonition that follows is especially appropriate: "Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest."

In the fifth chapter we are told that Christ has a better priesthood than that under the law. The high priest under the first covenant was not self-appointed. God called Aaron to his office. In the same way, Christ was ordained by divine decree. The distinctiveness of His calling is found in the fact that He was not of the lineage of Aaron. Instead, He was made a priest forever, after the order of Melchizedek. Melchizedek was a unique king and priest, in that he had no earthly successor to office.

In the sixth chapter we are told that we have better promises than those given to Israel. There were two requirements of those who would receive the promises of old: faith and patience. The Hebrews were told in the letter that they must exhibit the same qualities. It is said of Abraham, "After he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (v. 15). Encouragement is given us to imitate his conduct as we "lay hold upon the hope set before us" (v. 18).

Faith is tested when that which is expected is deferred. Impatience erodes away trust and eats like a cancer at our confidence. It caused Israel to murmur and complain against God. In spite of all the tremendous demonstrations of power in their behalf they reproached God, and many of them died in the wilderness. The superiority of the promises accorded to us should develop in our hearts a spirit that never succumbs to defeat.

In the seventh chapter we are told that Christ is better than Aaron. The reasoning employed here is superb. It is summed up in the conclusion that the descendants of Levi "became priests by the law of a carnal commandment." That is, there was nothing in the law that could convey life. The priesthood was subject to constant change by virtue of the death of the priests. The priests were not perfect. They were subject to frailty as much as those for whom they ministered. Even the high priest had to offer a sacrifice for his own sins (9:7).

The priesthood of Jesus is different. He is not a priest after the order of Levi, but of Melchizedek. The priesthood of Levi was changeable. That of Melchizedek was unchangeable. The priesthood of Levi was inaugurated without an oath. That of Christ has been validated by the oath of God, which makes it perpetual. The writer says that Jesus is a priest "after the power of an endless life" (v. 16). Further, "The law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated for evermore" (v. 28).

In the eighth chapter we are told that in Christ we have a better covenant. All relationship with God is upon a covenantal basis. God revealed himself as a covenant-making God. Why He did so is a divine mystery. By human rationalization it seems incredible that the one who is sinless in the absolute would choose to be associated in such a manner with sinful man. But God made covenants with Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and with the nation of Israel. All of those covenants are beggared in scope and nature by the one with which God entered into agreement with us.

The writer tells of Moses, who was called up into Mount Sinai and shown a replica of the tabernacle, which was to be built by human hands out of natural materials. He immediately contrasts the order given to Moses under the first covenant with the ministration of Christ, which is termed "more excellent." Jesus is the mediator of the new covenant, as Moses was of the old covenant, so the covenant we now have is founded upon "better promises."

In the ninth chapter we are told that followers of Jesus have a better sacrifice. Under the first covenant, on the day of atonement the high priest went into the Holy of Holies. No other person ever was allowed access to this place of thick darkness behind the veil, where stood the ark of the covenant with the mercy seat. Because the high priest was human, he had to carry animal blood to sprinkle upon the mercy seat to make an atonement. Only the high priest could penetrate the veil, and then only once annually. The writer of Hebrews declares that this proves that the way into the holiest precinct, where the presence of God was apparent, was not made known as long as the covenant was in effect. He virtually exhausts the vocabulary to demonstrate the inferiority of the legalistic system of old. It was limited as to nature and duration, being only "a figure for the time then present." It was limited as to effect, since its gifts and sacrifices "could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience." It was involved only with meats, drinks, varied ceremonial cleansings, and ordinances of the flesh, which had been imposed on them "until the time of reformation."

The time of the glorious change was ushered in when Christ arrived as a high priest of good things to come. His was a greater and more perfect tabernacle. It was of divine construction, not made with hands. Jesus did not enter the Holy of Holies with the blood of inferior animals, but by His own blood. As a result He obtained eternal redemption for us. His atonement was once for all. It was once for all time and once for all people. Our sacrifice is as superior as the immaculate Son of God is superior to bulls and goats.

In the tenth chapter we are told that Christ's followers have a better hope. This is important, because when man is hopeless he becomes helpless and miserable. Sometimes he becomes dangerous to himself and to others. The law was inadequate as a shadowy portent of good things to come. It required an endless cycle of animal sacrifices. In spite of the repetitious routine of blood-letting, it could never purge the conscience of sin. The impossibility of cleansing from sin by the blood of inferior animals was continually illustrated.

The coming of Jesus made possible our sanctification through the offering of His body. He offered one sacrifice for sins forever, and then assumed His position of authority at the right hand of God. His absolute conquest of sin and subsequent glorification made it possible for us to have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (v. 19). Because He is our high priest over the house of God, we can draw near to Him and worship with a true heart, in full assurance of our faith.

Our hearts have been sprinkled from an evil conscience by His blood. Our bodies have been washed in water at baptism. We are able to hold fast the profession of our faith without doubting. All of this is because He is faithful who promised. We can count on God. He is not going to forget or renege. "For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise" (v. 36).

In the eleventh chapter we are told that new believers have a better system of faith. This is a magnificent chapter, with its roll call of the faithful, beginning with Abel, and ceasing only because the writer ran out of time (v. 32). Faith is a firm conviction relative to hope— for things. It is a firm confidence relative to things not seen as yet. Faith enabled Abel to offer a proper sacrifice, Enoch to escape death, and Noah to construct the ark. It prompted Abraham to become a nomad in a foreign land while "he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

I never read this chapter without feeling the cadence of marching feet, the tread of patriarchs coming out of the gray mists of the past, and facing the sunrise of the ages. Tramp, tramp, tramp— Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Gideon, Barak, Jephthah, Samson— all strangers and pilgrims on the earth. They were but a handful of the mighty host of conquerors "of whom the world was not worthy."

There is a grave danger, however, that we will misunderstand the reason for the insertion of this chapter. It is easy for us to slip into the error of thinking that this marvelous catalog of worthies has been included to show us how dependent we are upon them. The exact opposite is the case. The last two verses in the chapter are the clue. "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (vv. 39, 40).

Their faith in God led them to stunning victories. They subdued kingdoms, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, and accomplished other great feats. All of these things took place before the "Word was made flesh" to dwell among us. Now that Jesus has been here to visit personally and has returned to glory, we realize that even death holds no fear or terror. The ancients looked forward to the "golden age" which is now ours. Something better has been bestowed upon us who live in this final age before the great culmination. What is ours is the crown upon all the promises ever made. Without us, even Abraham, the father of the faithful, never would be able to attain the ultimate. Jesus is the answer to every question, the solution to every problem, the fulfillment of every dream and the revelation of God. He is the keystone that locks the arch of faith together. One leg of that arch embraces the faith of yesterday. The other embraces the faith of today. Jesus locks the old and the new together in an unbreakable unity.

In the twelfth chapter we are reminded that children of the King have a better kingdom. We are surrounded by an immense crowd of spectators, looking down upon us from the tiers of seats in the stadium of history. In view of this, we are obligated to make a creditable showing in the race in which we have enrolled. This means discarding the weights that were fastened to our ankles in the training sessions. It means throwing off the cloak of doubt that enshrouded us before coming on the track. It means running with dogged persistence the race before us, keeping our eyes fastened upon Jesus, the former winner who now waits on the throne at the end of the course.

The chapter includes some exhortations and warnings vital to our lives if we would be victorious. It should be read often by those who suffer depression because they feel their lot in life is too heavy to bear. Those who become discouraged because of external conditions, which they regard as the rod of the Lord, will gain a great deal of comfort from what is said about the love of the Lord for those whom He chastens. They are His legitimate children. Punishment is proof of parenthood.

For me, the climax of the whole letter is reached in the great contrast between the events that happened at Mount Sinai in the desert, and at Mount Sion, the dwelling place of God. Israel in the flesh came to the mountain, and they were forbidden to even touch it, under penalty of death. The mountain burned with livid flame, but still was an envelope of darkness. A tempest howled about the people with tornadic force. In the midst of the storm a trumpet sounded loud and clear from the summit of the peak. An awesome voice began intoning, "I am the Lord which brought you out of Egypt, and out of the land of slavery." As the sound echoed among the rocky crags, the terror-stricken people cringed and pleaded that the words cease, because they could not stand them. They were trembling, frightened by the edict that even if a stray beast touched the mountain it would be stoned to death or have a dart thrust through its body. Even Moses later declared that the sight was so terrifying that he literally shook with fear.

In contrast to this picture of alarm, we are come to Mount Sion, the lofty, spiritual eminence, crowned with the city of the living God. This is the "new Jerusalem" described in the glorious imagery of Revelation 21. We have come to an innumerable company of angels, a host of celestial messengers that cannot be counted by man. John declared there were ten thousand times ten thousand, and myriads of myriads (Revelation 5:11). We have come to the general assembly and congregation of the firstborn ones whose names are enrolled in Heaven. We have come to God who is the judge of the universe.

We have come to the spirits of men who were justified and are now perfected. We have come to Jesus, who is the mediator of the new covenant. We have come to the blood sprinkled upon our hearts, which speaks of forgiveness of our sins. It is better than the blood of Abel, which cried out from the earth for avenging. We have received a kingdom that cannot be shaken. No convulsion of the earth, no catastrophe of the elements will move it. It is unshakable and secure. This is the ground of our hope amidst the towering wrecks of time.

In the thirteenth chapter we are told that we have a better altar. The first part of the chapter suggests our responsibilities as citizens in the unshakable kingdom. Briefly summarized, they are as follows: Verse 1: Our obligation to fellow citizens. Verse 2: Proper treatment toward strangers. Verse 3: Our duty toward the unfortunate. Verse 4: Right and wrong use of sex. Verse 5: The life of contentment and unselfishness. Without going into a detailed study, we note that "we have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" (v. 10). The altar was the center of the system revealed to Moses at Sinai. Atonement for sin was made at the altar. It was there that the blood of an innocent victim was poured out in the presence of God. We have an altar superior to the one made of acacia wood and overlayed with brass. Those who serve at such an altar, trusting in the blood of bulls and goats, have no right to share in the blessings of the altar where our sacrifice was made.

The cross of Jesus is central to the faith. It was there that the sanctifying blood was poured out. One who denies the reality of the cross has no right to its sustaining power. To deny Jesus and return to an inferior system is to invalidate the very purpose and goal toward which all animal sacrifices pointed. It is to love the shadow while rejecting the substance. It is to treasure the negative while refusing to look at the developed picture. It is to choose the fragmentary in preference to the perfect.

The Power of the Son

Contents

The letter to the Hebrews is unique in many ways. It appears to be more a treatise than a letter. This is evident with the opening sentence, which covers four verses in the Authorized Version. There is no customary greeting, "Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." Instead, the writer begins with the word "God," and immediately states his proposition.

God is not silent. He is not dumb as were the gods made by men's hands. He is communicative. God has spoken. This fact is startling in its implications. If God has spoken from Heaven, man on earth must listen. It is unthinkable that a mortal would ignore a message from God. So Isaiah prefaces his disclosure of the words of God with the admonition, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken" (1:2).

God has spoken in history, and His revelation has been made in two ages: "in time past" and "in these last days." The former refers to the whole period from the coming of man upon the earth to the coming of the Son of man to the earth. The "last days" designate the final age of God's dealing with man on earth. There will be no additional revelation until "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thessalonians 1:7, 8).

God has spoken to two classes of people, the fathers and ourselves. He has spoken through two kinds of agents, the prophets and His Son. The message in time past was presented in many parts and in many ways. Various means were employed to convey the divine instruction to the prophets. Various means were used to pass it on to the people. God used dreams, visions, angelic appearances, and natural phenomena to speak to the prophets. They in turn used not only direct communication, but all kinds of object lessons and dramatizations to portray what they had received from God.

The greatest revelation was reserved for the last age of mankind upon the earth. God had spoken to man by His Son. Jesus is the living Word. He is the very power through which all creation was spoken into existence. That Word "was made flesh, and dwelt among us." Men were thus able to see the glory of God manifested in a personality before their very eyes. The word of the Lord came to the prophets so they could speak of the Lord of the Word, or, of the Word who became Lord.

The Son is superior to the prophets. He is superior to the angels who appeared to the prophets. He is superior to the angels who delivered the tablets of stone to Moses upon Sinai. To turn one's back upon Jesus, and revert to the regime of the law, constitutes a spurning of the superior for the inferior. It is as if a mature person suddenly regressed into his former childhood state, babbling and prattling, and playing again with the toys he once discarded. Such a person in the physical realm is an object of pity. It is no sin to be a child, but it is a tragedy to remain one or to revert to childhood.

The superiority of Jesus over prophets and angels is demonstrated in seven declarations as to His power. No other intelligent being in the universe can qualify in these respects. The fact that God has spoken to us through one so dynamic is sufficient to demand the absolute attention of all who are aware of it. These seven power-packed attributes of the Son are a means of strengthening our trust in Him to the glory of God. Perhaps these seven are mentioned because the number signified completeness, or perfection, to the Hebrews.

1. The Son has been appointed heir of all things. Three truths are apparent in this brief statement: the Son is an heir, the inheritance is universal, and the heritage is by appointment. This is an affirmation of the power of divine relationship. In Romans 8:16 the apostle declares that the Holy Spirit bears witness with our own spirits that we are children of God. He then reasons, "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ" (v. 17). We are all sons of God, but Jesus is the Son of God in a unique way, and universal heirdom is based upon that sonship.

There is, of course, one great difference between the way we become heirs of our earthly parents and the way Jesus is an heir of God. We inherit the possessions of a father upon his decease. We are made heirs by his death. This is not true in the case of Jesus. He is not the successor of His Father. The original word rendered, "heir" may have three connotations. It sometimes meant one who acquired something by casting lots. It was also used as we employ it today, to designate one who received his father's goods upon the death of the parent. But it was also used to describe one who was the possessor of anything appointed to him by another; that is, one who was a master or ruler over such an appointed possession.

Jesus said, "All things that the Father hath are mine" (John 16:15). To be a joint-heir with Christ means that the riches of God are available to me through Jesus. No prophet who preceded Jesus could claim to be heir of all things. The era of the prophets was an age of greatness, as men spoke when motivated by the Holy Spirit. But that Spirit now lives with us and in us, and we share in the patrimony of the Father because our Lord is the universal heir.

2. The Son is the one by whom the worlds were made. This is the language of creative power. The Son was the divine agent in bringing about the creation. He was the instrumental cause employed by God. This is but one of several passages affirming this truth. John wrote, "All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made" (1:3).

The real purpose of the writer to the Hebrews was to demonstrate the surpassing dignity and power of Jesus. By affirming that the Son existed before all else, and was the agent through whom all else was brought into existence, he makes the worship of angels and other created beings an inferior system of praise. Any creator must exist before the creation and be superior to his creation. God's creation is the result of causes, and the prime cause is the divine intelligence. The implementary cause is the Word of God, which became flesh and lived among us as the only begotten Son. Every result must proceed from a cause, and the cause must be adequate to produce that result. That cause also must exist before the result, and the result must proceed from it. The power to produce a universe must be a universal power, and must be available before the universe itself.

3. The Son is the brightness of God's glory. This signifies reflecting power, as we shall see by the study of the terms used. The word "glory" is an interesting one for the researchist in the development of language. It is a translation of doxa, from which our familiar "Doxology" is derived. Basically it meant "an appearance, a manifestation." From this it came to mean "honor," "praise," or "applause." This is the appropriate recognition given by one in whom reverence or adoration is aroused. Later derivations were "glory" or "splendor," signifying the state or condition inspiring or demanding praise.

The meaning graduated to a significance relating to brightness, or dazzling light, and finally to the perfection characteristic of God. The ancient writers, poets, and prophets used it to signify divine perfection in the moral order, like the sun in the physical universe. As one could not gaze with the naked eye full into the face of the sun without being blinded, so he could not stare directly into the face of God and live. Isaiah saw this glory as the "train of the Lord," which filled the temple (6:1). Ezekiel saw it as "a fire infolding itself, and brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the color of amber, out of the midst of the fire." He said, "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord" (1:4, 28).

The Son is that brightness of God's glory. His disciple John described the new Jerusalem thus: "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof" (Revelation 21:23). All the splendor, majesty, beauty, and perfection associated with God are to be found in Christ. The word rendered "brightness" occurs nowhere else in the sacred Scriptures. It is therefore limited to the Son of God.

The word literally means "reflected splendor," the dazzling brilliance reflected by a luminous planet. This aptly describes the role of the Son. The rays of the sun in its meridian reflect the brightness of the heavenly body, so that one actually sees the rays rather than the sun. Likewise, as one looks at Jesus he sees in Him the manifestation of the glory of God, which is the light of the spiritual universe. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men" (John 1:4). We need to ponder a long time on the life that is light, the light of God reflected in a world of sin, which could neither overcome nor distort it.

4. The Son was the express image of God. This relates to divine power. The word "image" is from another original, which occurs nowhere else in the New Covenant Scriptures. In its inception, it was the word designating a graving tool, and so it came to refer to something that was engraved or stamped out by a die. The Greeks employed it to designate the image or superscription of the emperor upon coins. It was also used of the impression made by a seal pressed into soft wax upon an official document.

It was translated into English as "character." As such it was applied to letters, numerals, or other marks or signs stamped upon articles for the purpose of identification. The simplest way to illustrate it is by the use of a rubber stamp. When such a stamp is pressed down upon an ink pad and then transferred to a sheet of paper, the image is the exact replica of that on the stamp. So Jesus is the "image of the invisible God" (Colossians 1:15). While we cannot see God, we know exactly what He is like from His "express image" manifested in the Son. As you can look at the imprint of a seal and see exactly what is on the die, so you can look at Jesus and see the revelation of God.

5. The Son upholds all things by the word of His power. This is a description of sustaining power. There is a difference between this and creative power. It is one thing to design and manufacture an automobile and start it. It is a wholly different matter to keep it in running order until it has served its time. All things were created by the power of God's word, and all things are maintained by the word of God's power.

We speak of "laws of nature," but there is no tangible proof that there are such laws. The expression represents our human way of trying to account for the regularity and consistency within our earthly existence. We set our watches by it, and project men to the surface of the moon because of it. The rotation of the earth, the march of the seasons, and the revolution of the planets, all of these force us to conjecture that the Master Designer who first pulled the switch to set the universe in motion also has to have computerized laws by which to maintain it.

I suspect that which we are seeing is the unvarying application of the word of divine power, so that the functioning of the intricate balance is a constant testimony to us of His existence. It is not so much that He set up a code of laws called "nature." Rather, what we call nature is simply God touching His own creation, which responds to that touch, even as it came into existence through it. In our feeble attempt to account for it all, we invent terms and devise and publish scientific explanations. All of this is the human attempt to grasp something that inevitably escapes our grasp. It is beyond us. It comforts me to realize that the universe always is in God's hands, and that as a part of it I am also in His hands. I need not explain a snowflake to appreciate its beauty.

6. The Son purged our sins by himself. This is a description of cleansing power. For many centuries man has used soaps and solvents to purify and whiten. Even the prophets of old mention "fuller's soap," and a fuller was a bleacher of cloth. It is an unfortunate thing, however, that the very detergents we use become pollutants. Streams are covered with foamy suds because detergents were flushed into them from the sewer lines of a great city. Fish die and vegetation turns yellow and withers. In an attempt at sanitation, we become unsanitary. In a desire to destroy germs, we destroy life.

The master defiler of the ages is sin. Directly or indirectly, sin is the cause of all defilement in the universe. Man has no way of freeing himself from sin. He cannot undo a single act he has ever committed. He is helpless in the grip of his carnal nature, like one caught in quicksand. His very struggle to extricate himself drives him more deeply into the sucking mass. He has to be freed by one from the outside. He cannot save himself. He must have a Savior.

Blood is the only "detergent" that can cleanse or purge man from sin, and Jesus provided this cleansing himself. The expression with which we are concerned could mean one of two things. It could mean that Jesus purged our sins without the aid of another. The inference is that He had no assistance but acted alone. The statement could also mean that Jesus purged our sins by sacrificing himself. He did not employ the blood of bulls, goats, or any other substitute. This is probably what is meant. In Hebrews 8:27 it is made clear that as a high priest Jesus did not need to offer a daily sacrifice for sin, because He did it once for all when He offered up himself.

Whatever the meaning, one thing is certain. What we could not do for ourselves Jesus did for us. No man can purify himself, but Jesus purged the sins of all men. He was God's redeeming agent and we are the redeemed, purified and made fit for the Master's use. The cross lifted the curse, the blood bathed away the baseness, and grace gave us gladness in the divine presence.

7. The Son sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high. This is the language of ruling power, of universal authority. The right hand always signifies the position of special authority. Thus Jesus said to Caiaphas, the high priest, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matthew 26:64). Paul wrote that God raised Jesus from the dead and set Him at His own right hand in "the heavenly places," where He is above all principality and power, might and dominion (Ephesians 1:20, 21). Peter, who witnessed the Lord's ascension, substantiates this with the assertion that Christ has gone "into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him" (1 Peter 3:22). Jesus uses His position in a special way for those who are His servants. "Who is he that condemneth? it is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us" (Romans 8:34). This shows that Jesus still labors in our behalf. He is our intercessor at God's right hand.

At the risk of being boresome by repetition, let me once more remind you that the writer has a purpose in outlining these special powers accruing to Jesus by virtue of His nature and character. He is demonstrating that to reject Jesus, and return to the powerless and legalistic framework of Judaism, is to degenerate. It is to substitute the worse for the better, the least for the greater, the weaker for the stronger. It is to return to the degradation of bondage after having been set free by the grace of God.

Jesus possesses the power of divine relationship, creative power, reflecting power, divine power, sustaining power, cleansing power, and ruling power. He is both the center and the circumference of the moral universe. Anything that does not proceed from Him has no validity; anything that does not draw men to Him has no veracity. He is either Lord of all in our lives, or He is Lord of nothing at all! One cannot manipulate Him who is all in all!

Better Than Angels

Contents

It is interesting that, after the writer points out the superiority of Jesus over the prophets, he turns at once to prove that He was even better than angels. The word "angel" also means "messenger," but the angels are celestial beings, not subject to human limitations. There are seven reasons assigned to prove that Jesus is better than the angels, and the question naturally arises as to why the writer spends so much time and effort upon the matter. Why did he not merely state it as a fact and proceed with his theme?

The answer can be found in the attitude of the Hebrews toward angels at the time. Because of that attitude, nothing could be more important than to show that the Son was superior to these heavenly messengers. It was believed that there were millions of angels surrounding the throne of God. All of these were ready to do divine bidding in a moment. They went forth from the throne and returned to it like flashes of light. They were regarded as intermediaries between Heaven and earth. Anything that affected the world of mankind was directed by angels.

An angel supervised the seasons, regulating the coming of spring and winter. Another had charge of the sea and its waves. Another ruled over the trees, granting or withholding fruits according to whether or not the populace was deserving. There were angels of rain, hail, thunder, lightnings and earthquakes.

What the Jews had done, of course, was to take the ancestral record of appearances by angels and elaborate upon them, until they had worked out an intricate system through speculation. This had been handed down from one generation to another until it had been accepted with confidence and unquestioning submission. It is interesting that the writer to the Hebrews did not take time to correct all of the errors. That was not the author's purpose in writing, and he adhered steadfastly to his purpose.

The Jews believed the angels were intermediaries between God and men. They were celestial bridges across the chasm between divine and human. This is why the Jews readily accepted the idea that the law was given by the disposition of angels (Acts 7:53; Galatians 3:19). Since that law was the covenant engraved upon stones, it was surmised that God was too majestic and glorious to contact the hands of a man directly, even when that man was Moses. It was believed that had He done so, Moses would have died upon the spot because of the magnitude of the glory He would have faced. Angels were employed to give him the tablets of stone. Even then his face glistened with such brilliance that he had to cover it so the Israelites could look at him.

If it could be proven that there was one superior to angels, one who was personally "the covenant" of God, this would forever establish the supremacy of that one. To reject Him and return to a system inaugurated by angels would be the height of folly. Angels merely carried the words of God. Jesus was the Word of God. Angels bore two tablets of stone hewn out of a mountain. The Word had spoken the very mountain into existence. Angels conveyed the law to man. Jesus fulfilled that law as a man. Seven proofs of the superiority of Jesus over angels are given. As we note these arguments, let us investigate them through the Hebrews' eyes, as far as possible.

1. A name. By inheritance, Jesus has obtained a more excellent name than the angels (1:4, 5). The context shows that the name referred to is Son of God: "For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?" The word "inheritance" employed in verse 4 has to do with rank or place, and it is because of His superior position in the universe that Jesus is recognized by the Father as "my Son." We use the word "name" as a person's designation, but here it implies much more. Involved in a name are all of the characteristics, attributes, and functions that are associated with the person who is receiving the designation.

It is true that angels were called "sons of God," and saints are also said to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. "My Son," however, belongs to only one person in the universe. It is His in a particular and peculiar sense, and it exalts Him to a rank and dignity above that of all created beings, whether in Heaven or on earth.

2. An exalted position. Jesus has, by divine decree, a position of worship from angels (v. 6). Nothing demonstrates the exalted state of the Son more than that the angels have been placed under a divine fiat to bow the knee, or prostrate themselves, before Jesus as their sovereign. The expression of adoration and the recognition of reverence demonstrate the subjection of the angels, while proving the superior dignity of the Son. The lesser worships the greater.

3. A throne. The Son occupies a throne that is forever and ever (v. 8). Angels are spirits, serving the bidding of the monarch of the universe. The throne is the symbol of rule. It indicates a reign over a dominion. In this case the dominion includes the whole created spectrum of which the angels are a part.

4. A scepter. The Son wields a scepter of righteousness (v. 8). A scepter was generally a rod or wand held in the hand of a king while administering the affairs of government. It was a badge of authority and a visible symbol of the power vested in the one who held it. With the scepter the king could bestow honor upon worthy subjects by touching them with it. By a simple gesture with it he could decree the death of those who had disgraced themselves or offended his dignity. It was an instrument of life and death.

Angels have no such power. They may carry out the wishes of Him who wields the scepter, but may not impose their will in opposition to His will. The scepter of Jesus is one of absolute authority. Even the angels are subject to the power of Jesus.

5. A superior anointing. The Son has been anointed with the oil of gladness above His companions (v. 9). Under the Old Covenant, the prophets, priests, and kings were anointed as a ceremony of induction into office. Oil was poured upon the head as a public certification that the one so anointed was given full power to carry out a special function. The "oil of gladness" is an allusion to the perfumed oil that was used in the inauguration ceremony. It is a symbol of the joy and exultation of the universe at the consecration and coronation of the Son.

There are many and varied views as to the identity of the "fellows" associated with Him. Because of the whole tenor of the reasoning, however, I conclude that it refers to the angels. Certainly there is no question that they were His associates in Heaven, and superior anointing would indicate a function above or beyond their own. While some expositors conjecture that the passage means the Son was given a superior anointing to other kings, the term "oil of gladness" indicates to me an anointing above that of other celestial beings as well.

6. A special place. The Son is to sit at the right hand of God until His enemies are all conquered (v. 13). The question is raised as to when God ever invited an angel to occupy the place at His right hand until all of his enemies were subdued. No angel was ever accorded such an honor or position of preferment. Jesus will rule until the final enemy is dethroned and destroyed, and the last such enemy to be vanquished is death.

7. Service of angels. The angels are simply ministering spirits sent forth to serve the heirs of salvation (v. 14). Although we are in the flesh, the angels have been assigned to serve our needs, and to carry out the will of God in our behalf. It is possible that they do much more for us than we realize, and a great deal that we may credit to other agencies. One who denies that angels assist in his life thereby denies that he is an heir of salvation. But the point the writer is making here is that the Son is seated at God's right hand receiving all homage, while angels are busy in the universe as servants and assistants to human beings.

"THEREFORE— "

All of this has been said leading up to the opening sentence of the next chapter. While a division into chapters and verses may serve as a convenience in locating a statement or passage, it may also act as an impediment to understanding the thought. The first word of the second chapter is "therefore." This is the clue to tell us that what follows is a conclusion based on the previous reasoning. The writer has produced seven reasons why Jesus is better than angels. He now deduces that we need to pay more careful attention to what we have heard from Jesus than did those who received the message of angels.

He does not depreciate what angels spoke. Indeed, he declares that it was so authoritative that every violation or deviation was properly punished. His point is clear. If God would not tolerate disregard for the message of angels, who act as mere servants of transmission, He surely will not permit us to slight, ignore, or neglect the great salvation that was first announced by the Lord himself. Let us read the admonition and warning: "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip" (2:1).

Apparently this is intended to point up a great danger. Merely hearing or receiving the things God has revealed is not enough. We must heed them and diligently attend to them. If we do not, we may let them slip. What does this mean? To me, it is one of the most intriguing terms I have ever studied. The original word means "to flow by" "to run as a stream," "to slip away," "to glide past." Let me tell you about some of the interesting usages of the word in the days of the apostles.

Your center reference reads "to run out like leaky vessels." I know what that means. I grew up on a farm where we had to carry water from a spring. The house was on top of a hill, and the spring was at the foot. As a lad I always wondered why they could not be reversed. I do not recall that we ever had a bucket without a hole in the bottom. We generally plugged the hole with a rag, but when we filled the bucket the rag came out, and it was a race to get back up the hill and in the house before the water ran out.

Something like this happens with the truths we have heard from God's revelation. We do not need to make an effort to erase them from memory. All it takes is to neglect them, and soon we find that "our skimmer is leaking." Not long ago I met a man who had been a Bible Bowl winner a few years ago. He won contests for his memory of Bible facts, but now he hardly remembers a thing he once knew. It had run out as from a leaky vessel. It is to avoid such a disastrous consequence that we should give the more earnest attention to the gospel truths we have heard.

The Greeks used the original word for "slip" to describe many things. If a woman was washing dishes or clothes, and her ring slipped from her finger, this word was used to describe what happened. It was also used when a particle of food "slipped" into the esophagus in the act of swallowing. Neither of these was the result of a purposeful action. We do not plan to forget the Word of God. We do not chart a course of forgetfulness. We do not deliberately erase truths that have been inscribed upon the blackboard of consciousness. They simply fade away, or slip into the limbo of forgetfulness because of neglect.

But there is another usage of the word. I want to mention this because it may well have been the very thought intended by the writer. It was employed to describe what happened when a ship was carried by the current past the wharf and out to sea, or when such a vessel slipped its hawser and was carried by the wind away from the harbor without the captain's being aware of it. One factor that makes this explanation appealing is that the word translated "more earnest heed" also had a maritime significance. It was used to describe tying a ship securely to the dock. Perhaps the writer is saying that we need to be certain that we are properly tied and anchored, so we will not allow ourselves to be swept away and out into the spiritual deep through carelessness and indifference.

This is one of our greatest problems! There are not many of us who become involved in what the world regards as grave sins. Many of us merely forget to feed our spirits. The inner man fails because of malnutrition. The Hebrews were defecting from the faith because of lack of patience. They did not have the strength to hold on. For this reason they were exhorted to "hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end" (3:14). Because of this they were told to be careful, to follow the example of those who inherit the promise through faith and patience (6:12).

In view of the purpose of the letter to the Hebrews, I would like to suggest four essentials in obeying that charge. These commend themselves as being worthy of our attention, if we would preserve our conviction and "lay hold upon the hope set before us" (6:18). Since this letter of warning and encouragement was intended to stimulate constancy among the Hebrews, it seems appropriate to draw from its depths those things we need to emphasize.

1. The word preached must be mixed with faith. The writer specifically says, "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it" (4:2). My faith must be limited only by the testimony of the gospel. I cannot be selective with God's revelation. I cannot choose to believe what seems reasonable and reject what I cannot validate by my own rational powers. As a human being my mind is not always accurate in its deductions. If I am persuaded that a thing declared by the Spirit is a fact or a truth (and there is a difference), I am obligated to accept it in faith. If I do not, my problem is not with the declaration, but with my concept of God.

The ancients heard the word of God, but it produced no profit because they did not match it with faith. The Word is divine. There is no weakness in it. It is thoroughly adapted to accomplish the divine pleasure. But not until the thing proclaimed or the thing heard is believed will it profit us. The Word must become our flesh. It must be translated into personal conviction and acceptance. One may starve to death in the presence of food. Not the food served, but the food eaten and assimilated, maintains life.

2. We must come boldly to the throne of grace. This is essential for one to "find grace to help in time of need" (4:16). Many of us are still living under the spirit of the written code given at Sinai. We are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world. We have allowed ourselves to think a great chasm separates us from our High Priest, while no such chasm exists, He is near to us. He does not separate himself from us by the dignity of His office. He is not a sacerdotal specialist who alone can enter precincts that are off limits to the rest of us. He is not aloof!

Our High Priest is not cold and calculating. You do not have to write Him for an appointment. You do not have to ring the bell, and wait for the secretary to admit you. Actually, He is the door! The writer tells us He can be touched with the feeling of our weakness. He understands the temptation syndrome because He was in all points tempted just as we are. He did not give up, give out, or give in. He was without sin!

It is upon this basis we are invited, and even urged, not only to come to the throne of grace, but to come boldly. We do not need to come cringing, as though expecting a blow. We do not need to come with reticence, as if expecting a rebuke. The very fact that the throne is one of grace should encourage us. The very word means "undeserved kindness," so we need not be concerned as to whether or not we are worthy. We can assume that we are not, but it is precisely for such persons as ourselves that the throne is designed. We furnish the need. He furnishes the grace to help, and no need can be greater than His grace.

3. We must exhort one another daily. There is little hope that any of us will make it alone. When a single coal of fire pops out of the fireplace, it glows brightly for a few minutes on the hearth, then turns into gray ash. God drew the called-out ones into a fellowship, not for His benefit, but for ours. We stimulate and inspire one another. The word "exhort" means to encourage another to do what he already knows is right. Sometimes it becomes a little difficult to hold on. It seems as if it would be easier to simply let go and fall away.

We are to exhort each other daily because of the "deceitfulness of sin" (3:13). The word "deceit" means "mirage," which leads one on, promising something it cannot deliver. It may appear as an imaginary oasis in the desert, leading a weary and famishing traveler on to his death. Others may be able to see when we are following a will-o-the-wisp, a figment of the imagination, and they can direct us back to the path of reality. Note that we are to exhort one another. This is an expression for mutual sharing. It is not a one-way street. We should encourage each other, and we should do it daily. When we meet on the street, or in a place of business, we should not take leave of one another without speaking a word of comfort and strength. By such a means we can help each other to give more earnest heed to the things we have heard.

4. We must cultivate a spirit of diligence. This enables us to place all of life in a proper frame of reference. Suffering will not overcome us but will be recognized as a constructive tool to develop obedience. We will realize that even Jesus, "though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered" (5:8). Instead of becoming depressed by suffering, we will seek to know what facet of obedience we need to learn. Thus suffering becomes a learning experience, not a damaging or destructive force.

We will not be inclined to lapse into slothfulness. We will remain alert, not become apathetic. The instructions given to the Hebrews, as they faced the temptation to conform to the social culture about them, are as relevant today as the editorials in the morning newspaper. For the child of God, they are even more relevant!

Signs of an Apostle

Contents

Every careful student of the sacred Scriptures soon becomes aware that, from ancient times, God has made use of men to convey His will to humanity. In His revelation to Isaiah God said, "Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen" (8:1). The revelation was to be recorded in the language used by men in preparing human documents. It was to be preserved in a scroll according to the custom of the day. Of the gospel Paul declares that we "have this treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Corinthians 4:7).

So unvarying was the practice that the prophet Amos affirms, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets" (3:7). Amos was tending a herd of livestock when he was called to go to a foreign province and cry out against sin.

The Hebrew word generally translated "prophet" is nabi. It means "to bubble up." The divine message became effervescent in the heart of the prophet. He had to declare it, regardless of personal consequences. Sometimes the word nataph was employed. This means "to drop." In our generation, we are aware of the power of radio stations to direct their signals and to channel their broadcasts to certain points of the compass. God also employed such controlled broadcasting, using the prophets as His antennae. Ezekiel said the word of the Lord came to him, and his "program instructions" were, "Set thy face toward the south, and drop thy word toward the south" (20:46).

Spoken through the prophets, the word of God was authoritative. It demanded the attention and compliance, not because of its transmitters, but because of its Originator. The heavens were summoned to hear, and the earth to listen, because the Lord had spoken (Isaiah 1:2). Jeremiah uses the word "hearken" about forty times. Most of these are in condemnation of those who were stubborn and rebellious, refusing the counsel of the Lord. While Isaiah uses the word "obey" only once, Jeremiah uses it twenty-nine times. More than half of these are negative, such as, "Ye have not obeyed my voice, saith the Lord."

The writer to the Hebrews affirms that the word conveyed by messengers before the coming of Christ was stedfast. He uses the word three times in his letter, and every time it refers to something firm, sure, or solid. It is used to describe the revelation of God (2:2), the nature of our faith (3:14), and the hope we have as an anchor (6:19). The revelation given through angels and prophets was not to be taken lightly by those to whom it was addressed: "Every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward." To transgress was to go beyond the revelation. To disobey was to fall short because of inattention or unconcern. Either type of failure was punished by just retribution.

SALVATION

God's message spoken in "these last days" is summed up in the expression "great salvation." The Hebrews, to whom the letter was written, were accustomed to the word. The concept was expressed in their own word yasha, which was translated either "Joshua" or "Jesus." In their Scriptures it was used to denote various meanings, such as saved, helped, preserved, rescued, defended, and delivered.

The Lord "saved" Israel out of the hand of the Egyptians (Exodus 14:30). When the soul of David was depressed and frustrated, he praised God for His "help" (Psalm 42:5). The Lord "preserved" David wherever he went (2 Samuel 8:6). All these are renderings of the same word, which is also translated "rescue" one time, and "deliver" eleven times. In spite of all the great deeds done for God's people in the past, they were taught that a greater salvation would be theirs with the coming of the Messiah, the great emancipator.

In a particularly beautiful passage, Isaiah describes it from the standpoint of a city preparing for the coming of a king. The inhabitants issue from the gates to prepare the road leading to the city. They grade and smooth the highway, gathering out the stones that might prove to be impediments, and elevating banners as rallying points. "Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him" (Isaiah 62:11). It is noteworthy that the "salvation" coming is a person. It is He who will reward, and He who will achieve God's mission in the earth.

The writer to the Hebrews affirms that the long-awaited and expected Salvation has arrived. It is identified with the Son of God. Heaven's great "rescue mission" is in operation. The "preservation project" is proceeding on schedule. The "deliverance drive" is going forward. It would be a terrible tragedy for a world to wait centuries for salvation, only to ignore its arrival and "fall away" (Hebrews 6:6).

The gravest danger is neglect. This sin is especially frightening, because it requires no effort, no study, no calculation. In every realm of creation, it corrupts, corrodes, and decays. Neglect to paint a house, and eventually rot sets in, and the building sags down to the ground. Neglect to place expensive machinery in a shed, and rust will someday render it useless. Neglect to service an automobile, and you have unintentionally begun ruining a beautiful piece of equipment.

In the domestic realm, neglect to express love and concern and you will destroy the tie that binds. In the intellectual realm, neglect of study and assignments will produce failure. In the physical realm, neglect of the eyes may cause blindness, neglect of the teeth causes their decay. One need not deliberately commit suicide to die. He can simply neglect taking the medicine prescribed by his doctor. He need not jump from the top ledge of a skyscraper. He can neglect to watch the flow of traffic while crossing a busy street. The man who neglects repairing the gas heater in his home may kill his family as surely as the berserk intruder.

In the moral realm, neglect to reinforce the character by resolution and determination, and the result will be dissolution and degeneration. The word for "neglect" is ameleo, which means "careless." It signifies a state in which one is indifferent or unconcerned. To neglect the great salvation provided for us is to slam the door on our only avenue of escape from destruction. It is to cut off our last hope, and to guarantee our utter loss. One is not being neutral by such neglect, for neglect is a deliberate choice to ignore God's offer of amnesty and deliverance. It is like refusing to sign the document that would make one eligible for pardon and a new life.

The great salvation was first announced by the Lord. John the Baptist was the forerunner who prepared the way of the Lord, but it was the Lord who first made known that the time of deliverance had come. Once when He visited the town of Nazareth, where He lived and worked as a boy, He went into the synagogue on the Sabbath Day, as was His custom. He stood up to participate in the prophetic reading, and the attendant handed Him the scroll of Isaiah. He unrolled it until He came to the lesson for the day, and read: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (Luke 4:18, 19).

Having read the designated portion, He handed the scroll back to the congregational servant who returned it to the ark where the sacred writings were kept. He sat down, and all eyes were turned toward Him as the people waited for any comment upon the reading. He began by saying, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke 4:21). It will be noted that "preach" occurs three times in this one passage. The gospel was to be preached to the poor, deliverance was to be preached to the captives, and the time of acceptance was to be preached to all. Jesus first announced the deliverance that was made possible through His sacrifice. The very fact that the Good News was first released by the Son himself is an argument in favor of the greatness of the deliverance it offered.

The apostles continued announcing the message after the Son returned to glory. They were called and commissioned for this very thing. He told them while He was yet with them, "Ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning" (John 15:27). One of the qualifications of an apostle was to be a constant companion of Jesus from the time of His baptism by John until He was received up into glory (Acts 1:22). During the interval between His resurrection and ascension, He gave them full instructions. They were to be witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria, and to the outer bounds of the known world. Certainly the Hebrews to whom this letter was addressed were exposed to this testimony, and had accepted it as valid.

That there might be no question as to the divine nature of the revelation, God personally intervened by signs and wonders of an undeniably supernatural origin. These were intended to establish the fact that the message carried by these men was not a mere human invention. The Hebrews were aware that, from the time of Moses, God had revealed that by the mouth of two or three witnesses all testimony would be established (Deuteronomy 19:15). Accordingly, the great salvation had a threefold attestation. The Son proclaimed it during His earthly sojourn. The chosen envoys continued to preach it after His return to Heaven. To remove all doubt as to the origin of the message, God confirmed it through miraculous phenomena.

The purpose of the writer in introducing the matter is not at all to discuss the relationship of miracles to the ongoing proclamation of the gospel. He writes of the matter almost casually, and with his one brief statement drops it. His purpose is simply to prove that the great salvation was proclaimed in a way superior to the messages brought previously by prophets and angels. Because of this it should be given more diligent heed. It must be that the Hebrew believers were aware of the signs, wonders, and varied miracles accompanying the apostolic proclamation, because the writer makes no attempt to convince them that they transpired. If they knew nothing about them they would hardly have been introduced as confirmatory proof. A lengthy apology for their reality would have been necessary, which would have amounted to "proving the proof."

Because of this, I could drop the matter here and say no more about it without doing injustice to my purpose. Because of the present universal excitement about miracles and spiritual gifts, however, if I were to do that, you would feel I had cheated you. You would be left wondering what I thought about them. It is gracious of you to permit me to extend this session at length in order to express my views on a subject that is only peripherally related to my theme. I realize that whatever I say will not merit the approval or agreement of all of you, because you share a number of different ideas about the matter. I shall content myself with expressing my thoughts without sitting in judgment upon you, for I love you all.

MIRACLES AND GIFTS

I shall try to limit myself as much as possible to the discussion of supernatural acts as related to the confirmation of the apostolic testimony. I'll not jump on a charismatic horse and ride off in all directions at once. Some of you will be disappointed in this intention, but I prefer to stay as close as I can to the subject I agreed to discuss. Perhaps we should begin by talking a little bit about the relationship of testimony to faith. This is the real reason the subject of supernatural acts as confirmatory evidence is introduced. Faith is the belief of testimony. Where there is no testimony there can be no faith. The ability to believe can no more be exercised where there is no testimony than the ability to see can be exercised where there is no light. It is utterly impossible to believe in one of whom you have never heard. All testimony has to do with facts. It consists of a report or declaration of those things to which the witness has been personally exposed, or of which he has had experience. The revelation of God consists of historical facts, all of them related to the person of Jesus, and what God has done for man through Him. These facts are summed up in the most profound proposition of all ages: that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God.

The gospel is simply the announcement to the world of what God did for man in an historical breakthrough of the flesh curtain. The faith that culminates in a restoration of the divine-human relationship is simply the assent to these facts and the commitment to Jesus as a result of that faith. Man is so constituted by the Creator that he believes only what is rendered credible to him. He cannot believe what appears to be incredible. In order to produce faith, testimony must be confirmed. The fact about which testimony is given is one thing, the testimony about the fact is another, and the confirmation of the testimony is still another. Confirming testimony means to make it believable, that is, to provide the mind with the necessary power or proof to believe.

There are two realms in which intellectual beings or personalities exist. For want of better terms to describe them, we refer to them as the natural and supernatural. The natural mind may receive testimony about facts that originate in either of these realms, but in order to believe them, it must have confirmation to render them credible.

Facts related to ordinary occurrences in the natural realm require only ordinary or natural confirmation. It is judged sufficient to have two or three witnesses, who have had proper access to the facts, to testify concerning them. If their testimony is corroborative and not contradictory, it is considered that the fact is substantiated to the degree that belief is warranted. Even discrepancies are not considered as invalidating, if all of the witnesses agree on the point at issue. We need to distinguish between discrepancies and contradictions.

In developing laws by which testimony is rendered credible, men through the ages have concluded that an oath for confirmation should be the end of all contention or strife. Such an oath binds a witness to disclose the truth under the sanction of an outside power greater than himself. Even a court, vested with full authority, can make no greater demand than a solemn oath administered by a proper official, to assure veracity of testimony.

While natural facts require natural confirmation, supernatural facts require supernatural confirmation. Mere human testimony is not enough to confirm a supernatural fact. Such a fact never can be made credible by a subjective experience, emotion, or feeling. None of these can be tested by the law of valid testimony. They cannot be subjected to cross-examination to determine the authenticity of the construction placed upon them by one who would obviously be prejudiced in making an assessment.

The supernatural proof must be furnished by the Holy Spirit who is the divine agent of revelation and confirmation. We must look to the Spirit for those acts that render believable the facts related to the incarnation. When Paul writes to the called-out saints of the heathen city of Corinth, he mentions that they were enriched by Christ "in all utterance, and in all knowledge; even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you: so that ye come behind in no gift" (1 Corinthians 1:5-7). Later, Paul referred to both utterance and knowledge as specific gifts of the Spirit (1 Corinthians 12:8-10). They existed as assurances that the testimony of Jesus was true.

The fact that the saints lacked no gift in confirmation of the testimony was not a matter for pride or boasting. While the apostle thanked God for the grace that was given them, he remembered that greater confirmation is required only when more skepticism is manifested. God never wastes His power, nor does He ever employ more divine energy than is required to accomplish His purpose. The abundance of confirmatory gifts at Corinth may speak eloquently of the hardness of their hearts, rather than of their worthiness.

The relationship of the apostle to the congregation at Corinth is very revealing. Paul declares that, even if it could be proven that he was not an apostle to others, it was abundantly evident that he was an apostle to them. He said, "The seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord" (1 Corinthians 9:2). The word translated "seal" is sphragis. It refers to an impression made in wax by a die, or by a seal. The impression would prove that the seal existed. Many congregations were planted by men who were not apostles, but there was something about Corinth that left no room for doubt.

Paul asserted that he needed no letter of commendation from them. Instead, the congregation itself was his letter, and all men could read and know this. What was so important about Corinth? I suspect the answer may be found in 2 Corinthians 12:12: "Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." The word translated "mighty deeds" in the King James Version is dunamis, the very term as the one found In Hebrews 2:4 and translated "miracles." The signs of an apostle that were patiently demonstrated in Corinth are here described and designated as "signs, and wonders, and miracles."

In view of the strong intimation that an apostle had to be personally present to impart a spiritual gift (Romans 1:11), it is conceivable that wherever spiritual gifts were found, the proof of apostolic labor was at once evident. To this it will be objected that others besides the apostles exhibited spiritual endowments and gifts. Indeed this is true, and no place is a better example of it than Corinth, which came behind in no gift. Yet, the very profusion of gifts was proof that an apostle had been there. If such gifts had been received at Corinth without an apostle having been present, they could hardly be said to be "signs of an apostle."

If, on the other hand, the chosen of God were granted the validating power to render their testimony credible, such supernatural gifts and miracles would be clear evidence, wherever they were seen, that an apostle had been present. If these supernatural gifts were channeled through the apostles, any other person who manifested such gifts or powers would at once be recognized as having been in contact with an apostle.

Jesus has no such ambassadors upon earth today. An ambassador is a minister with special powers sent forth by a sovereign ruler to act for the authority that commissioned him. He is an accredited diplomatic agent of the highest rank, endowed with the authority to announce terms of peace to alien powers. As the inherent sovereign of the universe, Jesus called and qualified twelve men to act as His ambassadors, and when all authority had been given Him in Heaven and on earth, He committed to them the ministry of reconciliation. He commissioned them to go to all nations and take the good news of reconciliation, wherewith He made men free. They were appointed ambassadors-at-large.

Their position was unique. They had no successors to office, for the simple reason that they fulfilled their mission during their lifetime. Now the King exercises authority over those subjects who submit to Him upon the basis of the gospel, that is, "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Just as any ambassador must carry credentials to assure the validity of his claims, so the ambassadors of Jesus had to demonstrate their credentials to gain credence for their message. Theirs was a message of supernatural intervention in human affairs. Since the King who appointed them as His personal representatives occupied the throne room of Heaven, their credentials had to be extraordinary and supernatural. So we read that, after they had received their appointment, "they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following" (Mark 16:20).

In view of the fact that this is a disputed passage, I leave it to you to determine how you will regard it. As I have explained it, it makes little difference if Mark penned it or not. It is exactly what one would expect to find as the result of the ambassadorial commission. The "signs following" are the credentials, the only kind of credentials that would serve the purpose. One who bears a supernatural message needs supernatural confirmation of his claims.

BACK TO HEBREWS

With this having been said, we are now ready to return to our study of the letter to the Hebrews. The "great salvation" was first spoken by the Lord. It was then proclaimed by those who heard Him from the beginning of His public ministry to its conclusion, when He returned to the Father. They were not alone in their proclamation, because the Holy Spirit was sent in the name of the Son to teach them all things, and to bring to their remembrance whatever Christ had said to them while He was with them (John 14:26). The Spirit guided them into all truth, and showed them things yet in the future. In order to render their testimony credible, confirmatory evidence was provided in the form of signs, wonders, miracles, and diverse gifts of the Spirit.

It was in this fashion that God bore witness to the truth of their declaration. There was no other way to do so, since supernatural facts must be made credible by supernatural evidence. Signs, wonders, and miracles are not necessarily three types of evidence. In the first place, there is no special word for "miracles" in the original. The term is translated from the word dunamis, which means "power." A miracle is a demonstration of power above and beyond the natural. It is supernatural only as man regards it. Nothing is supernatural to God. Nothing is a miracle to one who is omnipotent.

A miracle may be a sign from the standpoint of design. It is designed to act as a miraculous testimony in behalf of truth. At the same time, it may be a "wonder" because of its effect, since it excites wonder and amazement in the heart of the beholder. It is a miracle because of its origin, being a demonstration of supernatural or extraordinary power. Gifts of the Holy Spirit relate to the Christian aspect of the manifestation of power.

In the passage under consideration, the word for "gifts" is not charismata. This word is used elsewhere, and refers to "gifts of grace," as the word itself indicates. But here it is merismos, literally meaning "parting" or "divining." It is used only twice in the New Covenant Scriptures, both times in the letter to the Hebrews. Instead of the expression "gifts of the Spirit," probably we should follow the marginal rendering "distributions of the Spirit." Since the gifts of the Spirit are all distributed by the Spirit, there need be no great excitement over which expression is used.

The signs, wonders, gifts, and miracles were the divine attestation to the veracity of those who were companions of Jesus. They were the ones who heard Him while He was on earth. The signs were God's way of assuring that the message of the witnesses was the same as the message Jesus had personally declared. Once their message was made a matter of historical record, and properly established as accurate by supernatural means, no further signs or miracles were required for rendering it credible. Truth once confirmed never need be confirmed again.

Accordingly, the "signs of an apostle" were never given to any but the apostles. To accredit every citizen as an ambassador would mean that no one was really an ambassador. I think the Spirit selected, and made a matter of record, a sufficient number of miracles, and the very kind of miracles essential to rendering the apostolic testimony capable of belief by an honest heart. To demand additional signs is not to manifest belief, but doubt. It is to walk by sight and not by faith. It is to impeach the apostolic credentials as being insufficient to accomplish the purpose for which God designed them. As far as I am concerned, the gospel was complete, the validation adequate, the credibility established. On that basis I believe it.

The World to Come

Contents

One of the most difficult things in the world is to attempt to project oneself into the lives of those who are the products of a culture other than his own. The understanding of and sympathy for other people depends to a large extent on a person's ability to bridge the chasm of differing circumstances. Almost every missionary family experiences initial culture shock. Sometimes this is so great that it is impossible for them to continue sharing in the strange environment and in the life-style it has generated.

If the establishment of communication is so difficult between those who live at the same time in history, it is infinitely more so when twenty centuries separate them. I seriously doubt that the modern Jew living in a penthouse apartment in New York City can even begin to understand the Jews of Jesus' day. How much less can those of us who are non-Jews develop a "Jewish mind" and share in the ideas, longings, and aspirations of "the circumcised" to whom some of the Biblical letters were addressed.

As much as possible, we must place the letters back in the setting in which the writers and recipients lived. We must try to fathom what the citizens of Thessalonica, a colony of mustered-out soldiers from the army of Augustus Caesar, thought when they read what Paul wrote. We must strive to understand what Timothy understood when the first letter was handed to him in Ephesus. We must ask what flashed through the mind of Titus when he perused his letter on the isle of Crete. That is not easy.

Living words, like living people, are always growing and changing. It is hard to go back even forty years in time and grasp your own feelings as a child.

One of the most difficult tasks of an interpreter of Scripture must be to reproduce the reasoning that guided the Jewish community of two thousand years ago. Today there is a great understanding gap between ourselves and some of our neighbors in the same apartment complex. To many of us, our Jewish friends who ride the same elevator are like people from another continent. When we pick up a newspaper bearing the title Jewish Light or Jewish Star, even though printed in English, it is filled with words that convey little to us. Most of us never have visited a Reformed Jewish Temple for the first Sabbath service on Friday evening. Hardly any of us ever have been to an Orthodox synagogue.

All of this means that we frequently read the letter to the Hebrews, forgetting to whom it was written and the purpose for which it was written. Thus our comments are sometimes shallow and superficial. Sometimes our applications are so farfetched that they actually do more harm than good.

The letter to the Hebrews grew out of a real life situation. It was written to meet a grave and present emergency. It was an honest attempt to keep Jews, who had accepted Jesus as the Messiah, from regression into Judaism. Because of the Jews' reverence for the prophets, whose writings were solemnly read every week in the synagogue, the writer asserts that the final revelation of God is His Son. Because of their preoccupation with angels, even though some of it was superstitious, the writer affirms that the Son is seven ways better than angels. He then makes a little digression to show the nature of the communication of God "in these last days," exhorting the readers not to neglect it.

Having done this, he reverts at once to his reasoning about the relative position of angels. "For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak" (2:5). Now, a great many expositors think of "the world to come" as a reference to the state of things after the coming of Jesus in the clouds, the culmination of the present order. Certainly if the letter had been written to us in the twentieth century, that would be a logical conclusion. But it was not written to us. It was written to first-century Palestinian Jews, steeped in all the lore and tradition of the Jewish thinking of that time.

The expression, "the world to come," had a special significance in that thinking. The Jews had developed a complex explanation for the state and fate of the world. So elaborate was it that time would fail us to detail it. There were many and varied versions so that, to the uninitiated looking back upon it, there seemed to be much confusion. Yet there was an optimistic thread running through all of the ramifications growing out of the discussions of the rabbis. This brought hope to the persecuted and disconsolate masses, who were downtrodden and often exiled by cruel conquerors.

TIME IN TWO

The general opinion was that time would be divided into two periods. One period was "this present evil world," called Olam hazzeh. It was to be a period in which the people of God must patiently endure every form of insult and indignity at he hands of those who knew not God. Families had to suffer being broken up. Individuals had to accept cursing and reviling. The sacred rites by which reverence was manifested would be interrupted by cruel and foul-mouthed heathen militarists. But all of this was to be temporary. It was but a preparation for a brighter time when Israel would triumph, and all of her foes would be trampled underfoot.

The advent of the Messiah would usher in a "golden age."

His coming would be "the day of the Lord," or "the great day." The prophets had freely predicted it. Joel had written about "the day of the Lord . . . in the valley of decision" (3:14). That day would be ushered in with the blowing of a great trumpet. Natural phenomena would be a sign to the heathen. The sun would be darkened, the moon would turn to blood, and the stars would refuse to shine. The Messiah would be the hope of His people.

According to the Midrash, all circumcised Israel would be released from Gehenna. The Jews in Palestine would be raised from the dead, while those of Israel who had been buried elsewhere would have to roll under the ground until they reached the holy soil, whereupon they would also come forth. Jehovah would establish His kingdom upon the earth. Jerusalem would be the capital of the world. The law of the Lord would issue forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The Messiah would sit upon the throne of David. Peace would settle over the earth for a thousand years. Every tree would bear an abundance of fruit, and every man would sit under the shadow of his own vine and fig tree.

During the thousand-year reign, the representatives of all nations would come to Jerusalem. Presents and tribute would be brought in honor of the majesty of the King. Commerce would flow unhampered through the world, with customs due and cheerfully remitted to the great King. Ten men, speaking varied languages would take hold of the garment of Jesus walking down the street and say, "We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you" (Zechariah 8:23).

In contrast with the time of hardship then being endured, this golden age was referred to as Olam habba, "the world to come." Ushered in by "the great day of the Lord," it would be a time when God would visit His people and punish His enemies. It was to be a "day of visitation." Woven into the mental picture was a great deal of fantasy, and the concept of the Messiah was shaped by a considerable amount of mythical speculation. But He was to be a world conqueror, treading the winepress of God's wrath, trampling His enemies underfoot. He would rule until the last enemy was destroyed, and universal tranquillity bathed the earth, through the intervention of the God of Israel.

Jesus did not fit the image conjured up by the rabbis. His claim to be the Son of God seemed like blasphemy. His disavowal of Jerusalem as the place where men would worship the Father seemed a denial of what the prophets had spoken about all nations flowing into the holy city. His utter selflessness and lack of political ambition were incongruous for a world conqueror. The Jewish masses were not concerned about throwing off the yoke of sin as they were about ridding themselves of the yoke of the Caesars. It seemed no real loss, therefore, when Jesus perished on a Roman cross.

THE TIME HAS COME

Now, the writer to the Hebrews had the task of convincing these Jews that "the age to come" had come. The Roman army still policed the world. Jerusalem was still an occupied city, but the kingdom of Heaven was a reality. The Messiah had been rejected when He came to His own. "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." They had consented to His death, but He had risen from the dead. He was even now seated at the right hand of God. All authority had been given to Him in Heaven and on earth. The "present evil world" was doomed. The Messianic reign was a reality. It was invisible, but would be made visible by His revelation.

The world is not under the angels. They do not have lordship or dominion. So the writer could say, "For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak" (Hebrews 2:5). Then he interjects a quotation, and this has caused some consternation among commentators. Many agree with William Barclay that it is "by no means an easy passage of which to grasp the meaning." The author of the letter was addressing men who were familiar with the Scriptures of old. He did not consider it necessary to identify the source of the quotation, either as to author or place. His readers would immediately recognize both. Here is the quotation as he gave it:

> "But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands: thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (2:6-9).

The one who testified was David. The "certain place" in which his testimony was given was Psalm 8:4-6. I do not regard this as a Messianic psalm. It is clear from reading it that the writer was talking about man as created by God. He was asking what there was about man to attract the attention or merit the visitation of God. The term "son of man" has no reference to Jesus, and would not have been so understood by David. It refers to the posterity or offspring of man, and throughout the Old Covenant Scriptures it is used as another term for man.

David answers his own questions addressed to God. The thing about man and his progeny that established a basis for divine interest was his nature. Man was created by God. He was given priority over all other material creation. He was made but slightly inferior to angels. He was invested with glory and honor not accorded any other creature. God set man over all the works of His hands. Whatever else was made was made for man's honor as well as God's. The flowers that bloomed, the trees bearing fruit, the birds of the air, the fish of the sea, the planets in their orbits, all were for man's enjoyment and benefit.

In one grand sweep of language the writer declares, "Thou has put all things in subjection under his feet." Every word of this sentence is dynamic. The entire system is by divine arrangement. The order of creation leads in a stately parade to the coming of man, and when the time of his advent arrived, his kingdom was ready and awaiting his sovereignty. Made of the dust of the ground, he still bore the image of God. He came forth from the lowly elements to become lord of all he surveyed. It was all by heavenly design.

It was not necessary for man to conquer his kingdom in order to rule over it. It was his by divine fiat. "Thou hast put"! God ordained it. Man's dominion was universal. All things were under his feet. There would be no doubt about the scope of it, for the statement is subjoined, "For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him."

That was the ideal of God's purpose. It was the design of the infinite mind. But often there is a great gap between the ideal and stark reality. It was so in this case. In making man after the divine image, God gave him a will. His will is the determinant factor. The will enables one to make a choice. This was a magnificent risk, for God knew that man could choose to reject God's will. Man could say to God. "Not Thy will, but mine be done." And it happened! So the writer has to say, rather sadly we surmise, "But now we see not yet all things put under him." Alienation from God brought enemies not yet conquered. Man became a victim rather than a victor. He became a subject rather than a lord.

HOPE IN GOD

Yet there is hope! That hope lies with God, not with man. God did not hate man, but loved him. He continued to love him, even after he shattered the eternal ideal. We must notice that there are two sentences introduced with the word "but," and both are significant. The first is a statement of failure, the second a statement of faith. One has to do with human helplessness, the other with divine hopefulness. "But now we see not yet all things put under him . . . But we see Jesus." The "not yet" will find its fulfillment in Jesus. We go from the primal purpose to the rugged reality, and on to the divine recovery. All that we lost through sin in Adam we will regain through salvation in Jesus.

It is significant that the name "Jesus" appears here for the first time in the letter. The Hebrews would associate it immediately with salvation, for that is what the word means. It is almost as if, after painting the dark picture of man's failure, the writer says, "But we see salvation." That salvation is not a scheme, a code, a program, or a compilation of precepts. It is a Person who will make it possible for us to erase the realm of the "not yet," which frustrates and defeats us. The one who does not "see Jesus," who ignores or denies Him, or who forsakes Him to return to an inferior state, is forfeiting all hope of realizing God's purpose for man. Such a person never can be whole. He will always be shattered.

In the seventh verse it was affirmed that man was made a little lower than the angels. In the ninth verse it is affirmed that Jesus was made a little lower than the angels. Nothing else could quite so fully depict Jesus' sharing the lot of man. The route to glory, since the primal sin of man, is the road of suffering. Once man was ruler of the created universe in undisturbed bliss. There was no pain and no anguish. No tear flowed down his cheek. But with the coming of sin came also suffering and distress. Now Jesus shared our suffering to regain the glory that He surrendered, making it possible for us to share His glory by sharing His suffering.

God's grace became manifest because of man's involvement with sin. That grace knew no limitation. It was by His grace that the Son tasted death for every man. The word "taste" means "experience personally," or "become directly involved." Jesus took our burden. He assumed the load of our guilt. When we see Jesus, we see a sin-bearer, a deliverer! We can now become conquerors in Him. His righteousness regains for us what our own unrighteousness lost in Adam.

The Problem of Suffering

Contents

There are a great many questions that believers in Jesus must face. There are no easy answers to some of these. They shatter our smugness and serve to stifle our pride. In some cases we must live with the fact that the replies we give are not wholly satisfactory to ourselves. We cannot be surprised when others feel that our answers are inadequate. One problem in this category is that of human suffering, prevalent in a universe created by a loving God.

All of us know the questions beginning with "why." They usually are preceded by others. Is not God all-powerful? Is He not all-wise? If He is, does He not know a means for removing human suffering? If He is omnipotent, why does He not end it? Can a loving God look upon such suffering and not be moved? Philosophers have pondered these matters, believers have striven for a meaningful solution, and unbelievers have employed them as goads.

Why do seemingly good people die of cancer? Why is it that a saint, en route to performing an act of mercy in the name of the Lord, may be crippled for life in an automobile accident? Why does it happen that a powerful proclaimer of the gospel is turned into a helpless specimen by a sudden stroke of paralysis? There are no glib answers to these recurring questions. Often we are haunted by the hollowness of our own replies. In the final analysis, we are driven back upon sheer faith, and faith alone can make it possible for us to hang on in an area where knowledge takes us to the edge of the precipice and then deserts us.

We must recognize, however, that even though we cannot give a complete and satisfying answer, this does not mean that we cannot give an answer at all. Just because one cannot explain everything does not argue he cannot explain anything. It is a conviction of mine that in the letter to the Hebrews we are given information about three benefits that accrue from suffering, and these never would become ours if we did not know suffering. While one hesitates to speak of "benefits" and "suffering" in the same breath, this only points up another of the paradoxes with which the Bible teems. It is interesting that all three of these are directly connected with the sufferings of Jesus. That they also have a relationship to ourselves is evident by a statement in 1 Peter 2:21; "For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps."

1. By suffering we are qualified to fulfill the role to which God has called us. This was true of Jesus: "For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings" (Hebrews 2:10). Even though He was the Creator of everything, and all things were made for Him, He still could not qualify for the task as the captain of salvation except by suffering. The word "perfect" is not used here in a moral or ethical sense, although Jesus was without sin. There was no flaw in His character. As used here, perfection has to do with the nature of His function in bringing sons of God to glory.

Jesus was fully qualified to be the Savior of men only by suffering as a man. Suffering is the natural consequence of the kind of world that sin created. When man abdicated his moral sovereignty over God's creation, he became an heir of suffering. We should not be surprised at suffering in this kind of world. We should expect it. Our attitude should not be one of denial of its reality, like the Christian scientists, nor of abject complaint against God for allowing it. The world in which we live is not as God made it originally, but as man made it aboriginally. Our task is to determine how we can employ our suffering to develop the kind of character that will ultimately triumph over it. We must master it, not allow it to master us, or to make us its slaves.

The Spirit speaks about suffering as a test of our patience and endurance. We are like gold tried in the fire. Gold is not destroyed by flame. It is purified. Fire consumes the dross, and thus purges the precious metal. The apostle Peter makes it quite clear that saints should not think of fiery trials "as though some strange thing happened unto you" (1 Peter 4:12). The intimation of his epistles is that Jesus' followers have been called to suffer. He says, "Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."

2. We learn obedience by the things we suffer. It was said of Jesus, "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered" (Hebrews 5:8). It is obvious that it is easier to apply this to ourselves than to Jesus. One who studies the expression in any great depth will soon become aware of how the commentators have wrestled with it. It is not my purpose to deal with all of the details. I can better serve my own cause by expressing what I think it means and does not mean.

It certainly does not mean that Jesus did not know what obedience meant. His very advent into our world was an act of supreme obedience to the will of His Father. In fact, under very trying circumstances He asserted that He was not deserted by the Father, nor abandoned. He offered as His reason for saying so that He unvaryingly did the Father's will: "He that hath sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him" (John 8:29).

We can hardly assume that Jesus was reluctant to obey the Father until suffering brought Him into line, nor can we suppose that He was tempted to resist and refuse until humbled by suffering. Laying aside all of these as intolerable, it seems to me that even though He was the Son of God, He was willing to become like ourselves and to submit to suffering, as a means of encouraging obedience. Jesus wanted to understand my nature to such an extent that He willingly subjected himself to my lot in order to see how I must learn.

All of us are quite aware that we learn obedience through suffering. We learn it in many ways. The person who breaks the speed limit and wrecks his automobile, crawls out of the mess with realization that his bruised and battered body must pay for his indiscretion. One who extends his credit obligations beyond his ability to pay, and then loses his job, lies awake at night suffering remorse because of his lack of control. Even little children must be required to pay the penalty for failing to behave and to obey. There are some things we apparently refuse to accept or admit until personal suffering enforces them upon us. Henry Ward Beecher said, "God washes the eyes by tears until they can behold the invisible land where tears shall come no more."

3. We learn compassion for others who suffer by our own endurance of suffering. It is possible that prolonged and acute suffering by its very nature can create a state of loneliness for the sufferer. This may result from one of two things. The sufferer may feel that he has become a handicap to others, and suspect that they avoid him because he cannot relate to them normally, or the sufferer may withdraw into a shell because he is unable to maintain social contacts to the full. In either case the ostracism only increases the problem by adding that of emotion to the physical, and the sufferer feels entirely forsaken.

It is here that the real believer who has a relationship with Jesus can triumph over self and gain the victory over his negative feelings. A consciousness of the nearness of Jesus enables him to recognize that he is not alone. He can be assured of a compassionate and understanding Friend who will not desert him, regardless of how rough the going is. There are two passages to be recalled when waves of self-pity sweep over the soul and fear of desertion sets in. One declares that Jesus was made like His brethren so that He could be both merciful and faithful as a high priest. The declaration closes with a sentence filled with assurance: "For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted" (2:18).

When we are in trouble we instinctively turn for help to someone else who has been through the same turmoil. There is little doubt that this is the basis for the high degree of success achieved by Alcoholics Anonymous. Because of one's inability to cope with life without intoxicants, the victim of drink can be sure of being understood by those who are "in the same boat." The simple approach to an agonizing problem has paid off, because it brings one into a fellowship of understanding, created by similar experience.

I have conducted a number of forums and seminars with high school students who have been experimenting with drugs, and have been grateful for their response. I am instantly aware that there is a wall between us, however, because I have never smoked pot, skin-popped, or mainlined. I cannot talk from a mutually experiential level with them. The difference is quite noticeable when I take someone with me whom I have salvaged after a "bad trip." Even though a former "pothead" or "pill freak" may not be an eloquent speaker, he commands attention because he knows what he is talking about. When he says that Jesus is the answer, his youthful hearers listen to the answer, because they realize a "veteran" knows the problem firsthand.

I know a woman of about forty who lost her husband as the result of an accident. His life was taken in its very prime, at a time when he and his wife were planning glorious things for the future. Some of their dreams were just beginning to reach fruition when death intervened and dashed all plans into oblivion. The wife went through a period of deep depression. There were times when she doubted the existence of God. There were moments of hysteria. She even contemplated suicide, and hated herself for doing so. In one of her blackest moments of despair, she was visited by another woman whose husband had died of a heart attack when she was only twenty-seven years of age. She was left a widow with three small children to rear. In a soft voice she told the other woman of sleepless nights and tear-filled days. She also told her that never once had she lost faith that God would see her through. Every night she prayed herself to sleep, and soon a healing balm was applied to her heart. She had suffered much more than the one who had recently lost her husband, so her very presence radiating calm faith made a difference. Something like this comes through to us when we turn to Jesus in our suffering.

The other passage to which I alluded is Hebrews 4:15, 16: "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need."

I am thinking of a social worker who was given a special award of recognition because of her efficiency in processing cases of the indigent and poverty-stricken. Day after day she sits at her desk listening to tales of human woe. From early morning until closing time the paper forms she has filled out pile up on her desk. She deals directly with wretchedness, hunger, disease, and despair. She must try to sort out the truth from the lies, and determine what is valid and what is not. One night I asked her how she could appear so cheerful and charming after a long day at her desk. Her reply was, "I never really become involved with persons. To me each one is a client. I see him as an index card or a form for filing in a metal cabinet. He is a number on the computer. This allows me to keep my sanity."

One time I was staying in the home of a prominent physician and surgeon. At breakfast one morning, he suggested that when he left the office in the evening he would take me to dinner at a gourmet restaurant we had been wanting to visit. He ventured the opinion that he would be ready for relaxation because of a particularly trying surgical technique he would have to employ that day. When he drove home to pick me up, I asked him about his day. His patient had died without regaining consciousness, and a little boy for whom he had performed brain surgery a few days before also expired while his father and mother watched him breathe his last.

I was curious to know how this affected an eminently skilled surgeon, and I ventured to ask. He did not shut me up but began to talk. He said, "No human being like myself can ever be unaffected by disease or death. We are too close to it to ignore it. I think about every patient, but I suspect I think of him as a case, challenging my powers of diagnosis and my knowledge of how to prescribe. In advance I go over all I have ever learned in school and in refresher courses. Then I determine the steps I shall take. But I do not become emotionally involved. Perhaps I deal with cases, not with persons. I wonder about my own attitude sometimes."

I think it is precisely at this point that Jesus differs in His ministration to our needs. I have a real conviction that He never regards me as a number fed into a computer. When I file my federal income tax return, it contains my Social Security number. The data I supply is fed into the maw of that giant electronic device under that number. The computer knows nothing about me. It has no consciousness of how hard I have labored for my income. It knows nothing of what I would like to do with the money I must pay as a tax to the government. It is cold, indifferent, calculating, and mechanical. It does not care who I am, what I am, or where I am going. But I am not a number to Jesus. He knows me. He does not need a printout for identification.

My personal physician is a wonderful man. I have a great deal of confidence in him, but he has hundreds of patients, and he cannot possibly remember them all. When I go to him for a checkup, one of his nurses calls my name from her appointment chart and conducts me to a little cubicle containing a desk and an examination table. She tells me the doctor will be in to see me soon. After she closes the door, she puts my chart in a spring clip on the outside. Although I cannot see through the door, I know the doctor comes and takes my chart, reads my name, and quickly glances at his findings and recommendations of the last time. Then he comes in, cheerful and smiling, extending his hand and saying, "Well, well, Mr. Ketcherside, it's nice to see you again! How are you feeling?" I've been tempted to switch the name on the front page of my chart to see if he would come in and say, "Well, well, Mr. Wyzinski! It is nice to see you again. And how is Mrs. Wyzinski?"

Jesus needs no such chart. He said that the good shepherd "calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out" (John 10:3). When I come to Jesus in time of need, He never asks, "Who is speaking, please?" He never says, "I am sorry, but I just can't place you. I don't recall your name." Jesus knows me, inside and out. Jesus is involved with me, with all my feelings and motives. He has no office hours. He does not take Thursdays off to play golf.

I confess that it really touches me when I read that our High Priest can be touched with our infirmities. He knows them all. There is not a temptation I have had to wrestle with that He did not experience. We make a mistake when we dream about Jesus and conclude that He was so holy there were some things Satan did not dare throw at Him. Satan scraped the bottom of the temptation barrel. He unloaded his whole arsenal, trying Him with every problem to which flesh is the unfortunate heir. He kept nothing back, but Jesus waded through the muck of earth's garbage dump unsullied. Did you ever weigh the force of that little word "yet" in the statement "yet without sin"?

All of this should encourage boldness in approaching the throne of grace. I once knew a group of young people who were given an invitation to come to the White House to present to the President a book of history compiled by the class. When they tried to choose someone to present the little speech in front of the television cameras, the class president refused the assignment. He declared that he was too timid and forgetful. He said, "I haven't got the nerve to tackle it!" Let me tell you that, even though the Lord of the universe occupies the throne of mercy, I am not frightened to approach Him. I've got the nerve to tackle it!

There are two things we all need in the moral universe. One is mercy. We cannot make it on merit for two reasons. First, the divine arrangement is not set up on that basis. Second, even if it were, none of us could hit the mark. Our human nature never could generate enough merit to qualify. Therefore, divine mercy is an absolute essential.

The second thing we need is grace to help in time of need. There is no such thing as a life on earth without knowing a need. Some do not recognize their need, but this is no proof that the need is not there. Need represents a lack of anything requisite. We often require forgiveness and forbearance. There are times of want, poverty, and distress. But regardless of the nature of our exigency, we can approach the throne, knowing that God has said, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."

GOD'S PIONEER

Having explored with you some of the good things that can arise from adversity when it is consigned to God's hand, I should like to turn our attention back to the term "captain of salvation" in Hebrews 2:10. The objective of Jesus is stated as "bringing many sons unto glory." In order to accomplish this, it is argued that it was appropriate and fitting for Him to perfect himself to the task by suffering. To do this He identified himself with our lot. He partook of our state. He did it all as the captain of the salvation of those for whom He suffered.

A study of the original language in this phrase leads to the conclusion that the word "captain" is hardly an adequate rendering. It does not convey to the modern man the import of the Greek word archegos. The word occurs four times in the Greek text, and in every instance it is applied to Jesus. In Acts 3:15 He is called "the Prince of life." In Acts 5:31 He is called "a Prince and a Savior." In Hebrews 12:2 He is called "the author" of our faith. The word was not easy for the translators to capture in English, as is evident from the variety of words they use in its stead.

J. B. Phillips uses the expression, "the source of our faith." The New English Version renders it "upon whom faith depends from start to finish." Today's English Version gives much the same reading. The Revised Standard Version reads "the pioneer of our faith." The Twentieth Century New Testament employs the term "Guide." We do not ordinarily think of a captain as being either a source, guide, or pioneer.

The fact is that archegos was used by the Greeks in every one of these senses. The translators had to make a selection that they considered to be most apt to convey the thought the writer wished to express to the Hebrews. As the first part of the word suggests, it has the basic meaning of chief, leader, or head. It was used for a captain of an army, or for a political leader of a province. Since "prince" designates one who rules over a principality, it is easy to see why the translators twice adopted it to describe the relationship of Jesus to the domain of salvation or faith. But the word also means a "founder" or "originator." One who founded a school of philosophy was called an archegos. One who planted a new colony or established a new city was also given this designation.

Whatever was under consideration at the time, there was always one thought running like a thread through every usage. The word signified "one who took the lead," with the view that others would be following and participating in the project. No one builds a city for his own exclusive occupancy. No one founds a school with the prospect that he will be the only student. No one begins a colony on the hope that he will be the only resident. Indeed, if this were the case there would be no city, school, or colony. There was always the expectancy that others would march in the footsteps of the leader.

It is because of this I experienced a real thrill when I first read the Revised Standard Version and found that the translators had selected the word "pioneer" unanimously in Hebrews 2:10 and 12:2. There is something about the very idea of a pioneer that describes what Jesus is to me. Our English word wends its way backward to the Latin pedis, "foot," and a peon is one who goes on foot, especially a foot soldier. So a pioneer was an explorer, one who went ahead and prepared the way for those who would follow.

As a lad I can remember my grandfather showing me the marks on huge trees, placed there by hardy timber explorers who thus blazed a route for others. I can also recall his stories of those who became lost, and in their circuitous wanderings stumbled upon a tree which had been blazed by an ax. They now realized that they were on the road to shelter and safety. Jesus is my trailblazer. He came into the tangled forest of life and plunged into the wilderness, marking the way for me. He placed danger signs, built bridges, removed obstacles, and led right on through the dark valley of the shadow. Ever since the day I made a firm resolution to follow in His steps, I have been looking for the marks along the trail. It gives me a little of the thrill of an explorer to pick my way through the undergrowth of sin and temptation, and think about the future goal where I know He is waiting.

It is my good fortune to live but a few minutes' drive from the winter quarters where Meriwether Lewis and William Clark began their expedition on May 14, 1804. Their adventure is regarded as one of the great facts of exploration. The men traveled 8,500 miles. Much of the route lay through unknown territory inhabited by Indians who had never before seen a white man. The leaders kept a diary, drew maps, and charted the route. A few years ago another band of men covered the same trail. They had no trouble finding the route. I am glad that the Spirit commissioned some of the companions of Jesus to make a record of His earthly trek. I no more confuse the Bible with Jesus than it would confuse an explorer's record book with Lewis and Clark. Jesus is the way-shower, the road builder, God's engineer. I am happy to be part of the continuous expedition, which will cease only when we see the Great Explorer.

BROTHERHOOD

A particularly significant passage occurs at Hebrews 2:11-13. I shall never forget when its implication first struck me. It opened up a great new vista of thought. It is one of the interesting things connected with reading the Bible that, just when you think you have exhausted the meaning of a verse, in a brilliant flash you envision details that you never thought of before. When I was little, I had an uncle who took delight in teasing us. He would have a pocket full of shiny new pennies, and at an opportune time would ask me to hold out my hand. He would drop a penny into my palm. When I would start to withdraw my hand, he would drop another. He continued this with agonizing waits between each piece of newly acquired wealth, until finally he said, "That's it." Then, as I turned away to count my little hoard he would suddenly say, "Wait a minute," and then start over.

God is not a tease! But He does not drop His inestimable riches upon us in one great heap. He releases the treasure to us bit by bit, "Here a little, there a little," as the prophet quaintly described it. I have learned never to close my mind, and never to turn away, assuming that it is all over. I am convinced that the Holy Spirit is not furnishing new revelation, but He gives us deeper insights, and they are not all "pennies from Heaven." Some are of transcendent value. Let us look at the verses that have sparked these comments, and then I will tell you why they mean so much to me.

> "For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. And again, I will put my trust in him. And again, Behold I and the children which God hath given me."

It is Jesus who sanctifies, who consecrates and sets us apart to the service of God. The sanctified ones are those who are in Jesus, those who have been purchased by His blood. It is here affirmed that both Jesus and His saints are all of one. It is obvious that there is an ellipsis here. A word must be supplied, if we would complete the thought. William Barclay says they are all of the "same stock." Albert Barnes suggests that other words, such as family, spirit, Father, or nature, would suit the connection, and that some such word must be understood. Robert Milligan thinks that "one Father" is correct, saying, that it "seems to accord best with all the terms and conditions of the context."

If Jesus is not ashamed to recognize as brethren those who have the same Father as himself, we should not be ashamed to do so either. Brotherhood is not based upon equality of knowledge, for then Jesus could not regard us as brethren. It is not based upon the degree of doctrinal comprehension, intellectual attainment, or orthodox understanding. Brotherhood is based upon a common Fatherhood. Fellowship results from a mutual sonship. We are brothers, not because we have the same ideas, but because we have the same Father. No one truly follows Jesus who refuses to call all those his brethren who have the same Father as himself.

The writer is addressing Jews. It is not surprising that he would validate what he says by quotations from the Old Covenant Scriptures, drawing upon both the psalms and the prophets. The principle he enunciates is universal, and I am blessed by the thought that I need not choose my brethren. All I need to do is accept those whom the Father has accepted. Wherever He has a child, there I have a brother or sister. It is just that simple, and I intend never to confuse or confound it!

The Great Liberator

Contents

We come now to the final night of our sharing meetings. I am deeply indebted to you for your invitation to address you. I am just as thankful to those who have influenced my life in the past and lighted within my heart the fire of appreciation for the Bible. I can truthfully say the flame grows brighter with each passing day. Occasions such as these we have enjoyed heap the kindling of your own interest upon the conflagration, to make an even more intense glow.

Although you asked me to address you on the letter to the Hebrews, I have limited myself to the first two chapters. I have done so purposely, for two reasons. I felt it better to take a concentrated look at a small scope of territory, than to make a sweeping view of a larger panorama with but a few details filled in. Also, my intent was to demonstrate how thoroughly the testimony to Jesus saturates the letter. The Son is the center and circumference of God's revelation. All that God has revealed revolves around Him, like satellites around our sun.

I am constantly amazed at how my own thinking about Jesus has changed, and my love for Him has grown deeper. I cannot remember the time when I did not know about Jesus. My first knowledge of Him undoubtedly came from the gentle lullabies softly sung by my Danish mother, as she rocked me to sleep. Steeped in the lore of the German Lutheran heritage in which she was reared, her life was one of awe and reverence for the babe of Bethlehem. I drew from her that same warm feeling just as I imbibed the warm life-sustaining milk from her breasts.

My first childish books were about Jesus. They told me but little about His childhood, for little has been recorded. But my own vivid imagination filled out the gaps and supplied what was lacking. By the time I was ready for high school, I knew all of the facts about Jesus. I could recite them glibly and give the details set forth in the sacred Scriptures. It was years later that I came to know Jesus in the real and personal sense, which He defines as eternal life. This was a wholly new dimension of knowledge, a blending of two personalities in an intimacy resulting in one spirit, a joining of the human and the divine, until eternal life became the possession of the human.

Jesus is real! He is real in my life! In some ways He is the only thing that is real. If the real is imperishable and unfading, if it represents existence that is independent and actual, then Jesus is all I have that is real. Without Him I can do nothing! Without Him I would be nothing! I think Paul must have felt that way when he wrote, "It is not I that liveth, but Christ that liveth in me!"

I can sympathize with the Palestinian Jews of the first century. The very air they breathed was full of expectancy. Their prophets had foretold the coming of the Messiah and had pointed to their very day as "the fulness of the times." The proclamation of the facts about Jesus of Nazareth seemed to measure up to every criterion they had been taught. Thousands of them accepted Him, turning away from their sins and being baptized in His name. But He was no longer upon earth. Things went on as before. The soldiers of an occupying foreign force still tramped the streets. The cries for divine intervention seemed to go unheeded.

The temptation to renounce the faith and return to the pageantry of the temple was almost overpowering. The longing to see a visible sacrifice for sins was always present. Every feast day brought a tug to the Jewish heart, every facet of life from birth to death was a fresh reminder of tradition hallowed by long usage.

The writer of the letter to the Hebrews knew the grave danger involved in defecting from the faith. The words of Jesus predicting the utter destruction of Jerusalem were still fresh in his memory. Those who reverted to the law, with its blood of bulls and goats, must deny the efficacy of the atonement of the cross. They would tread underfoot the Son of God. They would count the sanctifying blood of the covenant an unholy thing. For all of them there could be only a fearful anticipation of judgment upon the profligate nation, accompanied by a fiery indignation that would destroy the adversaries.

Ominous signs were everywhere observable. All of the portents mentioned by Jesus as indicative that the time was near were manifest. The letter to the Hebrews was a shout of warning. It was God's warning of the approach of the enemy. It was a storm warning, a tornado alert, the cry of the watchman on the walls. It pointed the way to the only emergency shelter available in the hour of disaster. That shelter was a Person. It was time to remember the words of the psalmist-prophet, "From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed. Lead me to the rock that is higher than I; for thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy. I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever: I will trust in the covert of thy wings" (Psalm 61:2-4). Note those words, Thou hast been a shelter for me!

In this final sharing period, I shall limit myself to a discussion of the last five verses of the second chapter of Hebrews. As a summary of the teaching in the letter, W. E. Vine chose three words as a chTitle for his commentary. They are "Christ All Excelling." He refers to the letter as "the great antidote" against defeat and defection. William Barclay lectured on the letter to the Hebrews to students in the University of Glasgow for seven years, before he wrote his commentary upon it. In summarizing the attitude of the writer he says, "He found in Christ the one person who could take him into the very presence of God."

That is good, but Hebrews 2:14, 15, reveals Jesus as the one person who could bring God into the very presence of man. It is fairly apparent to anyone who really thinks, that there are some things in the world that man was utterly incapable of doing. No one man could do them, and all men put together could not do them. There had to be help from outside a realm that was rendered helpless by the curse imposed upon it. No one caught up in the sin-cycle could free us from the effect of sin. No one who had fallen short himself could lift us up to the glory of God. I think it is also reasonable to expect the benefactor to adopt the kind of "space suit" we must wear, to live the same kind of environment in which we "live, and move, and have our being."

If He expected us to identify with Him, it would appear that He would have to identify with us. Since we move about in a suit of flesh and blood, bones and tissues, He should don that same kind of suit if He wants to live among us. It must not be a sham either. No one should be tricked into thinking He was flesh and blood, if He really was some kind of spiritual being putting on an act.

Our benefactor would need to experience cold to make Him shiver. He would need to know heat to draw sweat from His pores. He would need to become hungry, thirsty, tired, and weak. When His friends died He would have to know the pang of loss. When people were oppressed He would need to feel within His sensitive spirit the same lash that fell upon their quivering flesh. I think He would need to know He was going to die, which is actually worse than death itself, for anticipation always is more joyous or dreadful than the momentary act of realization.

Someone coined the expression "Big D" for Dallas, Texas. I suspect they did so to describe the growth, the indomitable spirit, and the increasing influence of this burgeoning metropolis. I think there were two "Big D's" in the catalog of enemies before which man in his own strength stood helpless: the Devil and Death. We could not overpower the devil because he had something in each of us. The sting of sin, the venom of transgression had been injected. He knew the string to pull to make us dance like puppets. Someone had to confront him who could say, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me" (John 14:30).

We could not overcome death because we always died before we finished the task. When death moved in, it took no thought of our desires and wishes. It allowed not another minute to complete things only half done. The older we became and the longer we lived, the more we realized that the confrontation had to come. There was no use of either pleading or arguing with death. Death always had the final word. It was the "great silencer."

It is interesting that in just one sentence the writer to the Hebrews shows how Jesus disposed of these two brigands. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Hebrews 2:14, 15).

It is easy to overlook the importance of some of the words in this statement. As an example, let me mention "forasmuch" and "likewise." These terms found in the King James Version are good old Anglo-Saxon words. The first is actually a combination of three little words meaning "in view of." It is generally rendered "since." "Likewise" is from the Greek word paraplesios, which means "in exactly the same way." The two words sustain a comparative relationship. Whatever is implied in the first is included in the second, and to the same degree. If you can determine the meaning of the first, you have ascertained the meaning of the second.

The children were human. They shared a life of flesh and blood. They existed in physical bodies. They lived in tabernacles of physical tissue. So Jesus moved into exactly the same kind of dwelling. "The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us" (John 1:14). He did not share our fate, for there is no such thing as fate. That is a pagan concept. He shared our lot. He participated in our portion. I like the expression "the same." Jesus identified with us fully.

Jesus shared in flesh and blood so He could use death as a weapon. The devil wielded death as an instrument of human mental torture. It represented the ultimate in his arsenal, the effect of sin, the great failure to measure up. It was the constant reminder of man's abject surrender, loss of sovereignty, and subsequent humiliation and degradation. Jesus stripped himself of His divine armor and stormed the fort in flesh and blood, submitting to death so He could wrench the sophisticated weapon from the hand of the fiend, and use it to destroy the last vestige of his boasted control.

DELIVERANCE

By the conquest of death through His resurrection, Jesus delivered those who were enslaved to sin. He likewise delivered them from fear.

"Deliver" is a word derived from apallasso, and it is a word of great power and comfort. It was used to describe what happened upon the arrival of a rescuing force, such as when a city was under siege and the enemy was driven away, so the frightened inhabitants could reopen the gates and rejoice in their restored freedom. It was employed to indicate the freeing of hostages held for ransom, or the liberation of prisoners taken captive by an invading army. The lives of such prisoners are always in jeopardy. They may be slain in their sleep, or cut down on a march. They exist in constant fear.

I have noticed something of importance when young people who had been enslaved by drugs were being freed, by faith, from their awful clutch. Because many of these could not return to their homes, they established communes in which to live. There they could share in the compassion and understanding of others who had traveled the same road. I visited a number of houses maintained by the "Jesus freaks," as they are called. All of them had the walls, and sometimes the ceilings, papered with Scriptural passages. You could lie in your sleeping bag and look up and read the Word of God. Almost everyone of them had the same large poster prominently displayed. It consisted of a painting of the head of Jesus, and underneath in bold letters: The Liberator!

These young people had recaptured a concept of the mission of Jesus, which had been lost by the contemporary world. We had been treated for centuries to displays of "the infant Jesus," featuring a doll lying in a straw-filled manger with an electric spotlight directed upon its rosy cheeks. We had sung hymns about "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild." We had adored pictures with a feminine aura, depicting Jesus with long hair down to his shoulders, and then when our sons began to imitate the hair length shown in the pictures, we gave them the ultimatum, "Go to the barber or get out until you do!"

We had forgotten the carpenter with calloused hands. We had forgotten the homeless hiker who could hit the road all day and then pray all night in the mountains. We were so busy making Jesus conform to our twentieth-century, upper-middle-class image, that we lost sight of what He was really like. When Jesus was murdered at the age of thirty-three, He had to have been a tough-muscled, sunburnt, fearless leader, willing to take on the last enemy that shall be destroyed. As J. B. Phillips once put it, "In fact there is no connection between what has been rudely called the 'creeping-Jesus' method and the life and character of the real Christ." Jesus has freed me! He has rescued me from bondage! He has liberated me from the great dread, the relentless shadow, the overwhelming fright!

Hebrews 2:16, as the King James Version has it, is confusing. I think the translators, appointed by the king, missed the point. The words they added in an attempt to supply an ellipsis do no injustice to the truth, and it is quite easy to see how they were motivated in their selection. The verse reads, "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." I do not think, however, that the point at issue is the adoption of angelic nature as opposed to the nature of Abraham's seed. It appears the writer is dealing with the purpose of Jesus' coming. He did not come to deliver angels. No savior was provided for the angels who sinned. There was no provision for removing the chains of darkness in which they were confined.

Jesus came to deliver the seed of Abraham. It was to Abraham and his seed that the promises were made. Since this letter was written to the Hebrews, it was particularly appropriate to refer to the seed of Abraham and to encourage them to trust in one whose advent in the flesh made Him a descendant of Abraham, and the very seed of blessing.

OUR HIGH PRIEST

Although I have previously alluded to the last two verses of this chapter, I beg your indulgence while I say a little more. So important is their message that they deserve better treatment than I am able to give them. "Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted," (vv. 17, 18).

For a number of years I taught an annual in-depth study in the Pentateuch, the five books of Moses. I think I can understand the reason why the writer of the letter to the Hebrews spent so much time emphasizing the high priesthood of Jesus. The contrast between the priesthood of Melchizedek and that of Aaron was calculated to do more than almost anything else to point up the immensity of the difference between the covenant of grace and one based upon a written code.

The approach to God in Judaism was made through the high priest. He alone was allowed to don the beautiful robe which was bound around the waist with "the curious girdle" (Leviticus 8:7). Upon his head was placed the miter with the golden crown containing the words, "Holiness to the Lord" (Exodus 39:30). He wore the breastplate with the twelve precious stones engraved with the tribal names. Inside the envelope-like container formed by the breastplate was the Urim and Thummim, two stones, whose designations meant "lights and perfections" and which gave the legitimate bearer perfect light in judgment and revelation.

It was the high priest alone who was permitted to enter the Most Holy Place to make atonement for the people. Only once per year upon the tenth day of the seventh month, the only day that God specifically commanded to be a day of fasting, the high priest took the blood and went behind the second veil into the thick darkness surrounding the mercy seat. Dipping his finger in the blood, he sprinkled it "upon the mercy seat and before the mercy seat."

The high priest was different from those to whom the law of Moses refers as "the common people." His genealogy, function, dress, and service, all served to keep him aloof and apart. Perhaps this is best impressed upon us by the sacred injunction, "And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place" (Leviticus 16:17). The high priest was untouchable.

The end of the priesthood of Levi, and the ushering in of the priesthood of the order of Melchizedek, brought in a completely new arrangement. Jesus was "made like unto his brethren," and He was both a merciful and faithful high priest. Certainly this could not be affirmed of those who presided at the altar when this letter was written. Many of them were guilty of political conspiracy and compromise. They were often greedy, cruel, and malicious. Sometimes they were so oppressive the people abhorred the ritual, and even were reluctant to go to the temple.

Mercy is the result of understanding. One who knows all of the circumstances that make another what he is, who can take into account the privations and sufferings that have formed his character and contributed to his actions, can be merciful to him. Sympathy is literally "feeling with" another, sharing in his sorrow and feeling his loss as if it were your own. Faithfulness is fidelity and trustworthiness. One who is merciful is one with whom you can commune; one who is faithful is one you can trust, upon whom you can depend. I am thrilled that Jesus is a merciful and faithful high priest.

Suffering and succoring! These are the key words of the last verse in Hebrews 2. The last one is a good old term that was generally in vogue in the England of King James' day. It is an interesting word, which literally meant "to run up from under." I suspect it was a nautical term, having to do with a small boat in distress. It was kept from sinking or coming apart by undergirding it to keep the planks from being ripped off. You read of just such action in Acts 27:17. Eventually the word came to refer to lending a helping hand in any time of crisis. Jesus is able to come to our rescue. He can relieve our distress, and the reason He can do so is that He understands our trials.

The follower of Jesus does not need to give in, give up, or give out! He does not need to be "down and out," because God has made it possible for him to be "up and in." He can substitute gladness for gloom, and smiles for sorrow. No persecution is greater than our Protector. No sin is greater than our Savior. To forsake Jesus is not to go somewhere else. It is to go nowhere. It is to be lost! Jesus is my life, and outside of Him is death!

I want to close these sessions with the benediction that concludes the letter to the Hebrews. I think I have never read anything more beautiful and impressive. Every phrase throbs within my inner being and pulsates in my heart:

> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (13:20, 21).

ADVENTURE OF FAITH

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Index of Books

- Title Page
- Once Upon A Times
- The Need for New Frontiers
- The Real Secret of Life
- The Master Teacher
- In Times Like These
- The Real Jesus
- Tuning In and Turning On
- No Place to Flee
- Writing Your Own Ticket
- A Redemptive Fellowship
- Adventure in the Spirit
- Then and Now
- The Other Helper
- Power to Prevail
- Adventure in Service

ADVENTURE OF FAITH

Contents

For you have been given the privilege of serving Christ, not only by believing in him, but also by suffering for him.

— Philippians 1:29

Originally Published by

Mission Messenger

139 Signal Hill Drive

Saint Louis, Missouri

1978

Once Upon A Times

Contents

A great many more years ago than I like to think about I was staying in a home where there was a lovely little girl who was not quite three years old. Like most others of her age this little charmer was eager to have someone tell her stories. She was never satisfied but as soon as one was finished she began to plead for another. She never called them stories. Instead, as soon as I entered the house and sat down, she came and crawled upon my lap, adjusted her head against my shoulder, and said, "Now tell me a 'once upon a time.'" When I had obliged her she immediately said, "Don't quit. Tell me another 'once upon a time.'"

It did not take me too long to exhaust my meager fund of fairy tales and after I had run Rumpelstiltskin through the mill a few times and had elaborated upon trolls, brownies, elves, and other little people, until I was tired of them, I decided I would have to devise some stories from life. I hit upon the expediency of taking objects which were in sight and concocting tales about them. I chose for my first candidate a large gray cat which lived a pampered life in the household.

Accordingly, I began, "I know a large gray cat which lies in front of the fireplace dreaming about things he used to do when he was a kitten." Immediately my little audience of one stopped me. "Don't tell that," she said, "I don't want to hear about real things. I want to hear 'once upon a times'!" Perhaps it is because a lot of folk never grew up that they react as did this little child. We never tire of hearing about David and his sling, Samson and his fiery foxes, or Moses with his snake-swallowing serpent. But a great many apparently think God has run out of power and the divine battery is so depleted it cannot crank us up and get us going in our time.

I never tire of reading the sacred scriptures. Some of the "once upon a times" there are thrilling. And they happened. There are no myths and folk-tales in the Bible. Samson was as real as Charles Atlas. Moses was as real as George Washington. But the God whom I serve did not work Himself into retirement. He has not been laid upon the shelf. Adventure is not something which once was and is no more. The joy, the zest, the thrill of adventure belong to every child of God who is willing to reach out and grasp them.

In his book The Adventure of Living, Dr. Paul Tournier points out that the law of adventure is that one must die in order to be born again. It is difficult for a lot of people to die. They want to hang on to some of the past to be certain of a reference point. They want to rescue an heirloom or carry with them a keepsake. But because they cannot make a complete break with life as it has been they can never fully receive or appreciate those things which "God has prepared for them that love Him."

In this little volume I would like to accomplish two things. One is to prove that God does not want any of His children to be content with mediocrity. He has designed us to be "more than conquerors through him who loved us." No two of us will be alike and no two of us need to be. But we do need to realize that we were born again to a life of victorious accomplishment, and that we begin with victory over self. We can lift up our eyes to the hills, as the Psalmist put it, and we can demonstrate enthusiasm which literally means to be possessed by God. One who is a God-container cannot keep the contents from showing through.

The other thing I aspire to do is to prove that the spirit of adventure does not need to be a relic of history. There are unexplored frontiers. There are new heights to ascend and new oceans to cross. The mere fact that they are not visible does not mean they are not real. We make a tragic mistake when we equate reality with visibility. Life needs to be lived with a challenge. We need to be constantly on the cutting-edge of destiny. The followers of Jesus can never justify a life of callous indifference. They are to be imitators of God as beloved children. This is the road of high adventure!

Wherever you are as you read this I eagerly pray that it will lead you into a closer walk with God, so that you will realize that wealth we have in "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." And let none of us ever forget that we have this treasure in earthen vessels "to show that the transcendent power belongs to God and not to us."

The Need for New Frontiers

Contents

I shall not forget the first time I saw the word ennui. At the moment I did not think it was a word. I thought it was a typographical error. But I consulted my trusty Collegiate Dictionary and there it was. That is why I recognized it when I ran across it again recently in a magazine article describing the feelings and attitudes of modern man in our western culture. It is defined as "a feeling of weariness and dissatisfaction; tedium; boredom."

I've noticed another term creeping with recurrent frequency into writings analyzing our reaction to our current situation. It is satiety. It seems a little peculiar to find it keeping this kind of company, because it is from a Latin word which meant "satisfaction." When it was adopted into English it meant "complete satisfaction," but words are like the people who use them. They change with advancing age. Now satiety means "an excess of gratification of any desire or need, resulting in wearisomeness or loathing." Modern man is fed up. He is "full up to here." He has had it and still has it! But the anomaly of it is that he is empty, hungry, thirsty and vacuous.

Even the "Now generation" does not like the Now! If one is in Junior High, life is icky. If he is in Senior High, it is yucky! The last term is the way to describe what happens when you poke your finger down your throat and try to vomit. Yuck! There is nothing to be gained by trying to sell the kids on the idea that "You never had it so good." The question will be flashed back immediately, "What's so good about it?" When you start cataloguing the things they have you will be interrupted with a Bronx cheer, or with the curt admonition, "Forget it!" Things simply do not fill the inner void. It is like trying to fill the bottomless pit by dumping garbage into its gaping maw.

What has happened is that we have lost the spirit of adventure somewhere along the way. It was still here when our great-grandparents were alive. If we are old enough, as I certainly am, it had spilled over into the lives of our grandparents. Of course, words like "adventure" are not easily confined when captured by usage, which is what we mean by definition. What is an adventure to one may seem quite humdrum to another. It is quite an adventure to a six-year old boy to visit the Ringling Brothers Circus, but it is no thrill to a lad of the same age whose parents are performers and who was born in a circus wagon. In reality, visiting a circus is not an adventure in the fair sense of the word unless the elephants go on a rampage and knock the tent down, or the lions break out of their cages and clamber up among the spectators.

The idea of risk or jeopardy cannot be eliminated from adventure, and the definition which seems to best suit is "a bold undertaking, in which hazards are to be met and the issue hangs upon unforeseen events." Certainly there are adventurers in our day, but their feats stand out in the morning headlines or the evening telecasts because of their infrequency. The disappearance of the frontier and its absorption by encroaching "civilization" robbed men of the opportunity for a lot of real adventure.

When I was a lad I lived in a small mining village in the Missouri Ozarks. There were aged patriarchs surviving who had made the trip to Texas, across the Oklahoma Territory, in covered wagons. To hear them tell about it was better than reading a book. One could lie on his stomach on the front porch with his chin cupped in his hands, looking up into a wrinkled face burned brown by exposure to sun and wind and listen by the hour. In imagination he could see the little band gathered about the campfire at dusk, or hear the whirring sound of rattlers or the howling of wolves. No one on the long trek knew what awaited on the morrow.

One of our relatives, designated by everyone who knew him as "Uncle Preston" had enlisted in an earlier day as a buffalo hunter to supply fresh meat daily for a cavalry unit sent out to "tame the Injins" as he expressed it. As he told it, about the only way to tame one who protested the trespass of the white man upon his hunting-grounds was to shoot him. Uncle Preston never trusted an Indian who was alive, and his distrust deepened when a dozen of them came upon him skinning "a buffler." He barely escaped due to his fleet-footed horse, suffering only from wounded pride and "an arrer" through his favorite campaign hat.

Almost every day brought a new sense of adventure to those who lived in log cabins in forest clearings, or in sod shanties on the prairies. Even death was a part of it, and when it came close, the family was gathered about the old four-poster bed for the final word of advice and admonition by the dying one, if he was conscious and able to speak. The hands of loved ones clasped his own until the spirit wrenched itself loose from its clay dwelling, then gently folded the hands of the dead across his chest. Grief was assuaged by the hard work of digging the grave, and burial often took place the same day, or early the next morning, especially in the heat of the summer. There was no evasion and no pretense. Death was a part of the whole scheme of things. It was the final Great Adventure in the flesh, and everyone would share it!

We are not going to recapture those days, nor would we want to do so if we could. The good old days were mostly old. They were not all that good. Our feeble little sporadic attempts to return to them are more laughable than serious. When we decide to take the family on a camping trip for a week during which we will live in a tent, we want to be sure the park site is equipped with electric lights, showers and toilet facilities. We must not forget the portable refrigerator. The can of bug spray must not be left at home. And even though we may wear a Daniel Boone type shirt with a fringe at the bottom, and a hat with a Davy Crockett insignia on it, we are not frontiersmen. We prove it when we arrive home by hurrying into the house to turn on the central air-conditioning unit!

But what must not be overlooked is that man was not created for a life of ease and softness. He is a creative being and he needs the motivation of challenge if he is to mature. He must resist elements, overcome opposition and face threats. He must lay his life on the line, risk his future, and measure up to the requirements of the hour. When he lives in a world where everything moves along with a precision dictated by others, both that world and himself disintegrates and falls apart. The individual who knows no tension and shares in no adventure becomes more like a domesticated animal than a man made in the image of God. He feeds, sleeps, breeds, and dies, and the world soon forgets he was in it.

There will be little argument about the tendency toward dehumanization in the kind of culture to which we are subjected. The coming of the Industrial Age which first produced its sweat-shops, and then its factory production lines, made the laborer a mere unit of production, chaining him as effectively to a spot as if he had been shackled to a girder. The Industrial Age spawned the Machine Age. Georges Bernanos, in his book Tradition of Freedom, always spells Machine with a capital letter. He argues that Society was taken by surprise by the invasion of the Machine and collapsed suddenly under the iron weight.

Whether that concept is correct or otherwise, men soon became slaves of the machines which they invented, and like all good slaves, took upon them the character of their masters. One cannot survive long as a slave who does not adapt himself to the nature of the master. Of course, machines still required the thinking powers of men to survive, as the Romans required the intelligence of their slaves in order to continue, but the spirit of adventure was burned out of men chained to production lines as ancient slaves were chained to the galley seats.

There is little sense of conquest achieved by arousing each morning to the jarring sound of an electric alarm clock, catching a bus on the same corner, standing all day in the same factory location, fastening four lugs in the same place on each succeeding car, and eating the same food at the same time each day in the company cafeteria. A little bit of the spirit of adventure returns periodically at contract expiration date. Then the worker feels a tinge of pride at rearing up on his hind legs and confronting a giant corporation, a faceless entity, and threatening to walk out and keep walking "until hell freezes over."

Even then the worker is still a part of a System, which is merely a machine under another name. He does not get to fight the dragon directly. This is done by negotiators, some of whom are not above lining their pockets with some of the dues assessed against the workers. It is true that the worker can go down to the union hall and vote upon the contract, but here he is only one of a pushing, shoving group, cursing the company and yet hoping he can stay on the payroll. What can be done to rescue man from the bondage of things as they are, and give him an opportunity to become what creation meant him to be— a little lower than God?

Man must not be betrayed at this juncture into regarding an increased amount in his pay envelope as a worthy adventure. There is nothing about receiving just remuneration for services rendered which is wrong, nor is there any sin in increased fringe benefits commensurate with need. There is certainly nothing sinful about being granted an increasingly extended vacation upon the basis of years of service, although what is done during a vacation may be quite sinful. But none of these make a man truly a Man, for even the ox which treads out the grain is worthy of sharing the grain which he treads out.

To become an adventurer one must seek for a new frontier which is worthy of his efforts as a rational being. But where will he go? If he back-packs into "the wilderness" he finds the ashes of burned-out campfires. He also finds empty cigaret packs and beer cans as well as discarded catsup bottles and mustard jars. Even the towering Himalayas have been so defiled by litter and human waste that consideration has been given to forbidding additional climbing on the snowclad slopes. Wherever one goes to get away from it all he finds the aged and fading legend carved on trees. "Kilroy was here."

It was a realization of the fact that we have been "walled in" by man's carelessness, indifference, hypocrisy and sham, which launched a lot of brilliant young people on the tragic experiment with drugs which now is proving so costly in ruined lives and the frightful increase in crime essential to support the habit. We make a mistake in judgment when we blindly assume that in its inception "the drug bit" was a deliberate attempt of a youthful society to prostitute and enslave itself. Instead, the youth regarded themselves as already prostituted and enslaved by a life-style in which they had no choice and, in their reasoning at the time and under peer pressure, they could see no alternative except to be used or be damned!

In their immature rationalization they concluded it was possible to ingest some chemical substance from without which would lift them out of what they regarded as a sordid state of existence and transport them into a new realm of fantasy which, with blown minds and distorted vision, they mistook for reality. It was not by accident they referred to "taking a trip" or "tripping out." Some of them died in agony. Others lived on as zombies, the walking dead. They had "freaked out" and were doomed to be out until trampled down by the Pale Horse.

Nothing which one takes orally or needles into his veins will ever provide the new frontier in which he can struggle to find his own identity or measure up to his personal potential. One might as well hit himself on the head with a hammer and conclude that the stars he sees indicate he is in orbit in the heavens as to swallow some substance and think that the psychedelic pinwheels which dance around in front of him mean that he is upon Cloud Nine. That is why it is regrettable to see the turning to alcoholic beverages by the young, some of whom are still in the elementary grades. The drug addict and the alcoholic not only preclude discovery of a worthy frontier existence but render themselves incapable of relating to it when another seeks to lead them.

Man has now proven that he can survive in the ocean depths in a bathysphere. He has left his footprints upon the gray ash of the moon. Hardly a spot upon the surface of the earth has gone untouched. The North Pole has been reached, and men have lived and studied at the South Pole. Jungle fortresses have been penetrated, glacial ice-caps have been explored, remote deserts discovered, and deep caverns have yielded their secret treasures. It goes without saying that the search for frontiers must be extended beyond the merely material realm.

For this kind of research man is especially endowed and equipped. He is more than material. While he possesses, in common with animals, the kind of body essential to existence on this planet, he is unlike the animals. He is not simply a higher order of animal. He is in a class by himself, and a class to which no mere animal can aspire. No one can account for the creativity of man by presupposing that he originated in primordial ooze and made his way upward through the whole realm of irrational creatures. The research done with chimpanzees as "tool-making" primates only serves to implement the unbridgeable gap between a hairy vertebrate poking a twig into an ant-hole to flush out insects, and the architect who designed the Senate Office Building. The chimpanzee does not think of the twig as a tool. It requires a human to make that kind of assessment.

Neither can one account for the development of conscience, that faculty enabling a man to decide as to the moral quality of his own actions or thoughts, and enjoining upon him that which he deems to be good, by an evolutionary process. At what point in "the upward climb" did man begin to sit in judgment upon his own thoughts upon the basis of conscience?

In older and simpler days it was sometimes argued that the ability of man to postulate the existence of God was proof that God existed. Whether that will stand up under the criteria of a more sophisticated logic I will not take time here to examine, but one thing it does prove is that man is not a trousered ape or a religious chimpanzee. The fact is that man is a threefold being consisting of body, soul and spirit. He is not so much a body possessed of a spirit, as a spirit possessed of a body, having hope of the life that now is and of that which is to come.

Because of this man can seek for spiritual frontiers and enter upon an adventure which transcends any thrill in the flesh. Almost everyone likes to read stories of pioneers, their hardships, sufferings and struggles against odds. It has already been stated that we cannot become pioneers in a geographical sense, but we can do so in the spiritual domain. J. B. Phillips refers to the early Christians as "pioneers of the new humanity" and since the new humanity has not yet reached its goal or destination we can join up and go along. It is my hope that in our succeeding pages I may motivate you to take a real trip. It will bow your heart but not blow your mind.

It is a suggestion of tremendous impact that we are strangers and pilgrims upon the earth. We are always in a foreign country. Moreover we are on battle duty. We are not passing through the land as tourists. We are on a seek and search mission. We are commandos who have been dropped behind the lines. We are in the greatest warfare of all— the battle for the minds of men. If we really believe this and have pledged full allegiance to the ruler of the whole earth, life can never be humdrum. If we do not believe it we may be "of all men most miserable."

The Real Secret of Life

Contents

The greatest event which has ever happened on this planet took place in a smelly stable in the rear yard of a nondescript inn of a peasant village in an occupied territory. It was so important that it changed the calendar. It was as if time stood still and then started over again in a new creation. Even those who fly in the face of abundant evidence, and deny that it ever happened, cannot date a check, complete a contract, or write a letter without giving the lie to their arrogant assumption.

The arrival of Jesus was the signal that God is with us. That baby was Emmanuel! Man would never again have to go it alone. The rescue mission had made it. The bread had arrived for the starving prisoners. The water of life was here for the glassy-eyed captives. As the news spread abroad, hope was revived, life became meaningful, and direction was given to those who were lost and frightened.

It was like a blood transfusion for a dying patient. The world was sick— sick unto death. But the Great Physician took its pulse and prescribed faith, and the color came back into the pallid cheeks of society, and mankind rallied. It was the great transformation wrought by the Man from outside, and it accomplished what force of arms and marching soldiers had never been able to effect. He took no life but gave His own. The only blood He shed was that from His own veins. The world marveled and wondered and was altered!

"I am come!" These are the words of Jesus, over and over, as He defined His mission, made possible by the great divestiture, the emptying, the forfeiture of glory. The reasons for His coming are interwoven by the spun-gold thread of selflessness. And He has never changed. Just as He once came to the world of man He now comes to each man in the world who invites Him into his heart. Then He came by incarnation, now He comes by identification. Then He dwelled in His flesh, now He dwells in yours.

The whole point of this book is that each of you can enter into a transcendent personal sharing with the very Author of life so that while the outward man perishes, the inward man will actually experience daily renewal. This will enable you to put the whole scope of your being or existence into sharper focus so you will see the afflictions in the flesh are momentary and transitory. They contribute to your preparation for a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

The one who is in Christ, and in whom Christ is, is still in the flesh while upon earth. He will grow older and become wrinkled. He will require the services of his dentist and physician. He will know the physical discomfort which others know because he is still in a corruptible body, that is, one which is subject to decay and decomposition. But the body is a tent in which he dwells, and the tent has to be dismantled or taken down so he can move out of it in preparation for taking possession of his "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

It is necessary to say this because there is a good deal of fuzzy thinking being spread about in our generation to the effect that the true disciple of Jesus need never experience pain, endure cancer or any other suffering in the flesh. The result is that one who has a heart attack or becomes paralyzed may feel that it is a symptom of faithlessness, a punishment for sin or a result of demon possession. In fact it may have no direct relationship to any of these but is rather proof that we reside in a world where sickness and infirmity dwell.

Christians are not immune to germs. They may be beset by infection as certainly as their neighbors are. That this is true and is a condition of earth-life is confirmed by the fact that all those who preach immunity and offer to drive away disease for an offering, end up in hospitals, grow old and die, without exception. It is true that the Christian, because of the harmony of his life with nature and with nature's God, will avoid many of the diseases to which the profligate are subjected, but in times of epidemic the saints die as do the sinners.

THE UNBREAKABLE APPOINTMENT

It is appointed unto man once to die. Man did not make the appointment and cannot break it. He must keep it whether he is ready or not. The Christian no longer fears death. He recognizes it for what it is, a bus stop where he changes vehicles and boards one which leads to glory. A bus station is not the most comfortable place upon earth and one does not choose to linger there any longer than is necessary. But it is a welcome spot to the weary traveler bound for home, because he is inwardly buoyed up by his expectancy of joy. It is only those who have no certain destination and who are wanderers and vagabonds who are restless and upset.

Death does not make it possible to secure eternal life, for that is the present possession of the child of God. Death frees him from the limitations and inhibitions posed by the flesh and makes possible the enjoyment of that life on a higher and nobler plane. One reason we have the letters constituting the new covenant scriptures is to inform us and assure us that we have eternal life now (1 John 5:13). "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." This clearly divides the rational beings upon earth into two categories—those who have life and those who do not! The difference is based upon having Christ or not having Him.

Eternal life is not so much an extension of existence as it is enjoyment of involvement. It's blessing lies in a quality of life rather than a quantity. It is not years upon a calendar but the satisfaction of a yearning in a calling. The possessor of eternal life may live more in one day than one without it would live in a month. Indeed, the latter cannot be said to live at all.

Certainly the most important thing for the earth-dwellers is to have Jesus. To receive Him is to be born of God. It is to be granted the right to become sons of God. This is affirmed by John 1:12, 13. Just as one is brought into an utterly new state when he is born of the flesh so he is brought into a wholly new state when he is born of God. Old things pass away; all things become new. To become a son of God is to be made free from all the claims of the flesh and the carnal nature.

The complete surrender to Christ leaves nothing that is not under His control. There is not an area of life outside of His jurisdiction. His flag waves over the entire territory of the heart. Paul writes to former fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, homosexuals, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, and extortioners, and admits the depth of their unrighteousness, but affirms that they were washed, sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God (1 Corinthians 6:9-11). One does not need to continue in blindness. He can see. He does not need to perish. A beautiful, blessed and beatific life can be his by God's grace. What He cannot do God will do for him.

It is at this point we need to consider the revolutionary aspect of the life inspired by the divine nature. Unfortunately, a great many things have arisen which obscure that phase or water down and weaken it until there is nothing startlingly different about the way the average Christian lives. He is just "holding on until death of the body comes." We have been taught to think that attending religious services, giving money to worthy causes, and living decently in the community is really accomplishing the purpose of God in life. There is nothing wrong with any of these unless they are allowed to become substitutes for life itself. Then they become artificial and shallow performances.

We have all seen individuals who "attend church," to use a common but unwarranted expression, purely out of a sense of duty or obligation. They bring no joy to it and receive no joy from it. Indeed they would rather be somewhere else and grumble because they cannot be. Often the churches have to promote attendance by purely carnal means such as rival contests, prizes and awards. A record attendance under such conditions has no relation to spirituality. Going for the "body count" is a superficial evasion of life in the Spirit.

The secret of real life lies not in keeping or possessing it but in losing it. After Simon Peter had openly testified that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God, and the matter was out in the open, Jesus began to tell the disciples that He would go to Jerusalem where He would suffer many indignities at the hands of the religious hierarchy and be killed and raised again the third day. When Peter recoiled at the very thought of this, Jesus told them all, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me" (Matthew 16:24).

To show that this radical approach was the divinely-ordained way to meaningful existence He added, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." One does not find his life by giving money, time or talent, to good and worthy enterprises, but by giving life. We tend to think of denying self in terms of giving up things as an overweight or obese person refuses candy or cake in the interest of weight reduction. He barters his desire for sweets for the satisfaction of a trimmer figure.

But Jesus is not talking of cutting down on things. He does not mean what we generally mean by the terms self-denial, temperance or moderation. All of that is good but it may be done for selfish reasons or for vanity. It is selfhood which must be denied. One must renounce all that he was, all that he is, all that he ever hoped to be, and become a new person, a part of a new humanity, by the creation of God.

The new role is one in which the one in Christ Jesus starts giving himself away. The cross which he takes up is not sickness, financial, loss, pain or physical suffering. The cross was an instrument of death, and the daily cross is not the daily lot of toil, but the daily dying by giving away self for others. As long as we think of the cross as consisting of trials, frustrations and depleting financial interests we will have a negative view. We will fret and complain. But giving yourself away when you have eternal life is the road to adventure. One of the cleverest ways of evading the cross is to substitute things for it.

THE GAMBLERS

It is in this light we must understand the implications of being in Christ. We are free to love and serve others and to do good unto all men, even our enemies. All of the great adventurers in history have been those who laid their lives on the line, not for gain, but in almost reckless abandon. They were not mercenaries but mercy-showers. They did not serve for compensation but for compassion. There is an element of risk in adventure as is evidenced by the word "venture" itself. It is interesting, in this connection, that the early Christians were referred to as "The Gamblers" by the pagans. When great plagues swept across the ancient cities, leaving a multitude dying in their homes, on the streets, and in the marketplaces, the heathen fled in sheer panic. But the Christians moved in and calmly brought cold water to feverish lips, nursing the sick and dying, and often dying by the side of those to whom they ministered.

The appeal of gambling to the masses lies in the risk involved. It is remarkable how that element has been removed from the Christian life in our generation. Instead, Christians are often regarded as smug, placid, contented individuals whose greatest risk is that of a heart attack while playing volleyball or pitching horseshoes at the annual "church picnic." It is the very lack of living dangerously which turns young people off. They see no real gain being made against the enemy by sitting in air-conditioned rest homes (called churches) and recounting victories won two thousand years ago.

In the days of the Roman Empire which had developed the most formidable military machine on the face of the earth it was the Christians who were dubbed the "militants." It is not an accident that the treatise which immediately follows the records detailing the facts about the penetration of the human spectrum by Jesus is called Acts. The facts generate acts. In our day they often merely furnish sermon outlines.

A study of the chronicles of the Acts is very revealing. Words like power, praise and prayer abound. The activism of the disciples of Jesus is portrayed by the use of the word "went" in such segments as Acts 5. The Jerusalem saints who were scattered by unrestrained violence went everywhere preaching the word. Philip went down to Samaria. Peter and John came down to the same place. The angel of the Lord told Philip to "Arise and go toward the south." The next sentence says, "And he arose and went." The queen's financial secretary from Ethiopia came up out of the water of baptism and went on his way rejoicing. The command "Arise and go" is found over and over. There was a hustle and bustle of preparation and performance. The faith prompted pulsation and the marching orders were obeyed with alacrity and precision.

The bold proclamation of the resurrection of Jesus by two men was enough to frighten the sectarian city fathers in Jerusalem into throwing the preachers into the town jail and holding them overnight without a trial. When two others arrived in Thessalonica the street loungers and Skid Row crowd organized a mob, assaulted a private house and formed a crowd at city hall yelling that those who had turned the world upside down had arrived. To be a disciple of Jesus was to be on the cutting edge of life and in the middle of the excitement.

The word radical means "root" and the true radical is one who gets to the root of a condition. This word has been misused and abused until it now describes one who has joined the wrecking crew and who is seeking to take the existing order apart. The word "radish" signifies a root vegetable. Radical surgery is that which removes all of the tissue essential to clear up or clean out a malignancy. Christians were, in the truest sense, getting to the very foundation of the human problem which is sin!

The Christian today in our part of the world is seldom in danger of being killed for the faith. He does not need to fear the stake, the rack or torture-chamber. The world has grown more sophisticated and this is reflected in the practice of the art of persecution. There are some things that are more precious than the beating of the physical heart or the inhalation of air into the lungs. When these things are denied many may actually prefer death of the body. To be branded a religious fanatic, to be shunned as a Jesus-freak, to be ridiculed as a "holy Joe"— these are things which often hurt more than stones which can only bruise the flesh.

It is because of the subtle form of suffering to which one is frequently subjected that he often compensates by trying to appear less consecrated than he really is. Few like to be thought of as saints and fewer still like to be branded as such. The concealment of deep convictions at school, at the office, or on the athletic field is "the way of life" for many. Actually it is "the way of death," because convictions which are not shared are like plants which are not watered. They wither and die. To refuse to engage in an activity because one is a Christian, and to let it be known that this is the reason for not indulging, may bring sneers at the moment even while it engenders respect in the heart of the one who sneers. In any event it lends strength to the character of the one who refuses to sell out for cheap praise and who stands tall because of unshaken resolution.

It is my purpose to analyze with you some of the things Jesus said and did while He was here in a body like ours. That He was regarded as a dangerous radical no one can doubt who really "bones up" on the story. It causes a lot of people in our day to feel uncomfortable and resentful to even use the word "radical" in connection with Jesus. But that is because they are mistaken about two things. They do not understand the real meaning of radical, and they do not understand the meaning of the real Jesus. They are upset by political and social radicals who will do anything to secure notice in the newspapers or to perform in the glare of television cameras. In a very important sense Jesus may have been the only true radical who ever made the scene on earth.

He was not in the spotlight. He was the light spot in a darkened world. Men did not focus a light upon Jesus, but He focused His life upon them and the glare caused them to duck for cover. "Men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." It is sometimes embarrassing to have someone turn the lights on suddenly, and it is sometimes embarrassing to remember that Jesus is listening to what you say and watching what you do. You cannot hide from Jesus.

The only way you can really learn about Jesus is by studying the Bible, especially that part of it comprising the new testament scriptures. As one of the writers put it, these writings were to inform us "of all that Jesus began both to do and teach." The Holy Spirit guided and supervised the writers and they gave us the authentic divinely authorized "print out" which is now available unto all. If you ignore the Bible you will be ignorant about Jesus. I invite you to search the words of the Spirit and embrace the spirit of those words. If you do this your load will be lighter and depression will disappear. The reward is not fiction or fantasy. It is not "walking on air" but walking as an heir. Something rich is awaiting you! There is a deposit to your account if you will come in and identify yourself with Him. The "great breakthrough" occurs when you become serious about the word of God.

Someone has written as follows: "There is a copy of the American Constitution so delicately shaded in the copperplate type that it brings out in relief, as the observer stands off a little distance, the familiar features of George Washington, the founder of the American Republic, the man who made that great charter of liberty a national and enduring fact. From one point of view it is a chapter of political history; from another it is a portrait of the father of his country. So, while the Bible gives us the most ancient record of history, the most sublime poetry, the most lofty system of morals, the most vivid portraitures of human character, and the most extraordinary system of spiritual truth, yet, back of all and above all it sheds upon us 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'"

The Master Teacher

Contents

Jesus was a "situational teacher." He did not transfer people from where they were to somewhere else to instruct them. If He was in a home He taught in that home. If He was in the temple He taught in the temple. But He did not teach there because it was the temple. He taught there because the people were there. For the same reason He sometimes taught while sitting on a hillside, standing in a boat at the seaside, or walking along the road.

We have learned a lot about educational methods and techniques and we now move and manipulate people into controlled situations. We prepare everything ahead of time— the place, the lessons, the cafeteria luncheon— the whole bit. We must have a classroom with contour chairs and writing desks at just the right height and slant. The windows must be only upon one side of the room and so constructed as to admit light at the proper angle. The temperature must be regulated by thermostat. Our audio-visual materials have to be approved, assorted and arranged for the greatest impact.

It was not that way with Jesus. He never "conducted church" or "held services." He did not teach "classes." He walked and talked and stopped and chatted. He taught while the sun bore down and the crowd swatted flies and brushed off bugs. His illustrative materials were not made to order. He never got into a dither because His "supplies" did not arrive in the Saturday mail delivery. He pointed to birds of the air, lilies of the field and gnats in a wineglass. He talked about farmers planting seed, fishermen casting nets and women making bread. When lunchtime arrived and everyone was famished and too far away from the nearest shopping mall, Jesus appropriated five hamburger buns and three sardines from an urchin who was the only one in the crowd with enough foresight to "brown bag it." Jesus never got uptight about the meagerness of what was available, so He blessed it and spread a fish fry for more people than an H. Salt Company Sea Food Galley, or an Arthur Treacher Fish and Chips Place could have fed in a month. It was a lot better than eating in the school cafeteria.

It is possible that in our attempt to "teach religion" as we generally refer to it, we have organized, structured and regimented things until we have pressed the life out of them. Of course Jesus never taught religion or theology. He simply shared life. In order to create a proper atmosphere we must have stained-glass windows to filter flecks of light into a cool darkened interior with a ghostly influence. Here "sermons" are delivered which change no lives and alter no outlooks. Perhaps if all of us stopped thinking of the faith as a way of life and regarded it as the life of the Way we would inject Jesus into every life encounter.

I have a friend who is one of the best formally educated men I have ever known. His degrees are from ivy-league schools and he is an instructor in one of the outstanding state universities in our land. A few years ago I asked him whom he considered to be the best teacher he had ever met. To my surprise he named an Ojibwa fishing guide in the far northern reaches of Canada. My friend had been on the verge of a nervous crackup when his doctor persuaded him to get away from it all for two weeks. He chose a remote fishing camp to which he flew in with a bush pilot.

His guide had been born and reared in a tumble-down cabin in the deep woods. He had never gone to school or read a book. He could not write his own name. But he was surpassing wise in the lore of nature. From him my friend learned the mythology of the tribes. He listened with fascination to the account of the habits of wildlife and the ways of the wilderness. If education is the equipping of one to adjust to his surroundings and to survive within them, this illiterate Indian was educated. He knew the world in which he existed. He drew his lessons from it. And this was the way it was with Jesus the master-teacher. The world was His schoolroom!

SPIKING A FALLACY

In our sophisticated age there is a fallacy commonly bandied about which needs to be corrected. It is frequently assumed that what Jesus said is outmoded and outdated. But truth does not deteriorate with time. It does not come with an "obsolescence factor" built in as part of the standard equipment. It is as true today as when Jesus spoke it. And man has not outgrown his need for it. Human nature has not changed. The man who boards a jet plane at Kennedy International may be the very same kind of person who boarded a mule at the Sheep Gate in Jerusalem. A sinner is no less sinful because he can get from one place to another with greater rapidity.

The fact is that what Jesus said is as apropos and timely as what you read in your morning newspaper. It may even be a little more poignant because it was not subject to "the blue pencil treatment" to force it to conform to a journalistic code or an editorial policy. Jesus zeroed in on the problems that you face in your subdivision or aldermanic ward. He dealt with adultery, divorce, lawsuits, vandalism and violence. But he also faced up to problems dealing with the generation gap, as well as hatred, inner tension and isolationism. His advice has never been supplanted or superseded because He could read the thoughts and intents of hearts before they were translated into actions. He did not stretch men out on a couch and encourage them to recall emotions so He could probe them for meaning. We are told that He did not need someone to tell Him about men for "He knew what was in man." The Great Physician was not "a shrink."

There is every indication that most of the woes of the world would have been alleviated and eliminated if the universal lordship of Jesus had been respected. There would have been no wars to make cannon fodder out of human bodies. Courts and judges and prisons would have been relegated to the past. Racial tensions accompanied by street riots and rip-offs would never have occurred. "There would have been no sectarian rivalry with its consequent train of skepticism and unbelief. Jesus did not merely have a solution. He is the solution." No wonder the message about Jesus is called the Good News!

There is something compelling about the way Jesus lived and the things He said. I know a prominent business executive who learned this the hard way. He is head of a huge manufacturing concern with plants scattered through several southern and western states. He is the "gung-ho type" and drove himself relentlessly day and night, to increase production and to keep things booming. He did not have time for serving God because he was so occupied serving his ambitious appetite. He neglected his wife and family and tried to compensate by giving them things. He sent them on vacations and joined them for a weekend or two, flying in with an attache case of plans and documents to which he addressed himself until time to go to the air terminal and return to the city and his office.

Then it happened! He developed a pain in his upper chest which would not go away. He could not raise his arm to shave because of the hurt. He could not bend to tie his shoes. When he called his physician he was whisked away in an ambulance to the intensive care ward where the monitor measured the raggedness of his heart pulsations. When he was finally removed to a private room the doctor gave strict orders that he was not to see any of his business associates or discuss financial affairs. Only his family was admitted and they were restricted to the regular visiting hours.

He found himself eagerly awaiting the arrival of his wife and teen age children. He dreaded to see them go. The television set bored him and the newspaper did not satisfy him. The afternoon of the third day he took the Bible out of the drawer of the bedside stand. He opened it casually and began to read the account of Jesus as given by Luke. In spite of the heavy catalog of names in the family tree of the thirty-year old Jesus, by the time he arrived at the statement of Jesus to the devil that "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God," he was hooked. Later, he said that as he read on, he had the sensation of being a corpse looking at himself in a mirror. He realized that, measured by the criteria of God, he had never really lived at all, but Jesus was revealing him to himself "warts and all."

By the time he left the hospital he was a completely changed man. He now believes that God knocked him down so He could lift him up. As he puts it, "God used a physical heart attack to attack my spiritual heart." One of his associates said, "He is a Bible junkie, as high on the Word as an addict on heroin." He presents a copy of the Bible to every new employee. He teaches a thirty-minute noonday Bible study every Monday in the courtesy room of a Savings and Loan Association of which he is one of the directors. But, best of all, he has time for his wife and children and it is apparent that all of them have entered into a whole new dimension of love. No preacher persuaded the man to commit his life. The words of Jesus penetrated his consciousness, stripped him naked, showed him to himself in his true light and pointed him in the right direction.

Of course Jesus does not just "zap" business executives with the Message. I can testify to that because I know what happened to a construction worker in one of the states of the Great Northwest. He dropped out of school when he was in the sixth grade and "went on the lam." Being a great big overgrown, red-haired, freckle-faced kid, he lied about his age, and got jobs at manual labor in any area to which he drifted. He could not even remember the names of all the towns where he had bedded down. He had worked in beet fields, turkey processing plants, service stations, lumber mills and truck terminals. Somewhere along the way he had developed an insatiable thirst for liquor, and by the time I met him he had become a disreputable, unshaven, tattered tramp who stayed on the job only long enough to get enough money to become tanked and get glassy-eyed drunk.

What I am going to say will sound as incredible to you as it seemed to me at the time. Two men who were formerly "rounders" by their own testimony came to the conclusion that God had called them to work among humanity's flotsam and jetsam, to salvage the human driftwood cast up by the tide of life. When they first saw the man of whom I speak, he was stoned and sleeping on a park bench. They put him into their car and took him to their quarters to sober him up. Gently they told him what Jesus had done for them and how they had been rescued from the pit of hell. At first the man was suspicious and belligerent. But they never gave up and when they began to read the Bible to him he developed a hunger for the truth. When I saw him he was clean and back on the job. He was making good money and using it to help all kinds of needy cases. He told me that he could not resist the teaching about Jesus. He particularly liked the version called Good News for Modern Man, and carried a copy with him to read on the job. He showed me the book and it was underlined on almost every page.

LOVE LETTERS FROM JESUS

The Bible is not a cold and concise code of laws. Jesus did not come to make us great lawyers but good lovers. There is a difference between the state statutes and a love letter from a dear friend. It is at this point many are turned away before they hardly begin to know Jesus. They have been subjected to debates, arguments and hassles over the meaning of this point or that until Jesus is lost in the sectarian shuffle. Reading the Bible is like studying mathematics to many. It is made a methodical, calculating experience, but it is hard to fall in love with a calculator, even if it gives you all the right answers.

It is axiomatic that when you truly love a person you want to please the object of your affection. There is a loyalty about love that expresses itself in devotion and constancy. One who loves Jesus wants to be like Him. Under no circumstances would he deliberately offend Him or bring sadness to Him. But we are subjected to so many pressure groups in our day which seek to use Jesus as a gimmick that it is difficult to truly know Him. Cults and sects pour Jesus into their theological moulds and make plastic reproductions of Him. Sometimes quite literally. The danger is that, almost without thinking, we substitute loyalty to the group for love for Jesus.

Of course we must realize that even while we deplore such misuse and abuse there is in it a subtle but effective tribute to Him. Men realize that Jesus has such power and appeal that you cannot leave Him out of a religious movement and get it off the ground. One may hate to see the face of his favorite football hero on T-shirts, toys and tricycles, but it would not be there if he were not famous. I do not recall seeing a rear bumper sticker with the caption "One Way— Confucius!!" Our task is to separate the real Jesus from the distorted images, so we will not go galloping off over the hill following a phantom. It is for this reason we have the Bible and we should immerse ourselves in its revelation, not because it is good literature, although it is, but because it contains the secret of life— eternal life.

In Times Like These

Contents

Anyone who has lived fifty years has been in two different worlds. The world of the last quarter of the twentieth century is not the world of the first quarter. The century began with philosophers cheerfully predicting the advent of a "golden age." Machines were taking the drudgery out of human labor. New forms of transportation were being invented which were expected to revolutionize travel and the hauling of commodities to market. It was freely believed the skies would be conquered and the ocean would become a highway for sleek ships plying the waters of every continent.

Poverty would be banished. Education would become universal. Illiteracy would disappear. Leisure to be utilized in self-improvement would be increased. It was a dream woven from the fantasy that man was basically good and not evil. Only environment shaped character, and when slums disappeared the slum mentality would disappear with it. Education was the magic wand which could be waved to banish the dirty, the ugly and the unseemly. Man had the potential to change his world and given due exposure to the arts and sciences he would do it.

The dream exploded like a balloon filled with hot air when two conflicts of such magnitude as to deserve the designation World Wars, swept over the globe like the poisoned breath of hell, with a frightful depression sandwiched in between. In the very year that the self-styled "Pastor" Russell, father of the cult now called Jehovah's Witnesses, predicted the times of the Gentiles would be fulfilled and universal peace be ushered in, the first World War broke out. In the United States of America the death of hope was hard and lingering. Woodrow Wilson was elected for a second term on the basis of the shouted slogan, "He kept us out of war." When we entered the rapidly-spreading conflict shortly thereafter we did so in the forlorn hope that we were fighting the war which would end all wars.

The depression served to give the lie to the prophecy that in our land poverty would disappear, lingering only in memory as a crude relic of those days when man had not yet achieved his full potential. Bankrupt financial tycoons dashed themselves to the sidewalk from the windows of palatial suites in skyscrapers. Wealthy men of the year before sold apples on the street corners. Freight trains were filled with gaunt and starving men moving from place to place in the forlorn hope of finding employment. The slightest rumor set off a stampede. Long lines formed at soup-kitchens hastily set up in cities, where one could get a bowl of hot gruel and a crust of day-old bread. The garbage cans in the alley at the rear of hotels and restaurants were thoroughly picked over for the morsels which they held, and for which human beings fought with rodents.

But it was the second World War which finished off the idea that deep down inside of every human being there is a reservoir of good which requires only an emergency to bring it to the surface and relate it to human need. The concept that education, learning in technology, and exposure to theology make it possible for a people to have a polish which reinforces natural moral goodness was buried in the mass graves where thousands had been lined up and methodically shot in the head and were still twitching and groaning when huge bulldozers pushed the cover of dirt in upon their emaciated and skeletal frames. It was wafted away in the blue-gray smoke from the furnaces in concentration camps where human beings were fed to the flames like ranks of cordwood.

Man's inhumanity to man, of which the poet wrote, reached its zenith in Germany, and not in some remote emerging nation seeking to free itself from black magic and voodoo. Here was a nation known for its refinement. Its educational system reached back to the Middle Ages, and under its benign influence illiteracy virtually became nonexistent. Great universities such as those at Marburg, Cologne, Munich, Tubingen, Jena, Berlin and Leipzig had become world-renowned. Heidelberg University, established in 1386, was justly famous.

Germany was the land of Luther and the Reformation. Its populace had been exposed to a culture shaped by theological discussion. Powerful preachers declaimed from the pulpits of great religious edifices. But much of the ritual proved to be superficial and in the showdown with naked power and raw savagery the faith went underground to avoid open encounter.

Out of the experience of war came cynicism and unbelief. The moral code of the past was swept away by the blood of the battlefield. A new order came in on the wings of revolution. Men secretly doubted the existence of a God who remained silent during the holocaust. The world was becoming secularized. The new religion was humanism. An affluent society basked in the sheer enjoyment of things. Hedonism, with its pandering to the sensual became the new philosophy. Once more the slogan of the ancient Epicureans became the guiding light for action. "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we may die."

The spirit of adventure was being smothered by the life of indolence and ease. It sought to exist for awhile in the rarefied atmosphere of self-indulgence but finally gasped its last. In its expiration it took with it man's purpose for existence. The frontiers had disappeared. The land had all been staked out. There were no more rivers to cross and no more mountains to climb.

As the knowledgeable historian reads the daily newspaper and the weekly news magazine he is struck with the fact that what he is reading is not really new. He has read it all before. And as he begins searching for the time in history which provided a preview for the present, it dawns upon him that the era which began with the death of Julius Caesar on the Ides of March, and continued through the first century of the Common Era, was just such a time as this. Increasingly, men with analytical minds who are interpreters, as well as chroniclers of events, are saying this in their books. Even Time magazine in its issue for August 23, 1976, published a bicentennial essay which compared the state of affairs in Rome at her fall with conditions in our society today.

It was this world into which the Son of God descended to become the Son of man. It was this world which was penetrated by the most outstanding missionary who ever lived. And it was this man who, in a letter addressed to residents of the capital of the world government, painted a lurid picture of the degradation and vice which prevailed, and which causes a shudder to go through the frame of the sensitive reader to this day. Against that world, a little minority group made up of social outcasts and virtual unknowns, pitted its strength in a dedicated effort and won! They were soldiers of the cross, an emblem of shame, and they did not stop until that cross was made an ensign of honor and courage.

Theirs was a battle for the minds of men. They were not interested in lowering national banners of cloth and hoisting a literal flag to flap in the breeze above government structures. As one of the soldiers put it, "For though we live in the world we are not carrying on a worldly war, for the weapons of our warfare are not worldly but have divine power to destroy strongholds. We destroy arguments and every proud obstacle to the knowledge of God, and take every thought captive to obey Christ" (2 Corinthians 10:3-5).

This is battlefield talk, but there is one phrase which stands out like a towering peak. Divine power to destroy! This was a search and seizure mission. Those who volunteered for it knew that a malign force was loose in the universe. It enslaved the minds of men and motivated them to every kind of vicious behavior. They designated the hidden and mysterious proponents of that ruthless force as "the world rulers of this present darkness" (Ephesians 6:12). But the battalions of the cross carried no visible weapons. They were out to take thoughts captive and you do not capture thoughts by sword or spear, or by side arms or cannon. And they won the war!

Since the Prince of the Universe is again enlisting troops to battle "the spiritual hosts of wickedness," let us understand the kind of a world in which the ragged remnant won such a victory in Century 1. One historian, Frederic W. Farrar, in a book which he dedicated to his friend Robert Browning, the poet, began with these words: "The epoch which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was an epoch of which the horror and the degradation have rarely been equalled, and perhaps never excelled, in the annals of mankind."

Rome had become a world power but was rotten to the very core. One of the contributing forces to inner corruption was the fact that there were sixty-million slaves in the empire. These had no family, no unifying faith, no hope, and no recognized rights. We get an insight into how slaves were regarded from Marcus Terrentius Varro, who was employed by Julius Caesar to collect and arrange the great memorial library of Rome. Varro himself wrote about 620 books, covering a score of subjects. In a volume on husbandry he divides farm instruments into three categories— the articulate, the inarticulate and the mute. The first comprised the slaves, the second the cattle and asses, and the last the vehicles. A slave was a farm animal, a brute, possessed of the power of speech. He had no more rights than a farm wagon or hay rake.

Marcus Porcius Cato, commonly referred to as "the Elder" to distinguish him from his illustrious great-grandson of the same name, was born on a farm in Tusculum, and grew up in a rural setting. He retained a love for the simple life and became a real enemy of Greek culture which he believed was destroying the very foundation of manliness and virtue. His book De Agricultura advises farmers to discard everything that is incapable of further production. Plows that were broken should be thrown on the scrap-heap. Cattle that were too old to draw a burden should be killed, slaves who were aged and sick should be allowed to starve to death.

As a result of the multiplicity of slaves there were two ensuing conditions which eventually caused the empire to disintegrate. One was the lordly pride of the wealthy nobility which looked upon all work as contemptible and undignified. The upper classes were indolent. They lolled about sumptuous banquet tables, engaged in sexual orgies and excesses, and through gluttony and lust created an age of monotony and despair from which thousands sought escape by suicide.

Those who owned hundreds of slaves had to expand their acreage in order to keep them employed and to feed them. Inflated prices were offered for land and small farmers, previously the backbone of the nation, sold out to syndicates and moved into the cities. Italy was converted from a rural to an urban culture with all of the tragic upsets which occur under such a transformation. Unsuited to city life the peasants became beggars and idlers, demanding that the government furnish them food and games for entertainment. They turned the civic center of Rome into a slum district where they existed in six and seven story insulae, government housing projects which were dirty, miserable and dangerous. Murder and violence became an accepted way of life in the narrow winding rabbit-warren of streets. The "long hot summers" were filled with screams and cries for help which were seldom heeded because of the fear of personal danger from involvement.

Pornography flourished in every form. This word means literally "the writing of harlots," and referred originally to the drawings and suggestive poetry used by prostitutes to lure customers. In the age of the apostles it was rife. A good example is found in the ruins of Pompeii, destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius in 79 A.D., while the apostle John was still living. When the site was excavated in modern times the moral filth and obscenity portrayed upon the walls of the homes and public baths was so vicious that the general public was debarred from access to some areas.

It is generally conceded that the literature started on the road toward utter and fatal degeneracy with the writings of Titus Maccius Plautus, who died less than two centuries before the birth of Jesus. Plautus went to Rome while very young and was employed in a theater. He took the money he made and invested it in a business which ended in bankruptcy, forcing him to secure employment in a mill. It was at this time he decided upon a career of writing comic and satirical plays for the stage. His plots were all based upon love affairs, some of them homosexual in nature. He is credited with more than a hundred productions, some of which were vulgar and bawdy burlesques. He set the tone and prepared the stage and it was climaxed in the sordid fiction of men like Gaius Petronius, who committed suicide the year that Paul was beheaded.

The state of things in the Empire was reflected in the decay of married life and the downfall of the home. In the early days family life was a sacred and treasured heritage. For 520 years divorce was absolutely unknown, until Carvilius Ruga divorced his wife in 234 B.C. This opened the flood-gate and marital fidelity was swept away in the on-rushing tide. Before long, according to Horace and Ovid, Roman poets who lived near the time of Jesus, marriage had fallen into such disrepute that free love was advocated without legal restraint.

Seneca, the philosopher, was contemporary with Paul. He had been recalled from exile by Agrippina, wife of the emperor Caligulus, in 49 A.D. to serve as tutor for Nero. It was Gallic, the brother of Seneca, who was proconsul of Achaia, when Paul was brought before him by a Jewish mob (Acts 18:12). Seneca is an authority for the condition of things at the very time in which we are interested. He declared that "women were married to be divorced, and divorced in order to marry." He also added that noble Roman matrons counted the years not by the Consuls, but by their discarded or discarding husbands.

It is remarkable how the writers of the age emphasize the fact that children were neither wanted nor desired. To have a family was regarded as a serious misfortune. Children were regarded as units of consumption and not production. They acted as drags upon the social life. When there were children they were placed under the care of slaves who were decrepit and useless for other work, and they soon caught the contagion of vice by which they were everywhere surrounded.

In the maelstrom of horror and immorality, of cruelty and sadism, moved the little band of adventurers, who had enlisted under the standard of the crucified One. They knew they were engaged in a war for life and death. Their writings betoken the fact that they recognized themselves as soldiers. Their metaphorical allusions are those of the battle-field. They were fighting the good fight of faith. They endured hardships and combat weariness. There was nothing namby-pamby, wishy-washy or fiddle-faddling about their lives. They were not play-acting. It was for real!

Their persecution was real. They spoke of fiery trials, of suffering and abuse. But they also talked of victory and triumph. They comforted and strengthened one another. And they won the fight. Their voice went out to all the earth and their words to the ends of the world. Now the call comes to you! It comes incessantly! It comes with the fresh breeze of the morning as you awaken. It comes on the night winds that blow outside your window. It is the call to enroll and enlist, to join the martyr-ranks of the ages.

It is the call to identify with the Christ who died, and with the multitude of the living who need Him. No one else can take your place. If you resist and refuse, the ranks will be broken where you ought to be. Rise up above the trivia of daily life and join the force of the world-beaters, the joy-proclaimers, the strangers and pilgrims who are marching toward glory. The new frontier is spiritual! There are undiscovered areas in your own heart and soul. There are depths of being not yet probed. There are soul-heights not yet ascended. Find them and take possession of them for the absent King!

The Real Jesus

Contents

Not long ago I was caught in one of those quick and heavy summer downpours which are so typical of our part of the midwest. I took refuge in a service station from which I could watch the slanted shafts of rain splatter against the concrete, creating a pattern of crazily dancing drops which merged with the gathering run-off draining toward the gutter. The shower lasted only about ten minutes and was succeeded by bright sunshine which caused clouds of steam to rise from the sidewalk.

I resumed my walk almost at once but not before a couple of barefoot boys had launched their paper boats on the rushing torrent swirling along the curb. The water was dirty and filled with debris washed up in its progress. This made no difference to the lads who were following their miniature vessels in great glee. The frail boats were swept along relentlessly, gaining impetus as new freshets swept in to swell the stream from cross streets. When they neared the entrance to the storm sewer their owners tried to rescue them but it was too late. They were swept under by the sucking pull of the current and disappeared from sight.

As I continued on my way I could not help but meditate about the fact that the fragile vessels aptly represented a lot of people whom I knew. One minute they were being borne along gaily on the onrushing tide but the end is certain destruction. There flashed into my mind the image of an attractive girl who grew up in a remote rural area of our state. Her parents were possessed of what is sometimes referred to as "an old-fashioned faith" in God. It was real and genuine. They reared their children to trust in God and took them regularly to a little village church from the time they were old enough to be carried outside the home.

The girl to whom I refer developed a sense of rebellion while still in the consolidated high school to which the bus transported her daily. As she read about the glamorous life in the city, and saw it portrayed on the television screen, she began to feel that she was being cheated. Finally, after a little encounter with her mother over some trivial incident, she ran off and made her way to the city about which she had fantasized. Desperate and lonely she fell for the blandishments of a boy who flattered her, and they were married after she lied about her age to secure a license. In a few months she became pregnant and her husband disappeared as quickly as he learned about her condition.

It is not necessary to detail what happened. With her dream castle shattered into fragments she knew the dark depths of depression. She contemplated taking her life but recoiled from the suicide pit as she lingered on the very rim of it. The thing I cannot understand is, that now, having gone through the ordeal, she has plunged back into the muddy waters again. She is living with a man to whom she is not married, drinking liquor to the excess, getting her nightly entertainment in the cheap music of a local tavern, and staying up until the wee small hours. When I went to talk with her about Jesus she brushed me off. She told me she was living at last and did not want to be bothered. She is a paper ship tossed on a rushing tide and headed for the sewer.

There are millions in our generation who are caught up in the swim and who will continue to be engulfed by the raging waters of vice, drugs or drunkenness. Once when we were at Niagara Falls I was standing on the fenced platform overlooking the rushing cascade. A city policeman was standing next to me and he observed that a great many tourists standing at this vantage point experienced a fatal fascination which created a momentary desire to plunge into the swiftly gliding stream.

It is not only moving water which has such an allure. The surging mass of mankind swept along in the impulse for pleasure, gratification, and earthly recognition draws many a person from a place of safety into the maelstrom which swirls into death. A good example is a former preacher of my acquaintance. Reared in the church he grew up with an ambition to preach, and as soon as he was old enough, enrolled in a school devoted to preparing men for the pulpit. He excelled in courses in the Bible and received special honor as a public speaker. Before he graduated he was offered a pulpit position in a congregation where he had been supplying on weekends. He accepted and married his high school sweetheart who grew up in the same congregation as himself. Together they had sponsored youth meetings and exhibited outstanding ability in working for worthy causes. For five years they were happily joined together and then their marriage began to go sour.

He became involved in an affair with another woman, older than himself, and it became such a matter of public knowledge that he was dismissed. His wife left him and secured a divorce. He began to drift about until finally he married a woman whose husband had divorced her for "cheating" on him. For a long time the former preacher avoided me like the plague. It was this which caused me to be so amazed when a car pulled into my driveway and I saw him emerge.

When we sat down in the livingroom it was evident that he was nervous and fidgety. He clasped and unclasped his fingers. He was perspiring even though the room was not warm. I could see that he was unkempt and no longer the polished professional I knew a few years before. Finally he told me that he simply had to talk to someone. I resolved inwardly to listen without interruption, difficult as it is for me to do so. He poured out a torrent of words. It was obvious he had dammed up the communication stream and now that the floodgate was opened he could not stop. I listened for more than two hours as he painted a picture of his life from his first memory.

He was quite convinced that he had always been a hypocrite, shamming it and playing to the grandstand. Even while preaching the messages which won such approval from the audience, his mind was somewhere else and on other things. It was a sordid story of one who began to read pornographic material and became "hooked" on it. He turned his mind into a pig-sty. He hid "girlie magazines" in the same place where he kept his Bible and sermon materials. The lust which began as a spark became a consuming fire until his influence was destroyed and the hearts of his best friends shattered to fragments by his behavior.

There are some things to learn from these two cases which may not be as rare and exotic as we would like to think they are. Without becoming "preachy" or indulging in "pulpiteering" I would like to point out a few things. Merely attending Sunday School regularly and being exposed to the sheltered environment it provides is no guarantee that one will "turn out right" to use a timeworn expression. Both of those I have mentioned were medal winners for Sunday School attendance. The first one received as a gift a Bible five years straight for perfect attendance.

Certainly we need not sit in judgment upon the worth of the Sunday School, which has had an influence for good upon many. But there is a real question as to what permanent impact is to be derived from merely attending any kind of religious institution and "going through the motions" required to conform to the established pattern. Not long since I was a panel member with an eminent judge of a juvenile court. In response to a question from the audience he said that about as many offenders who stood before him had been reared in Sunday Schools as not. He added, "Character is not formed by institutions such as churches or schools. It is a product of the intimate relationships in the home."

Merely graduating from a school of preaching or standing in the pulpit does not make one good. Putting the old man in a new place will no more change one's life than taking a robber from his prison cell and locking him in a bank vault will transform him. Both of the persons to whom we referred had read the Bible, memorized passages, and said prayers. None of these acted as a bulwark against temptation or sin when the test became great. It is only when such demonstrations are symptoms of the new birth that they are really valid. Turning over a new leaf at intervals is not enough. We must turn up with a new life. It was Billy Sunday who pointed out that taking a man to church will no more make a Christian out of him than taking him to the garage will make an automobile out of him.

Even prayer can become monotonous repetition, a kind of soul-deadening ritual with about as much spiritual value as the chant of a tobacco auctioneer. Jesus said that it was so to the heathen. It is only when prayer becomes one side of a conversation with a loved one that it has meaning. If it is a monologue recited to another out of habit there will be no cleaning, comfort or consolation. It must be a dialogue with full conviction that one's words are heard and a response is given.

Lately the fear has been expressed that, with the advent of so many versions of the Bible, there will be an end to the memorization of scriptural texts. Our more immediate ancestors grew up with but one translation, that authorized by King James to be read in the Anglican churches, and first printed in 1611. It lent itself to memory work since it was in the same stately dialect as that in which Shakespeare wrote. It was poetic and romantic. Families memorized whole chapters, reciting them together in the light from the glowing fireplace in long winter evenings. This was commendable and influenced both thought and literature greatly.

However, we must remember that the mechanical repetition of a great collection of verses means little, and might place one in the same category as others who could reel off the entire collection of Mother Goose rhymes without a hobble. It is possible that memorization may suffer in our day but this means no lessening of interest in the word of God. The very multiplicity of translations is an indication of growing concern for the sacred scriptures. They would not be produced if no one purchased or read them. It is also arguable that those who do read them will be drawn closer to God if they understand what they are reading. To wade through archaic literary forms may discourage some before they are hardly started.

It is possible to have a head full of scriptural quotations and a heart empty of Jesus. The written word was not given to provide an exercise in mental retentiveness but to lead us to moral repentance. It is a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path but we should never become so hung up on the nature of light that we sit down and philosophize about it until we never use our feet or tread the path. One does not spend all of his time gazing at a light or studying it, but busies himself performing his tasks in the glow that it sheds. The purpose of the scripture is to lead us unto Christ, and if we are led somewhere else we have already abused it.

The real spiritual adventure comes when one is personally identified with Jesus in the task of world conquest. Because this is a spiritual warfare and there are no battlefields bathed in gore or bestrewn by corpses grown rigid in grotesque shapes we may be prone to undervalue its importance. The fact is that it is the ultimate struggle, destined to end in world sovereignty for one Person. Every intelligent being in heaven, on earth, and in the nether regions will acknowledge His right to reign. Every knee shall bow. Every tongue will confess. To be a part of this Grand Design is to be involved in the glorious hope, the brilliant future.

This raises a real question. Why is it that those who hear about Jesus do not all come to Him? Why is it that some who have answered His call desert Him when the going gets tough or they become weighted down with their own shortcomings. I think the answer lies in the fact that the first hear about Jesus but never hear Him. He is presented as a hero in the past, a crusader who flung down the gauntlet to clerical rip-off artists in the temple who exploited the poor, or as a legendary figure who performed great feats that astonished the populace. To a secularistic age He appears as a kind of combination Robin Hood and Paul Bunyan.

There are a lot of things to distort the image of Jesus and keep us from seeing Him as He is. The modern church often comes between a man and Jesus. He must be looked at through sectarian lens ground to a traditional prescription. His teaching must be put through a theological meat grinder and moulded into sermon-wrapped patties of orthodoxy before being peddled for public consumption. The result is a world which has no clear picture of what Jesus said and even less of an idea what He meant by what He said.

It is a rather common fallacy to suppose that the new covenant scriptures as presently compiled, constitute a written code of laws and provide a meticulous pattern of forms, structures and ceremonies, to be rigidly enforced in all ages. Such a position always ends in the concept that a proper relationship to the Father of all mercies can only be maintained by conformity with the deductions and interpretations of each sect, and since these differ, division is assured and perpetuated.

The tragedy of the legalistic view is that it promotes strife among the more ardent students of scripture. The unconcerned and indifferent have no real interest in the study of revelation. The debates about meanings are carried on by clergymen, specialists who devote years of research to the text, not necessarily to walk closer to Jesus, or to develop a greater measure of compassion, but to defend partisan viewpoints. This results from an unhealthful and unscriptural view of the purpose of the new covenant scriptures which were intended, not to separate brother from brother, but to guide all into a more meaningful relationship with Jesus through the indwelling Holy Spirit.

None of us can be sure of how our Lord would deal with some of the situations which confront us in this technological era. There are issues with moral overtones for which no specific solutions are provided in the Word of God. The apostles never confronted some of them. Jesus has left us no bill of particulars and has given us no legal code with all of the contingencies spelled out in fine print or explained in footnotes. We do not even have a biography providing a complete account of his life upon earth. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John had no intention of giving us a history of His career. With one exception they skip over thirty years of a life that lasted even less than thirty-four years. They merely set forth those events which would provide proof to a rational mind that He was who He claimed to be, the Son of God! They later admitted that Jesus did many things they did not chronicle and said, "But there are many other things which Jesus did; were everyone of them to be written, I suppose that the world itself could not contain the books that could be written" (John 21:25). This means there is much more about the visit of Jesus on earth that we do not know than there is that we do know.

The same thing holds true with the letters written by the apostles. All of these were sparked by human situations and predicaments. After Paul had dealt with a number of the problems which plagued God's people in Corinth, he wrote, "About the other things I will give directions when I come" (1 Cor. 11:34). We do not know what the other things were and we do not know what directions were given.

When John wrote to a prominent sister in Christ and her children, he concluded his brief letter with the words, "Though I have much to write unto you, I would rather not use pen and ink, but I do hope to come and see you and talk with you face to face, so that our joy may be complete" (2 John 12). To Gaius, whom he admired, the aged apostle wrote, "I had much to write to you, but I would rather not write with pen and ink; I hope to see you soon, and we will talk together face to face" (3 John 13, 14). Perhaps it is as well that he did not write more. The religious world has been fighting for centuries over the little he did write.

God does not deal with us in these last days as with children. He has not supplied us a rule book with appendices in which every phase of spiritual activity is spelled out for us in detailed specifications. We must ascertain those principles which governed our Lord and apply them as best we can in the Jet Age which is far removed from the days of Herod Agrippa and Pontius Pilate. Fortunately those principles have never been abrogated by heaven nor superseded by any superior wisdom of mankind. We can, by a proper study of the greatest life ever to bless this earth, learn that personal approach which will be best for us during our brief life span. I should like to suggest a few things which appear to me to have relevance for our day. I believe they will help us to better manifest that spirit exhibited by our Lord, in his contact with the problems to which we are heir by being in this kind of world.

1. Jesus exhibited a genuine sense of priority values. He did not recognize every command of God as of equal weight and significance. He knew there were certain requirements that were central to our relationship while others were peripheral. When a lawyer asked Him which was the greatest commandment in the law Jesus did not say there was no such thing. Instead He recited the command to love God. He said, "This is the first and great commandment." He then gave the second and said it was like the first, "You shall love your neighbor as your self." He added an important comment, "On these two hang all the law and the prophets."

This is a forceful statement because it shows that love for God and neighbor is basic. From these two commands every other thing required is suspended. One might break the formal and ritualistic requirements and while he would be held accountable for these infractions the relationship would remain intact, but if he rejected or violated the foundational requirements the whole structure would tumble in disarray. The lawyer was discerning enough to see this. He replied, "Master, you have spoken the truth . . . to love God . . . and to love your neighbor as yourself— that is far more than any burnt offerings or sacrifices." The record says, "When Jesus saw how sensibly he answered, he said to him, "You are not far from the kingdom of God."

The converse of this must be true so that when a man regards ritual and ceremonial requirements as being on par with personal relationship to God and his brethren he is a long way from the kingdom. One nears the kingdom, according to Jesus, when he sensibly approaches the problem of our relationship as contrasted with legal demands. Yet most of the divisions in the family of God have been caused by some aspect of tragic error at this juncture. Jesus knew that the law was given by God but He knew there were weightier matters than some of the keen points of distinction which had been arrived at by the scrupulous legalistic minds of the scribes. All truth is equally true but it is not all equally important. It is true that "Methuselah lived 969 years and he died," but that is not nearly so important as the fact that Jesus died for my sins. One is as Biblical as the other, but one is not as weighty as the other in the divine-human relationship.

2. Jesus evaluated the relationship with a brother as taking precedence over a formal act of religious service. "If you are offering your gift at the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar and go; first be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift." The altar was ordained of God. It was the very center of expression of national worship. The most important religious ritual was to be interrupted to establish a proper relationship with a brother. Jesus would never have considered that a thing was settled so long as division existed between brethren.

Sacrifice at the altar was intended to bridge the chasm between man and God which was caused by transgression. But if there was a rift between man and man it must be spanned first. The apostle John declared, "If a man does not love his brother whom he has seen, how can he love God whom he has not seen?" Again he writes, "By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (1 John 3:16). In a certain place in the southern part of Missouri there is a great bridge over the mighty Mississippi River. But before one can cross it from the west he must first cross another little bridge over a creek. If he refuses to drive across the first he has no access to the second. It is this way with the kingdom of heaven. I become worthy to approach God by appreciating the worth of my brethren to me— and to God!

3. Jesus recognized that man was not made for religion, but religion was made for man, and the ultimate expression of religion is doing good for needy mankind. One sabbath while they were going through the grainfields, the disciples plucked off heads of grain, rubbed off the husks between their palms, blew away the chaff, and ate the grain. The sharp-eyed Pharisees immediately called to the attention of Jesus that His followers were doing what was not lawful on the sabbath. Here was a clearcut confrontation between law and human hunger, between a statute and starvation.

Jesus went to the very heart of the matter. He did not cavil about the existence of the law. He did not argue the validity of their interpretation. He did not engage in a long-winded wrangle to show that they were guilty of like infractions. Instead he pointed to the attitude of David when he was being hounded by Saul. Here was one who was universally honored. He was the first king of the house of Judah. Jesus recalled that when David "was in need and was hungry" he entered the very precincts of the house of God and there ate the bread of the Presence, which it was not lawful for any but the priests to eat.

This teaching was revolutionary to the legalistic sticklers of that day. All legalism sacrifices human need to ceremonial observance. The life, and even the soul of a man is worthless compared to "obeying the letter of the law." Let the law be upheld at all costs, regardless of human suffering or inner turmoil. Men are but machines, mere robots to perform stated acts. A good illustration in our own days is that of a preacher who was speaking to a rural congregation in Arkansas about the imperative of coming every Sunday to share in the communion of the Lord's Table. He declared that nothing must ever interfere with the attempt to attend "every time the doors are opened." He declared that if his doctor forbade him to go on Sunday morning, he would get up and dress and walk as far toward the meetinghouse as possible, then he would crawl as long as he could, and if he died he would expire with his right hand stretched out toward what he mistakenly referred to as "the house of God."

Such absurd reasoning was directly contradicted by Jesus when He declared, "The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath." The goal of the revealed faith is not to increase one's already heavy burdens. It is to develop one in all of his faculties and potentials to the highest possible level. It is to encourage and assist him in the arrival at that place where his personality fulfils the divine responsibility which is his to bear. When religion becomes destructive of the finer virtues, when it engenders hatred, animosity and carping criticism, when it drives apart those who claim to love Jesus, instead of drawing them closer together, it is prostituted to the baser elements of our earthbound existence.

It is a sad error to mistake being loyal to a party or to partisan traditions with being loyal to Jesus and the ideals which He espoused and for which He died. It is possible that nothing else in our day so stands in the way of genuine Christian living as sectarian prejudice. It places a blind-fold over the mind shutting out the light of truth. It acts as a shackle for the heart making further progress impossible. We need men who will rise above narrow concepts of brotherhood and restore to our aching hearts the real Jesus, in all the glory and majesty of that divine love which sent him to an unworthy world filled with sinners.

4. Jesus intimated that the ability to love may be in proportion to a recognition of the need for forgiveness. One who feels he is so good that he requires little mercy from God will have but meager compassion for others. Such a person lavishes all his love upon himself and has but a small surplus to share with anyone else. George Herbert, the English poet, who died in 1633, wrote: "He that cannot forgive others, breaks the bridge over which he himself must pass if he would ever reach heaven; for every one has need to be forgiven."

One of the most touching things in the life of Jesus on earth occurred one day when he was the guest of a prominent Pharisee. The table was surrounded with a select group of diners when someone conveyed the news to a streetwalker that Jesus was in the house. She edged her way through the door carrying an alabaster flask of ointment and came quickly to the place where Jesus reclined while partaking of the feast. Weeping copiously, her tears fell upon the feet of Jesus, whereupon she used her long hair as a towel and dried them, after which she stooped and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the costly perfume.

The host was astounded, but said nothing aloud. Instead he spoke to himself, "This man cannot be a prophet for if he were he would know who and what sort of woman this is who is touching him, and he would never have allowed a prostitute to touch him, let alone kissing his feet." Jesus understood what he was saying as if he had produced audible words, for the record says that Jesus answered him. His answer was a story, "Simon, a certain creditor had two debtors; one owed five hundred denarii, and the other fifty. When they could not pay, he forgave them both. Now which one of them will love him more?" The Pharisee replied, "I suppose the one to whom he forgave more." Jesus replied, "You answered correctly."

Then, after mentioning how remiss the Pharisee had been in common courtesy, Jesus said, "I tell you, her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much; but he who is forgiven little, loves little." If we would develop a love to share we must begin with a sense of our own need. He who comes short of recognizing his own shortcomings will come up short in bestowing love. Regardless of the gravity of our sins if we come to Jesus in loving compassion He may say to us as He did to the griefstricken harlot, "Your faith has saved you; go in peace." What an adventure came to her that day in such hostile surroundings.

Tuning In and Turning On

Contents

When Richard M. Nixon was preparing to visit China during his abbreviated term as president a great deal was at stake. There had been no diplomatic relations with this Communist country for many years. It became necessary for the president to brief himself as thoroughly as possible on all of the political ramifications involved, as well as to take a "cram course" on Chinese customs and etiquette. Even a slight mistake by our head of state might be regarded as a reflection against the Chinese. Information bulletins were prepared by experts in Oriental thought, and the president read them avidly.

Now suppose you became very serious about your role as the representative of the heavenly head of state in this alien world where you have been dispatched as a foreigner and pilgrim. You realize that your behavior is being observed by spies of "the prince of this world" and that any thoughtless utterance or unscrupulous act will be used, not only to hurt your personal reputation but as a reflection against Him who has sent you as His emissary. Even your life may be at stake. So you go to experts who have spent years in the service of the Sovereign and have carefully studied His declarations and instructions and ask if there is a brief summary which puts the whole thing in succinct form.

In all probability they would unanimously suggest that you read what is popularly designated the "Sermon on the Mount." This may be a misnomer. The word sermon does not appear in the Bible. Origen has been called "the father of the sermon" and he was not born until about 185 A.D. When we hear the word "sermon" we conjure up a mental image of a man trained in the art of homiletics standing behind a rostrum on a raised platform. But Jesus simply sat down on a rocky hillside and shared with people. He was "the Way, the Truth and the Life" and what the "Way-shower" shared was truth and life. There is some evidence that the people in our day have been preached to death instead of taught how to live.

Frequently we leave a "religious service" today unchanged and unaffected. A great deal of that may be our fault. We have been taught to be present at such events as an obligation to God. We attend as a kind of duty and when we have discharged that duty we go home and resume our routine. We have "paid our debt to society" and we are free from interference for another week. A junior High school class was discussing heaven when a boy raised his hand and asked, "Will we have to go to church when we get to heaven?" The teacher replied, "No, that will all be over!" "Hey," the kid said, "I'll bet that's what makes it heaven."

There's no use of denying that "going to church" is a drag for a lot of people. It is something to be endured and not to be enjoyed. I know a scientist who says that the only way he can hang on is to switch his mind to another channel when the preacher gets up to speak. It was not that way with Jesus in his open air address. When He concluded the people were astonished at his teaching. They compared it to that with which they were accustomed in the synagogue and concluded there was an air of authority about it which they had never seen demonstrated by any other teacher.

Nineteen hundred years have faded into the gray haze of history since that day but people are still astonished by what Jesus said. Books have been written about it. Classes have studied it meticulously. Sermons have been preached on its content. It is inexhaustible. The past generations have not wrung it dry. Ours will not do so either. The air of authority still clings to it. It is not an authority enforced by smoking cannon, or by what Kipling calls "reeking tube and iron shard." It is not an authority of stern looks or jutting jaw. It is not "cracking the whip." It is the pervasive authority of truth and life. With Jesus these were not just ideas to be discussed. They constituted not so much an exposition of His thinking as an exposure of His being.

Tradition has it that the mountain on which Jesus spoke was the one called Horns of Hattin, not very far from Capernaum. For centuries it has been designated "Mount of the Beatitudes." No one can be certain of the site and it is just as well. Each one of us must toil up his own slope to sit at the feet of Jesus. For some it will be a steep and toilsome trip up the side of a mountain of sorrow, or of frustration, or of disappointment and clutching fear. It is never the mount of blessing going up. It is only after Jesus speaks that it becomes so. When the disciples walked up the mountain it was the Horns of Hattin. It was as they were coming down they realized it was the mount of blessing.

I have been in a lot of public speaking classes. In every one of them there comes a time when you consider the construction of an effective speech. A good deal of discussion centers around the introduction. You are taught that you must secure the attention of your listeners. You must strike a match before you can build a fire. Jesus ignored all of the attention getters. He did not thank the people for their presence. That would have been too much like a shepherd thanking the sheep for gathering around the feed trough. He did not express appreciation for their willingness to travel such a distance. That would have been like thanking the hardy men who gathered at Sutler's Fort, near Sacramento, in 1849, as part of the gold rush. It is natural for people to go a long way in spite of suffering and privation when treasure awaits. I'm glad that Jesus did not open with the latest "preacher's joke."

He began sharing with the word "blessed" and repeated it eight more times. The first nine sentences begin with this word. That is why these statements are called "the beatitudes" from the Latin original which means consummate bliss. It is not my intention here to analyze the various kinds of persons who are said to be blessed the poor in spirit, those who mourn, the meek, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers and the persecuted. Other writers with far more ability than I will ever possess have already done that many times. I am indebted to them. Such writers do not create the fountain of truth but they do graciously provide cups so the rest of us can drink.

I do want to say a little about the original for the word "blessed." It is makarios, and it appears 49 times in the new covenant scriptures. In the Authorized Version it is rendered blessed 43 times and happy 6 times. Like so many Greek terms it is difficult for us to find an exact equivalent for it in modern English. It will help us to remember that this was the word used to describe the gods who were conceived of as dwelling in palaces of dazzling splendor far removed from all of the problems and pains to which the dwellers in the flesh were subject. To those who were favored by the gods makarios was granted. It was not something one earned or deserved. It was a gift from on high, a sharing of the life of the deities.

Jesus was the only real authority on sharing the life of God who ever lived on earth. He did not descend from the brow of fabled Olympus peopled with imaginary gods and goddesses, but from heaven itself. He had shared the life of the one true and living God. He could say, "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (John 17:5). When Jesus used the word makarios as a sharing in the bliss which God alone could bestow He was speaking of something which He experienced, and which is now made available unto peacemakers and persecuted ones.

Several years ago someone sent me a little paperback book with the title "The Secret of Happiness." Since that is a secret which all of us would like to discover I read the book through in one sitting. The author was an excellent writer and what he wrote interested me. The book was an exposition of the beatitudes and it was done in a refreshing way. One should be careful of criticizing the literary efforts of others, especially when his own are often mediocre, but I want to question the use of "happiness" as a rendering of makarios.

I have already mentioned that the Authorized Version uses the word "happy" six times. Apparently the sober scholars appointed by King James felt that it would be more appropriate to the context in other places. A good many modern translations use "happy" instead of "blessed" throughout the preamble of the talk by Jesus. A good example is the Good News Bible. One reason for that may be that everyone is "gung-ho" for happiness but few are searching for a blessing. We have swung so far that sometimes we employ the latter in exactly the opposite sense. When I asked a distraught mother what she did when her little ragamuffin tramped through her kitchen leaving a muddy trail to mark his progress to the bathroom, she replied, "I gave him a good shaking and blessed him out!" That hardly indicates a happy state of affairs.

There is a lot of shallow thinking about happiness in our day. I recently read on a card, "The five secrets of happiness are money, money, money, money, money." But it is not our reduction of the depth of the word which makes me doubt its validity as a translation of makarios. "The word happiness comes from the root hap which means chance, or luck. There was no element of chance in the term Jesus employed. It was not dependent upon the smile of "Lady Luck" the patron saint of gamblers.

Happiness, as we use the term, is too greatly affected by external circumstances. If there is a fortuitous concourse of things, if they all come together, they bring happiness. If everything seems to go wrong or fall apart we are not happy and we show it. On a box of cake mix produced by a famous flour manufacturer appears the statement, "All ingredients included!" That is true of makarios. It contains all the elements of joy in itself. They constitute its essence.

The special brand of bliss which is God's gift to us is described by William Barclay as "serene, untouchable, and self-contained." It is the lot of those whom men revile, persecute, and against whom they say all manner of evil falsely, for the sake of Jesus. Such victims of "man's inhumanity to man" are actually told to rejoice and be exceeding glad. I never read this that I do not think of Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley who were burned at the stake in 1555, during the reign of Mary Tudor, sometimes called "Bloody Mary." When the two were tied to their stakes with the faggots heaped about their feet, Latimer looked over at his companion and said, "Be of good cheer, Master Ridley, we shall this day kindle a fire in England which shall not be put out." Be of good cheer while waiting for the fire to sear your flesh!

What an adventure of the spirit to place oneself in such a state as to prepare himself for the kind of bliss which is unaffected by false accusation, cruel suffering, or impending death. I once knew a man who craved righteousness with such hunger and thirst that his friends and relatives thought he was a fanatic. They warned me against him and said, "Don't pay any attention to him. He's off in the upper story and reads the Bible and prays all of the time." I found him a gentle soul, harmless and undefiled. He was a vegetarian and would eat no animal flesh because he did not want something to be slaughtered so he could live.

He appeared oblivious of the slights of those about him. He prayed for his neighbors by name every night. If he forgot one of them, he would say "Father, I think I overlooked George, but I did not intend to do so. Please include him also." One day he became violently ill and when he was discovered lying in the yard he was taken to the hospital. I visited him there the day before he died. He said to me, "I'm not afraid to go. I've got my reservation. I will have my hunger satisfied and my thirst quenched. I'll be filled just like He promised."

It has always been interesting to me that immediately after Jesus finished His comments about the bliss of those who are tuned in to God's purpose in the world. He told us what His followers were. He used two illustrations. Both of them relate to things which we merely take for granted and seldom think about. We could not live without them but we accept them, often without a second thought. The first is salt. Jesus did not say that His followers ought to be salt or should be. He said "You are the salt of the earth." Salt is not something you try to become in Christ. It is what you are in Christ.

In the illustrations Jesus used there was always a relationship between the things employed and that which they were intended to portray. We can conclude that salt possessed certain characteristics attributed to the disciples. It will help us to list a few of them.

1. Salt was precious in the days of Jesus. This may be hard for us to realize when we can go to the market and buy a sizeable box of the refined product for a matter of a few cents. The former value of it can be at least partially understood when we remember that our word salary literally means "payment in salt." It is derived from the fact that included in the payment of a Roman soldier was a salt allowance. To this day we say of one who does not measure up that "he is not worth his salt." One of our highest tributes to a person is to say he is "the salt of the earth."

So precious was salt to our pioneers they often risked death from Indians by going to a salt spring or lick, where they camped out for days while boiling the water in huge kettles to evaporate it away and leave the grayish deposit of crystals in the bottom of the vat. It will help us to realize that God called us unto Himself because we are precious unto Him. In fact, it could be said of us as it was of Israel, in the days of old, "You are precious in my eyes, and honored, and I love you" (Isaiah 43:4). If we are so valuable in the sight of our Creator we ought never to cheapen ourselves, or take ourselves lightly.

2. Salt was the best preservative known in the time of Jesus. Sometimes when a corpse was to be transported a long distance by the slow methods of transportation then available it was packed in salt. It was this quality, no doubt, which caused covenants or compacts which were to be enduring, to be ratified by the parties involved eating salt together. The covenant made between God and Israel was such a covenant and salt had to accompany every cereal offering as a token of it. "You shall season all your cereal offerings with salt; you shall not let the salt of the covenant with your God be lacking from your cereal offering; with all your offerings you shall offer salt" (Leviticus 2:13). In 2 Chronicles 13:5 it is said that God gave the kingship over Israel for ever to David and his sons by a covenant of salt. As the maker of that covenant God would protect and preserve it.

Those of our readers who grew up in a rural setting in an earlier day when farmers slaughtered their own animals for the family larder know how important salt was. The meat was packed in salt which it absorbed, then taken out and smoked over a slow fire of hickory, sassafras, or some other aromatic wood.

The righteous are the ones who preserve the earth. In the days of Noah the wickedness of man became so great that God resolved to destroy him from the face of the earth. God withdrew the salt from the mass of corruption in order to preserve life and eight souls stood between life and extinction.

Noah and his family were the salt of the earth. Ten righteous souls would have preserved Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboiim from the desolation wrought upon them by fire rained down from heaven.

It is the righteousness of the few and not the profligacy of the many which keeps families and nations from being blotted out. It is for this reason the "salt" should never become discouraged. Salt does not make a lot of noise. It does not whip up a lot of excitement. It works quietly, gently, but effectively, and it preserves our culture from further decay and disintegration.

3. Salt was a purifying agent in the days of Jesus. W. E. Vine writes, "In the Lord's teaching it is also symbolic of that spiritual health and vigor essential to Christian virtue and counteractive of the corruption that is in the world." It was believed to possess antiseptic qualities and when a soldier received a spear wound the hole in the flesh was often tamped full of salt to prevent infection.

The Jews may have come to think of salt as a therapeutic prescription because of an incident in the life of Elisha while he was at Jericho. The men of the place came to him and pointed out that the city was an attractive place to live except for the fact the land was unproductive and the spring which furnished water was dangerous. The implication is that they credited the water with the death of some individuals and with causing abortions. Elisha asked them to put salt in a bowl and bring it to him. After throwing the salt in the spring he told them the Lord declared the water would not again cause death or miscarriages. The chronicler adds, "And that water has been pure ever since, just as Elisha said it would be" (2 Kings 2:22).

Every disciple who has not lost his saltness has experienced how his presence helps to purify conditions. I was in a state on the west coast when I was invited to talk at a Bible Club meeting at a community high school. Because the administration would not consent to a meeting during regular school hours these young people had to meet at 6:30 o'clock in the morning. I went expecting to find a dozen sleepy-eyed persons. I was surprised to find more than a hundred gathered in the music room engaged in singing lively choruses. I heard them pray for their school, the teachers and the students out of Christ. Later, when I talked to the mayor and chief of police they told me that the group had such an impact that teen-age crime and vandalism had been reduced to the vanishing point. The salt had purified the area.

A young girl who became a committed follower of Jesus Christ became aware of how the language of her fellow-workers in a restaurant was purged by her presence. At first she endured a great deal of jesting and subtle ridicule. Gradually this ceased and when it became obvious that she was seriously in earnest the obscene and suggestive language halted.

4. Salt increased the palatability of food. All of us have eaten attractively prepared food in which the cook had forgotten to put salt. It tastes flat and insipid. We feel a sense of compassion for one who has to be on a salt-free diet. Life without the Christian influence is also flat. I know a man who dreads to see Sunday come. He says that it gives him a first-class case of "the blahs." It seems like the longest day in the week. He is glad when it is over and he can get back to work. I do not share his feeling. Sunday is a great day for me. It is a time of spiritual uplift and rich blessing. To be able to gather in remembrance of one's dearest friend with others who also know Him, is a tremendous experience. Of course the edge is taken off when liturgy and formality kill the spark of spontaneity, but even then one can return home with his inner feelings aroused and his heart beating a little faster.

Sometimes life becomes a little hard and difficult. One may suffer loss, or become frustrated and despondent. But if he knows Jesus, the Holy Spirit dwells in his heart for just such emergencies. I am acquainted with a man who says prayer is "opening up the valve." He lives in an older house which is heated with hot water radiators. When the temperature becomes noticeably chill he opens up the valve a little and soon the room is comfortable. In the same way when his spiritual life cools off he intercedes with God in prayer and he is soon circulating warmth to others. It is easier to bear suffering if one comes in contact with God's salt.

It bothers a great many people that Christians seem to have so little influence upon the world in general. Sin continues unabated. Crime statistics are often frightening. Vice stalks the streets with brazen indifference. Why does the salt have so little impact? There is no simple answer. But it must not be forgotten that salt will do no good while huddling in the shaker. And a great many in our day are trapped inside of religious structures. Here they hold services rather than rendering them. They carry on religious exercises while the world is dying at the doorstep. Lewis Mumford in Faith for Living calls the institutionalized forms of religion "a mere husk of habit." The salt needs to be shaken out of its complacency and apathy.

Jesus speaks of salt that is tasteless because it has lost its saltness. He declares it is no longer good for anything except to be thrown out and trodden underfoot by man. In his book New Light on the Gospels, Clifford A. Wilson says it was a Jewish tradition that when salt became unfit for use on sacrifices it was sprinkled upon the temple steps in rainy weather to keep the priests from slipping. William Barclay refers to a statement in the book Jesus of Palestine by E. F. F. Bishop in which it is said that a thick bed of salt was placed in the outdoor clay ovens to retain the heat of the stones for baking. When it was no longer fit it was dragged out and thrown on the roadway.

It is not enough for Jesus to say, "You are the salt of the earth." The expression has become so commonplace we can mouth it utterly unconscious of any responsibility to the salt we talk about. I must say "I am the salt of the earth" and you must do the same. Then we must begin to act like salt, searching out areas of need where we can supply what is lacking. It is up to those of us who are disciples. No other provision has been made. Jesus does not say "If the salt has lost its strength, I shall have to try something else!" There is nothing else! It is you or nothing! If you fail the question is "With what shall the earth be salted?" The answer is that it will not be. You are the last divine thrust into the world! Jesus was the Son of God made flesh. You are flesh made a son of God.

We must not terminate our little study without paying attention to the statement "You are the light of the world." Someone has pointed out that this may well be the greatest compliment Jesus ever paid to man. In it we are called to be what He was. In our day of well-lighted homes, offices, parking lots and highways, it is almost impossible for us to imagine the kind of world through which Jesus walked at night. Nothing was a greater blessing than light.

The Authorized Version uses the word "candle" but this is incorrect. The art of candlemaking had not yet developed. Archbishop Trench in his Synonyms of the New Testament points out that the original Greek word luchnos is not a candle but "a handlamp fed with oil." Such lamps were made of clay moulded to shape. Sometimes a half of an oyster shell was drafted into use. In an emergency, a potsherd picked up at the village well or town garbage dump might be pressed into service. The depression was filled with olive oil and a wick of twisted cloth inserted into it and lighted. Such a lamp was placed upon a stand so the light would be diffused at a greater radius.

Because of its great value light became the subject of poetry and song. In many areas of paganism it was worshiped. One thing was obvious. A light could not kindle itself. It had to be started by a power outside of and beyond itself. Mythology attributed the origin of fire and light to the gods. When Jesus came to assert that His disciples were the light of the world. He was aware of the almost superstitious respect for light. He knew they had not kindled the light by their own goodness. He was "the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." The glory for their light belonged to the Father of lights. The lamps were mere vessels to bear the light.

It is all very well for us to talk about being modest and retiring but we must not use these terms to justify concealment of the light. A light that is not seen is not a light. Nothing stands out at night more than a city which is set on an elevated plateau. Anyone who has driven across the western plains country at night knows how far a city can be seen and how many miles must be driven before the environs are reached. God does not intend for us to cower in the shadows.

The greatest fear in primitive times was that the lamp would become extinguished. The invention of phosphorus matches which could be ignited with friction, by the English chemist John Walker, in 1827, took away that concern. Now every restaurant of note has books of safety matches as free promotional material. But in the days of Jesus when the family was to be away from the house for a little while the lamp was taken from its stand and placed on the floor where a meal tub (as the New English Version has it) was turned upside down over it. This protected the lamp from a draft of wind if the door was opened.

When the family was present and needed light no one would think of putting a basket or other container over it. The point of Jesus is that the world is desperately in need of light and it is no time to obscure or conceal ours under a thousand things which would render our testimony ineffective. We need to investigate everything with which we find ourselves becoming involved or preoccupied. It could be that Satan has planted a "meal tub" in our way.

It is a rather common thing to see those who stand alone in dark places become discouraged because one light seems so inconsequential in the immensity of the enshrouding darkness. Such lack of faith is hardly justifiable. If the light goes out the scope and intensity of the darkness is but intensified. If the light is kept burning it may be used to kindle others. Recently I was present in an audience of more than four hundred persons, each of whom had a small candle at his plate at the banquet table. At a given signal all of the lights were turned off and Stygian blackness prevailed. The moderator lighted his candle and from it lighted one at the front table. The light was passed on from hand to hand until the hundreds of candles were burning and the darkness fell away. All of the light began with one tiny flame.

A light is simply expected to shine where it is without consideration of or concern for the darkness. No darkness can ever overcome light. It is as true of us as it was of Jesus. "The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has never put it out" (John 1:5. Today's English Version). One who is the light of the world can go into any situation with an absolute trust that victory is on his side. Darkness is helpless against light.

God made no provision for lamps that have burned themselves out. He did not conceive of a congregation of blackened wicks in the reflected glow of a professional "light." It was never the divine plan for lamps to contribute all of their oil to one big lamp which was expected to shine upon a house of empty ones. The fact is that every disciple is expected to have the power to ignite someone else. That we have to be "turned on" periodically or "fanned into flame" or "revived" annually is not an indication of our faith but of our lack of it. The gauge of the success of a revival is not the number of persons packed in for the body count at a special entertainment. It is simply that no other revival is ever needed.

The very word revival is a dead give away. It literally means to restore to consciousness or life, to reanimate. It is an admission that someone is either unconscious or dead. Men trained in lifesaving techniques do not run around giving artificial respiration to healthy persons. To allow our lamps to go out or burn so low that we need to secure a lamp-lighter to come in and replenish the oil and trim the wicks is a reflection against the Father of lights. Satan has betrayed us into retreating from the scene on the ground that we are too weak and helpless to cope. It is time we rejected that spirit of defeatism once and for all.

No Place to Flee

Contents

I have a friend who realized a long-time ambition a few years ago. He had always wanted to own and personally manage a small motel. When he retired at the age of sixty, after forty years of employment with one company, he and his wife began to travel throughout the United States. One evening they came to his "dream castle," a thirty-six unit motel nestled against the base of a mountain in one of our western states. After staying all night in one of the comfortable rooms he began negotiations early the next morning with a view to purchasing the place. Before the day ended he had bought it and it has proven to be a successful venture.

This man is a dedicated student of the Bible. He never retires at night without reading the Book. The result is that he tends to think in Bible terms. His comparisons are often Biblically based. Not long ago he told me he thought Bible students could be described in the same three categories in which he mentally thinks of his guests. The latter he thinks of as rock-hounds, vista-viewers, and tourists.

Rock-hounds stay in his accommodations because they are in search of semi-precious stones which they can polish and sell or add to a private collection. Each morning they head out to a nearby lode and dig out pebbles which they examine meticulously to determine their constituency and value. Vista-viewers are not interested in such a concentrated study. They climb to vantage points from which they can look at faraway peaks or see the beauty of a wide sweep of country.

Tourists are simply on a trip through the area. Those who are independent quickly survey the terrain and go on their way, satisfied that they have logged another area in their record. Those who are on a group tour are shepherded by a guide who takes them to the right places, gives his formal spiel and gets them all back on the chartered bus to journey on to the next scheduled stop.

There are Bible "rock-hounds" who search for interesting and unique words in the treasure trove of scripture. They dig deep and uncover some rare gems. Nothing is more fascinating than a study of the derivation and history of words. I am intrigued when I sit down with A Theological Word Book of the Bible by Alan Richardson, or pick up my copy of New Testament Words by William Barclay. These men pry loose from their moorings truths previously hidden from my sight. They provide new insights upon the language of the Holy Spirit. As one eminent writer has put it, words are "fossil poetry."

Not every person is adapted to the discipline of such investigative exercise. Sometimes their mental muscles are too weak and flabby to permit digging beneath the surface. They like to view the mountain peaks of sacred history as part of a great panorama. The creation of man, the flood of Noah, the call of Abraham, the life of Moses— all of these themes are attractive and they focus their view upon them. Their interest leads them to list persons and events important to God's unfolding purpose, but they are not really researchists.

The tourists travel through the Book, often at a certain rate per day. Like one who calculates his mileage before he leaves home on vacation they cover so many chapters each week, pausing only briefly to survey the items of interest. Their chief aim is to say they have been there when someone mentions a spot, whether it means anything to them or not. Those who are on a conducted tour simply go where a preacher or teacher takes them with an itinerary furnished in advance. They listen to the description or explanation and move on to the next location.

I am not sure that those of us who are thinking together in reading this book can conveniently be filed away in one of the three pigeon-holes dreamed up by my friend. There is a temptation to linger with the "Sermon on the Mount" and probe into every aspect of it, but that is not our real purpose. We are rather on a journey to discover the adventure involved in attuning our hearts to a divine dimension which will make it possible to share a transcendent experience above and beyond the fleshly or sensual plane.

This requires a familiarization with Jesus as a person, living in the same kind of environment with which we must cope, until freed from it by the experience we call death. Jesus did not enter the earthly sphere to live in a kind of splendid isolation or to become a glorified hermit. He built no monastic retreat upon Mount Hermon. He did not dwell in a cave as a bearded recluse. He had no wilderness sanctuary to which He could retire "far from the madding throng's ignoble strife."

As the village carpenter whose ox-yokes rested easy upon the necks of draft animals and made their burdens lighter, He was subjected to the haggling over prices which is so much a part of trading in the East. He became a part of the pushing, shoving, gesticulating crowd which congregated along the gravel-strewn beaches of the Sea of Galilee. In the temple precincts He was carried along by the ocean of humanity which surged about the outer court on days of special sacrifice. He walked the narrow streets of Jerusalem and the dusty roads leading to villages, stepping out of the way to allow laden asses to pass while their cursing drivers screamed at both their animals and the pedestrians who blocked their way.

His ears were assailed with the crude and obscene jokes of a peasantry which had no other means of expressing its seething hostility against its Roman overlords. His eyes saw the graffiti scrawled upon the walls of the narrow alleys used as public latrines. In the markets he heard the babble of voices, the shrill cries of hawkers directing attention to their wares, the whining call of the beggars and the blind, the varied accents of a polyglot population which turned the city of God into a city of man, invading the holy place with tables of moneychangers and crates of cooing doves and pigeons.

How did one who knew no sin move into such a world of political intrigue, conspiracy and hostility, and relate to its desperate need? How can I, having known sin and still knowing it, live in such a world and profess to be a follower of Him? He moved among men unscathed and unscarred, but I already bear the scars of my departures from my own ideals, the frightful marks of my indiscretions and wrong decisions.

The dilemma revealed in such questions has caused many to flee from the marketplace to desert fastnesses to "get away from it all." Like the ancient Essenes, religious "orders" have established communes of "the faithful" upon the summit of high mountains or in remote valleys where the sun never shines. In an attempt to serve Him in the world man seeks to build heavens of his own into which he can go and leave the world, in direct opposition to Him who left the heaven which God constructed to come into the world.

I am convinced there is no place to flee. If I am to be like Jesus I must stay and face whatever the world and the flesh throw at me. I must mingle with the multitude in all of the raw, bloody godlessness of an earth which walks in darkness and despair. God has created no "green belt," no suburban area around the earth for my comfortable existence while mankind gasps for breath, and struggles for survival. I must be in the world but not of it. The temptation is to be both in it and of it. But that is not the way of adventure! Anyone can do that and most persons do!

It is evident that Jesus often ignored and frequently upset the sense of values which the world had developed. As we have previously mentioned, He established a whole new set of priorities. He set precedents which those about Him regarded as dangerous. He rocked the boat. He made waves. As a result I am forced to decide whether I will go along with the comfortable position which the world has evolved, or practice the life-style of Jesus as nearly as I can. I cannot do both. "For the desires of the flesh are against the Spirit, and the desires of the Spirit are against the flesh; for these are opposed to each other, to prevent you from doing what you would." So says Paul in Galatians 5:17. Let me suggest a few things in which Jesus cut across the thinking of men while He was upon the earth. We can consider but a mere sample of His teaching in this area.

THE NEW DYNAMIC

1. Jesus taught that love must be unrestricted and unconfined. It must be outreaching enough to include enemies as well as friends, a love for mankind, not just a certain kind of man. It is not something which can be held within but must be openly expressed, for love unexpressed is not really love at all. This kind of teaching must have been like a bolt of lightning to the hearers of Jesus. It cut across all they had previously been taught.

"You have heard that it was said, 'You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy'" This precept enjoins both hate and love, not for things but for persons who are made in the image of God. But hate is a consuming fire. It is destructive. It is like carrying a venomous snake in one's bosom. One of the big problems raised by this adage of the ancients is the problem of deciding whether another is a neighbor or enemy so one will not mistakenly waste love or hate on the wrong one.

Jesus wiped out the need of making such distinctions. He threw hate on the refuse dump as no longer necessary for His disciples to lug around inside themselves. "But I say to you. Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you." I think that for years I rather ignored this, hoping it was not real or would go away. When I could no longer avoid it I tried to dilute it, to weaken it so that I could swallow it, like dissolving an aspirin in a glass of water to keep it from lodging in the throat and choking you. Finally, when a growing sense of relationship to Jesus forced me to reckon honestly with everything He said I began to study this remarkable statement. I learned a great deal which has been of inestimable value to me, and if I can do so without seeming pushy, I'd like to share a few of the things I found out, with you.

The word for love is agape. It is one of four Greek words which have been rendered by our English term love, but it represents a special kind of love. It is not the kind of love one has for his wife, or children, or grandchildren. It is not the kind of love that he feels toward his country, the land of his birth. Involved in love for these is a combination of sentimentality and emotion which seems to be an integral part of our very being as humans. It is built into us. Since it represents a natural relationship we think of those who have no regard for their own parents or children as "acting contrary to nature."

But love for one's enemies is not natural. We stay aloof from our enemies. We regard them with suspicion and fear. We cannot apply to them the same sentimental affection which we feel toward our own flesh and blood. However, love for enemies is not unnatural, it is supernatural. When one becomes a partaker of the divine nature it becomes natural in that realm to love his enemies. I seriously doubt that any person who has been merely born of the flesh can ever truly love his enemies. To do this one must be born of the Spirit. Agape is a fruit of the Spirit. It is really a first-fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5:22). It is borne in those who belong to Christ Jesus and have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires.

Agape is God's love, the love that God is (1 John 4:8). If we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ "God's love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given to us" (Romans 5:5). We thus become containers of God's love and conduits through which that love flows to others. God never forces one to act against his will. He supplies for us the necessary ingredient for conquering self and the world but does not compel us to use it. In the final analysis, love for one's enemies is an act of will.

I do not need to will to love my children or my dear friends. My love for them is spontaneous. I may require instruction as to how better to express my love toward them, or encouragement in the proper response to make to their expression of love for me. But I am commanded to love my enemies even as I am commanded to love my brothers in Christ. This means that I must love some persons whom I cannot like. To say this is to spark an instantaneous question in the minds of many. "How can I love a person whom I cannot like?"

The answer lies in the nature of agape. We like people who are like us. The reason we do so is because it flatters us. Surely one who has the same tastes, the same hobbies, and the same style as ourselves must be something special. Even though our love for such persons may be shallow, being based upon human traits, it comes easily, being in reality a love for self. Love for our enemies, or even for God's other children who are wholly unlike us is another matter. Often it must be love for the loveless. God did not love us because we were good, but we are good because He loved us. Such love does not seek for value in its object, but creates it.

The one who is loved may be vile and worthless by every social and moral standard but the fact that he is loved gives him worth. Agape is active and beneficent goodwill which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object. In the case of Jesus it took Him as far as the cross. In a happy phrase, William Barclay designates it as "unconquerable benevolence." To love one's enemies is to wish only good for them, and actually labor to make that wish become reality.

Albert Barnes, who completed his commentary on the new testament scriptures at Philadelphia in 1832, wrote of the words of Jesus: "We are bound to love our enemies. This is a law of Christianity, original and peculiar. No system but this has required it, and no act of Christian piety is more difficult." Apparently his contemplation of the profundity of this statement of Jesus caused the commentator to open the floodgate of eloquence. He went on to write, "This is religion, beautiful as its native skies; pure like its Source; kind like its Author; fresh like the dews of the morning; clear and diffusive like the beams of the rising sun; and holy like the feelings and words that come from the bosom of the Son of God. He that can do this need not doubt that he is a Christian. He has caught the very spirit of the Saviour, and he must inherit eternal life."

This love is not passive, but active. It is not enough to endure persecution or to be patient under it. Jesus actually requires that we pray for those who persecute us. He gave an example of what He meant while suspended upon the cross. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Perhaps there is no more liberating experience in life than to gain the victory over self and to overcome a passion for vengeance and actually place one who deeply offends you in the hands of God. It may be a supreme triumph in some cases, freeing the persecuted from seething resentment which takes a greater toll of the one who suffers injury than of those who inflict it.

God is indiscriminate in the sharing of nature's blessings. He does not ordinarily send rain only upon those who are just and equitable. It falls upon the unjust as well as the just. The sun rises upon both the evil and the good. One who wishes to be identified with the Father, that is, who wants to be recognized as a partaker of the divine nature, must in this respect be perfect as the heavenly Father is perfect. The word perfect here does not relate to knowledge, moral character— or sinlessness. It means mature or complete. It is used here to show that we must not be selective in the bestowal of love or blessings.

More is expected of one who reveres God than of one who does not. Men who limit their expression of love, compassion and concern only to those who belong to a caste, clique or company, are motivated by selfishness rather than selflessness. There is no regard from God to those who thus act. "For if you love those who love you, what reward have you? Do not even the tax collectors do the same? And if you salute only your brethren, what more are you doing than others? Do not even the Gentiles the same?" When Jesus uttered these words, tax collectors were regarded as social outcasts, guilty of national betrayal and treason because they hired out to the occupation forces to exact taxation from their own people. Gentiles were generally looked upon as idolaters. Those who professed to be sons of God and acted no better than social outcasts and idolaters had nothing to commend them.

The words of Jesus about love provide for us a genuine yardstick for measuring the reality of our experience with Him. Each of us must be tested to determine the worthiness of our claim to be His disciple. I offer this suggestion. Select a person toward whom you have felt hostility and bitterness. Pray earnestly for the power to love that person regardless of any deep hurt he has inflicted upon you. Direct your will toward loving that one. Repeat to yourself over and over that you will conquer your hate. Insist to your own heart that you will love that person regardless of cost and continue to make yourself vulnerable until the burden of bitterness has been lifted from your heart.

You will find that your whole life has been changed for the better. There will come a sense of lightness and freedom you have never known before. You will be singing in your soul. The feeling of perpetual weariness will pass away. Your nervous tension will pass away also. You will become conscious of being more than a conqueror through His love. What will really take place, of course, is that you will have a consciousness of being a child of God in a real identifiable sense. There is really no way for this to happen as long as you hate those who speak evil of you and persecute you. The striving for revenge will consume you.

THE EXCLUSIVE LOYALTY

2. Jesus taught that loyalty must be undivided and sincere. The real secret of eternal life in our present state is absolute commitment without any reservation. The ultimate freedom on earth is attained by surrendering to the lordship of Jesus. One who does not become a slave of His will becomes a slave to self. "No one can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon" (Matthew 6:24).

This ultimatum says much and implies even more. Implied is the thought that every rational person on earth will be under a master. As a created being man can never go it alone. He can be only as free as the Creator made him to be. By nature man will always be dependent. Implied also is man's right to will and the power to do so. Although sin marred the original dignity of man it did not destroy his potential to choose. "He will hate the one and love the other." As a being man can will his own destiny. Thus he is capable of the Great Adventure.

Because of our English rendering of the two words "serve" and "master" we tend to lose some of the depth of what Jesus was saying. For example, we often speak of an apprentice serving under a master mechanic, but this does not convey the meaning of Jesus. Words are a medium of exchange in the realm of thought as coins are in the realm of trade. As coins often lose some of their value when converted into the currency of other countries, so words sometimes suffer when translated into another language.

Difficult as it is, we must try to hear what Jesus said through the ears of those who sat before Him on the slopes of the Horns of Hattin. If we do we may get a different impression than that received by a group of well-dressed attendants sitting on cushioned pews in an air-conditioned religious structure in the twentieth century. The word which we have translated serve is from a Greek term for the lot of a slave. The word we have rendered master is a term for lord, and was the one used to designate a slave-owner. As it came through to His original listeners Jesus was saying that no one can belong to two owners.

Human slavery was an institution well understood in the days of Jesus. In our culture we have rejected and renounced it. It even seems incredible to us when we see it depicted upon the television screen or read a book like Roots, by Alex Haley. But there were two features about slavery which must have flashed into the minds of the people who heard Jesus say what He did. First, the slave had no rights of his own. He did not belong to himself but to another. He could not be what he wished to be because he was wholly subject to the will of someone else.

It is at this juncture we must be very careful. It is easy to allow prejudice to take over and prompt us to think of God as a self-seeking tyrant while regarding ourselves as degraded. Our mental conditioning regarding slavery can easily betray us into false conclusions. It is not uncommon to hear a university student, caught up in the false glamor of humanism, reject God with the words, "I do not want someone else running my life, whether I can see him or not." Such thinking shows a real ignorance of the nature of the overpowering love which attracts one to surrender himself in realization that by so doing he finds his true self.

The identification of the human will in its weakness and limitations, with the sovereign creative will of the universe, is not degradation but exaltation. The mass of clay filled with impurities loses nothing but its own foreign matter when placed in the hands of a skilled potter to be made into a vessel "fit for the master's use." One cannot be under the power of two divergent wills at the same time and retain his sanity. He cannot serve two masters. To be wrenched and torn between conflicting desires and emotions can only result in a wreckage of personality. We either go with God or go to pieces!

The servant of Jesus is not brainwashed but heart-washed. His inner being is cleansed. He is purified. He is forgiven and made whole. One who is brainwashed cannot think straight. One who is heart-washed thinks straight for the first time. The brainwashed individual is programmed from without; the heart-washed individual is purged from within. He is led by the Spirit and cannot do the things that he would, the things to which he is prompted by the flesh. The mind that is in him is the mind of Christ.

Secondly, the slave has no time of his own. There is not a moment in which he is free from his owner. His plans are subject to the will of the master. He cannot take time off. He does not go in and out of his state. He has no time to devote to another. It is impossible for him to serve another master since all he is and has belongs to another.

The whole purpose of Jesus in emphasizing the exclusiveness of commitment to a master is to enforce the important dictum that one cannot serve both God and mammon. But what is "mammon"? The New International Version uses the word "Money" with a capital initial letter, that is, as a personal noun. The New English Version follows suit. That is plain enough. One cannot be a slave of God if he is a slave of gold.

I think we may accept this with one word of caution. In our day the word "money" may be a little too limited. The word "Mammon" related to a kindred word in Hebrew which signified something firm or solid, and thus, something which could be trusted as a foundation. The word trust seems to be woven into it. In its root significance it referred to material possessions which were entrusted to another to look after or care for. Eventually it underwent a change of emphasis and came to apply to the trust one placed in his material things.

Thus, the word once meant that which was placed in security or trust, and then came to mean that in which one placed his trust for security. Man comes to worship that to which he submits his life. If he trusts things or possessions as his shield against calamity and destruction these things will become his god. His life and time will be devoted to the accumulation of things, and such things will become his master. They will take precedence over every other value. He will sacrifice health, family and friends upon the altar of Mammon.

It is here that many tear their hearts to shreds. They try to trust in God and trust in material things at the same time. They are of all men most miserable, afraid on the one hand to turn loose of God, and fearful on the other hand of turning loose of things. When that which is created replaces and displaces the Creator in the shrine of the heart, only disappointment can result.

No doubt it was this which the ancient Greek myth about Midas, king of Phrygia, was intended to portray. As Thomas Bulfinch tells it in his Age of Fable, Bacchus, the god of wine, imbibed a little too freely and became lost. He was found by some peasants who brought him to the king. Midas entertained him royally for ten days and nights with all kinds of games and gaiety. On the eleventh day, when he was preparing to leave, Bacchus offered to implement any wish that Midas would make. The king immediately asked that whatever he touched be turned to gold. The wish was granted. Midas was thrilled when he reached up to pluck an oak leaf and it turned to pure gold.

He stooped down and picked up a pebble. It became gold in his hand. He hastened to pick an apple from a fruit tree. It became like the fabled apples of Hesperides which Juno had received as a wedding present from the Earth-goddess. Midas hurried to his palace and ordered a sumptuous banquet prepared in celebration of his good fortune. But the bread hardened in his hand, the meat turned to metal between his teeth, and the wine flowed down his throat as liquid gold.

In the days that followed the wealthy monarch became desperate. The mattress at night became unyielding gold. He cringed from touching anything when he arose. Starving and desperate, he lifted up his hands to Bacchus and pleaded that the curse he had besought as a gift be removed. Mercifully, Bacchus told him to follow the Pactolus River to its headwaters and plunge his body into its cold depths and wash away his guilt. Midas came from the stream hating what he formerly loved. Divesting himself of his royal splendor he lived in the fields, basking in the natural beauty he had once defiled by converting it into gold.

You cannot serve both God and Mammon! Those who seek to do so make existence miserable for themselves and others. When life is regulated by the stock market and happiness and misery pursue each other as the quotations rise and fall, the relationships which count will be neglected or flung aside. When one can be "wiped out" by the frenzied manipulations of those he may never see, he dies a thousand deaths and never really lives at all. Rousseau said, "When a man dies he clutches in his hands only that which he gives away in his lifetime." D. H. Lawrence wrote, "When I wish I was rich, then I know I am ill."

Writing Your Own Ticket

Contents

It is an exciting thing to witness when faith works a complete transformation in the life of someone you know. When this happens there stands before you a living demonstration that the Spirit of God is active and energetic, converting the raw material of human existence into what J. B. Phillips calls "muscular Christianity." I want to tell you about a lovely and gracious woman whose life is a constant exemplification of understanding and compassion.

It was not always thus. She grew up in a family where her parents were suspicious of each other and of everyone else. In their conversation about the table they were always critical and judgmental of neighbors and relatives. Destructive gossip was the pastime and they indulged in it with a vengeance. Motives were always bad. Everything was negative. Few people visited the home although it was located in a friendly and hospitable neighborhood. The woman of whom I am writing told me that she could not recall one person in the neighborhood of whom her family had ever spoken a commendatory word.

She knew no other way of life and when she married she started to carry on as her mother did before her. However, her husband was of a different caliber. He told her one day he did not want to hear one detrimental thing said about others. He further said he preferred she not talk at all until she could find something to say about others that was good. It was like a slap in the face and she was furious. She refused to speak to her husband for several days. Brooding and worried about the breakdown of communications with one whom she loved, she went to the minister of a nearby congregation and told him about her problem.

Fortunately, he pulled no punches but laid it on the line. He pointed out that her childhood home was devoid of faith in Jesus and thus the lives of her parents were empty. He told her that when people are starving they will eat anything and may even become cannibals. This is what had happened to her father and mother who were devouring one another and others because they were without Christ. They were starving for affection which they were unable to demonstrate. When she asked what she could do to keep from becoming like them he wrote her out a prescription consisting of three parts or ingredients.

Each day she was to read a chapter in one of the gospel records of the life of Jesus. As she did she was to underline every statement made by Jesus which seemed to condemn anything in her lifestyle and practice. Both morning and evening she was to pray in solitude for the help of the Holy Spirit in purging her heart of the carnal desire to think and speak evil of others. Each day she was to mentally select someone and concentrate on something good in that person's life. When possible she was to tell the individual about the good in his life. This consists of what Dr. George W. Crane calls "joining the compliment club."

Within a very few days a noticeable change started to take place. The woman began to be creative and considerate. In two months she was a changed individual. She told me that when she became aware of the grace and forgiveness of God she looked at those around her through different eyes. As she concentrated upon what Jesus said the Holy Spirit enabled her to put to death the works of the flesh. She is now in demand as a speaker at meetings and conventions of Christian women where she vibrantly relates what God will do for those who trust in Him.

I was especially impressed with one thing she told me. As she began to change her attitude toward others she noticed that life became easier for her. The low periods of depression began to disappear. The waters of life became calmer. As she learned to appreciate those around her there were fewer problems. Her physical health was improved as her mental state was altered. God began to measure out to her blessings which she had not previously known. She is now thoroughly convinced that you reap what you sow, and that some of the reaping takes place on earth. Suddenly she has sensed the real meaning of adventure in the Spirit!

Before I leave her case I want to mention that she told me she thought a lot of people were mumblers, bumblers or grumblers, and she realized that she started out in life to be a grumbler. She then took from her purse a card upon which she had written a scriptural quotation. It read: "Do not grumble, brethren against one another, that you may not be judged" (James 5:9). I suggested she ought to get a number of those printed and pass out to her friends and I felt like I might need one to carry in my pocket.

The book of Esther has always been one of the most interesting books in the old covenant scriptures to me. Admittedly, it reads more like a patriotic account than like a religious treatise, but it is a gripping story of how God rules and overrules in the plans of men. This is all the more intriguing because the name of God does not once appear in the text. It is a suspense story, a genuine "cliff-hanger," filled with action and with a surprise on every page. It is one of the greatest demonstrations of the working of divine providence ever put into print.

In this little volume is depicted the clever conspiracy of a jealous political hack to climb into prominence by the practice of genocide. Like Adolf Hitler he was so inflamed with the poison of anti-Semitism that he planned at a given signal to have all of the Jews exterminated. One of the gripping features of the book is how every evil he planned for others ended up falling upon his own head. Finally, he ignominiously died swinging from the gallows he had erected upon which to hang a man of whom he was insanely jealous.

The principle of retribution in kind seemed so consistent to our pioneer ancestors they incorporated it in axioms and proverbs as they did every thought which they valued. They spoke of "chickens coming home to roost." They spoke of one being forced to eat out of his own spoon, or of being paid back in his own coin. When they saw someone besmirched in character who had sought to malign another they said he was tarred by his own brush. These homely little expressions referred to the just recompense visited upon one who tried to curry favor by trampling others down.

PLANTING THORNS

There is an Indian proverb which dates back some thirteen hundred years and which says, "He that plants thorns must never expect to gather roses." And there is a homely American story of a butcher who complained to a woman who sold him butter that each pound was about two ounces underweight. The woman explained this by telling him she had lost the one pound weight for her scales and had been balancing the butter against the pound of ground beef which she obtained from the butcher.

Jesus clearly taught that a man creates the standard by which he will be judged. We will be weighed in the scales which we use to weigh others. God will accept our own yardstick as the criterion by which we will be measured. "For with the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and the measure you give will be the measure you get." If your basis of judgment for your brothers is strict conformity to legalistic procedure and you deviate from that law in the slightest degree you sign your own death warrant and seal your own doom. As an example, if you demand that others have the same degree of spiritual knowledge as yourself before you will receive them as children of God, then you must have the same degree of knowledge as God has before He will receive you as one of His children. This means that if you postulate fellowship with others upon attainment to a specific degree of knowledge, using your own knowledge as the basis, then you cannot be in fellowship with God until you attain to the degree of knowledge which He possesses. You will be damned, not because God desires to judge you thus, but because you chose that basis of judgment.

The way to assure that God will be lenient and merciful unto you is to be forbearing and forgiving toward your brethren. "Accept life with humility and patience, making allowances for one another because you love one another" (Ephesians 4:2. Phillips). Since we cannot claim perfection God must either make some allowances for us or we will be lost. I am convinced He is willing to do this because He loves us. But if we do not love our brothers enough to make allowances for their ignorance and mistaken views God cannot make allowance for us. We cannot expect to measure others by one rule and be measured by another.

It is for this reason we are under a "law of liberty" which means that we operate under a motivating principle of freedom. The apostle says, "We are free to serve not under the old written code but in the new life of the Spirit" (Romans 7:6). Note the contrast between a written code and the new life. If we were under law and not under grace we could not make allowances for one another regardless of the degree of our love.

We would have to "exact the pound of flesh" for every failure because law knows nothing of mercy, but only of justice. Mercy must be in the heart of the judge. It is not in the law. Since we serve in a new way and a new life we can extend mercy for ignorance and mitigating circumstances. Circumstances do make a difference. "Anyway, you should speak and act as men who will be judged by the law of freedom. The man who makes no allowances for others will find none made for him. It is still true that 'mercy smiles in the face of judgment.'" (James 2:12, 13).

Recently, on the outskirts of a town I saw a sign which read: "Speed Limit— 25 Miles Per Hour. Fine— One Dollar for every mile in excess of limit. Write your own ticket!" In that town the judge will assess you according to your own decision. The eternal judge will do the same. It is well to recall that Jesus said, "For if you forgive people their failures, your heavenly Father will forgive you; but if you do not forgive people their failures neither will your heavenly Father forgive yours" (Matthew 6:14, 15). In my own life it is an interesting experiment to sit down and think of some of the failures I have made and then to think of how I would like for God to deal with them. Then, all I need to do is to carry out the same approach to the failures of others. It is no wonder that through the ages this has been called "the golden rule." It represents about the highest level of approach to human dignity possible unto man on earth.

A prospective proselyte once approached the aged Rabbi Hillel (who died when Jesus was about ten years old) and enquired of him what was involved in obeying the law. The reply was, "What is hateful to thee, do not unto others. This is the law, the rest is commentary." Jesus agreed that the rest was commentary but he turned it from a negative to a positive statement. "Therefore in whatever way you would have people treat you, treat them the same; for this sums up the law and the Prophets." You are writing your own ticket!

I am sure most of you have heard about the Greek legendary figure called Procrustes, which means "The Stretcher." He was one of a number of fabled brigands who patrolled the roads near Eleusis in Attica, taking frightful toll of travelers. Procrustes had an iron bedstead and when he captured an individual he threw him upon it and tied him down. If the person was too long he sawed off his legs until he matched the bed for length. If he was too short Procrustes used iron stretchers to make him conform. When Procrustes was taken into custody by Theseus, the great national hero, he was treated to the same punishment he had administered to others. Theseus measured him upon his own bed and cut him down to size. This was the Greek way of illustrating the truth which had become proverbial among the Jews and was repeated by Jesus. "Judge not that you be not judged, for with what judgment you judge you will be judged."

Ever since I was a youngster I have been moved by the poem of Robert Southey concerning the Inchcape Bell. The bell was atop a buoy off the dangerous shore of Scotland. Its ceaseless ringing amidst the lashing breakers served as a warning to ships getting too close to the rocks. But one day Sir Ralph the Rover, the drunken captain of a privateer, bent over from the side of his boat and cut the bell loose from its moorings. It sank into the depths with a gurgling sound. Weeks later with his ship loaded with plunder, the captain steered for the coast of Scotland. A dense fog made it impossible for him to see the land and the frightened sailors listened in vain for the warning bell. The ship was wrecked upon the rocks and all who were aboard perished in the depths.

LETTING GOD BE GOD

In the year of 1952 there was published in England a fascinating little book of less than 120 pages. It bore the title Your God is Too Small and its author was the clever and versatile J. B. Phillips. The writer acted upon the supposition that a lot of people in our day would believe in and accept a God who was big enough to handle modern needs. Unfortunately, the God offered by the various denominations, seemed to the world to be helpless and inadequate to cope with the problems of the space age.

Phillips divided his book into two parts. In the first he exposed the feeble and childish concepts projected by a lot of believers. In the second he offered practical suggestions of ways by which we might discover the real God of the universe for ourselves. In the section devoted to unreal Gods, the one I like best is titled "God-in-a-box." This does not mean the other essays are inferior. They are all powerful and penetrating. I think the reason I appreciate so highly the one I mention is because it uncovers my own frightening tendency in the past.

It is very comfortable for one who is reared in an exclusive religious circle to drift into the arrogant assumption that God is more interested in and concerned with those of his party than with others outside of that particular pale. I presume it is easy for Presbyterians to assume that God is a Presbyterian, while Methodists think of him as being a Methodist. Somehow we tend to get our rationalizations and fantasies mixed up until it appears to us that if we are trying to be like God He must at the same time be trying to be like us. The sin of the Jews before Jesus came was that they forgot that they belonged to God and thought that God belonged to them. It became easier to push Judaism than to project obedience to God.

The tragedy of all this is that as we minimize God we maximize ourselves. Human pride is a tricky thing and when it is multiplied by the number of those constituting a religious caste it actually becomes dangerous. It can readily be converted into a mob spirit concealed under what appears to be robes of righteousness. Almost as bad, it can just as readily convince us that God would be severely handicapped and might not even make it without us. God must either operate through our machinery or He cannot operate at all. He can only go where we take Him!

If we have God safely ensconced in our box others can see Him only when we lift the lid. If we judge they are unworthy or might prove detrimental or embarrassing to the promotion of our cause we might not even lift the cover at all. In that case they will be "without hope and without God in the world." In any event they must come to us before they can come to Him. Playing God is one of the most popular and fashionable games in every age. It is as old as Satan and as new as the newest sect!

When we allow our spiritual thinking to mature we must awaken to the fact that it is not really God we have in our box. It is an image of God. We have made God in our image and in our likeness. There is no real indication that God pays the slightest attention to any of our historical boxes. He is free and unconfined. He cannot be crammed into a movement, party or sect. We are limited, inhibited and circumscribed by our creedal constructions but our God inhabits the universe.

Jesus taught that the will of the Father is sovereign and He has a perfect right to administer His affairs as He wishes. What God wills to do is right, because He has the right to will to do it! He may dispose fully of His blessings irrespective of any previous agreement. This is illustrated in the story of the farmer who went to hire laborers for His vineyard. Early in the morning he hired a group after agreeing to pay them each a silver coin per day. He went out again at nine o'clock in the morning, at noon, and at three o'clock and five o'clock in the afternoon. Each time he hired additional workers and told them to go to work and he would give them a fair wage.

At sundown the laborers were summoned and lined up to receive their pay. The foreman was told to start with the last ones who were hired and pay them first. As each came forward he was handed a silver coin. Those who were employed first expected to receive more but each got just one silver coin. This caused a lot of grumbling which came to the ears of the farmer. He said to them, "I'm not being unjust with you. Wasn't our agreement for a silver coin a day? Take your money and go home. It is my wish to give the latecomer as much as I give you. May I not do what I like with what belongs to me? Must you be jealous because I am generous?"

In the final day of accounts there may be those who will share in the blessing of God's bounty, not upon the basis of an agreement, but upon the basis of fairness and justice. Jesus continually held out that no law was of universal application. We dare not bind God by a law which He has given to bind us. The source of all authority is not subject to the authority which proceeds from Himself. Moreover, when God put all things under the feet of Jesus He excepted Himself.

The grace of God existed before the church and is greater than the church. The grace of God created the church and was not created by it. We are under grace and not over it. While we have no right to violate the agreement of God, nor seek to receive His blessing upon any other ground. He will not violate that agreement if He sees fit to extend mercy above and beyond it. He can do what He wishes with what belongs unto Him. Let us hope we shall not be found grumbling about His administration of mercy nor seek to argue about our human concept of fairness.

THE UNIFIED LIFE

Jesus was a perplexing person to many who heard Him while He was on earth. They were disturbed by the fact that He taught, as well as by the facts which He taught. In the first place He did not make teaching His profession so He was not a professional teacher. Indeed, many of the greatest truths He uttered were spoken almost casually. Some of them were answers to hecklers. A famous man once said of a rural schoolteacher who had inspired him. "He taught as much before school and after as he did while we were sitting at our desks. There was no use of talking about taking up school for he never let it out. We learned as much from him by playing with him at recess or when walking home with him as we did while poring over our books."

Jesus did not attend one of the schools for scribes. He did not go to a college for rabbinical students. He made no appeal to formal degrees or educational attainments as a reason why He should be heard. He never advertised His intellectual attainments. He was not a theologian and offered the people no course in systematic theology.

The scribes were generally sure of themselves, but they were not always sure of their teaching. It was too frequently a subject of dispute with other scribes. The difference between Jesus and the scribes was easily seen by the people. "When Jesus had finished this discourse the people were astonished at his teaching; unlike their own teachers he taught with a note of authority" (Matthew 7:28, 29). Any person who dares to rise above the narrow concepts of his age and set forth great principles will gain both enemies and friends. Jesus was no exception as his attendance at the Feast of Shelters upon one occasion demonstrated. "The Jews were looking for him at the festival and asked, 'Where is he?' and there was much whispering about him in the crowds. 'He is a good man,' said some. 'No,' said others, he is leading the people astray.'"

It was this occasion which gave Jesus an opportunity to enforce some great truths. One of these is the inner testimony to the truth of God which is resident in every sincere individual who is unreservedly following Christ to the best of his ability. It is not essential that one be conversant with the logical processes which go into books on apologetics in order to have assurance of the divine origin of the message of our Lord. Another principle is that a man demonstrates his sincerity when he aims at the honor of the one who sent him, rather than seeking for self-praise. These affirmations were called forth because of the astonishment of the Jews.

Here is the way the scriptures record it. "When the festival was already half over, Jesus went up to the temple and began to teach. The Jews were astonished. 'How is it,' they said, 'that this untrained man has such learning?' Jesus replied, 'The teaching I give is not my own, it is the teaching of him that sent me. Whoever has the will to do the will of God shall know whether my teaching comes from him or is merely my own. Anyone whose teaching is merely his own, aims at honor for himself. But if a man aims at the honor of him who sent him he is sincere, and there is nothing false in him" (John 7:14-18).

It is my personal conviction that the teaching of Jesus would provoke about as much astonishment today as it did among the Jews, if it was correctly evaluated. Actually, most of us take what Jesus said and fit it into thought patterns of our own. We have formulated our ideas of goodness and righteousness and into these moulds we pour the great teachings of the Master and conceive of the crystallized forms we produce as being those of heaven. Men tend to think of holiness in terms of places and times. They define goodness in relation to specific deeds. To them, it consists of particular performances in a particular manner. The one who does these things is considered to be a righteous man because he does them. All of this would be regarded by Jesus as superficial, perhaps even a hypocritical approach.

Jesus taught the ideal of a completely unified life, an existence wholly integrated and not separated into various departments. The entire personality is governed by a central force and it is this abiding internal principle which makes one good. Goodness does not consist in the mere performance of deeds. It is an inner quality of being. There is no distinction between thoughts and deeds, or between motives and actions. Things are good because they are done by good men. It is the man, not merely the transaction, which makes the difference. "A good man produces good from the store of good within himself; and an evil man from evil produces evil" (Matthew 12:35).

The nobility of this concept escaped the legalists in the days when Jesus was on earth. It still escapes those on earth since Jesus returned to heaven. Few of us dare even yet to believe that "A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, or a poor tree good fruit" (Matthew 7:18). An apple tree is not an apple tree because it has apples on it, but because it is that kind of tree it bears apples. It is obvious that if it is impossible for a good tree to produce bad fruit, then whatever is produced by such a tree must be good. However, men tend to exalt laws instead of the principles such laws were given to preserve. The keeping of such laws then becomes the chief good. Any deviation there from is regarded as evil.

There is a higher good than that of keeping laws. Laws are given to regulate relationships and those relationships are superior to the regulations. Jesus used as an example the case of David and his men when they were fleeing from Saul. Being hungry, they entered the sacred precincts of the house of God and ate the loaves of the Presence, "which it was not lawful for them to eat." When there is a conflict between perpetuation of life and performance of law, the first becomes the chief good. Life is superior to law! Actually there is no conflict about this in the heart of the one who truly understands Jesus, for he spontaneously does what is right. He "produces good from the store of good within." He does not have to stop and quibble about the matter. The decision has been made long ago. It is not the good deed which produces the store within, but it is the good store within that produces the good deed. It is not new deeds or new acts that Jesus wants, but new men! "You must be made new in mind and spirit, and put on the new nature of God's creating, which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by truth" (Ephesians 4:24).

GOD'S ARTESIAN WELLS

Jesus taught that while all righteousness welled up from within it had to flow out. He knew nothing about a faith kept bottled up by traditional restraints. So effervescent was true religion and goodness that they would burst the bottles (Luke 5:37). The faith never grows old but wineskins do and when they lose their elasticity the faith makes a breach in them and flows out. It cannot be contained in historic structures.

Jesus knew that religion was not a stagnant pool. It was a flowing spring. It was not a cistern but an artesian well. It is significant that it was when he was sitting on the curb of a cistern or well that Jesus said to the Samaritan woman, "The water that I shall give will be an inner spring always welling up for eternal life." It is no less significant that it was near the site of one of the great springs which helped to create the Jordan River that He said, "Upon this rock I will plant my community and the gates of Hades will not prevail against it." On the final day of the festival in Jerusalem He said of the believer, "Streams of living water shall flow out from within him" (John 7:38).

Here, then is the real test of whether one has been touched by Jesus. When Moses struck the rock at Horeb, water gushed out of it to quench the thirst of the people who were murmuring (Exodus 17:16). One moment it was just a rock, hard and impenetrable. Now it was a source of life. Everyone could see that something tremendous had happened. Our hearts are like rock until God fills them with His Spirit. Until that happens we are merely a part of the complaining mob. Under the hand of God we become channels of grace and blessing. The power of God is never demonstrated more than when a selfish, grasping individual is burst asunder and generosity, kindness and compassion "flow through the desert like a river."

The true religion was to be known by its fruits. Jesus knew that a religion which did not reveal itself openly was empty and vacuous. He pronounced a sentence of condemnation upon the fig tree when He came and found no fruit. He could not be content with mere leaves. There are no ornamental trees in

God's acreage. The church is not a park but an orchard. One either bears fruit or cumbers the ground. God demands the whole man and nothing less. Someone has said, "It does not take much of a man to make a Christian, but it takes all of him there is."

Jesus only painted one verbal picture of the final judgment scene and in it He made no allusion to worthiness based upon knowledge of doctrine, theological perception or argumentative ability. He did not say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, for you have memorized the entire letter to the Hebrews." He spoke of such things as giving food to the hungry and drink to the thirsty, of welcoming strangers, clothing the naked, visiting the sick and those in prison. The criterion for entering into life and possessing the kingdom was simply the good done for others. This was not an orthodoxy of doctrine but of doing.

It is interesting to note that in this presentation Jesus goes to some length to show that those who gave food and drink, showed hospitality, sheltered the homeless and clothed the naked, did not know they were doing it for Him. They were motivated by compassion and not by hope of reward. They were not so much demonstrating their religion as their character. Their good deeds were not partisan gimmicks to advertise "our church" or to influence people toward it. They were simply sharing what they had with suffering humanity and were surprised to hear Jesus say, "Anything you did for one of my brothers here, however humble, you did for me."

This may help to explain another statement of Jesus. "I tell you there is not a thoughtless word that comes from men's lips but they will have to account for it in the day of judgment." The King James Version has "idle word." The Revised Standard Version renders it "careless word." I confess that this used to bother me. That was before I considered it in the light of the context. At first it seems very extreme. It tends to portray God as a harsh and exacting taskmaster instead of a loving Father. But we must remember that a man does not reveal his true self when he is on guard and watching every word. It is when his guard is down and he is not trying to make an impression for social or other reasons that he shows what he really is. Many a man is the soul of politeness when he is sitting in a Sunday School class. But that same man may be wholly different when he is on the job on Monday.

It is the careless or idle word, the chance act, which gives a glimpse into the heart. You cannot judge a man so well by his formal as by his informal speech. Since judgment has to do with the man as he is, this is the proper criterion— the word idly spoken, the careless or thoughtless expression.

THE UNVEILED FACE

Jesus taught that the inner quality called goodness is never static. It is ever changing and amending character for the better. The good man is never satisfied with his current state. He must be ever climbing, and never standing still. Complacency has no place in the life of the concerned one. The man who stands and boasts of what he is and what he has done merits no notice from God. An outcast from society who bows his head, smites his breast, confesses his sins, and prays for forgiveness, goes to his house justified rather than the other. The apostle Paul makes a statement which portrays the creative nature of the goodness which keeps the eye fixed upon Jesus. "And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (2 Corinthians 3:16).

"The unveiled face . . . are being changed." Think about these expressions. It is the man who "sees through a glass darkly" who does not change. His vision is distorted, his perspective is warped, his sight is clouded. There are veils over the faces of many— veils of prejudice, of tradition, of partisanship. These allow only a blurred image of the Christ. One cannot properly discern his Lord through a veil of prejudice. Such a man may be like the disciples on the way to Emmaus. They were actually talking about Jesus and what had happened unto Him. It was inconceivable that anyone who resided in the vicinity of Jerusalem should not know these things. "As they talked and discussed it with one another, Jesus himself came up and walked along with them; but something held their eyes from seeing who it was" (Luke 24:15). It is possible to know a lot of things about Jesus and still not know Him! There are so many things which seem to hold our eyes!

The goodness of which Jesus spoke is not merely outgoing. It is also ongoing. It produces a flexibility of soul, an elasticity of spirit, which allows itself to be shaped and reshaped by increasing knowledge. It is not hardened by conformity to the past or by the infirmity of the present. It is transformed and transforming, striving ever to an unattainable ideal, yet becoming more ideal for the striving. It regards the will of God, not as a restraining fence but as a ladder, and even as one climbs the rungs he looks between them to a new vista and a better world offering new challenges for tomorrow.

Our lives may be circumscribed by circumstances. One may be physically handicapped until he is confined to one place until another comes and moves his wheelchair. We may seem chained to one spot by conditions beyond our control. But the mind is not chained unless we will it so. In his Yale lectures on preaching John Henry Jowett tells of a visit to a shoe cobbler in Wales. He asked the man if he did not feel cramped by his very small shop in which there was hardly room to turn around. The man said he did not and asked the noted preacher to follow him to a window that opened out upon the sea. "When I feel tired and cramped, I look through this window and it steadies me," he said. His physical surroundings were cramped but his vision was unlimited. This is what happens to any person who allows the Word of God to be a window in which to look at the universe, rather than a wall which fences us in!

A Redemptive Fellowship

Contents

If you think that life is humdrum and unexciting you should read the book The Adventure of Living by Paul Tournier. All of us have different tastes in literature as we do in food. Thus far I have relished everything that this eminent physician and psychiatrist in Geneva has dished up. I especially appreciate his concern for persons as indicated even by the titles of some of his better known volumes.

The Healing of Persons* postulates that the road to recovery may actually begin when the sufferer realizes the therapeutic value of deep and prayerful meditation. The Meaning of Persons affirms the difference between the real person and the personage. The latter term is used for the mask which men wear as the artificial product of culture. The Whole Person in a Broken World deals in a kind of profound fashion with the effect of the scientific method upon the whole philosophy of life. All of us, without exception, have experienced the invasion of our lives by the culture in which we battle to keep our heads above water. Not one of us has escaped the feeling that we exist in a fragmented and disoriented material universe.

All of the volumes thus speak to our condition, but the one I first mentioned catches me up in its pages because of its incisive analysis of our problem and the prescription for remedying it. Dr. Tournier declares that at the heart of humanity's sickness lies the failure of man to fulfill himself. He further asserts that many of us fail miserably in expressing our true selves because we are always asking for and accepting cheap substitutes for real adventure.

You can read the book for yourself. When you do you will probably be most impressed by the chapter bearing the title "The Adventure of God." It is here the author refers to God as "the great adventurer." He thinks this is implied in the very word Creator. He also suggests that the earthly adventure of Jesus was "the supreme adventure, with its supreme risk of disappointment and suffering." The chapter closes with two sentences I want to share with you. "In the Bible we rediscover the deep emotion which rekindles within us the fire of adventure. The Bible also gives adventure its true meaning, for from end to end it reveals what is at stake in all our work, all our activity, all our choices, and all our self-commitment."

I like the author's fortunate choice of the words "rediscover" and "rekindle." The first indicates that we have lost something. The second suggests that we have allowed a valuable emotion to be snuffed out, or to die down until it no longer burns brightly. In our day of spiritual illiteracy men exhibit the power to control everything but themselves. Insane men can pull switches, and when they do the result will follow, as regulated by those switches, as certainly as it would if the most rational being on earth had manipulated the levers. The world is sick, sad and sordid. It is cold, cruel and calculating. To offset its sickness and sadness it must re-discover an emotion. To overcome its coldness and cruelty it must rekindle the fire of adventure.

Our only hope is to return to the Bible, not simply to learn how to work, how to act, or how to choose, but to find out what is at stake in all of these. The word "stake" relates to that which is hazarded for gain or loss, but it also means a prize for which men strive in a contest. We need to know what is at stake in life and we can only find out by turning to the Word of God. It is a sad commentary on the way in which modern man has allowed himself to be hoodwinked by the enemy of souls that a lot of people in our day regard the Bible as dry, dead and uninteresting.

One who devotes himself to unrelenting research of the Bible, who regularly reads it and talks about it, is often regarded as eccentric. This is a strange turn of events, for the word literally means "out of center." When applied to an individual it is used in the sense of odd, irregular or unusual. God is either the center of the universe or it is not a universe. The Bible either contains His revelation or there is none, and man is left without a polestar by which to adjust his compass.

We are a far cry from the world of four centuries ago when there was ushered in an era of almost three hundred years in which knowledge of the Bible was considered an absolute necessity for an English gentleman who wished to succeed in life. The sacred volume was read daily in many homes. Often the children and servants were examined as to their grasp of what had been read. Memorization of vast portions of scripture was encouraged. The Book was quoted in literature, in circles of business, or street corners and in the halls of Parliament. J. R. Green, in his now famous work Short History of the English People, wrote: "England became the people of a book, and that book was the Bible." By the time of William Ewart Gladstone, prime minister under Queen Victoria, "the impregnable rock of holy scripture," as he called the Bible, had become a foundation for moral and intellectual life. With our modern surrender of faith and knowledge we sacrificed the spirit of adventure on the altar of "the unknown God."

One of the most penetrating writers of our generation is Elton Trueblood, and one of his most powerful books is *Alternative to Futility. It consists of five lectures presented at the Austin (Texas) Presbyterian Theological Seminary in 1948. It is significant that Dr. Trueblood, at the end of his preface, has inscribed the words "Earlham College— Two years after Hiroshima." The justification for the book was that "modern man, now come to a full consciousness of his spiritual sickness, is ready for the first time to accept a thoroughgoing remedy." I am interested in the fact that the second chapter of the little volume bears the title, "The Habit of Adventure."

In his autobiography entitled "While It Is Day," Dr. Trueblood says that he wrote Alternative to Futility after his first full year of teaching at Earlham College. He states, "It was produced with a greater sense of exhilaration than I have known in any other literary effort." He also tells how, in conferences with the editors of Harper and Row, he worked out the format which he followed in his subsequent books. A unique feature was a pertinent quotation appearing in italics at the head of each chapter. I am particularly pleased that the one chosen to head the chapter to which I referred is from Alfred North Whitehead, the professor of philosophy at Harvard University, who died the year Trueblood was writing his book. The quotation says, "Without adventure civilization is in full decay."

Dr. Trueblood writes, "In the spirit of adventure, and by the use of disciplined imagination, we might be able to encourage a new growth, within the existent churches. We might be able to inaugurate a redemptive movement that could take our dry bones and make them live . . . What we require, then, is a new reformation, but not one like that of the sixteenth century, which divided Christians so sharply. We need a reformation which unites at a deep level."

It is an unfortunate fact of life that few of those who hear prophetic voices ever allow what they say to seep down into the subsoil of consciousness. Their words are like brief thundershowers on a drouth-stricken earth. They serve only to harden the layer of surface dirt and add to the parched state of the vegetation. There are drops of spiritual moisture in the brief statement of Dr. Trueblood which should challenge us to the depths of our being. Spirit of adventure. Disciplined imagination. New growth. A redemptive fellowship. A new reformation. Unity at a deep level. There is nothing feeble about such concepts. No wonder the eminent professor who admits to being greatly influenced by C. S. Lewis called his book Alternative to Futility.

I must confess that for a long time I kept Jesus at arm's length. It wasn't that I disliked Him. I was not really afraid of Him. As I try to think through my attitude in retrospect of those days in which I delivered sermons about Him (as you talk about a friend in a remote country whom you have never seen). I think I was really afraid of myself. By making Him an object of religious veneration, singing songs about Him a couple of times per week, and discussing His recorded words in the context of "theology" I could keep my distance and yet stay close enough to Him to call Him to hear me in case of emergency.

Now I want to be as close to Him as possible. It isn't a matter of protection or of being on safe ground. I am just more comfortable with Him than with anyone else in the universe. This is not an easy thing. It is not conducive to a "hail fellow well met" or "devil may care" stance. It is a responsibility which keeps one on his toes, and off the toes of others. You are forced to realize that what others say about Jesus may not be valid for you. Even when they quote His words they may put a slant upon them, or be using them as a tool to build some kind of rigid mental structure which they can control.

This necessitates your listening to Him as if no one had ever heard Him before. But one does not exist in a vacuum. All of his life he has been subjected to interpretations and opinions about what Jesus meant by what He said. He approaches the things recorded about Jesus dressed in a mental garb which others have woven, cut out and sewed together, according to a pattern they have devised, and which many of them think was provided with the fabric. It is a little like going into a supposed virgin forest only to find that all of the trees bear blaze-marks. In spite of this, I think that each of us is obligated to listen to Jesus as if no one else had ever heard Him except those who actually wrote down what He said. It is one thing to read the record of the life of a person, but a wholly different thing to allow that person to become your life.

As for myself I can testify that it made a great deal of difference in my life and thought when I was led to really look at Jesus in what G. K. Chesterton has called "the strangest story in the world." Perhaps one of the most difficult things in this life is to accept the thought that there is anything really new. We must always compare and contrast it with something already existing, something which we have learned to handle and control. So Jesus must be compared to Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Hillel, and other philosophers, and we must sort out His pronouncements and match them with theirs. Even a new life must be the old life polished up until it shines. We can accept a philosophy which indicates most things made new, but not one which begins with "Behold!" and declares that "all things are made new." There are some old things that we would like to keep.

We reduce Christ to "Christianity" because it has been around for a good many centuries and has been shaped and moulded by speculation and opinion until it is easily handled. Christianity now comes under various brands and trademarks. We see its varied temples upon every side. We can "walk our fingers through the yellow pages" until we come to the one we seek, neatly filed under its own special heading. It is not easy to deal with a Christ who is unchanging and unswerving. The tragedy of sectarian division is that it encourages us to dabble in the shallows of a protected pond rather than to launch out into the deep. It blunts the challenge of the faith with a faith. It too easily substitutes a system for the Savior.

THE RELIGION OF RISK

There is an aura of glamor about the very word adventure.

We think of risk and daring when we hear it. There is nothing staid or commonplace in its implications. It is unfortunate that we seldom think of it in connection with the religion of Christ. The faith has lost something vital in its modern watered down version. It is often reduced to a routine of meeting attendance and this may be carried out from a sense of duty or because of fear of divine reprisal. Actually the brand of "Christianity" with which we are too familiar has little relationship to the kind of life which was characteristic of Jesus and the primitive saints. It has lost much of its verve and most of its vision.

We have been conditioned to a life of security and safety. Our bank deposits are guaranteed by a federal insurance corporation. Old age has its social security and pensions. We are sheltered and protected against the storms of life. Every aspect of existence has its safeguards. Religion is no exception. The result is that it has lost its appeal to the fearless and the brave. It tends to become primarily the resort of the very young or the very old— the adolescent and the aged. But the "Christianity" we see manifested is no more like the original than a stroll through the city park is like climbing the Matterhorn. The very fact that men have diluted and weakened it is proof that they cannot tackle the responsibility involved in its powerful demands.

We hear a great many sermons dealing with the quiet life, and advocating a serene and placid disposition. These have led us to think that Christianity is a rocking-chair existence. We conjure up visions of saints as retired persons, sitting in the shade, reading the Bible and conversing with mutual friends about matters of common concern. This is not the picture which the Bible paints. As God reveals it, the believer is a man of action impelled by an inner compulsion that allows no time for rest. He is pictured as a boxer, not in training but in combat. He is not beating the air or punching a bag. He is fighting for his life and willing to die to obtain it!

He is depicted as a soldier, not on leave or furlough, but engaged in deadly warfare. God's word knows nothing about a soldier in civilian dress, but clad in the full panoply of armor with sword unsheathed and pressing the battle against an implacable foe. The Christian is engaged in a race. He is not sitting in the grandstand but is down on the course, running, straining, grasping, sweating, reaching toward the prize. We have become a nation of spectators. The many loll at ease to watch the few fight for victory. Thousands fill the stands to see a handful of persons battle it out on the playing field. This philosophy has invaded the field of religion and our contributions become the price of admission to watch professionals perform.

We need to recapture the sense of personal adventure in the religion of Jesus. We should cease to make safety a fetish or security a god. Faith involves risk. It is true that it is a firm conviction as to things for which we hope, but that hope lies in the future and is not yet realized. It is also true that it is a firm confidence, but it is a confidence in things not seen. One who takes the leap of faith does so with the trust that His hands will be there to catch us and bear us up.

Anyone who flies in a jet-powered plane six miles above the surface of the earth is taking a risk, but not nearly so great a risk as if he were borne into space on an eagle's wings. "But they who wait for the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings like eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint" (Isaiah 40:31). We have too many who are grounded by fright, bounded by caution and bounded by fear.

Jesus did not teach men to "play it safe." He taught them to live dangerously. He implied that it was better to risk and lose than to keep through fear. Do you remember the man with one talent? "I was afraid and I went and hid your talent." This man expected to be commended for his prudence and discretion.

Instead he was addressed as a "wicked and slothful servant." This seems like strong language to apply to one who sought to safeguard another's property. But it is better to lose through use than to fail through fear. One is wicked when he seeks to "hold his own" when what he holds should not be held. He is slothful when he hides in the ground that which should be in circulation. Non-use is abuse! The master said, "You ought to have invested my money." When one invests he takes a chance. The one-talent individual pleaded the nature of the master as his excuse but the parable implies that it is that very thing which should prompt one to put what he has to work. The servant was faithful who "went and did"; that one was worthless who "went and hid."

The New English Bible renders Matthew 16:25, "Whoever cares for his own safety is lost; but if a man will let himself be lost for my sake, he will find his true self." Men leave home to seek for gold, uranium or diamonds. When they find that for which they are looking a dream comes true. Yet it is a fact that the actual finding is often an anticlimax. It is the anticipation, the searching without knowing what the next minute will produce that is the real adventure. Not so with the man who finds his "true self." Life really begins when this happens. Millions are doomed to plod their weary way through earthly existence and never make this discovery.

Our lives are "bound by shallows and by miseries," as Shakespeare puts it, because we are afraid to risk everything. We are frightened by what our relatives will say or what our neighbors will think. We fetter and shackle ourselves by rigid conformity. Life becomes a drudgery and a bore. We want to "stay in good" with all around us and we are resigned to insipid mediocrity to do so. "Whoever cares for his own safety is lost." Many are lost in their own homes. Many are lost in their own congregations. There are great causes to challenge thinking. There are great crusades which need conducting. There are abuses which need correcting. Those who take up the cross will be ridiculed, reviled and derided. But the heart will beat faster with the spirit of real adventure and when it seems that all has been lost all will be gained. This is the way of the cross!

There is a difference in being at cross purposes with those around you and having the cross purpose for your life. Too many have a martyr complex. These are not killed. They simply commit suicide. They do not lose their lives, they merely take them. They cannot find themselves because they look too close to home. They get in their own way. Note that it is not the man who merely invests his life who will gain. There are thousands who commit their lives to the church and the religious way of existence. You can check their names on the record. You can see them sitting in the pews every Sunday, you can behold their punctilious observance of all the rules and ordinances. They will tell you that through habit "the church has become a part of our lives." That is the trouble— life is partitioned off in little well-defined cubicles. There isn't anything about such protected and well-regulated little procedures as they indulge which is adventurous.

What a change occurs when someone who has been hanging on the church by his finger nails or "the skin of his teeth," suddenly encounters Jesus! It may not happen while he is doing what the world calls "something religious." Too often the church comes between one and Jesus. Our performances in it may act as masks to obscure reality. Sometimes the meeting occurs as a crisis in life. Everything which seemed so secure and orderly comes crashing down about your shoulders. It may be bankruptcy which "wipes you out." It may be the incredible unfaithfulness and infidelity of one in whom you placed implicit confidence. It may be a sin of your own, a sin of such enormity you cannot believe you did it.

But whatever it is, while you are poking through the rubble of your caved-in dreams, weeping in emptiness and soul-hunger, until you come to the place where you cast yourself recklessly down before the Lord of life, you will sense that another is walking in the wasteland with you. And you will know your companion is the rebuilder of shattered hopes, the resurrection!

BUILDING ON THE BEDROCK

There is a constant temptation in our modern culture to identify ourselves with Jesus in word while ignoring His demands upon our lives. It is a matter of personal honor to be regarded as a Christian. In respectable circles of society it is a card of admission. It is a good recommendation when you seek a position as a junior executive. It has come to pass that being a Christian is no more of an adventure than being a minor stockholder in Bethlehem Steel or the Carey Salt Company. A Christian is no more expected to change the world than a holder of one share is expected to change the policy of these corporations. Both are expected to acknowledge the head of the firm and do nothing but conform.

Unfortunately for this philosophy, acknowledgment of the head of the community of saints entails a life of non-conformity to the world. We cannot really recognize His lordship without assuming our own responsibility to change and transform the environment in which we live. Any person who attempts this embarks upon the high seas of adventure. He will become a prophet without honor in his own country. He may be stigmatized and ostracized by the unthinking ones whose hearts he tries to fire with the real message of God. "It is always the same— you never fail to resist the Holy Spirit! Just as your fathers did, so you are doing now. Can you name a single prophet whom your fathers did not persecute?" (Acts 7:51, 52). Those to whom this was addressed proved the validity of the accusation. They stoned to death the one who asked the question.

We live in a profit-taking and not a prophet-making society! Our norm is deadly to the spirit. We address Jesus as Lord but serve things as our gods. Thus we are absorbed and assimilated by the culture around us. We talk about adjustment to life and by this we mean adapting ourselves to the standards of the world. We are afraid of being conspicuous by being different. Our witness is stultified, our hopes are crucified, and we become resigned to hopeless mediocrity. There is no longer very much that is heroic about what we call Christianity.

Jesus recognized the temptation to conform. He asked, "What is the point of calling me 'Lord, Lord,' without doing what I tell you to do?" This implies that there really is no point to much of what passes for Christianity in these days. Those who subscribe to it are quick to acknowledge Jesus as Lord but the idea that they should actually adopt the implications of His way of life is remote from their thinking. The "churches" are geared and managed so that the spirit is not free. If one should attempt to eat with publicans and sinners he would be treated exactly as was the Master during His personal sojourn on earth. Every day must have been one of genuine adventure for Jesus. It was also one fraught with constant danger.

Our lives are too shallow. It is easier to set up a prefabricated structure on the sand than to build a permanent home. The whole world around us is one vast sub-division consisting of pre-fabs. A man who goes in for solid construction is regarded as an oddball. If one chooses a course in college which will enable him to serve the needs of humanity instead of to secure a lucrative position, if he reads and studies diligently even to the neglect of the big football game of the season he is a "square." If he expresses a deep conviction in Bible class on Sunday which cuts across the thinking of the party with which he is allied he is a dangerous influence and will have to be warned. Because of this, religion has become a tedious and monotonous performance. We must recapture the spirit of adventure or die because we have lost the sense of adventure of the spirit.

Here is the way Jesus puts it. "Let me show you what the man who comes to me, hears what I have to say, and puts it into practice, is really like. He is like a man building a house, who dug down to rock bottom and laid the foundations of his house upon it. Then when the flood came and the flood water swept down upon that house, it could not shift because it was properly built." Note that the test of a properly built house is not its external attractiveness but its ability to withstand times of crisis. The strength is derived not from the superstructure but from the foundation. Before a man can build upward he must first dig downward. If he does not do this any structure he erects will be superficial. That word is from a Latin term which means "lying on the surface." It refers to something which does not penetrate below that which can be seen.

But what is "rock bottom"? How do you know when you have dug deep enough? The rock bottom life is one that involves three things— coming to Jesus, hearing his words, and putting them into practice. When one adopts as his philosophy one of total commitment to Jesus, when he resolves to reproduce the life of Jesus on earth to the fullest extent, subject only to his human limitation, that person has his "rock bottom." He is then ready to start building. After that, every stone he lays will bring him nearer heaven. What are some of the involvements of the rock bottom way of life? Let me suggest a few and this will enable you to test the permanency of your dwelling.

1. A universal love for mankind based not upon reciprocity, but upon love for love's sake. The word for this is philanthropy. It is not love bestowed with a view of return. The world cannot be changed by love of force but by the force of love. We must inaugurate a reign of love in our hearts with all men as subjects. To the extent one does not love, to that extent he does not live. Love does not wait to see if it will be either received or returned. It is a blessing to bestow and not a bait with which to bargain. Love is never cheap, and what one gives or gets that is cheap, cannot be love. I think we need to recall again the words of Jesus which we have previously quoted, "For if you love only those who love you, what credit is that to you? Even the tax collectors do that."

2. An association with men based not upon their agreement with us but upon their need of compassion and understanding. The closest companions of Jesus were often ignorant, selfish and quarrelsome. They did not grasp His purpose nor understand His motives. They selfishly tried to maneuver themselves into positions of prominence and prestige in a kingdom which had not yet come. They rebuked Him in some of His most solemn declarations. They sought to regulate where He would go and when. In the moment of His greatest crisis they lay down on the ground and went to sleep.

In spite of all this Jesus never left them. He did not tell them that unless they straightened up He would withdraw Himself from them. To limit our association only to those who parrot our traditional slogans and fit the stereotype we have created is not to follow Jesus. It is to deny Him. Such an attitude of exclusivism is born of pride which will destroy us. It gratifies our own desire for prestige but defeats the purpose for which Jesus died. True adventure lies outside our narrow walls which we have erected because of fear and insecurity. We must love daringly. "And if you exchange greetings only with your own circle, are you doing anything exceptional? Even the pagans do as much."

3. A renunciation of the rule of gold in behalf of the Golden Rule. This will enable you to disprove the cynical proverb that "every man has his price." No one can give his loyalty to some things and be loyal to the creator of all things. It is impossible to serve both the creature and the Creator. The temptation to try and do so is one of the most inviting in the world.

During the past decade we have seen how this has once more fulfilled the declaration of Jesus, "I have come to set a man against his father, and a daughter against her mother" (Matthew 10:35). Many parents have grown up in a world of affluence and inflation. It is an age of what is called the "expanding economy." At a time when millions go to bed hungry every night, and thousands die from malnutrition and starvation in other parts of the world, we gorge ourselves. One of the symbols of our day is the fast food franchise. Quick service eateries line our highways as do the poor begging for bread in India.

Many young people reared in homes of wealth, have forsaken them to identify with the downtrodden and despised of the earth. I know of young men and women who have gone to minister to Indian tribes where death often comes early because of unsanitary conditions. I know of others who have made long treks to faraway places to discover their own identity. All of this bothers their parents who keep asking where they have failed. They have provided an education which would enable their offspring to become trusted bank presidents, engineers of note, or scientists of acclaim. It distresses them when these young people graduate and turn their backs upon the whole bit to live in an Eskimo village, or in the black ghetto of the inner-city.

What such parents should do is to recognize that their children have weighed the gold standard against the bold standard of faith and sharing and rejected the former because it has no promise after this brief life is over. "A man's life consists not of the abundance of things which he possesses." I do not think this amounts to rejection of parents at all. It is to be regretted that they have allowed themselves to become so identified with a certain ambitious way of life that they can no longer distinguish between themselves as persons and the lifestyle they have adopted.

4. A substitution of forgiveness of failures for a failure to forgive. This is not the same as ignoring failures or merely overlooking them. It requires a recognition of the failures and an understanding of those who have failed. It is not the same as pretending that no failure exists. The Bible quotes the words of Jesus thus, "For if you forgive other people their failures, your Heavenly Father will forgive you. But if you will not forgive other people, neither will your Heavenly Father forgive you your failures."

It is apparent from this that the only individual who can dare to be unforgiving of the shortcomings of another is one who is perfect. To be unforgiving of others is to plait a noose for one's own neck. There is some truth in the idea that no one can ever be a real person who has not learned the grace of forgiveness. Certainly one cannot truly be like God unless he has learned and demonstrated the art of forgiving. The apostle brings it into focus with the expression, "forgiving one another, as God in Christ forgave you" (Ephesians 4:32). Thomas Fuller, the English physician, wrote in 1732, "The worst of men are those who will not forgive." Families have been wrecked, churches torn asunder, and nations destroyed because of unwillingness to forgive slights, whether real or imaginary.

In his intriguing volume None of these Diseases, Dr. S. I. McMillen has a chapter entitled "The High Cost of Getting Even." In it he points out the startling fact that the moment you start hating a man you become his slave. Even though he may be hundreds of miles away he affects your sleep, your eating, your relationship to those about you, and may even be responsible for your developing ulcers or colitis. Perhaps Jesus was trying to save us unnecessary doctor bills when He said we should forgive a man seventy time seven. Jesus had a lot to say about forgiveness, but nothing was more vital than His observation, "If you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you."

5. A proper sense of values leading to a life free from concern about the merely sensual and physical aspects of existence. The pagans in the days when Jesus was upon earth were always thinking of things to eat, drink or wear. The neo-pagans of our own day exhibit the same characteristics. Over against these is the wholly committed life. "Set your heart on His kingdom and His goodness, and all these things will come to you as a matter of course."

Only a house built upon an immovable rock will not be shaken or rocked by storm and wind. It costs too much to build cheaply. No house can be better than he who lives in it for "every house is built by some man." We build for this age only when we build on the sand. That which is to endure for the ages must be built on the Rock of Ages. Shifting sands and drifting lives will not stand against wild waters and sweeping storms. Let us all take heed how we build.

Adventure in the Spirit

Contents

Many of our readers will have noticed that we have thus far said little about the Holy Spirit and our relationship to Him. We have emphasized the sheer adventure involved in entering into a vital and life-changing experience with Jesus, but this must not be regarded as a deliberate slight against the Spirit. Any attempt to downgrade the Spirit would be a reflection against Jesus who promised the Spirit to believers in Him in such glowing terms.

Moreover, any true relationship with Jesus will be effected by the Spirit. It is impossible to think of one without taking the other into account. Indeed, the Spirit is called the Spirit of God and the Spirit of Christ. They are indissolubly linked together in aim, effort and accomplishment. The motivating and regulatory principle which governs one who is no longer under condemnation is referred to in a beautiful expression as the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (Romans 8:1). In the same chapter, in one verse, occurs the terms the Spirit, the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of Christ. The immediate concern of the latter is provocative. "Any one who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him" (verse 9).

All of us are aware of the tremendous upsurge of interest in the Holy Spirit during the decade just past. This is good. Modern man needs to become aware of the futility of his own efforts to bring order out of chaos. He needs to realize that all of the political schemes he can devise cannot lift him out of the mire caused by sin. He needs to return unto God and "crucify the flesh with its passions and desires." It is a good omen when men fall upon their knees and call upon God.

For several centuries little has been said about the thrust of the Spirit in our rapidly developing technological age. This is not so much because believers denied the existence of the Spirit, but rather reflects a lack of their sense of need of His power or assistance. Man has been riding high in the saddle. In a nation which was once conceived of as having unlimited natural resources we have developed an ease of living never before known. Mistakenly we have referred to it as "the good life," without realizing that it was actually a smoother road toward death and decay.

We have raped our forests. We have assaulted our land. We have polluted our streams. We have destroyed God's creatures wantonly. We have indulged in that ghastly form of pride which manifests itself in racial prejudice. We have laughed at morality and ridiculed purity. We have elected men to represent us who took bribes, men who lied, men who were adulterers and fornicators. Exhausted, frightened, and helpless in our weakness we have turned to the Spirit of God.

Candor forces us to admit that what we have called "the Christian religion" has done little to prepare us for the moral bankruptcy we face. In the first place, we have shattered the body of believers into sects and parties, each one of which was born of fear, nurtured on the pap of pride, while growing up in an atmosphere of affluence in which the Spirit was seldom mentioned. In our fragmentation we have expended our energies and depleted our resources in fighting other believers, esteeming orthodoxy of opinion to be of more importance than the cross of Jesus, or, what is worse, equating the two as one. We have contributed to the confusion instead of alleviating it.

Each party has developed a fierce sense of pride which manifests itself in costly structures, elaborate rituals and fierce rivalry for attention. Each has been engaged in a struggle for a place in the sun, a development of a public image. All have forgotten that those who carve out an image always end up worshiping it. Churches have fled from the inner city to maintain their image. In a spirit of self-righteousness we have resented the poor, the ignorant and social outcasts. The question has not been what God thinks of the downtrodden but "What will people think of us?"

Now a great change has taken place. It began when a generation sickened by the thought of continuous war with the frightful toll of innocent civilians, began to regard Christianity as a conscience-shield for those who wiped out whole cities of helpless humans who were mere pawns of war-makers, victims of "man's inhumanity to man." In a vain and misguided attempt to transcend the ceaseless round on the treadmill they experimented with chemically induced highs, forgetting that the morning after would be worse than the night before. In their quest for ecstasy they increased the agony.

The collapse of this woeful experiment of idealists turned them in another direction. This time it was sex. Again the immature approach made two grave errors. It confused sex with love and life. It is neither, although it can be an expression of both. But just as the aftermath of the drug culture left those who did not free themselves from the clutch of its icy fingers hopelessly hooked, so the sex binge left its toll of those doomed to drift from one affair to another, never capable of making a true commitment or of keeping a covenant. Sex became as empty and void as the lives of its hedonistic worshipers.

The further search for meaning turned to the East. It did so for a number of reasons which we cannot detail here. The guru who sat cross-legged and meditated while hundreds suffered from hunger and starvation outside his compound became the hero of the day. He was calm, collected and disinterested. Young and old, drifting aimlessly upon the current of existence, sought for wise men who could give the answer they sought. They listened to esoteric language which neither he who spoke nor they who heard could understand. They hailed it as profound because it was veiled. Clever Oriental manipulators took advantage of the trend and moved into the West to siphon off the wealth from those whose faith had curdled into gullibility.

And then it happened! Man was empty, forlorn and part of the lonely crowd. In his extremity he turned his face toward God. When he did he became aware of the Holy Spirit. Attuned by modern literature and television to the finding of an answer to the momentous problems of life in a few pages or within a thirty minute period, he emphasized the miraculous and sought Christian character in a single encounter rather than by the discipline of years and the slow process of maturity.

Thus the test of the reception of the Spirit was made gifts bestowed by the Spirit rather than fruit borne by the Spirit. A gift can be appropriated in a moment. Fruit results from planting followed by nurture and growth. "The farmer waits for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it until it receives the early and late rain. You also be patient. Establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is at hand" (James 5:7, 8). Modern man did not want to wait. He was not conditioned to patience. Establishment took too long.

Spiritually illiterate persons, untutored in the word of God and untaught in the revelation of heaven, began to call upon God. They were joined by an increasing number of theological students whose hearts were parched and dry because of the husks upon which they had been fed. Clergymen in various parties were soon involved and took the leadership in directing others into what was designated "a Holy Spirit experience." The wave swept over sectarian barriers until Catholics and Protestants alike were meeting freely together.

It is not a strange phenomenon that when men become deadly serious and invoke the help of God with tears and inner turmoil that something happens. The depth of human personality is so profound that it is impossible to probe it without resultant experience, a shaking of the inner being. Everywhere men and women began to testify to great changes wrought in their lives. Many of them, although by no means all, alleged that the moment of contact with the divine was accompanied by physical symptoms. A charge like an electric current vibrated through their bodies. There was a tingling of every nerve. Their tongues pronounced unintelligible sounds which were taken to be ecstatic language, unearthly, other-worldly, perhaps heavenly.

The word charismatic began to be heard. This term, which simply means "a gift of grace" took on certain overtones. It was said that we had entered a "charismatic age." Before long those who testified to a mystical encounter resulting in a manifestation of unidentifiable sounds began to speak of a "charismatic fellowship," referring primarily to the drawing together, and the drawing apart of those who had "spoken in tongues," or who claimed a gift such as prophecy, healing, or ability to work miracles.

The effect upon the existing sects composed of those who professed faith in Jesus as the Son of God and Savior of men was generally traumatic. All such sects which have existed more than one generation have a tradition. The forms which the fathers devised by which to express worship to God are handed down and become crystallized and inflexible. The once proud expression "Rome never changes" could have been applied in some degree to every religious establishment. But now a completely new challenge had arisen. It came not from without but from within.

As usual, the reaction of the sheltered, socially-accepted religious establishment was sudden and sharp. Sects which had developed a legalistic approach to the scriptures and which had the Spirit properly and safely catalogued and confined by their interpretative process, announced that the whole thing was Satan-inspired to lure the unwary away from God. With characteristic assertiveness and caught up in the "either-or" fallacy which leaves no room for alternatives it was announced that it had to come from either God or the devil. Since it came to persons outside the party who were not orthodox, it could not come from God, therefore, it was of Satan.

Others declared that the "experiences" were not real. They were mental aberrations of the highly emotional individuals who imagined God had spoken to or through them. Such individuals deserved more pity than censure, although they received a good deal more of the latter, since those who tend to be like the Pharisees are much more adept at censure than at compassion.

These hasty objections did not seem to describe the existing situation. In the first place, there could be no denial that many of those who testified to a personal encounter with the Spirit were notably changed. Some who had never prayed in the presence of others, or even privately, became bold and open in their prayer life. Their new lifestyle was manifest even in public where, in large and pretentious restaurants, they bowed their heads and reverentially thanked God for meals which they once ate with no thought that food is a witness of God's care. Business men who previously would never refer to Jesus in meetings with their associates now testified of their faith at the beginnings of workshops and seminars. Families which had been on the verge of disintegration were welded together. This is hardly the work of Satan. Surely he is too clever to fashion a weapon which could be used to destroy his malign influence.

Regardless of the origin of the personality-shaking experience it was real to those who underwent it. Whether it was the welling up of the previously unprobed depth of one's emotional being, or the response on the soul-level of rationality to a crisis situation, or an actual confrontation with the Spirit of God, the result was the same. And if it was not the latter it was one more proof that the Spirit can take the mistakes of an honest seeker after God and weave them into the fabric of God's design.

Any strange and novel phenomenon produces real problems in closely confined and closed-end institutions, and this one was no exception. In all too many instances those whose lives had taken on new meaning felt obligated to testify to others who were neither sympathetic toward nor ready for their testimony. The cleavage which often resulted was not just from one side. Those who felt they knew the truth of the Spirit began to vie with those who felt they had the truth in the Spirit. Once again the division condemned by the Spirit occurred in some areas and hostility and bitterness resulted. This only crystallized the parties in opposition as it always does.

The result is that any person who now seeks to speak without "taking sides" is regarded with suspicion by all. In spite of this it seems to me that one who has a firm love for the scriptures and for the Spirit as the revealing Agent, and who receives every child of God as his brother and sister regardless of mystical experience or lack of it, might well speak in a cautionary spirit to help maintain the bond of peace in which atmosphere the unity of the Spirit flourishes. None of us can write upon a controversial issue wholly without a mental slant. That must be understood, accepted and properly evaluated by those who read. No one is wholly objective on any theme to which he gives serious thought.

In an attitude of concern for the whole body of Christ I am going to suggest a few critical observations. My hope is, that by doing so, I can make it possible for all to share in the marvelous adventure of the Spirit-filled and Spirit-guided life. It is my conviction, which is borne out by the scriptures as I understand them, that it is the divine purpose for every believer to possess the Spirit and to be strengthened by His might, but it was never the design of God to bestow the gift of tongues or any other single gift upon all. This leads to the ultimate conclusion that the proof of the indwelling Spirit is not a special gift but the bearing of fruit.

1. I think it is a serious mistake to regard some of the saints of God as charismatic to the exclusion of others. Every person in Christ is charismatic for the simple reason that all are recipients of a gift of grace. No one who shares in the rich and abundant grace of God is excluded from the riches and abundance. It is probably a useless exercise in arithmetic to try and count the gifts of grace because there is no indication they have all been enumerated and identified. Every such gift has been freely bestowed in order that the one possessing it may function to the building up of the body. Any enabling endowment of God which contributes in any sense or degree to the betterment of the saints is a charismatic gift, and there are no useless or non-functioning members of the body as God looks at them.

In Romans 12:3-8 the apostle speaks of "gifts that differ according to the grace given unto us." The word for gifts is charismata. Included in the list are prophecy, service, teaching, exhorting, contributing, rendering aid and doing acts of mercy. All of these are gifts of God. When we come to see that one who renders any service to another is charismatic, we will not need to make the distinction. It should not be forgotten that this statement occurs in a context which specifically declares that "in one body we have many members, and all members have not the same function." Nor should it be lightly regarded that the whole section is addressed to "every one among you."

2. In this same vein it is an error to speak of this as "a charismatic age" unless we mean to include the whole Christian era starting with the first proclamation of the Good News about Jesus. There has never been a time when the body of Christ has not functioned through the gifts of its members. There is no such thing as "a charismatic age" because there is no such thing as "a non-charismatic age." The Spirit is no more alive now that He has ever been. He has always been active and the body has lived because He has been alive in it. Such expressions as "the Spirit has started to move," which imply that He has been lazy and immobile, are not commendatory. It may be that men are beginning to move in response to the Spirit and for that we should be grateful. But God has never withdrawn the Spirit from the body.

3. Certainly one should not be guilty of nit-picking. He should not major in minors. This creates a problem in communication because one man's major is another man's minor, and vice versa. I am quite convinced that it is a mistake to refer to what is happening as a "Pentecostal experience." What happened on Pentecost was unique. It will not be repeated. On this day, when the Jews brought the firstfruits of their wheat harvest to present before the Lord in the form of baked loaves of bread, God gathered together the firstfruits of his harvest of souls from the field of the world.

Speaking in various languages was not the important thing. It was simply the means for attracting attention and drawing together the multitude. It was the message of Peter which was important. What the people saw and heard was validation of the great fact that the one whom they had crucified had been exalted to the right hand of God and received from the Father the promised Holy Spirit (Acts 2:33). Surely this need not again be ratified. A second Pentecost would be an admission that the first was a failure. It would not be a demonstration of faith but a testimony to unbelief.

What happens today in the repetition of esoteric phrases and unidentifiable sounds has no relationship at all to what transpired on Pentecost. Upon that occasion the apostles spoke in "other tongues," that is, in foreign languages. Some seventeen different areas of the world were represented by those present and each person heard the apostles speak in his own language. It was described by them as "his own native language" and "our own tongues." For this reason, those who now claim "the gift of tongues," refer to the gifts at Corinth as the basis for what is referred to as ecstatic tongues, a term which has no scriptural counterpart. Modern claimants should refer to theirs as "a Corinthian experience" to be consistent.

It is not our purpose herein to be critical of believers in any particular sect, although we are desperately opposed to all sectism, as a work of the flesh (Galatians 5:20). But mention should be made of those who operate under the title of Assembly of God Pentecostal. There is but one body of Christ upon earth. It contains all of the saved upon earth. Not one is outside of it. It is the assembly of the gathered ones, the community of the reconciled, the kingdom of God's dear Son. It was born upon Pentecost. Every child of God in our world can look back to Pentecost which the apostles called "the beginning." From the standpoint of origin one sect is not Pentecostal to the exclusion of the rest of the members of the one body. What began upon Pentecost was not a sect and the proliferation of sects since that day is a scandal to the cross and to the message upon Pentecost.

4. Speaking in tongues was never the proof of one's justification and acceptance by God, nor of the indwelling Spirit. There were many in the one body while the apostles were upon earth who did not possess this singular gift, and there is no record that any person ever prayed to receive it, or that others prayed that he might. In Corinth where it is said that the saints were "not lacking in any spiritual gift," it is distinctly said that while one was given "various kinds of tongues," others were recipients of various other manifestations or "varieties of gifts." Indeed the question is asked "Do all speak in tongues?" (1 Corinthians 12:30) and the obvious answer is in the negative.

There is so much more which could be said, and perhaps needs to be said on this aspect of our theme. I will forbear lest I appear too negative toward those of God's precious children who are caught up in the current emphasis upon the gifts of the Spirit. I do not want to appear in the role of an attacker, but it needs to be pointed out that there are very grave problems about "the charismatic movement" in the minds of many deep and reverential students of the revealed word of God. These cannot be dismissed as mere "kill-joys" or ecclesiastical "sticks in the mud." It is valid to insist that human experiences be tested in the light of God's word and not the reverse. What the Holy Spirit has said is as important as what it is affirmed the Spirit is doing.

In the final analysis the faith must stand upon objective truth which is capable of being examined and verified by historical process, and not upon subjective experience which cannot be validated. Inward feelings and emotional reactions are not a criterion for measurement of truth. One can be as happy or sad from believing a lie as from believing a truth. What I believe happened to me may prove to be a source of inward blessing but my experience can never be the ground of another's faith.

This was brought home to me quite forcefully by a recent occurrence. Two young women came to our home and introduced themselves as "sisters" representing the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints with headquarters in Salt Lake City, Utah. I had often been visited by young men mistakenly calling themselves "elders," and engaged them in spirited but good-natured conversation. In every instance when they were being backed into a verbal corner one would look at his wristwatch and stand up and say they had an appointment and would have to leave at once. It had happened so often and in exactly the same fashion that it was obvious it was a developed technique for "getting off the hook" when the going became rough.

But this was the first time I had been visited by young women engaged in carrying out the two year missionary stint and it was very interesting. The initial approach with the leading questions was the same and I could even anticipate what was coming next. At what I thought was the proper juncture I gently and smilingly interposed that I could never become a Mormon. When questioned as to my reasons I pointed out that they recognized three books in addition to the Bible as being inspired of God, but all three were self-contradictory, contradictory of each other, and all directly contradictory of the Bible. After being challenged to produce a contradiction I produced five of the easier and simpler ones. Upon being confronted with these, the "sisters" were visibly shaken, but the older of the two girls said, "But I have had an inner experience which confirms them as true."

I pointed out that if it took such a phenomenon before she could believe in the veracity of the records, after having been reared to believe in them from infancy, she could not expect anyone else to accept them who had not had a kindred experience. I then affirmed that documents of the nature of those produced by Joseph Smith, Parley P. Pratt, and their contemporaries, would have to be self-validating since they were alleged to have been presented by celestial beings and that no amount of subjective experience could either explain or erase a single contradiction in the records themselves. At this point both looked at their watches and said almost in unison, "You must excuse us. We have an appointment and we must leave at once or we will be late." There are laws of evidence by which facts must be established by testimony in order to be credible, and what a witness feels has nothing to do with the situation. It is not subject to cross-examination and is not admissible as evidence.

The Holy Spirit is not divisive but unitive. Peace is the fruit of the Spirit but strife is a work of the flesh. I propose to receive all of my brethren, not because of the gifts they claim, but because God has claimed us all as His own. Every Christian has received the Spirit. He is God's birthday gift together with the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38). The Spirit has been given to all who obey (Acts 5:32). I rejoice in every life that has been purged and purified. I rejoice in every fervent prayer poured out to the Father, whether with hands upraised or not.

I have resolved that I will never make any man's experience to which he testifies, a test of fellowship or communion. But I have also resolved that I will never allow another to make his experience a test of my relationship to the Father. In the first case I would adopt another creed than Christ. In the second I would consent to being judged by another creed than Christ.

This does not deny that if there are those who try to impose a special experience upon all and form a kind of "spiritual-experience clique" to the exclusion of others who are saints, but do not share the experience, separation may become necessary. If it does it will not be because of the personal experience but because of the factionalism created around it. Certainly Paul would have been divisive and destructive if he had begun to advocate that the only place Christ could be met was on the highway south of Damascus and then only at high noon. It is here that we may watch with some trepidation the formation of "a charismatic fellowship" which can only end in a charismatic sect.

There is room in Christ for men of various degrees of knowledge and of varied opinions. There is room for those of diverse opinions. But there is no room for division. The body of Christ is composed of many parts, but not of many parties. To give partisan allegiance to a charismatic position would be no different than to devote it to circumcision, as was done in the first century community of believers. Of course, the Holy Spirit does not create division. He is the divine agent of reconciliation and unity. We may be sure that when division occurs in the family of God it is not the work of the Spirit but the result of misguided zeal upon the part of those whose ambition is greater than their concern for their brethren.

Speaking in tongues, whether a genuine gift of the Holy Spirit or the projection of a deeply devoted and searching human spirit can never become a test or proof of discipleship. The longest treatise on tongue-speaking in the new covenant scriptures was because of an abuse of the gift. It was climaxed with the pointing out of a more excellent way. That way is the way of love. Without love every gift is childish and every sacrifice empty. It was our Lord Himself who said, "By this will all men know you are my disciples, if you love one another." We need to learn and practice the more excellent way.

Having written this, I now propose to deal with the real adventure of the Spirit which enriches life upon earth and lifts us out of the drudgery and despair caused by sin. Whether the special gifts of the Spirit are now attainable or not will have little bearing upon our theme. We may allow theologians to discuss the fine points of miraculous bestowals while we slake our thirst at the fountain which Jesus promised would not only flow to us, but also through us.

Then and Now

Contents

The Holy Spirit has always been not only a mystery, but also a problem to man. Caught up as he is in a realm of the flesh and doomed to inescapable death, it is difficult for man to accept a rational view of the supernatural. In the days when Jesus was upon the earth, the two principal sects of the Jews were sharply divided over the matter. The Sadducees flatly denied that there were angels or spirits. They dogmatically asserted there was no such thing as a resurrection or a life beyond physical death. They accepted the five books of Moses, the Torah, as God's revelation to Moses, and defended it, but still they were materialists. The Pharisees also accepted the Torah and believed in spirits and a resurrection, but made void the law of God by their traditions. It is apparent that both groups have representatives on earth today.

The personality of the Spirit seems to be one of the major sources of argument. Those who deny it usually seek to define the Holy Spirit by one of two propositions. They seem to ignore the fact that they have not so much found a way of explaining the Spirit, as of explaining the Spirit away. Let us briefly consider these two approaches.

First, there are those who think of the Spirit as a mere force or quality in the world. He is in a spiritual sense what gravity, electricity, or magnetism are in the natural. All of these are indefinable except in their effects. They are intangible and we cannot be sure how or why they function. "The terms applied to them are arbitrary ones. It is suggested that the Spirit is also a force moving in the universe beyond the power of science to investigate or the power of the mind to comprehend. To those who thus speculate, the Spirit is the wind of God, mindless and unfeeling, but blowing where and when the mind of God directs.

Those who regard the Spirit as a quality think of Him as a spirit of holiness, just as we speak of someone having a spirit of compassion or a spirit of meekness. In this case the Spirit is an attribute possessed by another, rather than one having attributes or characteristics. Whole religious movements have been built upon the predication that the Holy Spirit is simply the spirit of man, purged, purified and sanctified. In such cases the Spirit has no identity of His own, being identified only through the human spirit when it is affected by the blood of Christ.

Second, there are those who confuse the Spirit with the word of God, and quite frequently with the Bible, as a compilation of revelation first given orally and then committed to writing for preservation. Frequently this confusion is the work of those who have a legalistic view of the letters written by the apostles and who want to enforce their interpretations, deductions and opinions as the very Spirit of God. They do not realize that by making the Spirit the revelation rather than the revealer they actually "outrage the Spirit of grace" to borrow a term from Hebrews 10:29.

An unhealthy view of the scriptures which make them an object of worship, and causes those who view them to become guilty of bibliolatry, leads to a faulty exegesis of the statement of Jesus recorded in John 6:63, "The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and life." Attention to the immediate context will reveal that Jesus was not affirming that the Holy Sprit was merely the spoken word. He was contrasting the bread and fish which He had provided to feed the multitude for their physical sustenance with the spiritual teaching He had given for eternal life. The first had to be digested and the other believed. "It is the spirit that gives life, the flesh is of no avail," if we may paraphrase, "The words that I have spoken to you are spiritual in nature, producing life."

The Holy Spirit is not simply an energy, a force, or a power in the world. He is a divine personage as is proven by His associates, attributes and abilities. The student who wants to pursue this phrase more thoroughly is referred to the author's book Heaven Help Us The Holy Spirit in Your Life Today. It was written for the purpose of establishing by the scriptures the identity and uniqueness of the Spirit as a personality. In this treatise we will simply proceed upon the ground that the Spirit is thus identified in the scriptures.

Can every child of God be so directly related to the Spirit that he may share in the power and blessings bestowed by the Spirit? Before we answer directly let us be aware of the fact that the Holy Spirit has not always functioned in the same manner. Sometimes very small words in the scriptures have a great impact. Two such words are "then" and "now." These occasionally are used to mark two periods of time with the cross of Christ as the dividing point. The Holy Spirit did not operate then as He does now. The coming of Christ made the difference. Before His advent the Spirit operated on a more selective and limited basis.

Certain individuals received the Spirit to enable them to perform their assigned functions but the body of those under the law had no individual and personal relationship with the Spirit. When Moses was taken up into the heights of Mount Sinai and shown a pattern of the tabernacle God wanted built, God called Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan, and filled them with His Spirit (Exodus 31:3). They were inspired to carve, engrave, weave and make furniture. At the same time it appears that the natural talents and abilities of others were sharpened and stirred up to act as assistants to the master craftsmen.

The prophets received their revelations through the Holy Spirit. "God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets" (Hebrews 1:1). "No prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (2 Peter 1:21). It was "the Spirit of Christ within them" who predicted "the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glory" (1 Peter 1:10). The scriptures of the old covenant are God's revelation. Jesus regarded them as such and we should do the same. Any attempt to derogate the scriptures of the old covenant and to make it appear that they are merely the interpretation of current events by the prophets themselves is an affront to Christ.

All during the time of the prophets God was predicting the day would come when He would put His Spirit in the hearts of all His people. A new covenant was to be made. It was to be unlike the covenant made at Sinai. It would not be engraved upon stone tablets. Its guiding principles or rules of action were to be written upon the inner consciousness. The heart and mind would constitute the sanctuary in which the covenant was kept. The covenant would be a person, the Messiah, whom God would appoint.

"When the time had fully come, God sent forth His Son." The angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth to make the annunciation to Mary, who was a virgin. When Mary enquired how she could bear a child since she had no husband, she was told, "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore the child to be born will be called holy, the Son of God" (Luke 1:35). The Spirit is identified with the power of God and was to be the divine agent through whom the seed would be conveyed to the body of the virgin, there to impregnate the ovum from her body so conception could take place.

Elizabeth preceded Mary in pregnancy by six months, and when Mary came to visit her in the hill country the babe leaped in Elizabeth's womb when Mary entered the door. Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit and cried out loudly, "Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb!" When Elizabeth had delivered a son whose name was called John, much to the consternation of her neighbors and relatives, Zechariah was filled with the Holy Spirit and uttered a remarkable prophecy concerning his new offspring.

It is interesting to recall that when Jesus was forty days old, Joseph and Mary took Him to Jerusalem to formally present Him as a firstborn male to the Lord, and to offer the necessary sacrifice for Mary's ceremonial cleansing or purification. When they arrived they met an aged man by the name of Simeon. He was described as righteous and devout and as specifically looking for the consolation of Israel, that is, the Messiah. The Holy Spirit was upon him and had previously revealed to him that he would not die until he had seen the Messiah. Upon the day when Jesus was brought he was inspired by the Spirit to enter the temple where he took the child up in his arms and blessed God and the father and mother. I refer to all of these to indicate that the Spirit was active in the birth and presentation of Jesus.

There is more to it than that. When the time arrived for Jesus to begin His ministry to mankind the Holy Spirit was present in a visible form. Jesus was thirty years old. He traveled from Galilee to the fords of Jordan where John was baptizing. He persuaded John to baptize Him and they walked out into the water together. When He was buried beneath the surface of the flowing stream and brought up again, the Spirit descended in the form of a dove and lighted upon Him. This was a sign previously given to John by which to identify the Son of God. "I myself did not know him; but he who sent me to baptize with water said to me, 'He on whom you see the Spirit descend and remain, this is he who baptizes with the Holy Spirit.' And I have seen and have borne witness that this is the Son of God" (John 1:33, 34). This was the divine anointing, and it was accomplished by God and accompanied by His voice from heaven declaring, "This is my beloved Son with whom I am well pleased."

Jesus affirmed that it was by the Spirit of God He cast out demons. He also reasoned that this was proof the kingdom of God had come upon men. The dispossession of Satan, his dethronement from power over the bodies and hearts of men was proof of the appearance of a superior force (Matthew 12:28, 29). This force would be operative in defence of the ambassadors of the kingdom when they were subjected to arrest and trial before governors and kings. They were to prepare no advance brief. "When they deliver you up, do not be anxious how you are to speak or what you are to say, for what you are to say will be given you in that hour, for it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you" (Matthew 10:19, 20).

Both the manner of speaking and the content were to be under the control of the Spirit. This statement of Jesus is a good definition of what we mean by inspiration. The message to be spoken by the apostles to councils, synagogues, kings and governors was not to be one devised by human rationalization. It was not something which they "figured out" as a good approach to the presentation of the claims of Jesus. They were not to seek for loopholes in the law. There was to be no anxiety in advance, no agonizing over correct phraseology. "What you are to say will be given unto you."

It is, I think, very important that we come to see the message of the apostles for what it is— the word of God. It is not simply a human attempt to explain Jesus to the world. It is not a well thought out apology for One who was loved and accepted as the Messiah. It is not truth dressed in myth, even in the best meaning of that term in modern theological circles. Jesus said, "It is not you who speak, but the Spirit of the Father speaking through you."

In the face of this, it is a little bit incredible for those who profess faith in Jesus, to imply that the only inspiration the apostles had was that which resulted from their own inward fervency. Even in the heat of passion they were not capable of producing the kind of message we have from them. Those who knew them best were astounded out of their wits on Pentecost when they recognized that ignorant and unlearned Galileans were performing as they did. A blatant unbeliever might reason that despite their lack of training in the art of communication, they delivered themselves nobly under pressure.

But the believer cannot have such an option. Jesus plainly said, "It is not you who speak." He also added, "It is the Spirit of your Father speaking through you." Jesus either told the truth or He did not. If He did we are forced to accept the fact that the apology of the apostles was not originated by themselves, but was a revelation of the Spirit of God. If Jesus did not tell the truth He was not the living Word of God and the disclosure to the apostles was not the revelation of God. And if this be true we are not believers for there is no one in whom to believe.

There was no question in the minds of the apostles as to the source of their message. Paul had no problem on this score. He declared that what could not be learned by observation, hearing or human rationalization as to God's preparation for those who love Him. "God has revealed to us through the Spirit" (1 Corinthians 2:9, 10). Then he said, "And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom, but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spiritual truths to those who possess the Spirit" (verse 13).

Obviously it is not enough for one who receives and delivers a message to assign its origin to a divine source. The one to whom the message is addressed must also credit it to God, or it will appear to him as merely a piece of human philosophy. Under such circumstances it will demand no more serious attention than any other propaganda thought out by good communicators. The apostle knew the importance of a proper attitude upon the part of those who heard them. No more positive proof of this can be found than in a statement made to the Thessalonians, "And we also thank God constantly for this, that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men, but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers" (1 Thess. 2:13).

There can be no doubt that the Spirit of God was active in the life and work of Jesus on earth. His birth was predicted by the Spirit, His entrance into the world of human need was anointed by the Spirit, His mighty works were done by the power of the Spirit, and the record of them transmitted by the Spirit through human agents called and chosen for the task.

But all during His movement upon earth Jesus held forth great promises of the Spirit who would come to believers, enriching their lives, strengthening their resolves and leading them on to certain victory. He affirmed that great as were His mighty works, His disciples would do greater because He returned to the Father. I shall limit my discussion of the promises of Jesus to two occasions. The first is recorded by John in chapter seven of his record of the life of Jesus as we have divided it for our convenience.

The entire section deals with events related to the feast of tabernacles or shelters. This was the third of the annual harvest festivals occurring in conjunction with the gathering of the vintage. During the days of celebration the Jewish families were required to live outside their homes in temporary shelters constructed of tree branches and palm fronds. It was a time of great joy but also of daily pomp and circumstance with priestly ritual in the temple courtyard.

The presence of Jesus at the festival was the occasion of a considerable stir. Some defended him as a good man while others argued that he was a deceiver and dangerous. When He invaded the temple to teach publicly He became the subject of a great deal of public muttering and gossip. The stage was set for Him to make a pronouncement which would have a tremendous impact. He did so on the final day of the feast.

Each day thousands of Jews in attendance brought branches of trees which they waved toward the altar during the singing of the Hallel by the well-trained Levitical choir. During the ceremony a priest poured water from the pool of Siloam which had been carried to the site in a golden pitcher. The water was solemnly poured out by the side of the altar. On the last day of the festival this ceremony was made even more impressive. The priests brought twice as much water from the famous pool. Just as the first words of Psalm 118 were chanted— "O give thanks unto the Lord"— they appeared at the Water Gate and marched toward the altar. Upon arrival at the altar they marched around it seven times in memory of the toppling of the walls of Jericho so that the city could become the firstfruits of Palestinian conquest.

Then the water was ceremoniously poured out while waves of religious emotion swept over the vast audience which filled the court of the people. It was at this time Jesus daringly stood up and cried out, "If any one thirst, let him come to me and drink. He who believes in me, as scripture has said, 'Out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water.'" John recorded these words long afterwards and he adds the explanation, "Now this he said about the Spirit, which those who believed in him were to receive, for as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified."

One does not need to be a profound thinker to recognize the tremendous import of this statement of Jesus upon our relationship with the divine. It is a prescription for the satisfaction of our deepest human need and the solution to our most profound problem in the human perspective. We should think about its implications for our lives and our world in orderly fashion.

1. There is within every person a longing, a desire for that which is beyond. The spirit is in one sense a captive of the flesh because it is only by wearing such a garment as the flesh that the human spirit can exist and function in this kind of material realm. Just as a diver who works at great depths of the ocean, or an astronaut who walks upon other planets, must wear a special suit adapted to the environment, so the spirit must be garbed in a body composed of cells and tissues in order to function in the atmosphere of earth.

But there is a yearning of the spirit for freedom which can never be satisfied by the flesh. As pleasurable as eating, and sex, and companionship may be, they can never be the full end of happiness. Digestion falters, desire fails and dear ones depart. Man was not made for time alone and he dreams of transcendence. It is this craving or pang which Jesus refers to as thirst.

It was a fortunate figure of speech. Those who were present for the festival were thoroughly grounded in a knowledge of the scriptures. They knew the beautiful forty-second psalm in which David described the panting of his soul for God by the panting of a weary deer for the water brooks, and went on to say, "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." Nor would they forget the lovely sixty-third psalm in which David cries, "My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is." Thirst represents the acute pang of one who is dehydrating, whose tissues are burning up, whose tongue is cleaving to the roof of his mouth. And spiritual thirst is a burning desire for satisfaction in the Eternal One.

It is significant that Jesus interrupted a religious ceremony with all of its traditional trappings to make His public announcement. The day upon which He spoke was "the great day" of the festival. It was at the climax of the week of living in the outdoors in booths. Ritualistic regulations governed every phase of the occasion. Included in the branches used for the shelters must be palm fronds and willows cut by a brook. The sides had to be woven but not close enough to exclude the sunlight. The roof had to be thatched but in such a way the stars could be seen at night.

The water from the pool of Siloam had to be carried in a golden pitcher and only by members of the priestly caste. The priests entered the gate at a precise moment, clued in by the great blast from the priestly trumpet. Their processional to the altar was with "measured beat and slow." As the water was being poured out the huge congregation of worshipers waved their palm fronds and willow branches above their heads while shouting, "Hallelujah." It was a time of fervor and excitement. And it was then the voice of the Teacher from despised Nazareth rang out above the din.

"If any one thirst, let him come to me, and drink!" Was there intended to be a contrast between the pompous pageantry and priestly performance, and simply coming to Christ? If so, the followers of Jesus have miserably failed to preserve the distinctive. They have incorporated into their "worship" all of the trappings of Judaism and have added thereto and multiplied what are called "Christian traditions" until once again the face of God is obscured by waving branches and the words of God drowned out by creedal shouting. The thirsty soul is summoned from empty rites to come to Christ, to forsake the formalism for the fountain of light and life.

2. The invitation is universal. It is issued to the thirsty because no one else will come. A cup of cold water means nothing to one who is intoxicated. And so long as men and women are caught up in the giddy whirl with their feverish brains on fire with the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life, the call will not be heard. But when the cold gray dawn breaks, and the heart is filled with shame, remorse and guilt, there is a possibility the call will be heard.

It is not a matter of "coming to church" but of coming to Christ. One may do the first and go away thirstier than when he came. The problem is that "the church" in our day is also thirsty. It has often mixed dogma and opinion into the cup it has passed to the dying and their thirst has been intensified. Man cannot be satisfied by human creeds, confessions or ceremonies. These are the soft drinks bottled by religious institutions and flavored with their varied additives. They will not slake the thirst of the soul. Only Jesus can do that! And if anyone is thirsty he is invited! Anyone! Red, yellow, black or white! Rich or poor! Bond or free! Jew or non-Jew! No one need to be thirsty any longer. The fountain has been opened!

3. Coming to Jesus is believing in Jesus. This does not mean accepting Him as a historical figure, although He is certainly that. But one may believe He was born in Bethlehem, lived in Capernaum, and died in Jerusalem, exactly as he may believe that Benjamin Franklin was born in Boston and lived and died in Philadelphia. This will not quench your thirst. It is not knowing where Jesus lived on earth but knowing that He lives in your heart that makes the difference. One may visit the holy land with an unholy heart.

Believing in Jesus is not merely giving mental or intellectual assent to the superiority and validity of His teachings. Jesus is not simply a philosopher or a lover of wisdom, although He is that. He is wisdom embodied. To the saints in one of the ancient haunts of philosophers, the city of Corinth, Paul wrote that God had made Him "Our wisdom, our righteousness and consecration and redemption." He is not simply a person with wisdom but wisdom that is a person.

Jesus is not merely a prophet although He is one. But a prophet is one who reveals the word of God, while Jesus is the Word of God revealed. He is not just something revealed, He is the revealer. Prophecy was transmitted, but Jesus is the transmitter. What does it mean to believe in Him so that one becomes a genuine partaker of His life, suffering, death and resurrection? Obviously the belief under consideration is one which leads to identification with its object. It is a faith so powerful, a trust so magnificent that it actually consumes the believer and melts him into a state of oneness with Him in whom the trust is imposed. It is good to remember that the word commit in several passages in our English version is identical in the original with the word rendered believe. To commit oneself to a cause is to surrender himself unreservedly to it. To commit himself to a person is to place implicit trust in that person. It is possible that no definition we can construct will be wholly adequate to explain in its fulness what it means to believe in Jesus. We experience that we cannot always confine by words. We know that believing, as He spoke of it, involves trust and commitment, and this makes our relationship true and valid.

4. The promise of Jesus is that those who come to Him parched and dry, will not only have their thirst satisfied, but will become fountains of blessing to others. God is a specialist in causing rivers to run where there has been a dearth of water. Twice Moses smote a rock and from its inward depths a refreshing stream gushed forth to satisfy the sharp craving of his murmuring followers. Belief in Jesus is a transforming phenomenon. Hearts that were as arid as Death Valley become like a garden of flowers. The desert blossoms as a rose.

So certain is this that there is a real question as to whether they really believe whose hearts continue sterile and unproductive. If sorrow and sighing are to flee away but they still remain, if joy and gladness are to supplant them and yet they are never manifested, does the heart really believe? What a blessing it is to be in the presence of one whose life has been completely transformed, where old things have passed away and all things have become new. We are not meant to be cisterns but fountains. We are not to be satisfied with merely taking in but we must be giving forth.

5. Fortunately John was writing this after the glorification of Jesus. He had learned by experience the significance of the promise of Jesus. So he could explain, "Now this he said about the Spirit, which those who believed in him were to receive." The thirsty soul is invited to imbibe of the Spirit. It is the Spirit who acts like a cold draught of reviving water to assuage burning thirst. The Spirit renews, revives and resuscitates. There is no revival without the Spirit of God. "For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body— Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit" (1 Corinthians 12:13).

Notice the word "all." Everyone who has come into the divine organism, the one body, drinks of the one Spirit. He who does not dies. The body of Christ upon earth can no more survive without partaking of the Spirit than the human body can continue to exist without liquid. All who believe in Jesus in the sense in which Jesus used it of coming to Him, receive the Spirit. The reception of the Spirit is the seal of our acceptance with the Father. "Any one who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him" (Romans 8:9).

In the form of a Helper or Comforter the Spirit could not be given every believer while Jesus was present on earth in the flesh. As a Counselor the Spirit would come to attest to the glorification of Jesus upon His coronation in Heaven. He would bring assurance that the Son of God had been exalted to the throne at the right hand of the Father. This would confirm the right to act in His name and by His authority. Jesus plainly declared, "I tell you the truth: it is to your advantage that I go away, for if I do not go away, the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go I will send him to you" (John 16:7).

Jesus has now been glorified and magnified. Ten days after His ascension from the Mount of Olives the Holy Spirit came with audible and visual demonstration, so that Simon Peter could say, "Being therefore exalted at the right hand of God, and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he has poured out this which you see and hear" (Acts 2:33). In conformity with the promise made by Jesus on the last day of the Festival of Shelters, every believer now has the Spirit dwelling within as a divine gift. Those who are in Christ do not need to seek the Spirit. They possess Him.

This poses a real question. If believers possess the Spirit where are the rivers of living water which were to flow from their hearts? The answer is that many believers exhibit the abundant joy, the glorious dynamic, and the faith that rests in the power of God. They are an inspiration and a blessing to all who come into their presence. But there are others who are critical and censorious. They live shallow lives and constantly engage in self-pity. Yet if they have been born again the Spirit dwells in them. The problem is that they have quenched the Spirit. They have dammed up the river and filled the fountain with debris.

The hope for such persons is that, like the prodigal, they will come to themselves and forsake the pig-pen for the palace. If they can be encouraged to overcome their selfishness and to rise above their doubts they can become a source of encouragement to all. They can live longer, enjoy the marvelous grace of God and transform the neighborhood where they reside.

I grew up in the Missouri Ozarks. This was a land of rugged pioneers and despite the encroachment of modern ways one can still see the visible reminders of the life of a simpler age. One such sign of yesteryear are the old water mills, a few of which grind corn on old stone burrs while the creaking wheel turns as the water pouring down the flume from the pond fills its troughs. But there are other mills that have fallen into decay. The power is still there but the mill race has become choked with branches, leaves and sediment. There is no sound of grinding, no service to mankind.

It is the same with many lives I know. The Spirit is there with ability to strengthen with might in the inner man. There could be the fruit of love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control. But the Father forces no one to utilize the divine gift. He bestows but does not belabor! Yet if there are those who read this, and are tired of shriveled and circumscribed lives, they can find a sense of being never before attained. Let them call upon God to help them clean out the mill race, and the waters from above will again begin to flow. Rivers of living water flowing from and through the heart.

No child of God need be overcome by circumstances. God is greater than any circumstance. He is greater than any problem. There is no grief He cannot assuage, no sorrow He cannot allay. One can be beaten only by relinquishing His hold upon God. The Spirit lives in us, abides with us, shares with us as a Friend, a Helper, a Comforter, a Counselor. The trusting heart which accepts this as a fact will be blessed.

At a crucial time during the Civil War when dark clouds of foreboding hung over the land, Governor Yates sat down and wrote a letter filled with despair to President Lincoln. The reply was brief. It simply said, "Dick, stand still and see the salvation of the Lord." What a source of courage lies in the words, "Greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world."

The story is told of a young painter who was not satisfied with his work. He borrowed the brush of his teacher and asked permission to use it. The painting which resulted was not an improvement over his previous attempts. A friend remarked to him, "It is not the master's brush you need, but the master's spirit." Those who have the spirit of the Master can use their own gifts to produce masterpieces.

The Other Helper

Contents

It was John, the former fisherman, who was selected to divulge the information about the coming of the Spirit as "the other Comforter," as promised by Jesus. In so doing he reached the summit of revelation as to God's provision for His children during the absence of Jesus from the earth. Of course, John did not divide his record into chapters and verses. That feat was probably accomplished by the French editor Robert Estienne, and legend has it that he did it while fleeing on horseback from Paris to Lyons, in 1549.

Regardless of who did it, or when, the way we now have it divided leaves chapters 14-16 a "Cape of Good Hope" for the sailors on life's turbulent sea. It is the answer of Jesus to troubled hearts. It is the compassionate provision for those who cannot "go it alone." It was originally spoken to the apostles, who were disconsolate at the announcement that Jesus would soon leave them and that where He was going they could not go. Because of this there are those who limit to the apostles what was said of the Spirit.

All such overlook the fact that these men were disciples as well as apostles, and before they were apostles. What Jesus promised them in their role as apostles applied only to them, but what was promised as disciples belongs to all disciples until the Lord returns. Just as certain blessings of the Spirit were required by the apostles to enable them to fulfill their mission as apostles, so other blessings are required by disciples, or followers of Jesus, to enable them to live meaningfully as disciples. The power of the Spirit is enabling power, and whatever God requires of us He supplies the power to perform it. It is a tragic error to restrict the possession and indwelling of the Spirit to the apostles alone.

Jesus said, "I will not leave you desolate, I will come to you" (John 14:18). The word He used which has here been translated "desolate" is the Greek orphanos. It literally means "without a father." But, among the ancients it was also used of students or disciples who had lost a master by death. The relationship of a master to his disciples was very close and real. Often they lived in the same abode, ate at the same table, and shared their lives. The master did not conduct formal classes but talked with his followers as they walked along the road, or sat down in the marketplace. To lose a beloved teacher was like being bereft of a father.

I do not think Jesus was talking about his resurrection when He promised to come again to them. If He was the promise was good only for the forty days He was with them before His ascension, and then they were desolate again. I think He was speaking of the coming of the Holy Spirit who was to dwell in God's children forever, that is, during the age when Jesus was absent. When the Spirit dwells in one it is the equivalent of having God and Christ move into his life to make their home with him. Immediately after saying that the Spirit will dwell with those who love Jesus and manifest their love by obedience, He says, "If a man loves me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him" (John 14:24).

It is a sad commentary on what has happened to the faith that so many who claim to love Jesus are frustrated, frightened and forlorn. Many who attend what we designate "religious services" regularly are lonely and empty. They are sick and scared. They not only are unable to love their enemies but they entertain festering hostilities and bitterness toward those with whom they meet. They act as orphans who have been cast adrift with no hope and no one to care.

What has happened? The answer appears obvious. We have been betrayed by those who seek to maintain and perpetuate their systems into substituting public ritualism for personal relationship. It is difficult to be loyal to a system because the very acts by which one seeks to express his allegiance become mechanical, stereotyped and routine. The frenzied attempts to pump life into them prove exhausting and discouraging.

There is a vast difference between the act of arising on Sunday to drive to a "holy place" to watch "acts of worship" performed by skilled professionals trained in the art, and coming together as a Spirit-filled family around the thanksgiving table set by a loving Father, to share experiences and recount victories. The difference was brought home to me recently when I was scheduled to speak one night in a "religious" structure. The song director went through all kinds of contortions, and engaged in all kinds of pleading, cajoling and clowning, to get the people to loosen up and smile. He did manage to get a few of them to grin embarrassingly but it was quite apparent they were just smiling on the outside.

The next evening our whole family gathered at the home of our son. Three generations sat down together at the table. Heads were bowed in fervent prayer as one of our number expressed in non-stilted fashion our deep appreciation to a benevolent Father whose gracious providence had preserved and kept us unto that moment. After we had dined, one of the group dug out a pile of old hymn-books and we began to sing as we used to do when the children were little. For two hours we continued until our throats became husky and our voices were strained and we had to cease. It was spontaneous, effervescent and joyous. We loved every minute of it, and even when we had to say our farewells and leave we were still humming the refrains as we drove along the highway.

There is a feeling expressed by many in our day that we ought to abandon what we refer to as "the church." They regard it as dead and feel that it should be buried. I disagree. This attitude reflects a kind of cynical viewpoint which seems to underestimate the power of God. Certainly there are a lot of forms, fixtures, methods and traditions, which need to be cleared out. They have no relevance to our age or what we are called to do in it. They are barnacles which need to be scraped off the hull of the Ship of Zion. But even a dead body can be raised to life, and if "the church" has been wrapped in its graveclothes as was Lazarus, it needs to hear a voice calling "Come forth!"

Actually, our problem is quite simple. Under the impact of western culture we have been deluded and seduced into becoming a corporate structure consisting of shareholders whose right to vote is spelled out in the company by-laws. We are a legalistic institution with a judiciary consisting of elders and preachers interpreting statutes in the light of precedents established by our fathers and now incorporated as principles from which there can be no variance except at the cost of excommunication, excision and boycott. We should not be surprised that many of our meetings are as cold as a stockbrokers convention before the cocktail hour.

We have no consciousness of being a community of the reconciled and consequently no realization that we are a reconciling community. In fact "members of the church" often fight harder and more frequently than others in an area, and while the "pagans" are uniting to support causes of public concern the Christians are dividing and assaulting each other verbally and openly. There is often as much gossip, enmity, strife, jealousy and selfishness manifested among those who never miss a meeting as among those who have never "darkened the door" of a religious structure. This leads to the conclusion that Satan probably does not care how many "join the church" provided they act like many of those already in it. They do not fight him any more in the church than they did in the world!

To imply there is a simple solution to this is to lay oneself open to the charge of being an irresponsible dreamer. But we have made our situation more complex and aggravated by seeking sophisticated answers. We have talked about "the psychology of this and that" and argued about "the theology" of one thing and another until we have become bogged down in a welter of conflicting ideas, none of which touch the basic issue. The church is not an organization but an organism. It is not a business but a body.

A body without the spirit is dead. To revive a dead body the spirit must again return to it. It is not enough to arrange the limbs in a different fashion, or to rouge the cheeks. It will still be a corpse. Putting a Bible in the hand of a dead man will not revive him. Nothing that is done externally will restore life. It may make a more beautiful or attractive corpse but it will still be a corpse. Jesus knew this and He promised the Spirit with His life-giving power.

I may be mistaken when I suggest that the only way the Holy Spirit dwells in the spiritual body is by dwelling in those who are members of it. It was to these the Spirit was promised, for only these could be orphaned by the return of Jesus to glory. He said, "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever" (John 14:16).

Jesus could not abide with us through the age which began with His coming. He said, "I tell you the truth, it is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you" (John 16:7). From a human viewpoint, it would appear that it would be much more profitable and beneficial to the disciples that Jesus remain with them in the flesh. But God knew better. If Jesus thus remained He would suffer the limitations of time and space. The Holy Spirit knows no such restriction. He can dwell in God's people universally.

When Jesus was on earth those who wanted to see Him had to travel to where He was. But the Spirit comes to us wherever we are. Speaking of His works, Jesus said, "Greater works than these shall you do, because I go unto the Father." The Spirit could not come until Jesus was glorified. That glorification was the final act of validation of His Sonship. The coming of the Spirit was confirmatory proof it had occurred and the Good News was ready to be heralded to the whole world. The coming of the Spirit was more expedient than for Jesus to remain in the flesh. A realization of this will silence every tongue which would speak derogatorily of the Spirit and His impact upon the disciples.

The Holy Spirit came as a result of prayer to the Father by His Son. In reality, the Spirit always comes, not only by the will of God, but by the action of God. Jesus recognized the sovereignty of the Father by petitioning Him to send the Spirit, yet He participated in the action for He said, "If I go away I will send him unto you." One who possesses the Spirit possesses a gift of God and His Son. To honor the gift is to honor the givers. That we have been made the recipients of the Holy Spirit while in the flesh is a marvelous and astounding thing. It is the ultimate in human adventure.

In announcing the advent of the Spirit Jesus used a term which is almost untranslatable by any single word in our western vocabulary. The word parakletos literally means to call another to stand beside one for the purpose of aiding or assisting him in resolving a difficulty or in dealing with a problem. In an attempt to capture the general implications of the word, modern translators have resorted to various English terms such as Comforter, Helper, Advocate or Counselor. All of these are too feeble to portray the scope of the influence of the Spirit upon the life of the believer.

The translators appointed by King James adopted the word "Comforter." In 1611 it may have been the best word available for their purpose. Now, by a turn of those circumstances which constantly affect the languages of mankind the term has altered in meaning until it no longer conveys the meaning which the translators thought to express. In the days of King James a Comforter was one who came to lend strength and reinforce the will to resist. The word "fort" which is contained in it gives some indication of its meaning. It is from the Latin fortis, strong. A fortress is a stronghold.

In our day a comforter is ordinarily regarded as one who extends sympathy in times of grief or sorrow. He may make a telephone call or send a card of condolence to one who has lost a loved one by death, or he may visit the mortuary and express his concern and sign the register of those who attend a memorial service. All of this is good, and we should all do these things more often than we do. But this has little relationship to a parakletos, which has been translated to become "paraclete" in English. Accordingly, the word "Comforter" is now a misleading term.

To understand the function of the Holy Spirit as a paraclete we must seek the meaning attached to the word in the days when Jesus was upon earth. It is obvious that His purpose was to enlighten and not to obscure. When He employed the word it conveyed a certain mental image, or set of images, to His hearers. If we can recapture those mental images we can grasp the meaning He sought to convey. What did the Greek world think of when the word paraclete was used by a public speaker?

The word was used to describe the act of a porter who stood beside one of his fellows on the dock and helped him shoulder a burden which he could not lift alone. Sometimes he would walk beside the man and steady the huge pack with his own hand. The Holy Spirit is a burden-bearer who walks with us and helps with our loads which are too heavy for us to carry alone.

The word was used to describe an attorney or counselor-at-law who pleaded the case of one who was accused. Such an intermediary gave advice to a client, pleaded for mercy in his behalf, and interceded for him. Such a lawyer was called an advocate in English jurisprudence. That is the reason why this word is used to translate parakletos in the only instance in which it is applied to someone other than the Spirit. John is the only writer who uses the word and he writes, "But if we sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." The Holy Spirit is one of two intercessors pleading for mercy to be extended because of our weakness. One who does not have the Holy Spirit is left to plead his case alone and the conclusion is foregone. But those who have the Spirit have an intercessor living in themselves and another seated at the right hand of God.

The word was used to describe a tutor or guardian entrusted with the education and discipline of the child. Frequently this was a faithful slave who had constant care of a child until the father willed that he had attained maturity. The success of the guardian was determined by the character of the child. Greek schools were rigorous and stringent. The permissiveness we know today was wholly unknown in the Greek world. Often the guardian stood beside his youthful charge pointing out his mistakes in calculation and helping him to correct his errors. The Holy Spirit helps us find the solution to our problems and come up with the correct answers.

It is very difficult for many of us to accept the fact of the personhood of the Spirit. The very word "spirit" increases the difficulty. We tend to think of a spectral mass, an influence or a pervading atmosphere. We live in a pragmatic age which wants to see tangible evidence of everything. If we cannot examine it under a microscope or get a computer print-out on it, we assume it does not exist. Perhaps one of the saddest things to happen is that we walk by sight and not by faith. There is a very grave possibility that what we think of as real may be unreal, and vice versa.

We seem to have no difficulty recognizing the personality of the Father, although we are plainly told by Jesus "God is a Spirit" (John 4:24). The very promise of the Spirit as made by Jesus indicates His divine personhood. "I will pray the Father and he will send you another Comforter (Paraclete)." In the rich and versatile language of the Greeks there are two words for another. The word heteros meant "another of a different kind." The word allos means "another of the same kind." That is the word employed here. Jesus was a Paraclete (1 John 2:1). The Spirit was to be another Helper like Jesus. It is true that Jesus came in a body while the Spirit dwells in our bodies, making of them His temples (1 Corinthians 6:19). But He is no less real while dwelling in our flesh than was Jesus while in His physical body.

The word "forever" merely means "through the age." One cannot determine the extent of time involved by simply looking at the word. To do that he must determine what age is under consideration. What did Jesus mean when He declared that the Spirit sent by the Father would abide with the disciples forever? He had just been talking with them about His departure from them. He had informed them that He could remain with them only a short time more, and that it would be impossible for them to come where He was going. He told them that He spoke about the Spirit while He was yet with them, but that He was going away to be with the Father.

It would seem that the age of the Spirit's abode with the saints was that in which Jesus was absent. The purpose of sending the Spirit was to guard against their being left desolate or alone. Forever is the age in which the indwelling Spirit abides within us, and we are in that age by the grace of God. We should never feel forsaken. We should never be lonely. We need not succumb to feelings of depression. The promise He made that, "I will never leave you orphans," is ours to claim, to enjoy, to exult in.

Jesus identifies the Spirit as "the Spirit of truth." This is not intended to suggest that the other helper is a mere essence or quality of abstract truth or verity. He cannot be limited to a characteristic. We speak of "a spirit of compassion" or "a spirit of boldness." These are traits exhibited by certain individuals. But the Holy Spirit is reality personified for truth is correspondence with reality.

The world cannot receive the Spirit. The world is that vast domain which does not recognize the sovereignty of God. It is in rebellion. It stands under the judgment of God. It serves a prince who is doomed to be cast out (John 12:31). The world imposes a way of death under the guise of life. It is composed of those who live in the passions of the flesh, following the desires of the body and mind. It is constituted of sons of disobedience, the children of wrath (Ephesians 2:3). The world cannot see the Spirit. "In their case the god of this world has blinded the minds of unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ." The world cannot know the Spirit, that is, cannot experience the Spirit. Alienation from God shuts one off from the gifts of God.

Only the disciples of Jesus can experience the transcendent relationship with the Spirit, for to "know" in a Biblical sense means much more than to be intellectually aware. To know the Spirit is to enter into a warm and intimate kinship with Him, expressed by the words, "He dwells with you and shall be in you." The Spirit is not a passing visitor. He is not a transient guest. He does not ask for overnight lodging. The little girl whose grandmother had come to stay in her home was asked by a neighbor, "Is your grandmother visiting with your family?" Her reply was, "No, she didn't come to visit, she came to live with us." The Spirit does not regard my body as a motel, but as a purchased possession.

The Holy Spirit has taken up residence in my heart. His new address is my body. You can say the same thing if you are in Christ. My inside apartment is no longer vacant as it once was. It has a new occupant who has moved in, swept down the cobwebs, cleaned out the trash and opened up the windows to let the sunshine in. The Spirit shall be with you— companionship. The Spirit shall be in you— possession.

Lives may literally be changed by contact with a new personality. This was apparent in the case of a couple of my acquaintance. They had but one son, a brilliant teen-ager who was killed in a frightful automobile accident in which his body was burned beyond recognition. The mother virtually lost her sanity. The father withdrew from all social contact. The two of them wreaked out an existence which became ever more wretched. Then two of their neighbors were killed in an accident which left a little Korean girl whom they had adopted, an orphan for the second time.

The couple who had lost a son grudgingly gave the ten-year-old girl a place to stay until the welfare authorities could locate another set of adoptive parents. The child, who had endured enough suffering to completely break one, was so bright and cheerful, and so hopefully inquisitive that she literally stripped the mask of selfish grief from the faces of those who had reluctantly accepted her. The woman began to smile again for the first time in several months. The man caught himself whistling a cheerful tune on his way to work.

The Creator who made us knows our need for fellowship with the divine. The statement, "It is not good for man to be alone," has a much wider application than our need for marriage and physical companionship. Man has a need for communion outside of and beyond the fleshly realm, and that need can only be satisfied by the indwelling Spirit of God. It is this need which makes one a human. Left unsatisfied man is doomed to be less than human, a stalk cut off from its roots, a tumbleweed carried about by the wind.

No organization with which one is allied can ever fully supply the deep craving or thirst which gnaws at the inner being. Calling it a church will not alter the situation. In fact, working for the church without a sense of genuine partnership with Jesus can become a chilling, killing experience. Church secretaries become sick of the daily grind. Preachers become harried and worn trying to hold on to "a job." All of us have known men designated as good "church administrators" who have little warmth and affection. They are experts in business but Christ is not manifest in their lives. Men tend to forget that it is not what one is in, but who is in him that makes the difference.

It is easy to become so involved with "church work" that we have neither the time nor inclination to do God's will. The priest and Levite who passed by the Samaritan lying bruised and naked by the side of the highway to Jericho may have been on their way to a "men's luncheon" or a "congregational retreat." By the time one attends all of the meetings on "the church calendar" there will be little time remaining to serve God. One who measures faithfulness by how many sessions of Sunday school he has attended has been handed a different yardstick than the one which Jesus uses.

The Holy Spirit dwells in us to shake us to the foundations of our being. He did not move in to make us satisfied with things as they are but to enhance our dreams of things as they ought to be. The Holy Spirit creates pioneers and not settlers. No one, under His influence, thinks he has arrived, but rather, pauses for a moment before passing on. Death is merely the closing of the physical eyes that the spiritual eyes may be opened on the expanse of a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

How does the "other Helper" really help? What does the Spirit actually do for me that I could not do for myself, if I ignored His presence and power? To answer such a question fully would require an analysis of every love letter to the saints written by one of the chosen instruments of the Spirit. I shall therefore limit myself to one area of the impact and influence of the Spirit so essential to my own spiritual well-being. It is appropriate to discuss it because the apostle distinctly says, "the Spirit helps."

The statement occurs in a chapter of comfort and assurance which looms up like a lordly peak towering above a mountain range of startling beauty. The entire letter written "to all God's beloved in Rome" is a monumental treatise on the magnificent theme of justification by faith in Christ Jesus, a concept of righteousness so unique as to challenge the most profound thinkers of all ages. As I read the letter it seems to me that every chapter becomes a campsite at a higher altitude until I stand at last on the summit represented by the eighth chapter.

This is a glorious revelation by the Spirit and about the Spirit. Every line is a rich treasure, every sentence a blessing of incomparable worth. It will bring cheer to the sorrowful, faith to the doubting, and comfort to the bereaved. It is bread for the hungry soul, a garment providing warmth to the freezing, a source of power for the weary and fatigued. And immediately following a blessed revelation regarding hope, in which we are to wait with patience, there comes a glowing announcement, "Likewise the Spirit helps us in our weakness" (verse 26).

The particular area of weakness introduced is that of prayer. The apostle writes, "For we do not know how to pray as we ought, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words. And he who searches the hearts of men knows what is the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God"

All of us have problems with prayer. Sometimes our prayers become stereotyped and stagnant. We get into a rut and slip into a routine and before we realize it we engage in vain repetition. Sometimes we postpone our prayers, making them matters of convenience, tailored to fit our schedule, so they will not interfere with other things to which we assign priority. There is ever a danger that we will pray to be heard of men rather than God. Those who do so have their reward as soon as their petitions register upon the ears of men. They need not expect anything from God.

We do not know how to pray as we ought because of our ignorance of what tomorrow holds. The apostle who wrote these words told the elders of the church at Ephesus, "I am going to Jerusalem, bound in the Spirit, not knowing what shall befall me there." Little did he realize that, while on a mission of mercy, he would be arrested and made a political pawn of political appointees for two years before being sent to Rome as a prisoner awaiting trial. How different our prayers would be if we could but see into the future.

We do not know how to pray as we ought because of our ignorance of what is best for us. Our very anxiety for something may be a symptom of doubt and littleness of faith. The pain from which we seek release may be needed to teach us the art of patient endurance. We may pray to live when death would be a welcome respite, or we may pray to die when we are on the brink of a great victory in life. "We do not know" sums up the predicament of the whole human family. "We do not know how" is an apt statement of universal shortcoming. "We do not know how to pray as we ought" is applicable to every child of God.

We are feeble but not forsaken, helpless but not hopeless. It is precisely because of our limitations the Holy Spirit was given to be with us and to dwell in us. The end of our strength marks the beginning of His power in our lives. The Spirit himself intercedes for us. The term intercede means to present the plea or need of another as an attorney is an intercessor before a court of law. The Spirit is aware of our need since He lives within us, but He is also intimate with the Father who sent Him. I can be certain that my very best interests are in good hands.

Actually the Holy Spirit takes the deep yearnings of my inner being and transmits them to the Father. Language is a means of communication by which one person makes his thoughts known to another. It employs sounds arranged in combinations called words, and which create mental images in the mind of the other. But there are longings and desires for which there are no words in our vocabulary. There are feelings and emotions which I cannot articulate. I can but groan and sigh because of my inadequacy. But the Spirit is unlimited and infinite. He can translate my agonized concern into a plea too deep for words.

The Father searches the hearts of men. He is not unaware of the inner striving for understanding. He knows the burden which weighs down upon me. But He also knows what is the mind of the Spirit. The unselfish portrayal of my need, the unrestrained advocacy of my cause, the untiring intercession in my behalf, all of these are but a part of the "other Helper" who came from heaven to live in my tabernacle of clay and transmute it into a temple "fit for the Master's use."

The Spirit intercedes for the saints. If there was no other reason for becoming one of "the called out ones" this alone would be sufficient to motivate every thoughtful person to commit himself to Jesus as Lord of his life. The thought of a "hot line" to heaven manned around the clock by a sympathetic hand is a mind-boggling thought. In every crisis, in every moment of need, in every time of distress, a saint has access to the throne-room of glory. The saint is never alone.

I have a friend who lives in a rude cabin in a Canadian wilderness area. He was a rather successful salesman in a large eastern city who came home one time to find a note from his wife informing him that she was leaving and would prefer that he never even try to contact her. Caught up in a state of inner turmoil he lost his selling touch and suffered from one blow after another. In this state he decided to leave what he called "the veneer of culture" and return to a primitive way of life. His nearest neighbor is now twenty miles away and can best be reached by a canoe on the river.

In the occasional letters I receive from him he tells me about the long cold winters in which he can look out of his windows and see the wolves trailing through the snow. But it was during the first of these winters the Spirit of God became real to him. Having become a Christian as a lad in Virginia he attended church, as we so quaintly and incorrectly phrase it, but it was not his life. It was merely a phase of existence reserved for the weekends and attended to as a necessary sacrifice of time and effort.

One evening while reading by the light of his kerosene lamp my friend became tired of the fiction book he held in his hand. He reached up and took the Bible from the shelf and began to read. It had been a long time since he had opened it, but now, for the first time in his life he became immersed in the words of revelation. All around was a pervading silence broken only by the crack of wood from the fire in the stove, or the sharp crack of a limb from the cold outside which covered his windows with a heavy coating of frostly rime. On and on he went through chapter after chapter. Suddenly he began to feel the sense of another presence. It was so persistent that he became fearful he was cracking up and suffering from an illusion.

He closed the Book and closed his eyes in meditation. He knew that his inward self was being purged. As he put it in a letter to me, he could feel the chunks of rottenness and putridity being dug out of his soul and a healing taking place. He forgave his wife and experienced a deep love and understanding for her as a person, unaffected by sexual craving or passion. He felt delivered from the "dog-eat-dog" tactics of the marketplace which resulted in sharp rivalries bordering upon hostility in the selling game. Suddenly, he realized that the Holy Spirit was beginning to bear the fruit of love, joy and peace in a life which had been barren. At three o'clock in the morning he blew out the flame of the lamp and lay down under his Hudson's Bay blankets. He slept twelve hours and awakened a new man. From that day on he never forgot that the Holy Spirit was dwelling with his own spirit in what he calls "my mud house."

I do not think one has to abandon crowded thoroughfares to become aware of the intercessory companion. No two of us are alike. We differ in intellectual ability, physical strength, emotional depth, and general temperament. Some of us grow gradually to an appreciation of the Spirit. Others are confronted with His abiding presence in a time of crisis. But none of us will attain the joy that transcends every human thrill, or possess the peace that passes understanding until we become conscious of the Holy Guest within. It is tragic to see men try to explain away, or deny His presence, and thus impoverish their lives. One who prefers to light a candle to pressing the switch and flooding his house with light will always live in the shadows and stumble over the furniture.

The Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God. We are ignorant. We do not know what to pray for as we ought. What God has in store for us during the next hour or the year to come we cannot tell. We are warned against the pride of boasting about making plans to move into a city and set up in business for a year to buy and sell and make a financial killing. We are reminded that we do not even know what will happen the next day. We are cautioned that we ought to say, "If the Lord wills, we shall live and we shall do this or that" (James 4:15).

We are to pray. The Holy Spirit is not a substitute for our prayers. He assists us in our weakness. He supports us in our ineptitude. We are to be always aware that we are made under the will of God and we should constantly say, "Thy will, not mine be done." But we do not know the specific will of God for our lives and we cannot frame our petitions in the light of what we do not know and cannot know in the flesh. The Holy Spirit is not subject to our restricted vision. He knows the will of God and intercedes for me in full awareness of the mind, intention and design of God. One who is led by the Spirit can never offer a prayer displeasing to God. And one may pray most powerfully in the divine estimation who is unable to utter a single word.

Let us never confuse the spirit of adventure with the adventure of the Spirit. The first may create daredevils, but the second enables us to dare the devil to do his worst. So long as my body is a citadel of the Spirit and the walls are manned by the other Helper I can defy hell and challenge Satan. Jesus said, "In the world you have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world" (John 16:33). It was John who wrote those amazing words, "Little children, you are of God, and have overcome them; for he who is in you is greater than he that is in the world" (1 John 4:4).

Will you accept that? Will you trust in it? Will you commit yourself to it? If so, you are in the ranks of the overcomers! Some people are undertakers while others are overcomers. Undertakers are sometimes taken under by circumstances, but nothing can overcome an overcomer! The overcomer is victorious. He is a conqueror, not by his power, but by the power of God. His motto is "I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me." As someone put it, "Great people are just ordinary people with an extraordinary amount of determination." That is good but there are no ordinary people in whom the Holy Spirit dwells. When the extraordinary moves in the ordinary moves out. Do not sell yourself short! You are great!

Power to Prevail

Contents

In 1964, Eric Hoffer, the stevedore philosopher wrote "The Ordeal of Change." Included in it is the statement, "We are more ready to try the untried when what we do is inconsequential. Hence the remarkable fact that many inventions had their birth as toys." It is probably because of the deep roots of religious traditions that we have such a difficult time pulling them up to replace them with healthier growth. I am reluctant to censure too severely those who resist change. I know what a trying experience it was for me to come to a recognition of the vital role of the Holy Spirit in my life.

I grew up in a circumscribed religious party whose members regarded it as the sum total of the kingdom of heaven upon the earth. To be outside of it was to be outside of Christ. Its constituency was composed generally of honest, hardworking and neighborly people. They became bitter and rude only in their defence of their opinions and interpretations of the meaning of the sacred scriptures. They sought to demonstrate their loyalty to the Father by attacking His other children who differed with them.

The basis of such thinking and behavior, of course, is the philosophy of the grounds upon which we are related to God. The way we regard our brothers is determined by the way we regard the Father. If we are convinced that righteousness is by grace through faith we will act graciously. If we conclude it is by law we will spend our time laying down the law and arguing about its implications. The seeds of strife and dissension lie dormant in every legalistic system, awaiting only the proper conditions to produce the frightful fruits of division. Tragedy is the inevitable result when any group substitutes love of law for the law of love.

I was delivered from the insecurity which is always created by legalism when I first became aware of the fact of the indwelling Spirit. Insecurity is the child of inadequacy. It is born of recognition that one can never be good enough to earn God's approval even while convinced that he must be. The only remedy for failure to measure up is to work harder while the intensification of effort makes the failure more apparent. The sublimity of truth is obscured by the sublimation of man.

The burden is lifted the moment that one realizes that "there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus." These walk not according to the flesh but the Spirit. Condemnation belongs to the fleshly walk, the carnal bias of existence. Those who walk after the Spirit start with that for which those who walk after the flesh always seek and can never attain. The hope of the saints is the hopelessness of the unreconciled.

"No condemnation" is not the reward of those who are perfect, properly informed, or living up to all of the law flawlessly. It is the natural state of those who are in Christ. If one is not in Christ he is under condemnation, if he is in Christ he is not. He has passed from death unto life. He is a new creation. One is not saved because he is perfect, nor condemned because he is imperfect. It is his relationship to Christ Jesus which places him in a state of salvation or leaves him in a state of condemnation.

In Christ Jesus the motivating principle is the Spirit of life. It is this rule of action which makes one free from the law of sin and death. One who is free is no longer a slave. He has no obligation to a former master. He need not listen to him. He need not pay attention to him. He is no longer a debtor to him. It was the majesty of the revelation that the Spirit had broken the ties which bound me to sin and death, which started me on the real road to joy and happiness. I no longer had to prove I was justified. The fact of the indwelling Spirit was the proof. His presence was God's validating seal.

I would not want to leave the impression that I learned all about the Spirit's provision for me in a flood of light. The knowledge came slowly. It is not complete even now although years have passed. I am still growing in grace and knowledge of the truth. Life remains a voyage of discovery. The acceptance of the Spirit's blessings was made more difficult at first by my reluctance to recognize the Spirit as their source. I had always been taught that one received from God what he deserved. It was a real and tremendous switch to acknowledge that it was precisely because of acknowledgment that you were undeserving that God could enrich you.

The meaning of grace comes with difficulty to one who regards God's covenant as a legalistic document. To divest oneself of his carefully fabricated way of life sustained by works of righteousness and to trust absolutely in the unmerited goodness of another to receive him without merit is a heady thing. It is like divesting yourself of all your clothing and stepping out on the promise of another that he will provide you a garment to cover your nakedness. A former legalist is always afraid that grace will turn out to be a dream and he will find himself on a downtown street without a stitch on and no place to hide.

A lot of people sing about grace who neither understand nor mean what they sing. This does not particularly bother them for there seems to be an idea that if ignorance or equivocation is set to music it will not count. A congregation can lustily belt out all kinds of promises, but if they are set to four-four time, no one expects to keep them. It now seems incongruous for an audience to stand and sing "Marvelous grace of our loving Lord, grace that exceeds our sin and our guilt," just before a preacher mounts the platform to "lay down the law" and make everyone feel a heavier burden of guilt. But we used to sing songs about grace and then make it appear that the real function of grace was to provide a written code which we must keep meticulously or be damned forever.

A legalist is one who postulates that righteousness comes by absolute conformity to a written code. Every legalist must be inconsistent in order to survive. He must engage in casuistry and self-deception to live with himself. If he once sat down and logically carried his thinking to a conclusion, his own heart would condemn him until he would be driven to insanity or suicide. It is for this reason he must engage in all kinds of little tricks and stratagems, and develop all kinds of little subterfuges. A legalist always wears a mask. No one ever sees him as he really is, not even those who seem to be most intimate with him. Legalism makes for life behind a closed door. Grace is life in the sunshine.

Perhaps I was dragged into the sunshine gradually and reluctantly. Nothing is more frightening than to be set free after you have spent your entire life in the gloom of a prison. This is especially true when one has decorated his cell to suit himself and make himself believe that it is not he who is in prison but those on the outside. He is safe while they are in constant danger. One does not need to worry about associating with "the wrong people" if he is locked in a cell. He is not torn inwardly by having to make decisions. He does not need to be anxious about the things which trouble the heathen, or say, "What shall I eat? what shall I drink? what shall I wear?"

The thing about grace and life in the Spirit which frightens a lot of folk is the fact that grace creates personal responsibility. We are not given a program of little acts to be performed as

"worship." Instead, we come to realize that everything we do in word or deed is done to the glory of God in the name of Jesus Christ. We do not have an institutional calendar of events which we must attend or be on a divine blacklist. There is no organizational determination of priorities. In fact, grace does not abandon one if he is shipwrecked upon a desert isle, and resume its relationship when he can "start attending services" again.

The most awesome thing about the whole divine grace-faith concept is its absolute individuality. This means that when my life goes askew I have no one else to blame. In a legalistic framework it is easy to find a scapegoat. I can confess my sins over the head of someone else and send him out of sight to bear my guilt. The preachers are just out after money, the elders are in a conspiracy for power, the congregation is made up of hypocrites, the sermons are "Mickey-mouse" types, the whole thing is organized, ritualized and paralyzed, until it cannot be energized. Everyone of these accusations might be true and not affect the grace of God one iota. I cannot say, "Grace has failed, therefore my obligation is ended." No one has ever found a means for experiencing grace while serving the devil with a clear conscience. Even in a moment of fleshly gratification he will hear the distant bay of the hound of heaven and know that he is on his trail.

Life in a legalistic camp is always one of weakness. There is no power to deliver one from frustration, disappointment, or futility. It is like being sentenced to a life of hard labor, under the surveillance of guards who make you produce or go into exile. Frequently the instructors are weaker than those whom they teach, and the weary prisoners are served up doses of the same religious and traditional fare, in a monotonous repetition which destroys the will to believe and the desire to reason.

One of the first things which caught my attention when I was extricated from the web of law and led to see the working of divine love in the provision of the Spirit was the association of the word "power" with the indwelling Spirit. I should have expected this, knowing that the Spirit was the other Helper. A powerless helper would need help. A tow-truck with a battery so weak it would not start would accomplish nothing in helping stranded motorists.

The Greek language was rich in words for power. There was dunamis, inherent power or ability. There was exousia, delegated power, the right or authority to exercise power. There was ischus, strength or power as an endowment. There was kratos, manifested or governing power. There was energeia, operative power. William Barclay aptly calls it "divine power in action." With such an array, it is not too much to say that God's revelation is "power-packed" and that we operate by Spirit-propulsion. We are propelled, not pushed.

The two words which truly fascinate me in this list are dynamis and kratos. The first has been transliterated to become our English words dynamo, dynamic and dynamite. The second appears in such combined forms as democracy, or autocracy. But it is the first which is generally used in conjunction with the Holy Spirit. A good example of it is found in its two appearances in Romans 15. In one of these the apostle credits "the power of the Holy Spirit" as one of the means by which Christ wrought through him to win obedience from the Gentiles. It is interesting that in this instance as related in verse 19 he distinguishes between "the power of signs and wonders" and "the power of the Holy Spirit."

It seems plain from the sacred scriptures that the power of the Holy Spirit may be exercised without resorting to signs and wonders, and the mere appearance of signs and wonders does not indicate the exercise of the power of the Spirit (2 Thessalonians 2:9). It is doubtful that anyone is led to obey Christ by human ingenuity alone. It is Christ working through human instrumentality and by the power of the Holy Spirit who wins obedience from the Gentiles or any other group. Any theory of effective evangelism which leaves out Jesus, men, or the Spirit, is lacking in a vital essential.

Not only are men won by the dynamic of the Spirit, but those who are won abound in hope by the same power. In verse 15 the apostle says, "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that by the power of the Holy Spirit, you may abound in hope." God is the author of hope. One who does not recognize the God of hope will never experience the hope of God. Joy and peace are directly related to hope. One who is hopeless will also be joyless and unsettled. God can fill us with all joy and peace in believing because He is the God of hope.

The Holy Spirit has the power to take joy, peace and faith, with which we are filled and energize them until we not only possess hope but actually abound in it. To have an abundance means to have an overflowing amount. One who is filled with hope above and beyond the normal or expected cannot be discouraged or depressed. Hope sweeps away all thought of inferiority and refuses to entertain even a thought of doom or gloom. It stands at the door of the heart and refuses admission to such negative thinking. The indwelling Spirit is God's dynamo. He enables us to do what we are called to do.

As I look back upon my life before I became conscious of the abiding Spirit it seems to me that my weakness manifested itself in three ways. First, there was a lack of real incentive. It was not that I did not believe that Jesus was who He claimed to be. I was wholly convinced that He was Lord. I had no doubt that He had been raised from the dead and was actually seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high.

I read the Bible and accepted it as a revelation from above. I defended its authenticity and integrity. I attended the assemblies of the saints with whom I was identified, and often went out of a sense of duty when I was so tired I could hardly sit through the proceedings. I was so regular in my attendance that my brethren in the church called me "faithful," and those out of it thought of me as "a religious nut" and later as "a Jesus freak." Still there was something missing, an absent ingredient.

When I read about the life of the disciples as described in Acts, it seemed there was a quality about it which my own life did not exhibit. I wanted to recapture whatever it was which made them live so vibrantly and die so joyously. After I learned the glorious secret, everything I had ever read fell into place automatically. The friction was gone. The abrasiveness no longer "rubbed me raw" on the inside. And the secret was simply to quit trying so hard and turn the whole thing over to the Spirit. As the apostle wrote to the Galatians, whom he addressed as "cheerful idiots" according to J. B. Phillips, "If we live by the Spirit, let us also walk by the Spirit" (Galatians 5:25).

It makes a great deal of difference if you are "flying by the seat of your pants" as early operators of small planes described the experience of piloting small aircraft by one's own feeling and sensitivity, or with someone in the control tower. As soon as I became convinced from reading the "handbook for pilots of single engine aircraft" that there was a co-pilot who never had a wreck and couldn't ditch one because the name of the manufacturer was at stake I "wanted to take her up." I have been flying high ever since. And I am conscious of His presence. I want to live for Christ. I want to share with the saints. I want to go with God.

Probably the one passage which describes how I feel, and which always comes to mind when I am thinking in this vein is Colossians 1:11, 12, "May you be strengthened with all power, according to his glorious might, for all endurance and patience with joy, giving thanks to the Father, who has qualified us to share in the inheritance of the saints in light." All power! Glorious might! All endurance! There's nothing humdrum about that kind of life. And it is such a life for which you will be motivated by the Spirit.

I think another manifestation of weakness was found in my lack of ability to chart a single overwhelming purpose in my life and adhere to it regardless of external factors. I knew what the Bible taught about stability and satisfaction in Jesus and I was not about to shift from my foundation on the Rock. But I had all kinds of dreams of what I could do and would like to do. In fact, I thought of so many things, I hardly did anything consistently and persistently. I could not translate any specific dream into reality.

One becomes frustrated when he sees life drifting by while he is standing still. He tries to imagine he is moving. It is a little like being on a train on a sidetrack when another passes you on the mainline. You have a fanciful notion that it is your train which is in motion until the other clears your vision and you realize you are immobile and rooted to the same spot. I often sat down and meditated about how meager my feeble accomplishments were and how few lives I had really touched.

When I came to a recognition of the dynamic of the Spirit who abides within I sensed almost immediately what I had been lacking. I had enlisted in a war for world conquest and was trying to prosecute it without any well-defined personal strategy. No war on earth has been successfully waged without a strategy. A great field general does not merely send up trial balloons. He does not commit his troops at random. Probing actions are in order only if they are part of a strategic approach leading toward victory.

My whole approach to life has changed. The Spirit enabled me to "put it all together." After long weeks of prayer for help and guidance I began to see what my part in God's "purpose which he set forth in Christ" should be. I took stock of my gifts and assets, and assessed my liabilities which had hindered and thwarted my progress. I dropped some tactics which I felt would be detrimental in the long-run, and adopted others which seemed more adapted to the kind of battle in which I was engaged.

You can hardly imagine what a difference it makes to project a long-range plan, sufficiently flexible that it can be altered to meet changing conditions. One has to take into account the intrigues of the enemy, and also the attacks of those who should be fighting with him, but who are frequently moved by jealousy and envy to exert more hostility than those against whom there has to be an open declaration of war. It is exciting to be a commando for Christ.

No soldier is ever apathetic when pinned down by enemy fire. The best cure for indifference or unconcern is to crawl across No Man's Land at night with flares bursting above, lighting up the landscape. The reason why so many of us react as we do is because we were baptized into a rest and recreation camp and have never smelled the smoke of battle except in a skirmish with some of the brethren in a business meeting over the color of the aisle carpet in the new meetinghouse. I thank God that He has delivered me from childish quarrels over trivia and sent me into the frontline trenches with the "bombs bursting in air."

The third weakness which plagued me in the days when I thought the Holy Spirit was something which inspired the apostles and then went into hiding, was my lack of perseverance. It was a lot easier to start things than to see them through to the end. I suspect we labored under the misapprehension that if we could come up with the right gadget we could convert the world. We developed tract programs, visitation programs, special meeting programs and a lot of other programs. We were going to program the world into Christ. Any program seems successful at first because you hit it with all you have. It soon becomes apparent that it is not going to bear the fruit you expected to pluck, and if you possess a "program mentality" you must quickly swing into another.

The fascinating thing about the spread of the Good News in the first century is that it was done without any of the things we consider so essential in our generation. The early saints had no printing-presses, duplicating devices, tracts or bulletins. They owned no church buildings, homes for the aged, or missionary headquarters. There were no ministerial offices, church secretaries or telephones. There were no automobiles, planes, trains or buses. Yet the message went out to the ends of the world and was heard by every creature under heaven.

It would appear while a lot of things we value so highly are helpful there is an internal dedication to the Cause which they can neither replace nor displace. One can never be unaware, as he reads the book of Acts, that the source of real power among those who first accepted Jesus as the Messiah consisted of their prayers and their being filled with the Holy Spirit. Their prayers were for boldness in the proclamation. Every child of God testified of his faith. They that were scattered abroad by intense persecution went everywhere preaching the Word.

A recognition of the empowering of the Spirit banished from my mind any thought of defeatism. The idea of "throwing in the towel" or of "climbing out of the ring" was gone forever. I could see that the concept of success, as the world looks at that delusive term is not in the word of God. We are not required to be a success but to be faithful. If we are faithful to the end we are successful. One of my real weaknesses had been human ambition for attainment, recognition, and acclaim. All of these are unworthy and no one will ever experience inward peace until the Spirit scoops all of them out of his heart and pours it full of the love of God.

When I quit trying to sell God on plans and devices which I had borrowed or drummed up, and got on his wavelength where I could commune with Him, and literally placed my eager desires in His hand, things began to happen. One thing which impressed me greatly was the beautiful prayer of Paul for the saints at Ephesus as recorded in Ephesians 3:14-19.

Here I learned that it was possible for me to be strengthened with might through the Spirit of God in the inner man. This was a grant of God, and it was according to the riches of His glory. I had once applied for a grant to enable me to continue in school but I was rejected. There were certain restrictions and qualifications which barred me as a recipient. But God's grants are not made on the basis of our worth but because of the worthiness of His Son in whom we place our trust and to whom we submit our lives. It is because we have no merit which deserves His grace that it is made possible unto us.

The more I thought about those three pulsebeats of power the more I became convinced that God wanted me to be victorious. Strengthened with might! Through the Spirit! In the inner man!. What a trio of dynamic terms to be linked together in a person like myself. Sinful but forgiven. Fleshly but spiritual. Weak but powerful. Poor but wealthy. I threw myself in His arms and knew that here was safety, security and salvation.

Of course, it did not stop with that. I came to experience what it meant that Christ could dwell in my heart by faith. As if it were not enough that I could be strengthened with might in the deep recesses of my being, my blessed Lord would also abide in my heart. It was thus I was led to see that while faith is the belief of testimony it becomes vital when it leads one to embrace the object of that testimony. It is not enough to recognize and admit the veracity of those statements concerning our Lord. It is a fact that He was born in Bethlehem of Judea. It is a fact that He died on the cross. It is a fact that He was raised from the dead. These are facts to be defended and attested against all challengers. They are historical and can be substantiated as any other fact of history.

But the ultimate Fact to which all of these must lead is that I am His and He is mine. That Fact, which is demonstrable only by a transformed life is personal. Jesus is the Alpha and Omega. He is the beginning and the end. He is the first and the last. Just as one cannot spell a word with a letter before "a" and after "z" so there is no life before He enters and none after He departs, if we reject Him. Thus, all faith leads to the merging of my life into His until "It is not I who live but Christ who lives in me." I would as soon try to live without a heart as to try to live without Jesus in my heart.

I learned what it meant to be "rooted and grounded in love." Roots have to do with living things— with shrubs and trees. The word "grounded" has to do with building foundations. It makes a great deal of difference in the life of trees to have the proper soil into which the roots can penetrate. A large horticultural firm in the area in which I live set out hundreds of apple trees to create an orchard to which people might drive and pick their own fruit for a modest price. The place selected looked like a very poor location to the uninformed but a company survey revealed that it had the right soil mix to give substantial strength to growing trees. It was explained that the roots had something to grip.

It is amazing to many visitors from outside of New York City to see so many towering skyscrapers built so close to one another as they are on Manhattan Island. One man from the prairies of the Kansas wheat belt exclaimed, "I can't understand what keeps the place from getting top heavy and turning over on its side." The secret is that the island is almost solid rock. It is a proper foundation for huge structures.

The human personality is both a living organism and a growing structure. Without proper footing survival is impossible. In a world colored by sin trials of every kind are certain to come. Storms will beat against us. Disappointments will batter our hearts. The only foundation which can possibly survive is love— the love that God is! And that love is not something we develop. It is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. Filled with that love one can only be victorious!

Adventure in Service

Contents

One of the greatest adventures in which human beings can engage is that of unselfish service to their fellowmen. When such service involves personal sacrifice and a willingness to forfeit life itself for the welfare of others it becomes a regal way to live and a heroic way to die. Jesus said, "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13). Our word benefactor is from the Latin bene, good, and facere, to do. Beneficence is active goodness, and one who unselfishly engages in such a life is an honor to humankind and a vindication of the Creator who made us in His image.

If you were to take a poll of a hundred people no two of them would agree upon those whom they regard as having best ministered to the needs of man in the human predicament. If you were to limit each person to three names you would be surprised at the wide range of persons who would be mentioned. Noble service is rendered in a variety of ways and in a variety of times. The needs determine the response.

As for me, I do not feel I could be happy with myself if I were to ignore David Livingstone. This intrepid Scottish missionary and explorer was born in a crude tenement in Blantyre, Lanarkshire, Scotland, March 19, 1813. At ten years of age he was at work in a textile mill twelve hours per day, going directly from work at 8:00 p.m. to school where he studied until 10:00 p.m. Upon his return to his rude home he diligently pored over his books until his mother took them from his hands. By dint of such application, he qualified for entrance to medical classes at Anderson College, Glasgow, and while there enrolled for a theological course as well.

He was deeply moved to help the less fortunate of the earth and embarked as a missionary for Africa, then called "The Dark Continent." He penetrated regions never before seen by a white man, discovering Lake Ngami, the Zambezi River, and Victoria Falls, one of the most notable cataracts in the world. He became greatly concerned about the depredations wrought by Arab and Portuguese slave-traders, and wrote with such power against the sad and cruel practice that he is credited with being a pioneer in the abolition of the nefarious trade. Livingstone never hesitated to take his place beside the downtrodden and persecuted, the ignorant and poverty-stricken.

While on his difficult journey to discover the source of the Nile, he was suddenly stricken in the village of Chief Chitambo, on the Congo River, and died under a tree on May 1, 1873. The grief-stricken natives removed his heart and buried it where he breathed his last, that it might always lie in the soil of Africa, whose people he loved. They then carried his body to Zanzibar on the eastern coast, where it was placed on the steamer Malwa and returned to England. On April 18, 1874 it was interred in Westminster Abbey, on a national day of mourning.

When friends examined the personal diary of Livingstone they found an entry made just before he died. In it he expressed the fervent hope that others would follow in his steps and take the liberating message of Jesus to the jungle natives. He died with the welfare of others on his mind. For years he had been talking about "those who are of my own order, the Godly poor." Once when he was asked to express his philosophy of life, he said it was the same as that of Jesus, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life for others.

The word "ministry" is a bright light in a star-studded galaxy of spiritual verbal planets. Unfortunately, we have treated it like we have so many other rich terms. We have dimmed its brilliance in two ways. First, we have come to think of it as a specified function carried out by a trained specialist, hired to perform it. Secondly, we have ceased to regard or to talk about the work of every member of the body as ministry. The question "What is your ministry?" has given way to the question, "Who is your minister?" The subtle implication involved in this change is wholly without scriptural warrant.

There are several words in the original Greek which are translated "minister" by the men appointed by King James to produce the Authorized Version. The one with which we are especially concerned is diakonos. It literally means "one who executes the commands of another, especially of a master; a servant, attendant, minister." It can easily be seen why all in the kingdom of heaven are ministers. All of us serve a common master. All of us are equally subject to the commands of our Lord. To suggest that there is but one minister in a community is to suggest there is but one person serving God, and that he is doing so because it is his profession and he is paid to do it.

It is true that we may minister in different ways, but there is nothing in the word "ministry" which defines or delineates the type of service. A minister, in God's sight, is a servant, but what he does as service, must be determined from the command to perform a certain function. No one is a minister because he does a certain thing, but he does that thing because he is a minister. To apply the term minister as a title to a certain class of persons, or to designate those who fulfill a certain role or function is to misapply it. The result will be that all of those who do not fit into such an arbitrarily created category will cease to think of themselves as ministers of God. Their work will no longer commend itself as a partnership with God through exercise of gifts He has bestowed, but will become a secondary and supportive routine which will eventually come to be regarded as of little importance. It may even be regarded as "the thing to do" to keep the church going, rather than as a service ordained by God through the bestowal of a divine gift.

Our loss of the very nature of diakonia as set forth by the Holy Spirit has caused many ills to come upon us. Just as koinonia, the sharing of life (eternal life) has made us a body, so diakonia has been provided as the divinely-authorized means by which that body can function in the world. To a great extent we have allowed our thinking to be warped until we have filled up the deep wells of koinonia and diakonia which the Spirit dug for our sustenance, and we are now forced to drink from shallow surface-water contaminated by the theological waste which has been drained into it. One of the great adventures of our age could be the digging anew of these wells.

Honest thinkers who are able to rise above their prejudices will admit that hat koinonia no longer has the profound meaning it had in the first century. The apostle John, in a singularly beautiful passage, defines it as the sharing of eternal life, held in common with the Father and Son, and with all others who have been adopted into that transcendent relationship. It alone can provide meaning and dignity to earthly existence which would otherwise terminate with maggots devouring putrefying tissue. To our utter shame and disgrace, koinonia has become association on a purely human level created by creeds and opinions, something to be manipulated by men on an organizational basis, and used as a threat to hold other men and women in a straight-jacket. When koinoni ceases to be the sharing of eternal life and comes to mean the sharing of mere deductions of the rational process it is time to write "Ichabod" above the portals of the temple. The glory has departed!

In the same way the majestic power of r of diakonia has been lost. It is this marvelous arrangement of God which was to provide dynamism and power, skill and mobility to the body. Neither the human body nor a body of believers will succumb to death easily. When a man loses the use of a limb by paralysis he devises an expedient. He may secure a crutch or a walking device upon which he can lean. He is certainly not functioning as he was intended to do, but he is holding on to life while waiting for the end. He may secure a gold-plated crutch and boast about how much it cost, but it is still a crutch, and it is a testimony, not to his power, but to his powerlessness.

In many respects the body of Christ, the corpus composed of those who have been reconciled to God by the blood of Jesus, has allowed itself to become dysfunctional. As a result various means have been devised to enable the System to continue and to keep breath pumped into it. A clergy system has been developed by which an expert is imported from outside to come in and maintain a semblance of life by artificial respiration. If he fails to maintain a certain level as gauged by the number of those who gather for the weekly body count, or by the amount of money contributed, he is released and cast on the open market. Sometimes the group will pay for the time left on his contract, on the basis that it would be more costly to keep him than to get rid of him. Then the process of "trial sermons" by various job-seekers must again be endured by the employers and hopeful employees.

The greatest tragedy is not that we have created a new functionary wholly unknown to the primitive saints, and invested him with the work which is ours to accomplish, but rather with the radical restructure of the body. We have gradually changed from an organism, living, pulsating, throbbing, vital with its varieties of gifts, service and working, to an organization, operated like a business, with administrators, secretaries, directives, and posted rules governing employees and assignments. We have moved from a family relationship to a formal regimentation. We have substituted sectarian sacrifice for spontaneous, satisfying service.

How can we reform a state of affairs which dooms us to become an ever-decreasing minority with each passing day? We must change our thinking, and the change must be radical and revolutionary. It must be more than sewing a patch on here or nailing a shingle on there. We are today exactly where our thinking has brought us. We will be tomorrow exactly where our thinking takes us. If we would be somewhere else tomorrow than where we are today we must change our thinking. This means we must not read the new covenant scriptures to justify what we have. They were not given to substantiate our presuppositions. We must read them as though they were just now given to mankind. We must search them as though no other generation had ever seen them. It is a question of what God said and not of what our fathers thought He meant by what He said.

One of the great truths we should recapture at once is that all of us are important to God. He has no favorites. There are no "teacher's pets" in the school of Christ. From whatever standpoint we are viewed we are all part of the grand design. We are branches of the vine, sheep of the pasture, members of the body, soldiers in the army, and stones in the temple. Some are weaker than others but weakness is not inferiority. Some are more mature than others but maturity is not pre-eminence in rank. God has placed each member in the body as it has pleased Him. God has adjusted the body so that it can function without friction. There is not one useless member of the body. All members have not the same function but all have some function.

Another great truth we must grasp is that all of us are ministers and priests. The kingdom of heaven is not a kingdom with priests. It is a kingdom of priests. The church is not a body with ministers but a body of ministers. Every child of God is a priest. Every Christian is a minister. Just as the physical body provides an opportunity for every member to fulfill its role so the spiritual body must provide for the exercise of every gift. The inauguration of any system which makes it difficult or impossible to exercise any gift does dishonor to the Lord of the gift. It reflects against the divine judgment which bestowed it. The purpose of the fellowship is to provide an arena in which every gift can be utilized for the common good.

Whatever one does to the glory of God is ministry. The one who teaches a class in the study of the Bible is ministering. The one who sweeps the floor, dusts the seats, or mows the lawn, is ministering. The mother who rears her children in the faith by precept and example is ministering. Indeed, the apostle Paul writes, "Whatever you do in word or deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him" (Colossians 3:17). Whatever the Christian does in word or deed is a manifestation of worship and in rendering worship he is a minister.

Diakonia was used to designate the preparation of food for dinner by Martha who was emotionally upset by much serving (Luke 10:40). It was used to designate the aid given by angels to Jesus when they came and ministered unto Him (Matthew 4:11). It was used to designate the action of Peter's mother-in-law who arose from her sick bed and ministered unto Jesus and His companions. It was used to designate the work of a number of women who had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering to him (Matthew 27:55). It was used to designate the help rendered to Paul by Timothy and Erastus (Acts 19:22). It was used to designate the collection of money for relief work by Paul among congregations of the Gentiles, and the transfer of that money to Jerusalem to relieve the needs of poverty-stricken saints there (Romans 15:25).

All this points up the fact that the word ministry is general. It does not contain within itself a specific function. The form which ministry takes must be regulated by other words and by explanatory terms. One does not become a minister by human appointment or ordination, but by the new birth. To deny that one is a minister is to deny that he is a servant of God. To deny being a priest is to deny that one is in the kingdom of heaven, in which every citizen is a priest by divine arrangement.

One who surrenders himself unreservedly to the Holy Spirit will be imbued with a fervent desire for ministry. Indeed, one of the proofs that one is being led by the Spirit is the motivation and inner sense of compulsion to get on with the work of God. The Spirit dwells in us. He empowers us. He strengthens us with might in the inner man. He is the enabling force, the supplier of needs, the divine Agent. He is the other Comforter, the Helper, the Advocate.

The gifts of God are divine endowments of enabling power. The gift is not the purpose or function to which one is called. It is a bestowal of God to make possible the successful carrying out of the purpose or function. If the county presents the sheriff a new car it is to assist him in fulfilling the requirements of the office. Because the gifts of God are gifts of grace, and cannot be purchased or earned, they are charismata. The word charism simply means a gift of grace as opposed to something given because of some consideration or exchange.

The body of Christ has always operated through the gifts of its members. It has no other means by which to function. For that reason it is a mistake to think of some members as charismatic and others as not. Every child of God is possessed of the Holy Spirit and the Spirit furnishes the dynamic for his functioning in harmony with the will of God. By the same token it is an error to refer to a certain era as "the charismatic age." The whole period between the ascension of Jesus and His return is charismatic. The Spirit came when Jesus returned to heaven. He will remain through the age.

We should not imply that the Spirit is becoming active for He never became inactive. He has never hibernated. He is not beginning to move for He has never ceased to move. In Romans 12:3-8 occurs one of the most outstanding lists of charismata to be found in the apostolic writings. Here we learn that prophecy, service, teaching, exhorting, contributing, rendering aid and doing acts of mercy are gifts of grace. These are compared in the immediate context with the functioning of members of a body, and it is distinctly said that the body of Christ functions through these charismata. Does this mean that if all who have these gifts exercise them the body of Christ will be able to fulfill its purpose upon earth? I think so.

The nobility of service as God regards it can never be over-estimated. We are all told that we must never flag in zeal, but be aglow with the Spirit and serve the Lord (Rom. 12:11). We are to contribute to the needs of the saints and practice hospitality (Romans 12:13). We are to owe no one anything except to love one another (Romans 13:8). We are not to pass judgment on one another and never put a stumblingblock or hinderance in a brother's way (Rom. 14:13). We are to bear with the failings of the weak and not please ourselves (Rom. 15:1). Perhaps the whole scope of the new covenant scriptures is caught up in one sentence, "Do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh, but through love be servants of one another" (Gal. 5:13).

Such service may require hardship, persecution and even death. It is this which places it in the realm of adventure by adding an element of sacrifice and risk to it. Prisca and Aquila risked their necks for Paul's life (Rom. 16:3, 4). Epaphroditus nearly died for the work of Christ, risking his life to complete the service of Philippi to Paul (Phil. 2:30). Paul went to Jerusalem to carry the contribution to the poor in spite of the fact that the Holy Spirit testified that affliction and imprisonment awaited him in every city (Acts 20:22). While there on his mission of mercy he was assaulted by a rabid mob bent on killing him. He was rescued in the nick of time by a Roman tribune and the cohort under his command (Acts 21:32). John projects ministry to others to the ultimate degree. "By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for one another" (1 John 3:16).

How can we revolutionize our modern church structures so they will again become the simple family of God where loyalty to the denomination gives way to love for one another? At the best it will be a difficult task. It may be impossible. Forms and rituals sanctified by tradition become more important than the will of God. That will recedes from view as men continue to read the word through the tinted spectacles of their own presuppositions. Is there no hope? Indeed there is. We are not saved in groups but as individuals. We are not related to Christ through the church but vice versa.

No one can come between Jesus and me except as I allow him to do so. I am not joined to the head of the body because I am joined to other members, but I am joined to other members because I am joined to the head. I need neither the permission or sanction of others to minister to people in their needs. I am not a minister of men to Christ but a minister of Christ to men. As Jesus "went about doing good," so I can go about doing good. I have personally resolved never to leave the body of believers with which I am affiliated. I need them and they need me. Some of them are slow to learn, others are anxious to take the bit in their teeth and run. The first teach me patience, the second teach me restraint. But we are all brothers because we are all children of God.

My soul is bound up in the bundle of life with others. My greatest thrill comes not from making money, driving fast automobiles, or appearing on the stage. The real adventure lies in seeing lives take on new meaning because of touching them. In Lake Wales, Florida, is the famous Singing Tower, erected by Edward W. Bok, who edited the magazine Ladies' Home Journal for thirty years. At the base of the tower is the inscription, "Make the world a better place to live, because you have lived."

To see a smile come to a face twisted in pain, to have a child nestle close to you in simple trust, to watch hungry eyes light up at sight of the food you have provided, these are scenes that grip the heart, He who said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," knew that our hearts bear the image of our Creator, the essence of whose very being is love. Those who come to be ministered unto will always be unhappy and disappointed. Those who come to minister will always find fulness of joy. "It is enough that the servant become as his lord!"

During his earthly pilgrimage Jesus described the final judgment scene but once. Matthew, who was present for the occasion, recorded what He said.

"When the Son of man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him, then he will sit on his glorious throne. Before him will be gathered all the nations, and he will separate them from one another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats, and he will place the sheep at his right hand, but the goats at the left. Then the King will say to those at his right hand. 'Come, O blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink, I was a stranger and you welcomed me, I was naked and you clothed me, I was sick and you visited me, I was in prison and you came to me. Then the righteous will answer him 'Lord, when did we see thee hungry and feed thee, or thirsty and give thee drink? And when did we see thee a stranger and welcome thee, or naked and clothe thee? And when did we see thee sick or in prison and visit thee?' And the King will answer them, 'Truly, I say to you, as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me.' Then he will say to those at his left hand, 'Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels; for I was hungry and you gave me no food, I was thirsty and you gave me no drink, I was a stranger and you did not welcome me, naked and you did not clothe me, sick and in prison and you did not visit me.' Then they also will answer, 'Lord when did we see thee hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison, and did not minister to thee?' Then he will answer them, 'Truly, I say to you, as you did it not to one of the least of these, you did it not to me.' And they will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life.”

COLONY OF HEAVEN

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Index of Books

- Title Page
- How This Book Came About
- The Community in Philippi
- The Colony of Rome
- The Colony of Heaven
- A Letter From the Ambassador
- The Salutation (1:1, 2)
- The Prayer of a Prisoner (1:3-11)
- Ambassador in Bonds (1:12-14)
- Christ Is Proclaimed (1:15-18)
- Expectation and Hope (1:19-26)
- Citizenship in the Colony (1:27-30)
- Unity in the Community (2:1-4)
- Example of the King (2:5-11)
- Citizens at Work (2:12, 13
- Shining Lights (2:14-18)
- A Colonial Messenger (2:19-24)
- Man of Honor (2:25-30)
- The Workers of Evil (3:1-3)
- Paul's Personal Proposal (3:4-11)
- Toward the Goal (3:12-16)
- The Colony of Heaven (3:17-21)
- Help These Women (4:1-3)
- The Peace of God (4:4-7)
- Things to Think About (4:8, 9)
- Learning the Secret (4:10-13)
- Seeking the Fruit (4:14-20)

- The Final Greeting (4:21-23)

COLONY OF HEAVEN

Contents

But we are a colony of heaven, and from heaven we expect our deliverer to come, the Lord Jesus Christ.

— Philippians 3:20

Originally Published by

Mission Messenger

139 Signal Hill Drive

Saint Louis, Missouri

1979

How This Book Came About

Contents

Different books are written for different reasons. In his "Personal Foreword" to God Our Contemporary, J.B. Phillips writes, "I believe that modern man can never possess a faith which can both command his intelligent loyalty and influence every part of his thinking and feeling until he discovers the unique authority of Jesus Christ." It was out of that significant personal conviction his book grew. The little volume of mine which you now hold in your hand is the realization of a dream. It was a dream which lasted for years. I should like to tell you about it.

I think I have always loved the Bible since I was old enough to read. Certainly I have always respected it. Perhaps there were times when I feared it. I began to become acquainted with it as a mere child. My father, who had been an agnostic, suddenly came to know Jesus in a very realistic way. It made a profound change in his life, and in ours. Although he had little formal schooling, he resolved that his children would not grow up ignorant of God's revelation. We had daily studies of the Word as a family. By the time I was twelve years old I had been completely through the Bible twice. That includes the genealogical charts with their list of "begets" as well. We did not skip any part of it.

At first I read it because I had to. It was one of the daily chores, like filling the woodbox behind the stove or feeding the chickens. Eventually I no longer looked upon it as a task to be fulfilled, but as a blessing to be enjoyed. It was then it "came alive" to me. As I began to write books of exposition of its teaching, and to share my growing insights, there was a deepening realization that I would some day, if my life was spared, write a kind of running commentary on one of the apostolic letters.

I wanted to do this because I knew that each of these letters had grown out of a situation, or a combination of conditions, which called for advice, counsel and assistance. It seemed logical that if one were to be able to interpret them properly, he must first place them back in their historical settings. They needed to be looked at in their own frame of reference. I thought about all of them, but each time I reviewed them I kept coming back to Philippians. This little volume is the result.

I was motivated in the selection by several factors. It was a letter of thanks to a community of saints which Paul had planted. From the very first they had been deeply concerned about him. They had shared with him their material blessings more than once. However, they had lost track of him for a long time, but learning of his imprisonment in Rome, they gathered up those things which would relieve his needs. They sent their gift by the hands of one of their own members, Epaphroditus. He became seriously ill on the journey and almost died. The letter which he carried when he became well enough to return to Philippi was one of deep appreciation for the grace of God, and the thoughtfulness and generosity of the brethren.

This letter was written by a prison inmate. He was incarcerated because of his fidelity to the call of Christ. It is a letter of rejoicing. One is hard put to keep in mind that it was written by a prisoner. It puts hardship and persecution in proper perspective. It demonstrates how one can be free in spirit even while his body is chained. There are tremendous truths to be found in the four chapters into which we have divided this apostolic letter. The deciding factor, however, was the link between the language of the letter and the geographical location of the congregation. Paul uses the word politeuma to describe their relationship to heaven. The word never appears anywhere else in Scripture. It is possible it would have served only to create wonderment, rather than enlightenment, elsewhere. But at Philippi it was especially appropriate, because Philippi was a Roman colony as Luke informs us in Acts 16:12.

Rome planted colonies at strategic points throughout the empire. These were not made up of conquered peoples, but of Romans. They were primarily to preserve the Pax Romana, the peace of Rome. This was the great dream of the Romans. Universal peace would be secured by recognition of one lord, the Emperor. Every year upon his birthday, every citizen in the world was expected to burn a pinch of incense in front of his bust and audibly declare, "Caesar is lord!"

A Roman colony was a "little Rome." It was set down in an alien world, where its citizens were strangers and foreigners to the land in which they lived. They spoke Latin, the language of Rome. Their dress, their customs, their whole manner of life was dictated to them by Rome, not by the social customs of the people of the land. The education of their children was to enable them to be proud citizens of Rome. They were taught to look forward with great anticipation and expectancy to the coming of the Emperor. That coming was resplendent in glory and pageantry. The colony must be ready at all times. There was to be no shame if the coming was unannounced.

To the alert mind of the apostle the little community of saints was a colony planted in an alien world. It was there to propagate the peace of heaven. This was to be a universal peace to be achieved by acknowledging one Lord— Jesus Christ. Every week the disciples gathered about a table and ate and drank in memory of Him. The colony of the Spirit which began with Lydia and her household was "a colony within a colony," and the last was the pagan culture in which the first was set down.

This explains Paul's use of politeuma. It was the word for citizenship. After having encouraged them to be followers together of him, and to observe those who did follow him as an example, he declares, "For we are a colony of heaven; from which we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ." What a thrill it must have been to the little persecuted minority in Philippi to realize they were actually a colony planted by heaven, set on a victorious course which would one day be world-shaking.

The careful reader will note that I have generally avoided the word "church." I have done so because it does not adequately translate the Greek ekklesia. It has become a theological term, and has taken on a kind of professional or institutional connotation. There is no indication in the Scriptures that God intended to form what we call the church. Certainly He did not design "churches," with their varied creeds, laws and concordats.

I have used the word "community," which seems to me to best render the word ekklesia. Congregation is a good term. It comes from the Latin grex, flock, and means "to flock together." But it also has suffered from the abuse of theologians, who tend to corrupt the words they use. Ekklesia literally means "called out," but it also implies a calling together, and in the case of God's call, it is a calling together into a fellowship, the sharing of eternal life. The community of God in any area embraces all who are a part of the family of God. It consists of all who have heard the call of God and have properly responded to it. There may be many "churches" in a city, but there is only one community of heaven. Churches embrace those who see things a certain way. The community of heaven is composed of all who have embraced Him as the Way. There is a difference in "the life of the church" and the community of the Life.

The word community suggests those who are bound together by a common tie. This common tie is not a creedal compilation, a written code, a particular opinion, or a special way of doing things. The tie that binds is faith in the person of Jesus. It was this which separated the community in Philippi from members of the Roman colony. As the Roman colony was planted about the standard of the Caesars, so the colony of heaven was planted around the cross of Jesus. The apostle wept when he told them that many were enemies of the cross of Christ.

The Roman colony consisted of mustered-out soldiers of the emperor. The colony of heaven consists of mustered-in soldiers of the King of kings. Rome had captured the material world. Blood had flown in streams, and universal peace, uneasy as it was, had been achieved and was being maintained by the sword. But the colony of heaven was engaged in a contest for the hearts of men. For this they were furnished the sword of the Spirit. The task of this colony has not altered. Its citizenry must have a strategy of world conquest, seeking to win men, not to itself but to the King of glory. We are engaged still in the great controversy of the ages. On one side is the philosophy that might makes right; on the other, that of right makes might. It is to be hoped that this little analysis of the letter written by an ambassador in chains may help us all to renew our efforts for the kingdom.

The Community in Philippi

Contents

The first streaks of light were beginning to break through the gray dawn at Philippi. Most of the houses were still darkened on this first day of the week, but in the upper room of one could be seen a glow of light. This was the gathering place of the Community, the body of saints who were followers of the Nazarene. More than an hour before, the clay lamps had been lighted and placed upon the lampstands and the members, hurrying through the darkened streets, converged upon the place, to greet each other with the kiss of love. Some carried hampers of food for the feast of love, but others— the poor and the slaves— came with empty hands. The long table in the center of the room was surrounded by members of the Community. At its head sat the bishops, as supervisors and shepherds, with the president for the day sitting in the center.

A solemn stillness prevailed until the president, arising, began the hymn of praise. The impressive cadence of the chant filled the room and stirred the hearts of the saints. The hymn was antiphonal, the president chanting the leading lines and the members of the body chanting the responses.

In the beginning was the Word.

And the Word was with God.

So the Word was divine.

He was in the beginning with God.

By Him everything had being.

And without Him nothing had being.

What had being in Him was Life.

And Life was the Light of men.

And the Light shines in the Darkness.

And the Darkness could not suppress it.

The president announced the reading of the sacred writings, and asked that some brother volunteer to read from the Torah, as given to the ancients through Moses. Following this reading, another arose to read a portion of the prophets. Once more, the president arose, to inform the members of the Community of a notable event.

He said, "You will remember that after our beloved brother Paul, accompanied by Lucas, Silvanus and Timotheus, came to Philippi and was so ill-treated here, he went from thence to Thessalonica, and bore the News to them with such results that a Community was planted in that city. You will recall, too, that the annals of our Community reveal that those who were then enrolled among us, were sent more than once to relieve the great need of our brother there. Later, whilst our brother was at Corinth, he wrote once and again to the saints in Thessalonica, some ten years ago. Certain of our number at Philippi, having learned of these epistles, journeyed to Thessalonica, and there read the words of our brother. It was our desire that copies be made so that the memoirs of our brother might be shared with the saints here and at other places. It is but recently that one of our brothers, having secured parchment, journeyed again to Thessalonica, and assisted by scribes in the Community there, made a copy, which now lies before me. It will remain here for our reading and admonition. One of my fellow-bishops will read extracts from it in your hearing."

The aged saint arose, and read these words: "You yourselves know, brothers, that my visit to you was by no means ineffective. Though I had previously suffered and been ill-treated, as you are aware, in Philippi, I made bold in God with a great effort to give you God's News. My appeal to you was without imposture or impure motives, neither did I use guile. I spoke as one approved of God as worthy to be entrusted with the News, not as one who seeks to please men, but God who tries the heart. For I was never in speech a flatterer, as you know, nor one with covetous designs, God is my witness, nor one who seeks human commendation, neither from you nor anyone else, although entitled to be of consequence as an envoy of Christ. Rather was I very tender with you, as if I were a foster-mother nursing her own children. Thus yearning over you, I was delighted to impart to you not only God's News, but my very life, so dear had you become to me.

"Only call to mind, brothers, my toil and drudgery. Night and day I laboured so as not to be a burden to you in any way while proclaiming God's News. You are witnesses, and God also, how correctly, honourably and blamelessly, I acted towards you believers, just as you know how I exhorted, encouraged and charged every single one of you, as a father his own children, to behave worthy of God who has invited you to share his sovereignty and state."

With the close of the reading, the president again arose and spoke. "You are aware, brothers, how often during the past several years we have sought to have word from our brother Paul, and how our every attempt to locate him and to communicate with him has been fraught with disappointment. Now we have received word from Thessalonica as to his present state, and after the royal feast in memory of the death of the Christ, we shall have the report conveyed to us by our brother who bore the copy of the epistle from Thessalonica."

The president then spoke at length of the sacrifice of the Son of God, and of its meaning to the Community. He exhorted all to live in fidelity to the solemn pledge made to the Christ. Then, taking the loaf in his hands, he summoned the members to rise. Looking toward heaven, he solemnly gave thanks in these words:

"We give Thee thanks, our Father, for the life and knowledge which Thou didst make known to us through Jesus, Thy Child. To Thee be glory for ever. As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains, but was brought together and became one, so let Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom, for Thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever."

At the conclusion of the expression of thanksgiving, the entire Community voiced the Amen. The servants of the Community then distributed the bread to the members. Afterwards, all stood again and the president, taking the cup of blessing in his hand, again gave thanks in these words:

"We give thanks to Thee, our Father, for the Holy Vine of David, Thy child, which Thou didst make known to us through Jesus, Thy Child; to Thee be glory for ever."

Again the Community voiced the Amen. Then all drank of the fruit of the vine.

When the time came for the report concerning Paul, there was an intensity of feeling which manifested itself in the eager faces of the members. It was plain that these humble souls loved the one who first brought them the News. The brother arose and began to speak.

"Whilst I was in Thessalonica, brothers, I received confirmation of the rumors which have come to us. Our brother Paul, who left here several years ago, accompanied by the brothers whom we had selected to travel with him, arrived in Jerusalem with the bounty which the Communities of the Gentiles gathered for the relief of the saints in Judea. He was told by the elders there of the feelings of certain ones among the believers, who had been falsely informed that he was instructing the Jewish brothers among us not to circumcise their children. To allay the fears of the brothers in Jerusalem, upon advice of the elders, Paul entered the temple with four brothers who had taken a vow, expecting to bear the charges of their purification, and thus demonstrate that he lived in obedience to the law.

"Unfortunately, near the close of the seven days of purification, the Jews from Asia aroused the crowd and assaulted him. They accused him of defiling their holy place by taking uncircumcised Greeks into it. This accusation was groundless. They had seen our brother on the streets with Trophimus, who had been selected by the Community at Ephesus, to bear their share of the bounty to the distressed saints. The mob assumed that Paul had taken Trophimus into the temple. In a maddened frenzy they sought to kill our brother, but he was finally rescued by the tribune of the cohort, Claudius Lysias, who was forced to send him forth to Caesarea under protection of armed guard.

"In Caesarea, seat of the Empire in Palestine, our brother was on trial before the procurator, Claudius Felix, who left him in prison for two years. You have learned by proclamation last year of the recall of Felix for violence and extortion, and you know that his life was spared only because of the intercession of his brother Pallas, the favorite of the Emperor. He was succeeded as procurator by Porcius Festus, and before him our brother, as a Roman citizen, made appeal unto Caesar. He was then committed to the care of a centurion for the long journey to Rome, and was accompanied by Lucas, the good physician, who resided among us and taught us the Way, and also by Aristarchus, whose home is at Thessalonica, and who is so well known among us in this region.

"It is as the result of a communication of this brother to the Community at Thessalonica I have learned that, after many perils, including a serious shipwreck, our brother Paul finally arrived at Rome. He was delivered by the centurion into the custody of Burrus, the Pretorian Prefect, and is now in the care of the household troops of the Emperor, although permitted to dwell in a rented house in the vicinity of Palatine Hill. He is under constant guard and in bonds. It is not certain when the deputation from Palestine will arrive to prosecute him before the Emperor. During this interval he is in dire straits, for the Empire makes no provision for the sustenance of such prisoners. This much I learned from the word conveyed in the message of Aristarchus."

At the close of this account, many of the saints were weeping. One spoke aloud the sentiment of his heart, "How can he endure so much suffering?" It was apparent that Paul was loved by all. The president arose and exhorted the brothers to pray for this one who had endured so much to bring the News to Philippi. One after another, the members voiced their petitions to God in behalf of His suffering servant. Some of the prayers were offered in voices which broke under the emotional strain. Occasionally, one halted his prayer to weep unrestrainedly. When the last prayer was offered, and silence reigned except as punctuated by a sob, the president once more spoke to the little group.

"It was our brother who taught us that the blessed Lord Jesus said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' You are aware how often we have been concerned about the welfare of this faithful laborer, and of how we would have sent to help him in his needs, but lacked the opportunity. The time is now here when we can confirm our love unto him. Let as many as are prepared give this day to the deacons, and those who cannot do so today, let them make known their intention to aid, and the deacons can then visit you and receive your gifts, that the bounty may be collected without delay. And let us not forget that other things besides money will be required. There will be need of clothing, parchment, reeds, and other things. Let us respond nobly to these needs."

The president continued, "One from among us must offer to make this long and hazardous journey, and deliver unto our brother those things which he requires. Such a journey will be beset with danger now because of the ravages of the plague. You are familiar with the fact, brothers, that only recently the decree has gone forth to curtail all unnecessary travel, because of the fevers which have taken the lives of so many, and even desolated some towns and villages. Yet, we believe that He who notes the fall of a sparrow will not be unforgetful of such an act of love and deed of mercy. The Community will send up fervent prayers and will commend unto God the one who undertakes the mission."

This speech was hardly finished when Epaphroditus arose from his seat. He said, "You are aware, brothers, that I owe my soul to him who is now in bonds. I am ready to spend and be spent, in his behalf. How could I better serve our Lord than by attendance upon His faithful servant? We have labored together when he was among us. I long to see him again and look upon his face. I will convey your grace unto him and return to you any message that he desires to send. Perhaps I may even bring to you an epistle such as the ones he wrote to the Community at Thessalonica, and future generations reading it will know of our fervent love for him, and of his love toward us in the Lord Jesus."

The suggestion met with the approval of the entire company, for Epaphroditus was held in reputation for his work's sake. Accordingly, it was agreed that the servants of the Community gather up the bounty, and those who could do so would meet upon the evening of the fourth day for prayer, and on the morning of the fifth day Epaphroditus would set forth. Certain of the brethren agreed to travel with him along Via Egnatia as far as Thessalonica from whence, after commending him unto the grace of God, they would return to Philippi.

It was early in the morning of the date of departure, that the little band of brethren turned their faces toward Rome, along the paved road which stretched from the Hellespont to the Milliarium Aureum, the "Golden Milestone," which stood below the palace of the Emperor upon the Palatine.

This was one of the outstanding roads of the Empire, marked with milestones along the way, and with stations at proper intervals where travelers could spend the night. It was traversed regularly by couriers, members of the military staff, and traders. Amphipolis was the first stop on this highway after leaving Philippi, and when the travelers reached it they had covered thirty-three miles, a part of which was over rough terrain, before they reached the plain where the Strymon River formed a large lake. Amphipolis, which means "between the waters," was named from the fact that the river encircled it.

After a night in this spot, the men pressed on the following day toward Apollonia, passing enroute the tomb of Euripides, the great poet and dramatist, who at the age of seventy-two produced his tragedy of Orestes at Athens. Another night of respite from the fatigue of the journey, and on the morning of the third day they began the remaining lap of the trip to Thessalonica, where Paul and Silas had planted a community of believers after they left Philippi years before. Here they found refreshment and rest for both body and spirit in the company of the saints, and here Epaphroditus took up the remainder of the long trek to Rome without the company of brethren.

One could wish that he had before him a diary of such a journey, but in its absence it can only be conjectured that the brave saint carried on across the full width of Macedonia until at last, after many days, he reached Dyrrhachium on the shores of the Adriatic Sea. At what juncture of the arduous trip he first felt the severe symptoms of illness we do not know, but in spite of the danger attendant upon the sickness he carried on, risking his life to supply the things so essential to the life of Paul.

Embarking on the ferry which plied back and forth across the choppy and tempestuous channel between Italy and Macedonia, he landed at Brundusium and traveled north to the junction of Via Egnatia and Via Appia, and from thence, along the Appian Way past the Forum of Appius and Three Taverns to the very gates of the city of the Caesars. Here the traveler became a part of the jumbled traffic flowing in and out of the great metropolis sprawled upon the seven hills. The swaying chariots of the nobles and patricians, the prancing horses of the cavalry, were almost engulfed in the seething mass of pedestrians surging in both directions. Farmers bringing in produce, tradesmen with their wares in packs, soldiers transferring from one barracks or guard post to another, artisans, laborers, slaves, and foreign sightseers— these formed a teeming, pushing, shoving crowd, all intent on getting through to another destination, while adding to the confusion and turmoil about them.

Via Appia entered the city through the Porta Capena, the great arch which served to support the aqueduct above it, and Epaphroditus, passing through it, would find himself on a straight course leading toward the Circus Maximus, but the street veered to the right before arriving at this huge place of civic entertainment and skirted the Palatine Hill to lead down a gentle slope to the beautiful center of the imperial city, the Forum. Here would be found an imposing contrast with the dark, narrow streets, the sprawling hovels and the dirty shops of the remainder of the city, for successive rulers had vied with their predecessors in erecting magnificent structures.

The humble servant of the Community at Philippi, ravaged with fever and faint from illness, would be thankful unto God that his life had been thus extended, for he now stood within a few blocks of his destination. Before him lay the Capitoline Hill, its entire surface covered with the imposing palace of the Caesars. Enquiring for the praetorium where the household troops were stationed for constant protection of the emperor, he would be directed to the rear of the palace and to the guard house. Here he would identify himself to the Roman sentry and secure the pass entitling him to visit the prisoner.

What a scene it must have been, when in the apartment of the faithful envoy to the Gentiles, the messenger from the Community of Philippi presented himself. How the humble prisoner of God, chained to his Roman guard, must have held up his shackled hands and reached yearningly toward this brother. And with what unrestrained joy Epaphroditus must have rushed into the arms of this beloved one, while the two of them wept copiously from sheer gladness and relief. We leave them together now, during the interval required to portray the background of that community of saints, which formed their bond of mutual interest. We shall return and visit them again when we have finished our other task.

The Colony of Rome

Contents

"And from hence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony" (Acts 16:12).

The city of Philippi was located in the beautiful and fertile plain which stretched between the mountain ranges of Pangaeus and Haemus. Originally it was called by a name which meant "Place of Fountains." This name bore testimony to the streams and rivulets which watered the territory. The city had been reconstructed, upon a nobler basis by Philip of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, and he called it by his own name. It served not only as a monument to his military genius, but in a more practical sense, as a fortress for protection of the Macedonian frontier.

However, Philippi occupies an even more important place in history, because this plain became "the death bed of the Roman Republic" as the result of a decisive battle fought here in 42 B.C. Inasmuch as this fact provides background for, and adds color to the narrative written by Luke, we will not be amiss to sketch an outline of events leading up to it for the interested reader. Such a presentation must begin with Julius Caesar, sometimes called "greatest of the Romans."

Born of a patrician family, Caesar was by training a politician rather than a soldier. Pompey was the idol of the populace and the great military hero of the day. But, when Caesar was sent as proconsul to Gaul, his ability to plan and execute military strategy was demonstrated, and he proved himself to be one of the greatest generals of all time. He was virtually worshiped by his men, and his success bordered upon the phenomenal. In nine decisive campaigns he subdued all Gaul, and in 55 and 54 B.C., he invaded Britain.

The jealousy of Pompey was aroused by the acclaim given Caesar, and his envy drove him into closer alliance with the aristocratic party, which controlled the Senate. He succeeded in getting through an order to disband the army of Caesar, but when the order was conveyed to Caesar he refused to comply. Leading his men to the banks of the Rubicon, the little river which marked the boundary of Italy, Caesar halted to meditate and ponder the consequences of an attack upon his country. With the words, "The die is cast," he plunged into the stream and led his soldiers across: He was welcomed by the people, and Pompey, with the senators and nobles, fled to Greece.

Within three months all Italy was at the feet of Caesar, and on August 9, 48 B.C., he routed the forces of Pompey on the plains of Pharsalia. By further speedy conquest he subjugated the rest of the world, and when he defeated the last force of opposition led by the two sons of Pompey in Spain, 45 B.C., he was made imperator for life, and his portrait was stamped on the coins of the realm.

Although Caesar publicly refused a crown offered to him at a festival by Mark Antony, the aristocrats were suspicious of his designs, and feared he would even yet declare himself to be a king. They were urged into a conspiracy against his life by Cassius, who was motivated by a lifetime hatred for tyrants, as well as by personal animosity because Caesar had seized for himself a number of lions, which Cassius had accumulated and kept caged at Megara. He found an assistant in Marcus Brutus, a descendant of Junius Brutus, who had originally driven out the Tarquins and destroyed the monarchy.

Brutus pretended openly a friendship for Caesar, and had received openly many favors from him. But he also received many letters from anonymous sources urging him to rise up as did his illustrious ancestor and overthrow the imperator. Some of these messages merely contained the words, "Oh, that we had a Brutus now!" or "You are not a true Brutus!" Conditions were made worse by flatterers of Caesar, who slipped about by night and placed kingly diadems upon his statues, and who by day harangued the mob in an attempt to get them to salute him as king instead of dictator.

It was finally agreed to kill Caesar at a meeting of the Senate, called for the middle of March, on the day which the Romans called the Ides of March. The convention was held on a portico, adjacent to the theater. This portico contained a large statue of Pompey, whom Caesar had defeated in his rise to power. The conspirators arrived well in advance of their victim, and when he came followed closely about him into the inner precincts while one of their number, Trebonius, detained Mark Antony in conversation outside the door. Tillius Cimber pressed forward under pretence of making an intercession in behalf of his brother, who had been banished, but grasped the robe of Caesar and pulled it from his shoulders. Casca inflicted the first wound, a superficial one, and Caesar turned and grasped his dagger by the hilt, crying out, "Villain Casca, what do you?"

By this time, feeling the impact of many daggers, and still wrestling with Casca, Caesar looked hurriedly and wildly about him, seeking an avenue of escape. It was then he saw Brutus also with upraised dagger, and, as if in despair that he would be thus treated by one whom he had befriended, he relinquished the dagger of Casca, and drawing his robe over his head, submitted his body to their blows. As the daggers were driven into his body, the assassins became smeared with blood, some of it from a cut which Brutus had received on his hand. The blood of the slain Caesar ran red about the statue of Pompey.

In the first reaction to the killing it appeared that the conspirators had won the day. Signal honors were heaped upon them. In an allotment of provinces, Brutus was given Crete, and Cassius was assigned Africa. But a violent reversal occurred at the public funeral held for Caesar. In the reading of his will, it was learned that he had bequeathed seventy-five drachmas to each man in Rome, and given his beautiful formal gardens beyond the Tiber as a park to be used by the public. During the oration delivered by Mark Antony, the speaker, as a climax to his pathos, held aloft the toga of the murdered man, exhibiting the many rents made by the daggers and the number of wounds inflicted. The people virtually went berserk. Pillaging the shops and stores of their furniture, they made a huge pile of benches, tables and chairs, and cremated the body of Caesar in the forum, and snatching burning brands from the pile, they ran to burn the property of the murderers. Brutus and his party were forced to flee for their lives.

Julius Caesar made the son of his niece, whom he had adopted, his heir to the public office. The young Caesar was at Apollonia in school when he learned of the death of his benefactor. He immediately went to Rome and gained the favor of the people by distributing to them the money mentioned in the will. Adopting the title Augustus, he welded the army into a cohesive unit, and with the help of Mark Antony, to whom he became reconciled after a quarrel, he made ready to defy the forces which were gathered abroad under the banner of Brutus and Cassius. The two armies finally met upon the plains of Philippi.

In the first day of battle the troops under command of Brutus executed great slaughter, but in the fierceness of the fighting were severed from the segment commanded by Cassius. This contingent was driven back and Cassius was forced to flee to a hill overlooking the plain. Here he retired to a tent, taking with him one of the freedmen, whom he commanded to kill him. The deed was done, the sword striking the head of the general from his body. It is an ironical twist of fate that Cassius died because he was nearsighted, and mistook approaching friends for his enemies. When Brutus was informed of the death of Cassius, he mourned over him, calling him "the last of the Romans." However, by the promise of magnificent gifts, Brutus rallied those who had followed Cassius, but when the battle was joined again, the forces of Augustus and Antony were victorious.

Brutus, with a few friends who survived, came at night to a hollow under a great projecting rock, where he sat down to meditate upon his ill fortune. When evidence was presented that his case was hopeless, he made a brief address to his companions and shook hands with each one. Then, taking about three of his friends, he walked a little way off from the main group. Here he took hold of his sword, and directing it with both hands upon the hilt, plunged forward upon it and killed himself. The dead body was found by Mark Antony, who directed that his richest purple mantle be thrown over it. With the death of Brutus, the last hope of the revival of the republic also expired.

Augustus, beholding the strategic importance of Philippi, resolved to make it the site of a colony and utilize it as a fortress city for protection of his frontier. Accordingly, he made special provision for his soldiers who had fought so valiantly to be retired on pensions, and to reside at this place of their signal honor. It was an excellent location because of its nearness to thermal springs and due to its temperate climate. A proclamation was made of its colonial status and it was given the name *Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensis. It was a living memorial of the victory over Brutus, and its citizens were filled with the pride of military conquest.

Since it is important to this narrative to understand what all was involved in a Roman *colonia, we ask the kind indulgence of the reader for the detailed account given herewith. The modern student, having in mind the colonial systems of more recent nations, may miss much of the significance of the term as used in the first century of this era. It is only as we understand the expression in its fullness that we can appreciate some of the language of the apostle Paul as he wrote to the community of the saints who here resided.

A Roman colony was "a little Rome," regardless of where it was located. It was merely a reproduction, to the extent possible, of the great capital of all the universe. By looking at the colony, one could visualize the nature and character of the original. The residents of the colony never forgot that they were Roman citizens. They looked upon themselves as a community of strangers in a strange land, in so far as the inhabitants of the territory were concerned. They cherished the thought that their names were inscribed in the archives of their mother city, and their citizenship was thus assured by this enrollment. They spoke the language of Rome, and behaved with the dignity and decorum commensurate with the position of those who represented such a worthy position among men.

The colony did not make its own laws. The citizens were subject to the laws revealed or approved by the emperor, and although many had not seen him personally, they rendered complete obedience to his edicts and demands. It is not too much to say that they worshiped him as their god and deliverer. The local officers were designated by the terms applied in Rome, and were subject to the discipline of the *imperator. When new laws were issued they were publicly posted, read and explained to the citizenry summoned together for the purpose. Sometimes the Laws of the Twelve Tables were inscribed upon brazen plates in the Agora, or marketplace, as was the case in the city where Cyprian lived, according to his own testimony.

Such a colony was Philippi. It did not represent a city of foreigners who had been adopted under the standard of Rome after being subjugated. A city of that nature was called a *municipium, not a *colonia. Essentially a military colony, Philippi was composed principally of Roman citizens transplanted here to protect and defend the interests of the mother city upon the Tiber. They were tied to Rome by invisible cords and cherished the rights bestowed by this citizenship above all other earthly prerogatives.

The Colony of Heaven

Contents

Two years had elapsed since the return of Paul to Antioch, upon completion of his first preaching tour, and there was a longing in his heart to visit again the communities he had planted, to see how they fared. The interval had not been spent in idleness. Certain ones had come down to Antioch from Jerusalem and disturbed the minds of the brethren by teaching that no one could be saved unless he submitted to circumcision in the flesh. Recognizing this as an infringement upon liberty in Christ, and as a denial of salvation by grace, Paul and Barnabas vigorously resisted the doctrine. The dispute terminated in a decision to go to Jerusalem and consult the apostles and elders about the matter.

At Jerusalem, the discussion was intense with feeling, but was resolved in favor of the Gentiles being received into the communities, without circumcision. A letter was drafted to all and sundry to inform them of the decision, and a copy was presented to Paul and Barnabas. In addition to this, two of the trusted servants of the Community at Jerusalem, Judas and Silas, were sent to Antioch, to personally confirm the authenticity of the document. After a brief stay Judas returned to Jerusalem, but Silas remained in Antioch, devoting his time with Paul, Barnabas, and many others to instructing and proclaiming the Word.

Paul was anxious to deliver the decision of the brethren in Jerusalem to the communities he had originally planted, and suggested to Barnabas a tour of the area where they were located. Barnabas was unwilling to go unless accompanied by his young relative, John Mark, who had started with them on the first tour, but soon deserted them to return to Jerusalem. Paul opposed taking him along, perhaps feeling that his presence would to some extent nullify the effect of the letter. Mark, who had been reared under the Judaistic influence in the Jerusalem community, deserted the first tour when it became apparent that Paul would extend the benefits of the Good News to the uncircumcised. It was after his return to Jerusalem, where he no doubt reported the activities of Paul and Barnabas, that the Judaistic teachers came to Antioch and created the disturbance. Believing that he was not fitted for work in Gentile areas because of his former training and experience, and unwilling to allow any influence to hinder the spread of the News, Paul was adamant in his refusal to allow John Mark to start the second tour.

The contention between Paul and Barnabas grew more heated. Neither was willing to concede to the judgment of the other, so they separated. Barnabas sailed to Cyprus, where he had been a former land owner, and Mark accompanied him. Paul selected Silas as his traveling companion, and they set forth into the region where Paul had been reared, going through Syria into Cilicia. When they had strengthened and confirmed the brethren in this area, they turned their faces toward the scene of the first tour, a territory separated from their present locale by the towering peaks of the Taurus range.

Fortunately, the trampling feet of marching men had worn down an excellent pathway through the gorge known as the "Cilician Gates," and through this narrow pass the soldiers of the Prince of Peace could now cross over from the plains of Cilicia to the plateau upon which Derbe was located. This was the farthest extremity reached on the first tour, and one can contemplate with joy the quickening of the pulse and the eager anticipation with which Paul approached the city. The news of his arrival would spread swiftly, and the place where he lodged would soon be crowded. Silas would be introduced and welcomed, and inquiries as to the welfare of Barnabas would be answered. In a more formal fashion, when all were gathered, the letter from Jerusalem would be read and its provisions discussed. When the time came to part, there would be many prayers, accompanied by tears. The few days of fellowship together would constitute a mountain-top experience for the disciples of the Messiah. This would be tempered with the thought that they might not meet again on earth.

With their faces set toward Lystra, we are certain that Paul would brief Silas on conditions in that city, and give an account of his previous experience there. Silas would learn that outside the gate was the great statue of Jupiter, recognized as the lord and protector of the city. Here the pagan priest ministered at the altar, slaying oxen which had previously been decorated with garlands of flowers. Paul would need to recount the healing of the lame man who had been a cripple from birth, and tell of the effect of this deed upon the superstitious citizens of Lystra.

Silas would learn of the wave of excitement which caused the shout to go up that "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men." He would be informed that the populace designated Barnabas as Jupiter, while calling Paul Mercurius, or Hermes, the god of civic joy, because they concluded that he must be the messenger of the gods, inasmuch as he appeared to be the chief speaker. And we are sure that Paul would tell his companion how they ran in among the shouting multitude, pleading with them to desist and to cease their superstitious adulation, and to recognize them as mere men even though they did carry a message from heaven. We can only surmise the questions Silas would ask as they drew near the city, and the interest with which he would listen to the reply. Perhaps Paul showed him the place to which he was dragged by the mob, and described the brutal stoning which brought him so near to the brink of death.

The rejoicing among the saints at Lystra must have known no bounds when Paul again appeared in the city. And the apostle and his present companion would be greatly encouraged by the fidelity of those who had entered into covenant relationship with the Messiah. All were eager to report the spiritual growth and activity of an outstanding young man, Timotheus, and Paul expressed a desire to have the youth travel with him into the regions beyond. The father of Timotheus was a Greek, but his mother was a Jewess, and also a member of the community of saints. The mother and grandmother had made a special effort to teach Timotheus, with the result that he was well informed in the law and the prophets. Due to the influence of his father, the young man had not been circumcised, and realizing that this fact would hinder his influence in Jewish circles, the apostle circumcised him. The acquirement of this ardent worker was one of the most valuable acquisitions to the cause represented by the evangelists, and time served to demonstrate the wisdom of his selection as a traveling companion.

Driven by an inner urge, and impelled by an anxiety to acquaint all of the saints with the decisions which had been reached at Jerusalem, the three men pressed on from city to city. The communities were strengthened and confirmed, and each day there were added numbers of persons who were led to an acceptance of the Messiah when they became convinced that these men were not advocating a mere sect of Judaism. In a flush of triumph the proclaimers of the Good News were directed by the Spirit to pass by the province of Asia, and so they came to Phrygia and Galatia.

The journey was arrested at this point by the illness of Paul, and the rude but warmhearted Gauls were treated to the Message, because his bodily ailment would not allow Paul to proceed further. Unwilling to waste precious time, the envoy of the Christ made his period of detention one of service for Him whose slave he had become, and although his condition was a trial to his hearers, they did not ridicule or despise him, but received him as an angel, or a messenger from God. He publicly portrayed the Christ in such a manner that his hearers could almost visualize the crucifixion. The result was that Jews and Greeks, slaves and free men, all became one in Christ.

Leaving the weak and beggarly elemental spirits, both men and women who had been in bondage to idolatry cast off the yoke of such slavery and yielded themselves to the true God. Throughout Galatia, communities of believers were planted, and those who received the Spirit by the obedience of faith felt a deep satisfaction as the result of the ministration of this one whose bodily ailment had turned out so providentially to their welfare. It was with reluctance, when able to travel again, that the ambassador of the Messiah bade farewell to those whose love for him had been so fervent, they would have plucked their eyes out and given them to him. But the call of regions beyond was too great to tarry longer, and they turned their faces in the direction of Bithynia.

Again the Holy Spirit blocked the way and refused to allow them to go to their objective. Skirting the borders of Mysia, they directed their steps toward Troas. Hundreds of years before, the blind poet Homer, perhaps a contemporary of the Biblical prophet Elijah, had made the plain of Troy famous. In the twenty-four chapters of the Iliad, that great epic poem of the Trojan War, gods and men had conspired, struggled and fought. To the city made famous by the names of Agamemnon, Achilles, Hector and Paris, came the soldiers of the invisible King, clad only in the armor of righteousness and carrying but one weapon, the sword of the Spirit. But here, where Alexander the Great had stood by the tomb of Achilles, noted for the "ruinous wrath, which laid unnumbered woes on the Grecians," and dedicated himself to world conquest; a divine summons came to the Jew of Tarsus to extend the conquest of the Prince of Peace over the territory of Europe.

During the night, when the city was silent and sleeping, the envoy of the Christ had his slumber disturbed by a vision. A figure appeared at his bed, and he identified the supernatural visitor as a man from Macedonia. The man stretched forth his hands in an imploring gesture as if begging for aid, and said in pleading terms, "Come over to Macedonia and help us." The last word indicated that he was a spokesman for many, and that a great host of the inhabitants of Greece needed the assistance which only the Christ can bestow.

Paul never doubted the importance of the vision. Concluding that God had opened the door to Europe, he divulged the secret of his nocturnal visitor to Silas, Timotheus, and Luke, who had joined the little band since the sickness of Paul. Dawn found them at the docks of the harbor seeking passage across the Aegean, and providence had the ship ready as well as the men. And the same providence, permitting no delay, allowed the wind to blow from the south so that the hoisted sails billowed out and the ship plowed through the strait and past the Dardanelles, and by evening had reached the island of Samothrace, where the mariners anchored for the night in one of the safe havens.

The journey was resumed the next morning, and again the vessel was sped on her way by favorable winds, so that before the day ended the travelers arrived at Neapolis, where the Roman military road came down to the Aegean Sea. Upon this road they then set forth for Philippi, ten miles distant, climbing the slope leading upward to the high ridge separating the sea from the fertile plain which lay beyond. From its summit they could look back over a beautiful expanse of island-studded sea, and forward to the great sweep of land where the battling forces of Rome had sealed the fate of the Republic but a few years before.

Philippi was an excellent proving ground for the power of the Good News. As a colonia, it was a "little Rome" with ties stretching back to the city on the Tiber. Its citizens were primarily military men and their families, related to the soldiers of Augustus who had fought so brilliantly on the outlying plain. Arrogant, proud of their service record in the army of a world power, such persons would have little time for the story of a Jew in a remote province, who died on a cross at the sentence of a territorial governor. This colony would provide an opportunity for one who desired to visit Rome to see the effectiveness of his labors among those who were so haughty, they divided the world of mankind into "Romans" and "foreigners."

The emperor, hundreds of miles distant in the capital city, ruled the colony, consisting of many who had never seen his face. They were bound to him by the invisible ties of Roman citizenship, and by their oaths of allegiance. Because of their relationship to him, they were welded together into a compact community made up of those who shared in mutual aims and privileges. The emperor was more than a distant ruler exercising control over their lives through his agents. He was also regarded with superstitious reverence, and worshiped as a god.

Into this city steeped in martial traditions, came the emissaries of another distant King. Their task was well defined. It was to plant a colony of heaven in the colony of Rome. They were to enlist soldiers under the banner of the Nazarene, and bind them by sacred vows of allegiance to one whose features they had never beheld. They were to band them together as a colony of heaven, so that those who looked upon them could see reflected the purposes of the King of kings.

Now the kingdom of the Messiah was brought face to face with that of the Caesars. The rule of the heavens was to confront the last great world empire. It was at Philippi that the test was to be made. It is true that the proclamation of the heavenly message prior to this had always been made upon territory dominated by Rome, but it had been made to Jews and Greeks who were regarded as "foreigners" by those who ruled them. At last it would be presented to those who would say, "These men are Jews and they are disturbing our city. They advocate customs which it is not lawful for us Romans to accept or practice."

These thoughts must have flooded the mind of Paul as he entered the city. It would appear that everything was against the success of his effort. The history of the place, the disposition of the populace, the nature of their government, the pride of ancestry, the worship of the emperor, all of these constituted barriers which it would be impossible to batter down if dependent solely upon man. Add to this the fact that the two principal proclaimers were Jews and would face the prejudice of the Roman citizens, and one can see the difficulty of securing a foothold for the Good News. Yet all of these factors would melt away in contemplation of the vision of the Macedonian call for help. If God called upon them to proclaim the Good News to the people of Europe, He would open the way.

There was one feature which loomed important. Paul was a Roman citizen. This great benefit had not been purchased with money, but, as a descendant of one of the "first families" of Tarsus in Cilicia, he was born to the privileges which once had belonged only to the dwellers on the Italian peninsula. As a citizen, he could travel throughout the world with the full protection of the Roman garrisons. It was illegal to bind a Roman with fetters, or to beat him with rods. Petty officials who disregarded these civil rights would be stricken with terror when informed of their infringement.

While this fact operated in favor of the proclaimer, there was one thing which increased the difficulties of labor. In Philippi there was no synagogue of the Jews. The synagogue in a Greek city afforded a place for the initial declaration of the Good News. Here could be found an audience composed of interested students of the Torah and Hafterah, the revelation of God through Moses and the prophets. Upon this foundation one could readily build and lead the minds of the devout to an acceptance of the Messiah as a fulfillment of the Torah. Synagogues were scattered throughout the world, and the fact that there was none in Philippi is indicative of the status of that city.

It required ten men, willing to devote much time to prayer and study, to establish and constitute a synagogue. In those communities where such a group could not be found, a Proseucha, or place of prayer, was designated. In many instances a building was employed as a proseucha, occasionally a place in the open air, often upon the bank of some stream, would be selected and set aside as a spot to which the faithful might repair for their devotions, particularly upon the sabbath days. Here there was less formality than in the synagogue, and the prayers and meditations, not being guided by a president, were carried on individually.

In conformity with Jewish practice, on the sabbath day the messengers of the Good News went out through the city gate to the Gaggitas River, and entered the proseucha. They found the congregation composed of a few women. Not all of these were of Jewish extraction, and not all were local residents. At least one was a proselyte to Judaism. Her home was at Thyatira, a city in Asia Minor, which was a center for the dye industry, and where the various guilds were organized as trade unions to protect their competitive position. Of these guilds, none was more famous than that of the purple dyers, who used an extract from the little shellfish, the murex, to produce a dye prized by the nobility. Lydia, who was at the proseucha, was a business woman representing this guild.

The envoys of the Messiah did not consider it beneath their dignity to speak to the little group of women who had come together. They told the simple story of the Nazarene, and linked it with the prophecies of old. And although it was a man who summoned them to Macedonia in the vision, it was a woman whose heart was first opened to give heed to what was said by Paul. Lydia was motivated to acknowledge her conviction that Jesus was the Messiah, and in this declaration of faith she was joined by the associates of her household. These were then led into the water of the nearby river and were immersed in the stream, and into the divine relationship with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

The firstfruits of the conquest of Europe, on European soil, were gathered into the granary. It is true that Lydia was from Asia, yet she heard the message on the fringe of the Roman colony, and her house became the base from which operations were directed to extend the borders of the colony of heaven. In becoming modesty, as soon as she was immersed, she offered the facilities at her command to those who served the Messiah. She invited them to her house to stay, if they deemed her to be faithful unto the Lord, and prevailed upon them to make it their headquarters. We doubt not that here assembled those others who surrendered unto the claims of the Messiah from day to day, and here the community of saints sat down around the memorial feast. Peace and serenity prevailed, and the work moved forward in calm and quiet. But this could not long continue.

It was a woman in Philippi who first accepted the Good News and gave impetus to the work of colonization for the Messiah; it was another woman who became the instrument for the arrest of the proclaimers. The great contrast in the two serves only to accentuate the variety of characters who came under the influence of the Message. The first was a business woman respected in the world of commerce; the second a slave girl manipulated by selfish owners for their own gain. One was under the tranquil influence of God's revelation; the other was an unfortunate victim of demon possession, having a spirit of divination.

This is not the time for a discussion of the many questions dealing with the subject of demons and their possession of the bodies of men and women during the days when the Spirit of God worked miracles to confirm the divine testimony. It is sufficient to say that the Word of God teaches that personal spirits from the realm of darkness gained control and mastery over men and women and exercised power over them. Among the heathen who worshiped idols, the demoniacal influence was attributed to Apollo, who was regarded as the god of light, and who was thought to control song and prophecy, with the ability to inspire whom he would with musical talent or prophetic fervor. Greek mythology credited Apollo with slaying Python, a hideous serpent which lived near Delphi and devoured the cattle and men which came within reach. When Apollo arrived at Delphi, he slew the monster with special arrows, and from that time on the name of Python was given to him to designate his prophetic power as an oracle or revealer of secrets.

Those who were possessed by demons were regarded as being under the direct influence of Apollo. Their rantings and ravings were accepted as the voice of the oracle, and much gain was made by exploiting their words. There was a slave girl in Philippi who was a Pythoness. She was jointly owned by several men who derived much wealth from advertising her as a prophetess and fortune-teller. It appears that she was a victim of demon possession, and the foul spirit used her as an instrument of deception. One day, as the disciples were on their way to the proseucha, they encountered the female slave, who began following them, crying out in a loud voice, "These men are servants of the Most High God, who proclaim to you the way of salvation."

This performance continued for many days. The Pythoness, awaiting the arrival of the disciples each day, would take up her chant as soon as she saw them. The populace became aware of it. Paul was annoyed. Like Jesus, he did not want the testimony of demons. The cause he represented would suffer if the people concluded that he was working in league with Apollo, or was endorsed by the Delphian oracle. When the aggravation became too great, moved with compassion for the victim and with respect for his mission, he suddenly turned and said to the spirit, "I charge you in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her." Instantly the girl was freed from the compulsion of the evil personality which had invested her, and was returned to sanity and a normal status.

The release of the victim from the domination of the evil spirit rendered her worthless for soothsaying, and thereby deprived her owners of any further hope of enriching themselves by exploitation of her power of divination. They flew into a rage and grabbing Paul and Silas, they literally dragged them to the forum where the colonial rulers, or praetors, sat to judge the cases brought before them. It was necessary to file an indictment against those accused of criminal act or intent, and the owners of the slave girl were reluctant to state the real reason for their anger, since it was not illegal to dispel a demon, nor was there any punishment assessed by law against one who drove out evil spirits. In this case, the owners made a direct appeal to prejudice. They stated three things relative to Paul and Silas—that they were Jews, they were disturbing the peace of the city, and were advocating customs unlawful for Romans to adopt or practice.

The fact that they were Jews would create suspicion against them at this time, because of the "underground movement" of certain zealots, who sought by every means known to them to arouse animosity against the Romans, and to foment revolution. Indeed, it had been but a short time since the Jews had been expelled from Rome, and the synagogues there closed down by law, in an attempt to curb seditionists who were circulating subversive propaganda, and organizing simultaneous outbursts of fanatical opposition throughout the Roman world. The praetors would feel obligated to treat dangerous resistance groups in the colonies as they were handled in Rome, and being already nervous and distraught by reports of guerilla activities elsewhere, they were ready to take drastic measures against any who came in from abroad to disturb the colony, as these men were accused of doing.

While Rome was generally quite tolerant toward the gods of the people conquered by her armies, and permitted traditional forms of religion to continue in occupied territories, there was a law against the introduction of foreign and alien gods. It had long since been learned by experience that nothing else caused such social upheavals as the attempt to change religious rites and customs. Even captive peoples fought more bitterly for their ancient religions than for any other cause. The legal provision against bringing in new deities was intended to preserve tranquillity, as well as to guard against defections from the Roman gods in Italy and the colonies.

On this score the Jews were always a problem. Their belief in one God, and their definite aversion to idols and images rendered them intractable. The exile in Babylon had burned out of the nation a tendency toward idolatry, and they fiercely resented even the symbols of polytheism. This, coupled with a deep sense of nationalism, made them impervious to the influence of the mythology of Greece and Rome. There was exercised toward them by the Romans a feeling of contempt which always smoldered, and occasionally under undue provocation, burst into flaming anger. The defeated slave owners, recognizing this, were quick to accuse the Messianic envoys of being Jews who advocated customs which were illegal for the Romans to adopt. There was some truth in the accusation as measured by Roman law.

The situation was aggravated by the fact that a mob soon formed, composed of loungers who frequented the forum. Every city had its share of these human parasites. Those who were indolent and lazy, and who lived chiefly by their wits, lolled about the markets, constantly on the alert for something sensational as a diversion. Tiring of the street jugglers, magicians and sleight of hand performers, who did their tricks for the small coins thrown to them, the crowd soon rallied when word was conveyed that the foreign Jews had been arrested. Moved by the hope of seeing the victims beaten with rods, the screaming, gesticulating group gathered around the seats of the praetors, demanding that the men be punished for infraction of the law, even though most of them did not even know the accusation against them. They were not disappointed.

The praetors, desirous of appearing as faithful guardians and executors of the Roman Code, ordered the lictors who stood near to strip the men of their garments and to beat them with rods. This judicial flogging was indescribably severe. It was not administered as the beating under the Jewish law, which provided a maximum for the number of stripes which might be inflicted with the lash. The Roman method was to beat with rods, applied with full force against the quivering muscles of the body, and sometimes continued until the unfortunate and hapless culprit was beaten to insensibility. The body became bruised and discolored as the relentless blows reigned down, and often the blood gushed forth when the swollen skin burst under the repeated attack of the brutal lictors.

In the case of Paul and his companion, it is distinctly recorded that many lashes were inflicted upon them. But this was not the end of their suffering. To add insult to injury, they were thrown into prison without being allowed to even wash the blood from their battered bodies. Aching in every joint, purple from the multiple bruises, sore and weak, they were turned over to the jailer, who was given a strict order to guard against their escape and to see that they remained in confinement. Under such positive command from the praetors, the jailer, laboring under the impression that he had under his care important and violent criminals, led them into the dungeon recess of the prison, and as an added precaution, fastened their feet in the stocks, which were kept for the more dangerous types of felons. The pain and torture occasioned by this form of detention can only be imagined. Unable to move or to change position, forced to endure the stinging torment of throbbing veins, with stabbing darts of fire piercing every organ, the men were left in darkness and discomfort.

The midnight hour came, but it brought no cursing or screams of rage from the inner prison. The men in the stocks prayed to God. Their feet were fastened, but their spirits were free. Suddenly the sound of a hymn floated through the vaults of the prison. The other prisoners were listening. Never before had they heard such a thing. They were accustomed to vile imprecation and shouting, to swearing and vilification. But this was the first time they had heard an ascription of praise unto God. While they listened another sound was heard. There was a rumble in the bowels of the earth, and nature became engaged in a great convulsion. The prison rocked and reeled, and as the agitation increased, the very foundations of the building quaked and shook, until the doors to all of the cells flew open, and at the same moment the chains and fetters fell off of all the inmates. In their state of shock and amazement, the prisoners did not move from their places.

The tremendous upheaval aroused the jailer, who quickly looked about him and saw all of the doors standing wide open. The thought flashed through his mind that the prisoners had all fled, and knowing that if such were the case he would be subjected to torture culminating in death for delinquency in office, he immediately decided to commit suicide rather than to endure the disgrace and stigma of public trial. Snatching his sword from the sheath, he was ready to fall upon it and plunge it through his heart when Paul shouted loudly to him, "Do yourself no harm, for we are all here!" The astonished warden, thus halted upon the very brink of death, called for lights to be brought, and in their glow sprang into the dungeon area. Trembling in every fiber of his being due to the strange concourse of events, and smitten with fear, he fell down before Paul and Silas. The rumors he had heard concerning these men came flooding back into his mind and these, coupled with his observation of their faith and conduct while they were in his custody, impelled him to bring them out of the prison and into his own private quarters, where he voiced the question, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

The messengers looked upon the faces of the members of the jailer's family who had crowded about them. They observed the fear and curiosity written upon those countenances. It was an opportunity afforded by providence to save souls, and their own personal discomfort was forgotten as they replied to the question. "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved, and all your household." Recognizing the queries which would be provoked by such a reply, they began at once to explain. The story of the Son of God was unfolded in the early hour following midnight, and the hearts of the listeners were profoundly touched. The intention of obeying the One who sat at the right hand of God was announced by the head of the household, and in this decision all of the others readily concurred.

The jailer led his former prisoners to the courtyard where there was an ample supply of water, and here he bathed the wounds of Paul and Silas, washing from their stripes the blackened blood which had caked and hardened there. Then the jailer and his family, being led into the pool, were immersed the same hour in which they had made their fateful decision, and the family of God was enriched by those who were born again.

A great change had now been wrought. The prisoners, who had been fastened in the stocks by the jailer on the previous afternoon, were now made guests in his home. But they were more than that, for they were now brethren beloved, and toward them he demonstrated that love and hospitality which are so much a part of the new relationship in the Christ. Food was brought and placed before the hungry servants of God. As they ate, the members of the family clustered about the table, overjoyed in their new faith, thanking and praising God for the working of His power which had brought them into contact with the proclaimers of His love for all men. Happily talking together, the morning hours passed quickly by, and dawn broke over the city of Philippi.

Soon after daybreak the sound of a knock on the door summoned the jailer. He was surprised to see the civic lictors standing before him, and more surprised to hear the message which they brought from the praetors to set the men free. His mind reverted to the order of the previous evening given by these same officials, to hold the prisoners securely. Had the earthquake aroused a superstitious fear which now caused them to countermand their previous order? While pondering this turn of events, the jailer requested the lictors to wait while he consulted with Paul.

Turning back into the inner room where Paul was resting, the jailer informed him that the praetors had sent word to let him go. He urged the apostle to depart without further delay, that he might go in peace. But Paul, recalling the rude and injudicious conduct of the praetors in the face of the mob, refused to leave. He arose and went out to where the lictors stood waiting. He said to them, "You go back and inform these Roman governors that they have beaten us publicly without proper investigation. We are Roman citizens and are entitled to protection under the law, but we have been cast into prison as common felons. We refuse to be spirited away secretly. You tell your superiors that if they desire us to leave, they must personally come and conduct us forth as becomes those who are citizens."

This message struck fear into the hearts of the praetors, who immediately realized they had violated three of the basic codes governing citizens. They had imprisoned citizens of Rome without due process of law; they had flouted the Valerian law which made it a crime to place a Roman in stocks; and they had acted contrary to the provisions of the Sempronian or Porcian law which denied to any man the right to punish a Roman citizen with rods. Moved with fright, they quickly decided to appease the prisoners if possible, and in that spirit they went in a body to the home of the jailer, where they pleaded with the men to forgive their impulsive actions. With proper judicial recognition they escorted them out and requested that, in the interest of peace and safety, they leave the city and their jurisdiction.

Paul and Silas, upon being freed, went to the home of Lydia. Here they spoke words of encouragement and consolation to the little band of followers who formed the community of the saints, and informed them of the accession to their number of the prison guard and his family. The time for parting came all too quickly, and with the farewells bringing tears to the eyes of the faithful ones, the proclaimers set forth on the way to Thessalonica. They had succeeded in planting a small colony of heaven composed of active soldiers of the King, in the midst of the colony of Rome made up of retired soldiers of the Caesar. The leaven had been deposited in the dough. Only time was required for it to expand and influence others who had not declared allegiance unto Him who was mightier than Caesar.

In our day, when the faith has become stagnant, and is weakly professed by those who never expect to live by it, it seems incredible that a small group of pilgrims could so affect the world around them. But a familiarity with the letter written to them shows the powerfulness of their impact upon the culture of their day. It also reveals the closeness of the apostle to them and his really deep love for them through the years. It is time now for us to investigate that letter.

A Letter From the Ambassador

Contents

The illness contracted by Epaphroditus became more serious after he arrived in Rome. Day after day he languished, until it appeared that he could not possibly live. The apostle, in bonds, keeping informed of the condition of his companion in Christ, earnestly besought God in his behalf. Finally, the crisis was passed, and the sick messenger began to improve. Paul considered this as a direct answer to prayer. He regarded it as a providential act to keep him from having an additional burden to the ones he already bore.

Epaphroditus was deeply troubled, even after his recovery was assured. He learned that word had been conveyed to Philippi that he was sick, and also that the Community there was greatly distressed by this information. He was anxious to set their minds at ease by going personally to prove to them that he was again in health. He was torn between conflicting emotions. There was the fear that if he left Rome he might never again see Paul; on the other hand, he felt a sense of responsibility to the saints in Philippi.

Eventually, he presented the matter to Paul. With foresight and understanding, the apostle devised a means of offsetting the concern of the worried emissary. He asked him to go to Philippi as his personal messenger, and to carry an epistle of gratitude and instruction. Since Epaphroditus could not deny this request, and being desirous of seeing his home again, he readily agreed to the proposal, whereupon the apostle sat down and wrote the letter which was carried to the Philippian Community.

It is our good fortune to have a copy of the letter, which we propose to examine carefully with you, that all of us may profit by an understanding of the will of God for a colony of heaven planted upon alien soil. It will do us good to study diligently the words of the prisoner of God.

The Salutation (1:1, 2)

Contents

> Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:
>
> Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

The letter was written by an apostle (Paul), and an evangelist (Timothy). The apostles were ministers plenipotentiary, acting as ambassadors for the absent King (2 Cor. 5:20). Unto them the mystery of God was made known by revelation (Eph. 3:3-5), and they were empowered to bind or loose, with assurance that their action would be ratified in heaven (Matt. 16:19).

Evangelists were heralds of the glad tidings, as the etymology of the term indicates. They were harbingers of the Good News, taking the message to those who had not heard it before, immersing those who accepted it, and instructing and training them until permanent officers were qualified and appointed. That Timothy served in this capacity is evident from 2 Timothy 4:5.

Paul and Timothy are designated servants of Jesus Christ. Because we use the term today to describe domestics who serve for wages, it conveys a different meaning than the original in this place, which means "a slave." The apostle writes, "He who was free when called is a slave of Christ" (1 Cor. 7:22). A slave was purchased by his master and was not his own. He was the sole property of another man, and he acted only at the bidding of the one to whom he belonged. This is the state of those in Christ (1 Cor. 6:19, 20).

The colony of heaven at Philippi was composed of the saints, with the bishops and deacons. The word saints has to do with character. It is from the same word also translated "sanctified, holy." In relationship to God, these are children; in relationship to each other, they are brethren. As to intellectual progress, they are disciples; in relationship to Christ, they are Christians. In the primitive Communities men were not made saints by pronouncement of canonization after death. They were saints in life by virtue of the call of God, which summoned them from darkness to His marvelous light (1 Peter 2:9). Thus, they were called saints. This does not mean merely that they were designated as saints, or called to be saints, as the Authorized Version has it, but they were called saints— those who had heard and answered the call of God.

The word grace means "undeserved kindness." It is not favor bestowed upon a reciprocal basis, nor in payment of debt or obligation. The recipient of grace is wholly undeserving. He can claim no merit of his own as a reason why he should be so blessed. Peace is that state of safety, security or happiness, which results from a union of the spirit of man with the Father of spirits. It can be secured only through the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:1). Among the Greeks, it was the custom to bid farewell to friends by saying, "Grace be unto you." The Jews used the formula, "Depart in peace" (James 2:16), or "Peace be with you" (Cp. Acts 15:33). It is an interesting feature of the writings of Paul that he employs both terms in salutation, thus indicating the universality of his message.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COLONY

The creator of the universe is a God of order and system. This is demonstrable, not only in the natural, but also in the spiritual realm. The Community of believers sustains a relationship to God and men. They are obligated to love both, and this love must be manifested in a practical manner. It must be demonstrated. The organization and discipline ordained by heaven is designed to achieve this purpose. Thus the Community at Philippi consisted of saints, with the bishops and deacons. The responsibilities and functions of the officers can best be understood by recourse to three considerations: (1) The implications of the terms used to designate them; (2) the charges or instructions given to them; (3) the descriptions of their work written with apostolic approval, together with a study of the qualifications as specified.

The Community at Philippi was apparently fully qualified to serve the best interests of the absent King. They stood firm in one spirit, with one mind striving side by side for the faith of the gospel. They were not frightened in anything by their opponents (1:27, 28). Although they had obeyed in the presence of Paul, they were encouraged to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, much more during his absence (2:12). They were capable of shining as lights in the world, and of holding fast the Word of life, in the midst of a warped and sick world (2:15, 16). We must conclude that they were self-sustaining, self-maintaining, and self-perpetuating, and that this is the divine plan for a colony of heaven.

The word bishop means "an overseer, a superintendent." As originally used, the term had no religious or ecclesiastical significance. It was applied to those local officials of Greek cities who were charged with maintaining order and supervising the collection of taxes and other forms of revenue. The Holy Spirit employed the word to describe the work of guiding and directing a community of saints, which was the responsibility of the elders. These are specifically said to have been made overseers (Acts 20:28), and were instructed to take the oversight (1 Pet. 5:2).

The same men are called elders and as a body or group, they constitute a presbytery (1 Tim. 4:14). The word elder would have special significance to the Jews, as the word bishop did to the Greeks. There is a difference, however, in that the first has to do with qualification, while the other pertains to function or service. Originally, the word elder meant "a bearded one, an aged person." In primitive societies where there were few records or books, and where learning was derived from traditional accounts of ancestors and from personal experience, the oldest members of the clan were esteemed to be the wisest. Special regard was attached to them as counsellors or advisors. As the social structures became more complex age alone was not sufficient to assure wise administration, and the word took on additional connotations of wisdom, ability, and willingness to serve. The evolution of the word can be observed by the careful student of the old covenant scriptures.

Another word used with reference to the same office-bearers is pastors (Eph. 4:11). All teaching must be done on a foundation of previously acquired knowledge. The unknown can be grasped only in the light of that which is known. A revelation adapted to the needs of men must be given in the language in current use among such men, and any illustrations used to enforce the meaning of the revelation must be drawn from the life with which such men are familiar. A correct understanding and application of such illustrations and terms by those remote in time or place from the people to whom the revelation was originally vouchsafed, can be assured only by research designed to establish familiarity with the former way of life. Words are constantly altering. In their employment as the currency of communication they lose previous connotations and accumulate new variations.

There is ever a danger that those who study the new covenant Scriptures will apply to the words contained therein a modern meaning or idea, wholly foreign to that of the inspired penmen. The word pastor affords a good example of the reason for our warning. The revelation of heaven was made to people familiar with a pastoral existence. Literally, the word has to do with sheep, and since these animals which provided the food, clothing, and shelter of the ancients required protection, guidance and feeding, it involved the idea of a flock-tender, or shepherd. The entire Bible abounds with allusions to the people of God as the sheep of His pasture, and the most beautiful passages of sacred writ are those which contain such figures of speech.

The very word congregation is from the Latin grex, a flock; combined with a prefix which means "together," the community of saints is composed of those who flock together under the guidance of "the Shepherd and Bishop of souls" (1 Pet. 3:25). It is but natural that those who tend a local congregation, called a flock, would be designated pastors, since the word pastor means "a herdsman, especially a shepherd." The pastors of the community of saints are the elders or bishops. In Acts 20:17, Paul requested the elders of the congregation at Ephesus to meet with him at Miletus. He reminded these men that they were overseers of the flock of God at Ephesus (verse 28). Overseers is from the same Greek word elsewhere translated bishops. But these men were told to take heed to all the flock, over which they had been made bishops, to feed. This last word is the verb form of the same word rendered pastors in Ephesians 4:11. The word feed means to "tend a flock, to keep sheep." It embraces much more than throwing down fodder, or providing sustenance. The Greek language, famed for its keen distinctions, had a different word to express this limited action. The pastors, or shepherds, were entrusted with providing not only proper nourishment, but care, guidance, protection, discipline— in short, everything required to make the flock grow, develop, and remain in a healthy state.

That the pastors are the elders, or bishops, is again evident from 1 Peter 5:1-4. Here the elders (verse 1) are instructed to "feed the flock of God, taking the oversight thereof." The expression "taking the oversight" is from the same Greek root word as bishop, and James Macknight renders the expression, "exercising the bishop's office." Again the word feed means "to tend a flock, to keep sheep," and it is from the same root word as pastor in Ephesians 4:11. It is evident that the words bishop, overseer, elder, presbyter, pastor, and shepherd all refer to the same functionary. This will explain the reference of Peter to "the chief Shepherd" in the same context (see verse 4). The elders are really under-shepherds, tending the flock of God in their respective areas, and some day they will give account to the chief Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

An understanding of the work of a shepherd in the pastoral or agrarian society of the ancients is essential to a correct understanding of the relationship of elders to the spiritual congregation. Here, as usual, the revelation of God is its own best expositor and commentary. We can learn what God requires of any specific person or group by what He commands in order to merit His approval, or by His expressed censure against the shortcomings which incur His displeasure. In Ezekiel 34 is an arraignment of the shepherds of Israel. It is charged against them that they fed themselves instead of the sheep, and that they did not strengthen the weak, heal the sick, bind up the crippled, bring back the strays, or seek the lost. They ruled with force and harshness, and the sheep were scattered because of the attitude of the shepherds.

The shepherds were not only entrusted with the care of the sheep, but were accountable for them. One such shepherd, in reporting to the owner of the flock, declared, "Your ewes and your she-goats have not miscarried, and I have not eaten the rams of your flocks. That which was torn by wild beasts I did not bring to you; I bore the loss of it myself; of my hand you required it, whether stolen by day or stolen by night. Thus I was; by day the heat consumed me, and the cold by night, and my sleep fled from my eyes" (Gen. 31:38-40, RSV). Ezekiel declares, "Therefore, you shepherds, hear the word of the Lord:

As I live, says the Lord God, because my sheep have become a prey, and my sheep have become food for all the wild beasts . . . and because my shepherds have not searched for my sheep, but the shepherds have fed themselves, and have not fed my sheep, therefore, you shepherds, hear the word of the Lord: Thus, says the Lord God, Behold, I am against the shepherds; and I will require my sheep at their hand..." (34:7-10).

It is because of this great responsibility the bishops must be qualified men. The requirements are twice listed in letters written by Paul, and addressed to Timothy and Titus. A study of the qualifications will show that they generally fall into four classifications: moral, domestic, intellectual, and executive. It is inconceivable that men be required to meet such specifications, who, upon ordination, become mere figureheads, relegating their work to others who contract to do it for hire. Perhaps nothing is more essential to recapture of the true ideal of the Christian community, than the restoration of the office of bishop to its proper position of dignity and worth in the eyes of the people.

The Community at Philippi also had deacons. This word is merely an Anglicized form of the original, which refers to one who is a servant or attendant. There is nothing in the word itself which indicates the type of service to be rendered, but in the primitive Community it came to be applied in a special sense to designate those entrusted with the care of the poor, and with the collection and distribution of the funds essential to their care. Originally, in the Community at Jerusalem, the twelve served in this capacity. The burden became great, and the Hellenists complained against the Palestinian Jews, alleging that their widows were being neglected in the daily distribution of food and necessities. The twelve summoned the body of the disciples and proposed that they select from their number seven men in whom they had confidence to minister to the temporal welfare of the saints.

Qualifications of these first seven required them to have a good reputation, and to be full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom. After they were chosen by the entire Community, they were ordained by the apostles. It is specifically stated that they were chosen to "serve tables" (Acts 6:2). The word serve is the same one translated by the expression "use the office of a deacon" (1 Tim. 3:10). The apostle declares that men ordained to the office must be serious and dignified, not deceitful, not drunkards, and not greedy after money.

The colony of heaven, then, is composed of the saints, or holy ones, with their superintendents and administrators. Such a flock of God is complete as to organization. This does not necessarily imply that all of the saints will have attained to the same spiritual stature. In such a colony there will be babes in understanding, as well as mature ones. Neither does it imply that all of the superintendents and administrators will be equally gifted or talented in every department of spiritual life. But the colony is complete in that it has all of the parts designated by heaven to fulfill the purpose of the absent King. All that needs to be done in furthering His work in a colony can be done, and if well-pleasing unto Him, must be done, within this structural organization. To tamper with it, alter, amend, or otherwise recast it, is to interpose human wisdom over that which is divine, and is an act of rebellion. He who seeks to plant a colony of heaven today must conform to the simple organizational structure of the one to which Paul wrote at Philippi.

The Prayer of a Prisoner (1:3-11)

Contents

> I thank my God in all my remembrance of you, always in every prayer of mine for you all making my prayer with joy, thankful for your partnership in the gospel from the first day until now. And I am sure that he who began a good work in you will bring it to completion at the day of Jesus Christ. It is right for me to feel thus about you all, because I hold you in my heart, for you are all partakers with me of grace, both in my imprisonment and in the defense and confirmation of the gospel. For God is my witness, how I yearn for you all with the affection of Christ Jesus. And it is my prayer that your love may abound more and more, with knowledge and all discernment, so that you may approve what is excellent, and may be pure and blameless for the day of Christ, filled with the fruits of righteousness, which come through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God.

A remarkable feature of the entire letter is its testimony to the attitude of the writer toward the circumstances in which he was placed. After he had been mobbed, beaten, shipwrecked, and finally committed to prison, he still finds much for which to be thankful. He regards those things which happened to him as keys which unlock a door opening into a realm of greater service. His letter abounds with expressions of joy and thanksgiving. The bonds of the flesh cannot fetter the triumphant spirit. The mind, unconfined by prison walls, soars away to former fields of labor, and the blessed factor of retentiveness allows the prisoner to stand again among those he loves.

Remembrance is from a Greek word meaning recollection. The mind collects again the impressions of the past, and out of them forms a mental image for the present. Such recollections may be stimulated by a letter, a friend, or even casual mention of a place or person. Upon every occasion when the apostle thought of Philippi, he expressed gratitude to God. He was always filled with thanksgiving in their behalf.

Prayer is an expression of the desire of the heart, a pouring out of the inmost feelings unto God. Like religion itself, it arises from a sense of dependency. The apostle labors to show the intensity of his feeling in behalf of the Philippians by assuring them he always remembers them in every prayer. The initial convert in that city was made at "the place where prayer was wont to be made." No doubt, the Community had often heard the voice of the apostle raised in their behalf. It was reassuring to know that he still bore their names before the throne of grace every time he voiced a petition to the absent King. His prayers were not blanket appeals for the Community as a whole, but were for every person in it, as evidenced by the expression "for you all." Despite his circumstances and suffering, the apostle regularly found time to pray, and he also took the time to mention the brethren who were so dear unto him. He did not forget the colony he had planted while absent from the brethren who composed it.

One source of thanksgiving was their consistent partnership in the gospel. The word partnership is from the same original word generally translated "fellowship." It means "joint participation." It is sometimes applied to a benefaction, or sharing with those who are in need, and is even rendered "contribution." While the idea of money is not in the original word, this constitutes one means of demonstrating fellowship. It is possible that the apostle so uses the word here. In chapter 4, verse 15, he points out that "in the beginning of the gospel when I left Macedonia, no church entered into partnership with me in giving and receiving, except you only." The word partnership is identical in both passages. The expression "from the first day" corresponds with the term "in the beginning of the gospel," both of these relating to the introduction of the gospel by the apostle into that section of the European continent. Moreover, the letter under review is primarily a letter of thanks to the Community at Philippi for the gifts brought by Epaphroditus. The joy of the apostle was not occasioned by the money, but by the spirit and motive which prompted the gift. He says, "Not that I seek the gift; but I seek the fruit which increases to your credit." Fellowship is a state or condition to which we are called. The sharing of our means with the needy is one expression of that inward consciousness.

The liberality of the saints at Philippi is worthy of remark. It began with their introduction to the Good News. Immediately upon being made recipients of the bounty of heaven, they began to share their physical and material bounty with those worthy ones who had sacrificed so much to share the spiritual things with them. Their giving was not sporadic, nor upon impulse. It was consistent and regular. They sent "once and again" when Paul was at Thessalonica. They did not forget him when he was out of sight. They shared his needs "from the first day until now." Those who help bear the burdens of men who make sacrifices to proclaim the Word to those who have never heard it before have "partnership in the gospel." They are partners with God and Christ, as well as with the instruments through whom the divine message is declared to a sinful world.

The circulation of the Good News is the work of God. The divine purpose is accomplished through human agency. It is only when men realize they are in partnership with God that their lives cease to be a matter of trivial existence, and they live above themselves. It was God who began a good work in Philippi. His first emissaries were summoned from Troas as the result of a vision. As each person whose life was touched enlisted under the gospel banner, he became a sharer in the work of God. The fruit of that work now reached Paul in Rome, as he had once reached Philippi, to share with them. He expresses his firm conviction that God will perfect His work at the day of Jesus Christ. The word sure is from an original which means to be fully persuaded or positively convinced. There is no doubt in the heart of Paul, but what the purpose of God will some day be perfected. This does not imply that the human agents will always remain faithful. They may leave their first love, and desert the work. But the failure of men will not frustrate the plan of God. However, the apostle manifests confidence in the integrity of the saints to whom he writes.

His feeling for them was not a passing one. It was not engendered by the gifts which Epaphroditus brought, nor was it an emotional upsurge produced by the demonstration of their care for him. He had long since "learned the secret of facing plenty and hunger, abundance and want" (4:12). His attitude was not the result of holding their money in his hand, but of holding them in his heart. The feeling of many preachers toward a Community of saints fluctuates in proportion to the support received. The motto of the apostle was, "I will not be a burden, for I seek not what is yours, but you." The very essence of the spiritual life is sharing. The apostle shared the Good News with the Philippians when they were in dire need of salvation; they shared with him when in danger of starvation. Their willingness made them partakers, or sharers, of grace.

The extent of the participation of the Community at Philippi in the labors of Paul is evidenced by his expression "both in my imprisonment and in the defense and confirmation of the gospel." They did not forget him when he was no longer able to visit them because of prison bonds. This very letter was evoked by their ministration to his needs while in prison. They obeyed the injunction, "Remember those who are in prison as though in prison with them" (Heb. 13:3). Defense is from an original which has come into our language as "apology." It refers to a speech made in defense. It is possible the allusion here is to his first appearance before Nero, when all who were with him in Rome deserted him, and no one took his part (2 Tim. 4:16). Perhaps these Philippians conveyed word to him during this crisis that they stood with him, and their confidence in him was unabated. Suffice it to say that from the very beginning of their spiritual relationship, the apostle and the colony he planted had continued in a spirit of mutual love and concern.

The intensity of his longing to see them is shown by the fact that he calls God to witness to it. Such yearning is within the heart, and is not visible unto men. Only God, who searches the hearts of men, can testify to the reality, or genuineness, of the desire which wells up within. The affection of Jesus for mankind is the greatest demonstration of sympathy, compassion, and understanding. It is the ultimate, or maximum degree of affection, which is willing to sacrifice everything in behalf of its object. It was possible for the apostle to reproduce that love, for he testified, "I have been crucified with Christ, it is no longer I who live, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal. 2:20). One cannot exhibit the love of Christ who has not lost his own life in the life of Christ.

We are fortunate indeed to have preserved for our study and spiritual growth the prayer of the prisoner of God for the people of God. We can be certain that the things for which Paul prayed are those which should characterize every Community of saints. If these thing's become a part of the life of a congregation, it will meet the approval of God. We have a criterion provided by which to measure our own attainments. A close scrutiny will reveal four great objectives for the Christian community.

1. Increase of love, coupled with knowledge and discernment.

2. Development of the ability to approve what is excellent.

3. Cultivation of purity of life and blameless character.

4. Production of the fruits of righteousness in abundant supply.

This prayer is as important for what it omits as for what it includes. It provides a decided contrast with our modern means of measuring the success of a congregation. In our confused sense of values and perverted emphasis upon the material, we are inclined to judge strength by the number in attendance, the amount of money contributed, or the size and furnishings of a physical plant. Yet all of these may be present, and the four qualities enumerated be almost wholly lacking. On the other hand, history attests that when the Good News had to be circulated by an underground movement, harassed and bounded into catacombs and caves, it was these characteristics which gave it strength and enabled it to triumph. It may be that the Community is decadent to the exact proportion of its emphasis upon the externals, and strong only to the extent of its emphasis upon the cultivation of the spirit. It will do us good to analyze the items in this prayer and try to fathom what we should be.

The life in Christ is to be one of constant and steady growth. In relationship to God and each other, members of the spiritual body are to develop a deeper sense of trust and regard as each day goes by. This requires an increase of love. Love is a responsive action. We love because He first loved us (1 John 4:19), not "We love him because he first loved us," as the Authorized Version renders it. We would not have known love except as it was manifested unto us. When we love, we set in motion an invisible current that becomes greater as it touches new lives and calls out the love which has been dormant within.

Love is of God. "He who does not love does not know God, for God is love" (1 John 4:8). "If we love one another, God abides in us and his love is perfected in us" (1 John 4:12). The royal law, that is, the king of all laws is, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (James 2:8). To know how to love others as we do ourselves, we must first learn how to love ourselves. To do this, we must have a proper sense of values. We must see ourselves as God sees us. God so loved the world He gave His only begotten Son. That indicates the worth of the individual. On this same basis we should evaluate others as objects of our love and mercy.

It requires much training and self-discipline to grow to maturity in love. We tend to be selfish. We want to love only those who love us. But to be children of the Father in heaven we must love our enemies, even those who hate us (Matt. 5:44, 45). We do not attain this state of love at once. Our love must be nurtured and encouraged until it increases more and more. Gradually we will become unselfish and universal in our affection. It is essential that love be accompanied by knowledge. It should not be a sickly sentimentality, but an intelligent demonstration of genuine affection. The word discernment implies ability to discriminate, or to judge properly. We need to acquire a good sense of the relative value of things. It is possible to lavish attention and care upon the trivial and unimportant, and neglect weightier and more deserving matters. Our love should be regulated by a proper sense of fitness and right.

The expression, "that you may approve what is excellent," is interesting and worthy of study. Approve is from a word related primarily to metals, and has to do with the testing or assaying of ores or metals to determine their nature, purity, or value. An example is found in Proverbs 17:3, "The crucible is for silver, and the furnace is for gold, and the Lord tries the hearts." The Lord has a standard by which hearts are tested for dross, as silver and gold are tested. The Septuagint Version uses the same word for tries in the passage, as it is translated "approve" in the one before us.

Excellent is from a word which means to differ. It is used in 1 Corinthians 15:41, "For star differs from star in glory." The sense of the language under consideration is a prayer that the Community of saints may be able to test or try all things, and make proper distinctions. This is an attribute of maturity in an individual or a congregation (Heb. 5:14). Perhaps no ability is more needed in the decadent Christian world of today than to separate the trivial from the worthwhile, the essential from that which is incidental, the primary values from those which are secondary. Even in the matter of spiritual vocabulary, great harm has been done in the loss of distinction in certain terms.

The ideal of character is found in the two words pure and blameless. Character is not a gift, but a growth. It is cultivated, not bestowed. The exact form of the original for pure is found only here and in 2 Peter 3:1, where it is applied to a sincere mind. Literally, it refers to that which is inspected in the sunshine. Many ancient bazaars were dark, and buyers took the fabrics or articles for sale outside where they could examine or scrutinize them in the full light of the sun. The word came to mean that which had no hidden flaws or concealed defects, that which was free of all impurities.

The word sincere is from the Latin sine cera, which literally means "without wax." It was first applied to strained honey, which was transparent and clear when viewed in the sunlight. Later, the term was given a special significance. Sculptors in marble often sought to conceal the cracks in the stone by rubbing tinted wax in the tiny crevices. The inspectors would carefully examine the work of art, and if no such tactics had been employed, they would stamp it "sine cera." In its application to Christian character it refers to those whose lives do not have hidden faults that are glossed over. They are free from hypocrisy, deceit and trickery. Such persons have no hesitancy in being examined in the full glare of sunlight. They will meet the test when scrutinized and investigated.

Blameless is from an original which means "void of offence." It refers to one who does not stumble himself, and who does not place a stumbling block in the way of others. The blameless individual does no injury to another. He guards and disciplines his life until he is free from offense in word or deed. He does not violate the rights of others, nor wound them in any manner.

In his mention of the fruits of righteousness, the apostle specifies the origin, motive, and quantity of these fruits required of the saints. These come through Jesus Christ, that is, it is through our relationship to the Christ and by the indwelling Spirit such gifts are produced. By adoption of His teachings, by following His example, and by walking in the light as He is in the light, our lives are made to overflow with an abundance of the fruits of the Spirit. The liberality of the Community at Philippi was one of the fruits of righteousness (chapter 4:17).

Such fruits are not to be borne for personal glory or the approbation of men, but to the glory and praise of God. We honor God when we live enriched lives, filled with service and sacrifice for others. It is not enough to draw near with our lips, nor to merely honor Him with our mouths. Our whole existence must be devoted to the promotion of His cause. We are fortunate in being able to determine what the colony of heaven should be like, and we should strive to fulfill the expressions of desire in this prayer to the Father.

Ambassador in Bonds (1:12-14)

Contents

> I want you to know, brethren, that what has happened to me has really served to advance the gospel, so that it has become known throughout the whole praetorian guard and to all the rest that my imprisonment is for Christ; and most of the brethren have been made confident in the Lord because of my imprisonment, and are much more bold to speak the word of God without fear.

This brief paragraph in the letter was inserted to reassure the Community at Philippi that the imprisoned apostle regarded his present state as a providential arrangement for advance of the Good News. When the prison doors closed, a door of opportunity was opened. It affords an insight into the philosophy of the ambassador for Jesus, who could regard suffering, hardship, and cruel treatment as rungs in a ladder, by which he could climb to greater heights. This philosophy not only guaranteed that he would find contentment in whatever state was imposed upon him, but it serves to strengthen and bolster the faith of many who would be made to ponder the reason why such a man of faith would be subjected to such indignities. When a prison cell is made a center for dissemination of the Good News, it little matters that the doors and windows are barred.

The ambassador had long coveted the hope of visiting Rome. He wrote to the saints there, "I have longed for many years to come to you" (Rom. 15:23). He had planned to stop "and enjoy their company a little" (verse 24) on his way to Spain. Before he could do that he had to go first to Jerusalem on a mission of compassion, carrying the gifts from the Gentile Communities to the needy saints in Jerusalem and Judea. On that trip he was arrested, and after having been made the victim of political aspirants for many months, he was sent to Rome as a ward of the government. His coming was not as he had planned or hoped, yet the very means employed gave him access to hearts in the city which he could not have reached as a free man.

The word advance is seen to be a military term in ancient communications, as are so many words associated with Rome in the days of the empire. When the Roman legions were engaged in extending their conquest to other parts of the world, they frequently had to go through trackless forests and jungles. A special corps of trained woodsmen preceded them, clearing a path for the marching men. These woodchoppers were dexterous and skilled in making roads for army travel. The word translated advanced in our text is applied to these. The ambassador in bonds regarded his arrest, imprisonment, shipwreck, and all that he had endured, as the woodchoppers of God going ahead to prepare the way for the coming of the Good News.

Although it might be expected that the detention of a Jew who was looked upon as a leader in a small sect called "The Nazarenes," and who was from a remote province would occasion no special notice in the city of the Caesars, it was not so in this case. The whole praetorium knew about the prisoner, and knew why he was there in bonds. There has been a great deal of controversy in years past as to the meaning of the "praetorium." This is important as bearing upon the extent of the Christian influence in Rome through the efforts of the apostle. Our translators have rendered the term as "the whole praetorium guard," and we are inclined to accept this as correct.

The apostle was probably kept in confinement in the quarters of the Castra Peregrinorum, the barracks of the itinerant soldiers. He was forced to pay for these quarters in which he was constantly chained to a guard. As each guard fulfilled his time with the prisoner, he was relieved by a successor. By this means, in a few months, the majority of the guardsmen would have become literally attached to the person of the prisoner, and would have learned the reason for his detention. During the period of his confinement the apostle was visited by various ones of the saints who sought to provide for his comfort and welfare. Members of the guard who were present at all of the conferences between Paul and the brethren would gather considerable information relating to the charges against him, and such information would be augmented by their personal conversation with the ambassador chained to them.

The guardsmen were fully aware of the underground movement of the fanatical Jewish zealots who constantly sought to incite revolt in all of the provinces, but contact with Paul had convinced them that "the sect of the Nazarenes" was not a part of that movement, and that he was a victim of the prejudice of the Jerusalem hierarchy; a religious, rather than a political prisoner. Even prison guards sympathize with one unjustly incarcerated, and this very attitude created a favorable atmosphere for instruction concerning the Christ.

Imbued with a love for souls which transcended all bounds of nationality, the apostle told the story of the cross, and this message formed the basis of discussion in the barracks, so that it was soon common knowledge that the Jew of Tarsus was imprisoned, not for treason or other crime against the state, but because of his personal conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah of God. The circulation of this knowledge was advantageous to Paul. It was so wide, indeed, that not only the praetorian guard, but all the rest knew of his innocency. It is not assuming too much to apply that phrase to the city as a whole.

The providence which destined that Paul should arrive in Rome in chains had so worked as to use those very shackles to gain for him a greater audience than he would have had if he came freely of his own will. We are inclined to listen with greater sympathy to the plea of one who is a victim of some great injustice. In view of this manifestation of the outworking of God's grace, the prisoner could truthfully say, "What has happened to me has really served to advance the gospel."

Another factor, occasioned by his imprisonment, also implemented the spread of the Good News. "Most of the brethren have been made confident in the Lord because of my imprisonment, and are much more bold to speak the word of God without fear." There are many ways in which the imprisonment of the apostle could have inspired greater zeal and confidence among members of the Community in Rome. The fact that the tide of popular sentiment was running in sympathetic acknowledgment of the injustice he was enduring would enable the brethren to find listening ears attuned to any information concerning the Christ in whom Paul believed. It is not inconceivable that many Roman citizens who previously ignored, with contempt, those in Rome who believed in Jesus, now sought them out to question them about the grounds for their faith.

It must not be forgotten, that so far as history records, this was the first time an apostle of the Christ had been in Rome. Previously, those who proclaimed Jesus would be regarded as importing a foreign faith based upon the testimony of others. Now there was in the city a prisoner who had seen the Christ and talked with Him after He had been crucified by the consent of a Roman procurator. The fact that their declaration could be sustained by a witness who was empowered by the Holy Spirit was enough to encourage those who were reticent before to take the Message to all who would hear.

The presence of Paul served also to encourage the fainthearted ones by their frequent visits with him. We are inspired to greater heights of devotion when we see another who suffers valiantly for a cause. The apostle never wasted an opportunity to stimulate those whose zeal was flagging, or whose courage was waning. A firm exponent of the priesthood of all believers, he sought to employ every gift possessed by men to advance the glory of God and enforce the truth of heaven. Surely no visitor ever left his presence without renewing his determination to do more for the Savior, regardless of the consequences or suffering entailed. In the midst of a crooked and stubborn nation, the saints now had an example to whom they could point as an illustration of the Spirit. The Roman world needed some sustaining force. The people, jaded and discontented, would find in "the faith once delivered to the saints" the hope of a brighter day and a better world.

It is probable that when Paul first stood before Nero, the brethren in Rome expected an immediate sentence of execution. In any event, they refused to be identified with him, and made no attempt to assist him. He later wrote, "At my first defense no one took my part; all deserted me. May it not be charged against them" (2 Tim. 4:16). But God had additional work for Paul to do. If Nero had ordered his death, some of the most powerful epistles in the new covenant canon would never have been written. Thus he writes, "But the Lord stood by me and gave me strength to proclaim the word fully, that all the Gentiles might hear it. So I was rescued from the lion's mouth" (verse 17). This last expression was proverbial among the Jews for tyrants and despotic rulers, based on Psalm 22:21, and is employed by Josephus to designate Tiberius. We can be sure that it here refers to Nero.

The fact that Paul was spared the sentence of death, and allowed to live in a rented apartment from which the Good News was circulated, emboldened the frightened brethren. Paul wrote from prison asking the saints to pray "also for me, that utterance may be given me in opening my mouth boldly to proclaim the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in chains; that I may declare it boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. 6:19, 20). This attitude affected the saints in the city until they too were "much more bold to speak the word of God without fear."

We can hardly appreciate the full impact upon the colony of heaven in the Roman colony of Philippi, when they learned that the Good News was being so freely dispensed in the capital of the Empire. Everything which transpired in the seat of government on the Tiber would affect the remote colonial outposts. The ambassador in chains knew what rejoicing would be occasioned by the information he penned, and he wrote the more cheerfully and gladly, in anticipation of the result of his letter upon the hearts of those whom he loved.

Christ Is Proclaimed (1:15-18)

Contents

> Some indeed preach Christ from envy and rivalry, but others from good will. The latter do it out of love, knowing that I am put here for the defense of the gospel; the former proclaim Christ out of partisanship, not sincerely but thinking to afflict me in my imprisonment. What then? Only that in every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and in that I rejoice.

The Good News proclaimed to the world concerned a person. It was not a message about an organization, a system, or a plan, but about a man, Jesus the Christ. Unfortunately, not all who proclaimed the Christ acted from proper motives. There were some whose purpose was ulterior. These latter carried on their work in a spirit of envy and factionalism. We are not informed as to who these were who made the lot of Paul harder to bear, but it could well be that they were the Judaistic teachers who everywhere else were his opponents. The circumcision party was especially resentful toward Paul because he had freely taken the Good News to the Gentiles. Members of this faction dogged his steps, and it would not be surprising to find them at Rome. They were envious of the fact that Paul had personally seen the Christ on the Damascus highway, and of the success which attended his efforts. They were interested only in building up a powerful pressure group, and labored diligently to enlarge their party. In view of the fact that a warning is issued in this letter to the Community at Philippi to "look out for those who mutilate the flesh," and assurance is given that "we are the true circumcision which worship God in the Spirit, and glory in Christ Jesus, and put no confidence in the flesh," we may be sure the apostle was still aware of the workings of this powerful sect.

The information which filtered through to Paul encouraged him, for there were many who proclaimed the Good News from an attitude of good will. They loved and respected the ambassador to the Gentiles, they knew of his sacrifice and labor to convince the Gentiles that they could be "fellow-heirs, members of the same body, and partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 3:6). Now that he was personally restrained by his chains, they undertook to further his aim, by taking the message to all who would hear. It is declared that they acted out of love. They did not ignore the presence of the prisoner among them, and they were not embarrassed by his bonds. Regardless of the false accusations of others, they did not regard him as a betrayer of Judaism, but as an exponent of the idea that Judaism only reached its climax and culmination in the Nazarene. With a proper evaluation of his convictions, and with respect for the intensity of his purpose, they identified themselves with him, and took advantage of his presence in the city to advance the cause.

We have, in this brief paragraph, a contrast between the partisan and non-partisan spirit. The zealous advocates of circumcision had actually created a party among the believers. "So when Peter went up to Jerusalem, the circumcision party criticized him" (Acts 11:2). Their creed was, "Unless you are circumcised according to the custom of Moses, you cannot be saved" (Acts 15:1). As they viewed it, before one became a Christian he had to first become a Jew. It was the mark on the flesh and not the faith in the heart which was a sign of covenant relationship. These acknowledged Jesus as the Messiah, and proclaimed Him as such. But they called attention to the fact that Jesus was Himself circumcised on the eighth day. They urged His conformity to the law as a pattern for those who acknowledged his Messianic claims. Their vision of the scope of God's mercy was limited by legalism of the most pronounced sort.

Thus, the apostle says, "They proclaim Christ out of partisanship, not sincerely but thinking to afflict me in my imprisonment" (Phil. 1:17). He did not deny that they proclaimed Christ. He did assess the motive behind it and deplored the insincerity in which they acted. This is proof that men may present the truth and be hypocritical while doing so. The bitterest partisan can proclaim Christ, and many do, forgetting that they belong to Christ and imagining that He belongs to them. Those of whom Paul wrote, knowing that he was not free to refute them in public, doubled their efforts to proclaim Christ and to warp the thinking of the believers after their partisan code. They knew that such perverting of their hearers would serve as a burden upon the heart of the apostle during his period of forced confinement and helplessness.

The apostle, however, rose above the party spirit. He acknowledged truth wherever he observed it, and knew it was no less the truth although proclaimed by an unworthy or unscrupulous person. The party spirit cannot rejoice in the achievement or accomplishment of any good by one outside the faction. It finds nothing to commend in anyone except its own adherents. Paul rejoiced, not in the pretence or hypocrisy of the preachers. He did not condone their behavior nor justify their character. He knew there were some who learned about Jesus by listening to these men, and he rejoiced in the message, not in the messenger. His example, if followed today, would eliminate much of the jealousy, envy and rivalry in the religious realm.

Expectation and Hope (1:19-26)

Contents

> Yes, and I shall rejoice. For I know that through your prayers and the help of the Spirit of Jesus Christ this will turn out for my deliverance, as it is my eager expectation and hope that I shall not be at all ashamed, but that with full courage now as always Christ will be honored in my body, whether by life or by death. For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. If it is to be life in the flesh, that means fruitful labor for me. Yet which I shall choose I cannot tell. I am hard pressed between the two. My desire is to depart and be with Christ, for that is far better. But to remain in the flesh is more necessary on your account. Convinced of this, I know that I shall remain and continue with you all, for your progress and joy in the faith, so that in me you may have ample cause to glory in Christ Jesus, because of my coming to you again.

The student of this letter of thanksgiving must be aware of the exuberant gladness which surges through it. On every hand, and at every time, we encounter the words "joy" and "rejoice." It is difficult to remember that it is written from prison, but it serves to emphasize that, in the Christ, hearts may be free while hands are shackled. It was the invisible cord which bound him to the Lord as a slave, and not the manacles which bound him to his guard as a prisoner, that Paul noticed.

He relied upon the prayers of the saints and the help of the Spirit to effect his deliverance. The tenor of the letter indicates this refers to his liberation at his forthcoming trial, and not to his spiritual salvation. He had been given a preliminary hearing in Caesar's court, and had been held in custody. Perhaps his accusers among the Jews at Jerusalem did not make the long journey to Rome to press their charges against him. Those who hired lawyers to present their case before procurators may well have become convinced that their accusations would seem like childish superstition to the emperor. Prejudice could not be aroused against a Nazarene in Rome as easily as it could be in Palestine. Many months had drifted by with the apostle still retained in chains. Now another hearing was imminent. While he did not know what the outcome would be, he was optimistic. At his first hearing all deserted him. No one appeared in his behalf. Now there were several who had been emboldened by his own spirit to defend him as innocent of any crime against the people.

The chief concern of the apostle was that he might face any eventuality with heroic courage. He was eagerly expectant and hopeful that he would not be ashamed when confronted with those who held the power of life and death in the empire. Others had recanted their faith in Jesus and denied Him under like circumstances. Paul wanted to do nothing which would grieve his own conscience or weaken the force of his testimony. There was more than a human life at stake. The envoy of the Lord considered himself expendable. The witness for Jesus was above every other consideration. The essential thing was that Jesus receive honor, and whether it was accorded by his life or death was not the thing that really counted.

It is in this touching passage that the Christian philosophy of life and death shines forth in its real glory. "To live is Christ." If his frail lease on life was extended, it meant just one thing. Paul would not use such an extension to acquaint himself with the wisdom of the philosophers, nor excel in earthly knowledge. He would not devote his energy to amassing wealth or accumulating treasure here below. He would not engage in pursuit of vain pleasure, or drain the dregs of the cup of dissipation in one last fling. The singleness of purpose, the unified plan of existence, is seen in the fact that the center and circumference of the life of the saint was summed up in one word— Christ! Christ is life, so life is Christ. There is no life out of Christ, and in Christ is the sum of life.

"To die is gain." These four words challenge the worldly man. The concept they portray is counter to his every thought. To him gain is his end in life; to Paul the end of his life was gain. We associate loss with death, with the apostle the opposite was the case. Gain is from a word which means "advantage" and to Paul there were certain advantages which would accrue from death. It would enable him to realize a desire to "complete what was lacking in Christ's afflictions for the sake of his body" (Col. 1:24). He would be free from further insults, hardships, persecutions, and calamities (1 Cor. 12:10). He would no longer be subjected to temptations. There would be no more danger of betrayal by false brethren. The dread of death itself would no longer confront him, for the conquest of this enemy at the last disputed barricade would mean permanent triumph and final victory. Death brings release from those ills to which the flesh is heir.

If the verdict resulted in liberation, the apostle planned no life of retirement or rest. He desired only to be back in the thick of the fight. There were other places where the Good News had not been heralded. There were men who had not yet heard the story of the cross. Communities needed to be strengthened and confirmed, problems needed to be met and answered. Life meant new adventures in the service of the King. Each day would be filled with fruitful labor and rewarding toil.

The thought occurred to the apostle that if he were granted the right to determine his own course, he would not be able to choose easily and quickly. He was torn between conflicting desires. The original language at this point is beautiful. It is nautical in nature, and portrays a ship in a harbor with sails spread, and a wind blowing out toward the sea. The vessel is tugging at the hawser which holds it attached to the wharf. It eagerly awaits the time when the anchor is lifted and the journey can begin. Paul was desirous of putting out to sea. He wanted to embark on the journey from which there is no return to this fleshly bourne. But he was still anchored in the harbor. He felt it would be better for him personally if he could be on his way. If his life continued, however, it would be to the profit of the colonies of heaven.

The saints among whom he had labored would be enriched by the experience of seeing him again; those who had faithfully served would be encouraged to press on, those who had become weary and faint would be given strength to resume their tasks. New areas would be opened up, the truth would penetrate to remote regions. There was a great deal yet to be done, and being convinced of this fact, the apostle felt that his life span would not be summarily ended. He was filled with plans for visits among the Communities he had planted. He was stimulated by the thought that he could assist in their further growth and progress.

Citizenship in the Colony (1:27-30)

Contents

> Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I come and see you or am absent, I may hear of you that you stand firm in one spirit, with one mind striving side by side for the faith of the gospel, and not frightened in anything by your opponents. This is a clear omen to them of their destruction, but of your salvation, and that from God. For it has been granted to you that for the sake of Christ you should not only believe in him but also suffer for his sake, engaged in the same conflict which you saw and now hear to be mine.

The original term rendered "manner of life" is of special importance in view of the title of this book and the nature of the Community of saints which received the letter from Paul. It is the word from which we get our English terms "polity" and "politics." In classical Greek it had to do with citizenship, and with the making and administration of laws. From this, it came to do with the proper conduct of a citizen, signifying one who familiarized himself with the laws and statutes, lived in conformity therewith, and insisted upon proper reverence for the code as essential to the maintenance of social welfare and community spirit.

In a Roman colony, such as Philippi, there was great pride in and constant awareness of the implications of citizenship. The population was divided into two classes. These were called Cives and Peregrini. The first word means "citizens." From it we get our words "civic" and "civilian." The second means "strangers," or literally, "wanderers or displaced persons." These last were permitted to dwell in the city, but they were not Romans and were not accorded the blessings accruing to citizens.

It must be recalled that, in a Roman colony, the people sought to reproduce in an alien world the greatness and majesty of Rome. The citizens were subject to the Roman law, and this code of jurisprudence was administered by Roman officials. Reports of proceedings were transmitted to Rome, and there the records were kept. All matters pertaining to legal affairs were conducted in the Latin language, and all of the citizens were officially enrolled by name in the great capital city of the earth. Although each colony had its own supervisors and administrators, the final judgment rested with the distant emperor, who was frequently worshiped and revered as a god.

Those who were reared in such an environment, and had now been made citizens of a colony of heaven, would immediately understand the import of Paul's admonition, "Let your citizenship be worthy of the Good News of the Christ." They, too, had been planted amidst strangers. Sinners are displaced persons, for sin removes one from his proper place and standing. Here, the citizens of the universal kingdom of the Messiah were to reproduce their capital city, the New Jerusalem, in miniature. They were not legislators, or lawmakers, but were subject to the law and principles conveyed to them by an absent King through chosen envoys, the apostles and prophets. They were all firstborn ones whose names were enrolled in heaven, and whose citizenship was on record in the city of the Great King (Heb. 12:23).

They were to speak the language of heaven, holding fast the form of sound words, employing sound speech that cannot be condemned. (Titus 2:8). Each colony of heaven had its own supervisors and administrators (bishops and deacons), but these were not supreme in their own right. The final judgment would be rendered by the King Himself, and from it there would be no appeal. With such a background, the Community of Philippi would regard with greatest interest a communication from the ambassador of heaven who planted the colony originally. Such is the letter we are now studying, and without knowledge of the circumstances involved, the casual modern reader, unfamiliar with colonial status, might miss a great deal of real value.

The "ambassador in chains" (Eph. 6:20) was not certain if he could again visit the colony at Philippi, but his anxiety was that whether present or absent, the reports conveyed to him might be favorable. Recognizing that the ultimate success of any colonial project is dependent upon two factors, viz., maintenance of proper relationship with the king and unity of the distant subjects, the imprisoned envoy was desirous of hearing that the citizens stood firm in one spirit, and strove side by side for the faith of the Good News with one mind. It is easy to see how essential were these things. Firmness, unity and service of all the citizenry in the cause of the King are basic needs in every colony.

It is lack of these things which today threatens the colonial system of heaven in an alien world. The citizenry is all too frequently composed of those who propose to have their own way, regardless of the will of the absent Sovereign. There is disrespect and irreverence for His law. Citizenship is nominal, rather than real or genuine. Men become citizens for selfish reasons and for social gain. There is extant the dangerous philosophy that it makes no difference what one believes. The distinction between citizens and strangers has been broken or watered down. No longer do the citizens stand together. They are torn into bickering, fighting factions. They strive face to face, rather than side by side. The clash of creeds, the din of human opinions, and the noise of jarring philosophies drown out the faith of the Good News. The "sound speech that cannot be condemned" is shouted down by "wild tongues that hold not Thee in awe." The greatest task confronting servants of God in these days is the restoration of the colonial aspect to the communities of saints. Unless we can recapture that concept and be tied together by the invisible cord which links us all to our capital city, we will present to the world a tragic picture of sectarian strife and clash of partisan forces, hewing each other to pieces in the name of the very King we profess to honor.

Every colony of heaven will have opponents. The apostle was aware of the opposition at Philippi. He was not so much concerned that such opponents existed, for that was to be expected. It was the attitude toward the opposition which chiefly concerned him. The colonists of God were not to be frightened in anything by their adversaries. Fear of hostile forces could only do injury to the citizens. It would influence them to value life above the cause of Jesus. They would shrink from responsibility because of physical suffering, and thus lose their hope of eternal reward. Furthermore, fear reflected a lack of faith. It was unbecoming to those who professed an abiding trust in God. It was indicative of weakness.

The courage manifested in the face of threats, the refusal to engage in retaliation, the calm endurance of persecution coupled with rejoicing, these presented the heathen with a problem which they could not solve. They knew the language of force. They understood how to meet sword with sword, but they could not vanquish faith with the sword. It was a shield which no spear could cleave and no dart pierce. Such a manifestation of confidence in the power of God was to them an indication of their ultimate destruction by a power superior to their own, even as they were forced to admit that no power of theirs could wrest from the saints their hope of glory and salvation.

The language used in this connection indicates that the apostle looked upon the conflict of life from the standpoint of the gladiatorial arena. The saint is observed by a world of spectators. He is exhorted to stand firm, to hold his ground in the face of the enemy, exhibiting no fear or sign of tremor. The righteous combatant does not look to the spectators for the sign which indicates that life is to be taken or spared. The token of his salvation and the destruction of his antagonists is from God. The highest indication of acceptance and recognition by the Lord is found in the fact that the saint is elected to demonstrate his faith by suffering for the sake of Christ.

The Community at Philippi shared in the conflict which Paul endured. The word conflict is from a term which meant to engage in gymnastic games, to fight, to participate in gladiatorial combat. Our English word "agonize" is derived from it. It is used in 1 Timothy 6:12, "Fight the good fight of faith," and in 2 Timothy 4:7, "I have fought the good fight." The saints at Philippi knew of the persecution Paul had endured in their city. He alludes to it in 1 Thessalonians 2:2, "Though we had already suffered and been shamefully treated at Philippi, as you know." He declares that he had courage to declare the Good News "in the face of great opposition." This last word is from the same original as "conflict" in the present passage. Like all true soldiers, the saints were to stand side by side, fearless and undaunted, with firm conviction that the battle would end in victory through Jesus, for this was their faith in the Good News.

Unity in the Community (2:1-4)

Contents

> So if there is any encouragement in Christ, any incentive of love, any participation in the Spirit, any affection and sympathy, complete my joy by being of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind. Do nothing from selfishness or conceit, but in humility count others better than yourselves. Let each of you look not only to his own interests, but also to the interests of others.

In 1:3 the envoy of the Christ speaks of the joy which accompanies his prayers in behalf of the colony of saints at Philippi. In 1:27 he exhorts them to stand firm in one spirit, with one mind striving side by side for the faith of the gospel. In the paragraph now under consideration he affirms that his joy will be complete if such unity as he has described is maintained. In order to enforce his admonition to harmony within the Community, he presents four facts which support the appeal and lend strength to it.

The word "if" as used here does not imply doubt or raise a question. In the Greek it refers to a condition which has been demonstrated to be a fact, one that has been fulfilled, and can thus be recognized as certain or sure. It could be translated "in view of the fact," and do no injury to the use made of it by the Holy Spirit. The first fact, then, which should incite to unity is the encouragement in Christ. Jesus was an embodiment of that spirit which produces oneness. In His relationship with the Father, He could say, "I and my Father are one." To this fellowship all who obey Him are called, so that John could write, "Our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ."

Those who share in this spiritual communion should be impelled by the example and instruction of Jesus to cherish and nourish it. He is a traitor indeed who would prove to be disruptive and a disturbing factor to the peace and tranquility which ought to prevail under the orderly and benign sway of the Prince of Peace. The encouragement of Jesus is a vital contribution to the development of those who believe in Him.

The second fact is the incentive of love. The word "incentive" is from an original, which implies a word which appears to stand beside one for the purpose of stimulating him in a resolution, or to encourage him in a chosen pursuit or project. There is an indication of gentle, but firm, persuasiveness implied. It is possible that the love here under consideration is not that which we have for each other, although this is an essential ingredient of unity, but the love of God for us. That love acts as a firm tugging or drawing power, bringing us closer to each other by drawing us unto Him as a common center. "So we know and believe the love God has for us. God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him" (1 John 4:16). "We love, because he first loved us . . . And this commandment we have from him, that he who loves God, should love his brother also" (1 John 4:19, 21).

God's love for man was not conditioned upon a state of perfection in the latter, for "God shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). This furnishes us an incentive toward unity in spite of differences in temperament, variations in opinions, and personal shortcomings. If God could love us all in spite of our failings and failures, we can be longsuffering and forbearing toward others, patiently helping and strengthening them, working for their good and for the ultimate glory of God.

The third point of consideration is the participation in the Spirit. The Greek word for "participation" is the one generally rendered "fellowship." No truth is more convincingly stated in the revelation of God, than that of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of every saint, and the unity to which the apostle exhorts will more likely result from a recognition of this fact than from any other source. Indeed, the argument for one body is strengthened by this consideration. "For just as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, though many, are one body, so it is with Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body, Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:12, 13).

Jesus promised that, during His absence, He would not leave His disciples orphans (John 14:18). The context shows that He proposed to petition the Father who would send another Counselor, who would remain with them through this age (John 14:16). This Counselor is specifically identified as the Holy Spirit (John 14:26). When Jesus sat down at the right hand of the Father, His envoys announced that all who reformed their lives and were immersed would receive the Spirit as a gift (Acts 2:38). It was affirmed that God gave the Holy Spirit to those who obey Him (Acts 5:32). Accordingly, the body of each saint became a temple of the Holy Spirit, who dwelled within, as the gift of God (1 Cor. 6:19).

The immersed believer thus becomes an abiding place of Deity, and partakes of the power, blessings, and privileges accruing from such an intimate relationship. The love of God is poured into the heart (Rom. 5:5). The believer is sealed for the day of redemption (Eph. 4:30). The Spirit in the heart is an advance guarantee of the eternal inheritance which will be granted when the body is resurrected, or redeemed from the grave (Eph. 1:14; 2 Cor. 1:22). The inner man is strengthened with might (Eph. 3:16). The sons of God are enabled to cry out unto God as their Father (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15). The deeds of the flesh are put to death by the influence and power of the Spirit (Rom. 8:13). The Spirit aids in our personal weakness, bearing to the throne of God our feeble attempts to converse with the Father, and interceding for us with sighs too deep for words (Rom. 8:26).

It is a sense of mutual kinship with God, through the Spirit, which causes His children to be drawn closer to each other. The selfishness, jealousy, and envy which divide and separate are put to death as works of the flesh by the benign, but powerful, influence of the Spirit, so that barriers are removed and walls of separation tumble. One who loves God cannot despise the temple in which He dwells. Love for brethren will be intensified as each realizes his relation to every other in Christ Jesus through the Spirit. A community of saints is an exemplification of the unity of the Spirit maintained in the bond of peace (Eph. 4:3).

The fourth contribution to unity is expressed by the two words "affection" and "sympathy." The first has to do with that quality or state of heart which is tenderly disposed toward others. One is moved by compassion when seeing others in distress or need, and that because of the deep love for mankind. The other represents the state of action which does something about the straits of others. When these fruits of the Spirit abound in the lives of all, there will be few difficulties arising between brethren, and those which do will soon be alleviated and eliminated by the thoughtfulness and care which acts in unselfish devotion to others. Quarrels will not be carried on, ill-feeling will pass away, when all pray for each other and seek the well-being of others.

The one thing which would bring greatest joy to the imprisoned ambassador for Jesus was a knowledge of the singleness of heart and purpose in the colony of heaven. The word "complete" indicates a partial joy engendered by the faith of the Community at Philippi, which would only be made full by their earnestly striving together for the faith of the gospel (1:27). The desired status is described in a three-fold emphasis: (1) being of the same mind; (2) having the same love; (3) being in full accord. These are opposed to two conditions in the text: selfishness and conceit.

The expression "being of the same mind" literally means "thinking the same thing." This should be the goal of every community of saints. It will be noted that this was not a prerequisite to fellowship. Those to whom this letter was addressed were already in fellowship with God and each other. We do not enter the fellowship of Christ Jesus because we understand everything alike, but we seek to understand everything alike because we are in that fellowship. We come into covenant relationship with God because of faith that Jesus is the Son of God, but having entered that relationship, we grow in grace and knowledge of the truth. As we grow in perception and understanding, we mature in attitude toward each other and come closer to the ideal.

"Having the same love" is proof that this is a reciprocal quality of our spiritual experience in Jesus. It is lack of love which creates most divisions and schisms among God's children. A depth of love for each other will make it possible to weather most storms. There will always be differences of opinion and interpretation. This is to be expected. But differences do not produce division, unless we allow them to assume a greater degree of importance than our love for each other. Men may differ and not divide, but they cannot unite in the spiritual realm without love. It is the cement which holds the living stones together in God's great structure.

The colony of heaven cannot be held together by the oratorical powers or persuasive eloquence of brilliant men. Linguistic ability which would enable one to converse or discourse in the very tongue with which celestial angels communicate, when unaccompanied by love, reduces the flowery speaker to the status of a noisy gong or clanging cymbal. Superior knowledge is insufficient as a cohesive force to maintain unity, for if one had the insight and prescience to make it possible for him to unravel all the mysteries of the ages, he would still be nothing without love. "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor. 8:1).

Mighty as is the power of faith, if it were possessed in such a degree that the possessor could speak the towering hills into oblivion, and uproot the majestic mountains and transport them to the midst of the ocean depths, such a mountain mover would be utterly insignificant in securing the good of mankind without love. Nothing is to be gained without love. If one sells his property and disposes of all his earthly possessions to feed and clothe the unfortunates of the earth, it gains him nothing without love. Of what ultimate value is it to toss mountains, food, or clothing about if while doing so, we sow the seeds of hatred and animosity, and increase "man's inhumanity to man"?

One may speak in many languages, have a profound knowledge, demonstrate great power, and contribute generously to charity drives, and still be impatient and unkind, jealous and boastful. He may demand his own way because of his superior ability, and be irritable and resentful when he does not get it. But "love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong, but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things" (1 Cor. 13:4-7).

"Being in full accord" does not refer to a state of abject conformity or blind servility. Our purpose and aim should be one. But we are at different stages of spiritual learning and development. There are babes, young men, and fathers in the spiritual as well as the physical and social realm. Not all have the same aptitudes. "Accord" is the opposite of discord. Every member of a symphony orchestra does not play the same instrument, but discord results only when some member departs from the musical score. A group may act in concert without all performing the same functions. The meaning of the terms with which we have been dealing can best be understood in contrast with those which follow.

The Greek term from which we get "selfishness" is a very interesting one. Originally it came from a root word which had to do with wool, and from that it was made to apply to the various steps required to fabricate wool into cloth; spinning, weaving, etc. By some strange evolution of thought it was transferred to those who electioneer for office and court public favor by spinning a story of their own worth and accomplishments, and fabricating a pattern calculated to deceive and betray the unwary. We still speak of one "spinning a yarn" or of "a lie out of whole cloth." From the man who electioneered for office, the word was next applied to the party, or political faction which he represented. Thayer's edition of the Grimm's Wilke's Lexicon defines the word in the New Testament, "A courting distinction, a desire to put one's self forward, a partisan and factious spirit which does not disdain low arts; partisanship, factiousness."

In Galatians 5:20 the "party spirit" is listed in a catalogue of works of the flesh. These are printed as a warning, having previously been mentioned orally by the envoy of Christ for the same purpose. It is plainly declared "that those who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Nothing is more fraught with danger to the peace of God's people than the spirit of partisanship. Those imbued with it seem to lose all sense of fairness and justice "not disdaining low arts." They will say or do anything which will advance the party, and stoop to any depth to gain personal victory. The injunction here is to do nothing from such a motive. The party spirit is opposed to the fruits of the Holy Spirit.

"Conceit" is from a combined form of two words, and in the original occurs only here, although an adjective form is found in Galatians 5:26. The first word in the Greek refers to that which is empty, futile, or useless. It was primitively applied to vessels which were devoid of content, or to areas which were barren and sterile. Later it was used to designate trees which, while making a showy outward appearance by heavy foliage were fruitless, sapping the soil of its strength and giving nothing in return. In an easy transition it then was applied to those who visited a king or royal personage bearing no gift or present.

The second word in the combination is often rendered "glory, honor." Actually, however, it originally signified an opinion, personal judgment, or fancy. In the strange evolutionary process through which all language passes, it came to refer especially to the estimate placed upon another, whether good or bad. In the new covenant scriptures it eliminated the latter, and took on the sense of a good opinion regarding a person, and as such a person deserved honor, reverence, or respect, it is frequently applied to the praise or glory accorded to one high in esteem. In the passage before us, the combined form implies an empty, senseless exaltation of self. The word "vainglory" is used in the King James rendering. "Empty pride" is a good term to describe the meaning.

The difference between factionalism and conceit is that in the first, inordinate love of party motivates every action; in the second, inordinate self-esteem or self-righteousness is the basis. These two are enemies of unity, and wherever they exist, alone or together, only discord can result. The only effective antidote is the one prescribed in this verse— humility. This word is also an interesting one to the student. The root term means "not rising from the ground," so it came to designate those slaves and others of low degree who indicated their abject and servile state by remaining prostrate on the ground while in the presence of the master or others of more noble birth.

The form of the word used here originated with the new covenant revelation of God. It was never used by profane authors, nor does it occur in the old covenant scriptures. The very implication was obnoxious to the heathen world. To them it represented not a virtue, but a sign of weakness and disgrace. It is remarkable that a quality which suffered from such dishonor was so elevated by the Lord that, as Archbishop Trench points out, the early Christian father, Basil, referred to it as "the casket or treasure house in which all other graces are contained." As used here it is in contrast to the word "conceit." That word refers to a vain, exalted opinion of self. This means "possessing a deep sense of one's own littleness, or insignificance, modesty, lowliness of mind."

Coupled with this is the admonition to "count others better than yourselves." The word "count" is from a Greek term referring primarily to leadership, rule, or command, which stems from a root word meaning "to go before." It has a secondary meaning, "to consider, regard, account." In his footnote to Grimm's Wilke's Lexicon, Joseph Thayer says it "denotes a belief resting not on one's inner feeling or sentiment, but on the due consideration of external grounds, the weighing and comparing of facts." This simply means that the saint of God should properly evaluate all facts and weigh all proofs, and from such critical examination develop a personal philosophy enabling him to recognize his own littleness and the worth to the cause of Christ of his fellow members, so that he can properly esteem them.

The word "look" means more than casually observing, or accidentally glancing at a thing. The original suggests attentive scrutiny and regard. The footnote by Thayer suggests the depth of meaning, "to direct one's attention to a thing in order to get it, or owing to interest in it, or a duty toward it." All of these, desire, interest, and duty, should prompt us to be concerned for the welfare of others. We are obligated to consider our own interests, but one is selfish indeed who is so wrapped up in himself that he cannot see the needs of others. These four verses in this section summarize the great motivations which make unity desirable and possible, and also develop for us the attitude necessary to achieve it.

Example of the King (2:5-11)

Contents

> Having this mind among yourselves, which you have in Christ Jesus, who, though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men. And being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

To demonstrate that humility which enables one to count others better than himself, and the unselfish spirit which looks to the interests of others, the envoy uses the greatest example available, that of the Lord Jesus Christ. Since all conduct is an expression of thought, if the behavior is to be proper, the thinking must be right. One cannot develop a humble life while his heart is filled with personal pride; he cannot be sincerely concerned about the welfare of others while his thoughts are all centered upon himself. The writer does not here speak of all the characteristics of the mind of Jesus, but only of the thinking which motivated Him to sacrifice so much in behalf of others. The degree to which we should be willing to go in self-denial is illustrated by the extent to which He went to benefit us.

It is affirmed that Jesus was in "the form of God," and whatever is meant by the expression, it refers to a state or condition, prior to His earthly advent, for He emptied Himself of it, in order to be "born in the likeness of men." Thus, the pre-existence of Christ Jesus must be accepted by every believer. The original for "form" occurs only three times in the new covenant scriptures, twice in this passage, and in Mark 16:12. Marvin R. Vincent in his Word Studies says, "We must here dismiss from our minds the idea of shape. The word is used in its philosophical sense to denote that expression of being which carries in itself the distinctive nature and character of the being to whom it pertains, and is thus permanently identified with that nature and character."

Archbishop Trench in Synonyms of the New Testament, referring to the use of this passage by the early Christian fathers against the Arians, and by the Lutherans against the Socinians, concludes their reasoning cannot be sustained. He says, "Doubtless there does lie in the words a proof of the divinity of Christ, but this is implicitly, and not explicitly." Of the word "form" he says, "It may be assumed it is of the essence of a thing." Joseph Thayer, in a footnote in his Lexicon, says it differs from the word "form" (verse 8), "as that which is intrinsic and essential, from that which is outward and accidental." All of this sums up to the fact that Jesus was a possessor, or partaker, of the essence of Deity. The Word (Logos) was not only with God, but was God.

Again the word "count" means "a judgment or decision reached upon consideration of the facts." It cannot apply to a hastily drawn conclusion, or snap judgment. The resolve to be "born in the likeness of men" with all that such a resolution entailed, was not made upon momentary impulse. Hebrews 10:5-7 seems to imply a conference with the Father, and a recognition and acceptance of a role which had been written "of me in the roll of the book." "Equality with God" as used here probably refers to the manifestation or expression of Deity, and not the essence of Deity. It was the glory which the Son had before the earthly advent, of which he emptied Himself. This glory was the manifestation of His divinity to the principalities and powers (orders of celestial beings) in heaven. He willingly laid aside that honor and was made a little lower than the angels that He might suffer death. For that reason He could pray near the close of His earthly mission, "And now, Father, glorify thou me in thy own presence with the glory which I had with thee before the world was made" (John 17:5).

The passage asserts that although Jesus was a possessor of the very nature or essence of Deity, He did not, after proper consideration of all factors involved, conclude that the demonstration or expression of the glory which He possessed with the Father should be retained regardless of the consequences. Motivated by the will of the Father, and a love for fallen mankind, He was willing to relinquish the glory He possessed in behalf of the interests of others. This was the greatest demonstration of the unselfish spirit in the history of the universe, and demonstrates why Jesus and Satan are captains of opposing forces. Satan, elevated with pride (1 Tim. 3:6) sought to seize the glory of God and was cast out of heaven; Jesus humbled Himself and relinquished the glory, and was caught up to heaven. The conflict of the ages is one between selfish and unselfish spirits.

"Emptied himself" is a significant expression. The first word, which we have previously seen applied to vessels or containers, implies that Jesus did not seek by some devious means to conceal or retain a portion of His status. He "went all the way" in our behalf. The second word shows that this was a willing, voluntary act. It was not something performed upon Him, it was something He performed. Since the ultimate of His rejection of glory was the rejection of Himself by those whom He came to save, resulting in ignominious death, this points up His own words relative to laying down His life: "No man takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord." There is a wealth of meaning in the expression "I lay down my life."

The sacred writer runs the gamut of human language in portraying the extent of the humiliation of Jesus. The word for servant in the Greek is one, the origin of which is rather obscure. It is derived either from a root meaning "to tie, or bind," or from one meaning "to ensnare or capture." In any event it refers to a slave or bondman. Thus, the sacrifice of Jesus is all the more pronounced, for one who was in the form of God went to the other extreme and took the form of a menial slave.

The phrase "being born in the likeness of men," taken in connection with the preceding language, is another indirect testimony to the pre-incarnate existence of God's Son. "Likeness" is from a word which indicates a real likeness or kinship with man. Jesus identified Himself with our nature. He became one of us. Thayer says of the word in this place that it is a likeness or resemblance, "such as amounts well-nigh to equality or identity with man." The Creator became like the created, identifying Himself with the creature. Such a transformation is staggering to the intellect which meditates upon it with seriousness and sobriety.

The degradation was not complete in the assumption of human likeness, but "being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death." Here the word "form" is from a Greek word which refers to that which is purely external, the outward appearance of Jesus as observable by men. He was composed of the same physical materials as other men, and was subject to the same feelings of hunger, thirst, cold, pain, and suffering. In this state He became obedient unto death.

There is a difference in being obedient until death, and being obedient unto death. Jesus was never obedient to death as a master. He was the master, and He died voluntarily. He laid down His life. It was not taken from Him. The same distinction should be remembered in reading such passages as Revelation 2:10, "Be faithful unto death, and I will give you the crown of life." It is one thing to be faithful until death, a wholly different thing to be faithful unto death. The first has simply to do with patient endurance, the second with that degree of faith which will sacrifice life itself before giving up. Jesus came to do the will of God. He was obedient unto death. This does not mean that He was obedient all of His life, although that is certainly true, but He was obedient to the supreme test, even up to the point of dying.

In the Greek text no definite article precedes the word "cross," so that our version is correct in rendering "a cross." The idea is that the most terrifying, excruciatingly painful death that could be inflicted was by crucifixion. The heart recoils from the very thought of the shame, reproach, degradation, and cruelty of this method of punishment. Yet Jesus was not only willing to die, but He was obedient even to death on a cross. Of the word "even" in this instance, Thayer's Lexicon says, "It is joined to terms which are repeated with certain emphasis, and with such additions as tend to explain and establish them more exactly." It is difficult to conceive of the suffering contemplated in the words introduced by the particle even.

We have studied and meditated upon the greatest act of self-denial in the universe. One who was in the form of God emptied Himself and adopted the form of a slave. He did this as an act of unmerited kindness toward others. Because of this voluntary humiliation God has highly exalted Him. Thayer says this means "to exalt to the highest rank and power, raise to supreme majesty." This act of God in elevating Jesus was the result of the act of Jesus in humiliating Himself. So the envoy of the cross draws the conclusion that the path to glory lies by way of the road of self-denial. Those who walk this road must walk in peace, for peace is a fruit of humility.

In addition to the super-exaltation, God "bestowed on him the name which is above every name." This does not mean that God gave Him a name, but bestowed upon Him "the Name." The Greek text contains the definite article. This passage has produced much speculation in an attempt to decide what name was meant. We do not think a particular appellation was under consideration, and much of the argument of the subject has been empty and futile. The confusion stems from lack of recognition of the fact that among the ancients "the Name" embraced all of the qualities, nature, and characteristics of a person. Thayer says, "By a usage chiefly Hebraistic the name is used for everything which the name covers, everything the thought or feeling of which is roused in the mind by mentioning, hearing, remembering the name, i.e., for one's rank, authority, interests, pleasure, command, excellences, deeds, etc."

Bishop Lightfoot says, "We should probably look to a very common Hebrew sense of 'name,' not meaning a definite appellation, but denoting rank, office, dignity. In this case the use of the 'Name of God' in the Old Testament to denote the Divine Presence or the Divine Majesty, more especially as the object of adoration and praise, will suggest the true meaning: since the context dwells on the honour and worship henceforth offered to him on whom 'the name' has been conferred."

"The Name" bestowed upon Christ Jesus is not a mere designation which is better than, or superior to, all other designations in a given language. Rather it is a comprehensive honor embracing all of the majesty and glory which accrue to one who is seated at the right hand of the throne of God in the heavens. It is useless to contend for one designation or another, for none of these which we pronounce constitute "the Name" which is above every name. The writer continues by saying "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow." From this some have concluded that Jesus is the name above every other. But it is not at the name Jesus that every knee shall bow. It is at the name of Jesus, that is, at the name bestowed upon Jesus.

The name Jesus cannot be the Name for it was given at the time of His earthly birth, whereas "the Name" was bestowed after the crucifixion, and because of it. Moreover, the name Jesus was a common name worn by many, as it still is in some lands. It is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew "Joshua." But no other person in the universe can wear "the Name" in the sense it is here contemplated, for it is reserved unto Him upon whom it is bestowed by the Father, and at that name every being shall bow. The record does not say that after His death the name Jesus was honored by God, but "the Name" was bestowed upon Jesus after His humiliation was completed.

It is at "the Name" given to Jesus that every knee should bow. In recognition of the power, majesty, and glory now accruing unto Him by reason of His mighty exaltation, homage should be rendered by every living creature. There are three regions in the universe peopled by intelligent beings. These are the celestial, terrestrial and infernal realms. The first is the dwelling place of angels, the second of men, and the third of demons. These are here designated as heaven, earth, and under the earth, i.e., the nether regions. All revolt in the universe will be subdued by the Christ. He must reign until He has put all enemies under His feet. His is a rule of conquest, and to His sovereignty every created intelligence must sometime bow.

Just as every knee should bend in reverence to "the Name," every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord. "Confess" is from a Greek term which means "to say the same thing as another, i.e., to agree with, assent." It also means "to declare openly, speak out freely." It is the same word rendered "profession" in other places. There is no difference between one's confession and his profession. The thing to be confessed is that Jesus Christ is Lord, that is, the ruler of the universe, all power having been granted unto Him at His exaltation. Such an acknowledgment will reflect the glory of God the Father by acknowledging the fulfillment of the divine purpose.

Citizens at Work (2:12, 13

Contents

> Therefore, my beloved, as you have always obeyed, so now, not only as in my presence but much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for God is at work in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure.

The envoy has cited a case of obedience to challenge the thinking of the saints. It was obedience carried to the maximum or ultimate. In view of this example, those who have the mind of Christ Jesus should be stimulated to greater heights of obedience. He reverts to his former statement (1:27) where he refers to their citizenship being worthy of the Good News, so that he might have a good report of their service whether he visits them, or is forced by circumstances to be absent from them. Now he exhorts them that as they have always obeyed in his presence, they should exert even greater effort during his absence.

In the expression "work out your own salvation," the words to be emphasized are "your own." They must not depend upon the ambassador for Christ, but upon their own efforts to grow in grace and knowledge. The statement does not imply that salvation can be obtained or secured by meritorious works, for this would contradict other passages. The contrast is not between faith and works, or grace and works, but between individual effort and dependence upon the presence and labors of another. If the community of saints at Philippi looked to Paul to do their work for them and placed their hope in his efforts, when he was absent they would cease to function. Instead they are urged to exert greater effort during his absence.

Bishop Lightfoot suggests that the expression "fear and trembling" means "a nervous and trembling anxiety to do right." Fear is not morbid terror, nor is it a dread of God, for the next verse would dispel all such emotions. It is a sensible regard of the greatness of the goal to be attained, coupled with a recognition of personal weakness and shortcomings, which will inspire to anxious service coupled with prayer for divine aid.

To assure the saints that they are not alone during his absence, the apostle refers to the fact that God is at work in them. The statement has led some to reason to a false conclusion. They reason that since God works in the saints, and since there is no merit in their own works, there is no effort required of the saints. But the statement of the apostle that "God is at work in you" was not made to discourage them from working, but for the very opposite reason, to encourage them to "work out their own salvation." Instead of God being active and the saints passive, the latter were to be active with God.

The word "work" is from a Greek word which has been transliterated into our English word "energy." It means to be operative, exert power, be active, to produce effect. God produces a certain effect in our lives. He accomplishes a specific result. That effect was not said to be salvation. The effect produced in us is to will and to work. Those who will not to work, or who teach others not to do so, are certainly not motivated by God. As to how God is at work in His saints, we may not be able to determine. There is ever a mystery in how energy achieves its effect. This is true of magnetic energy, electrical energy, atomic energy, and energy within any other field. We can see the effect, we can utilize the energy, even though we can neither define nor describe it. So it is with divine energy.

Just as in the case of magnetic or atomic energy, we can in this instance also recognize certain laws of function. One is that divine energy as applied to ourselves does not operate independent of human will. The will cannot be compelled or forced. It can be motivated, but if it is forced into a pattern it is not exercise of will at all. So God is not at work by compulsion. His energy is to direct us to will. Whatever energy or force is employed, it cannot be physical, for physical force has no direct effect on the will. You cannot make a man think a certain way by beating him, incarcerating him in prison, or starving him. He will think what he chooses or elects to think. The only force which can change the will is moral force in the realm of reason or rational process. It has been frequently said that man is a free moral agent. The word "free" is redundant.

A moral agent must be free. If he is not free, he is not a moral agent. The divine power in us is to produce the effect of "willing and working." That energy must always be exerted in harmony with the divine laws or principles governing its application to moral agents. The freedom to choose or will must not be abrogated. Man must not be made a machine. A rational being must not become a robot.

The result of willing and working in harmony with God is "his good pleasure." The words "good pleasure" are from a Greek word which also means "will, choice." Then it is extended to mean "goodwill, delight, pleasure, satisfaction." It can thus be seen that we are motivated by a love for God who works in us to will and to work in conformity with His will. This is for our everlasting happiness as well as for His good pleasure.

Shining Lights (2:14-18)

Contents

> Do all things without grumbling or questioning, that you may be blameless and innocent, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom you shine as lights in the world, holding fast the word of life, so that in the day of Christ I may be proud that I did not run in vain or labor in vain. Even if I am to be poured as a libation upon the sacrificial offering of your faith, I am glad and rejoice with you all. Likewise you also should be glad and rejoice with me.

The attitude manifested in obedience will have much to do with the effect of such obedience upon others. It is not only important that we do all things, but that we do them without grumbling or questioning. "Grumbling" is from a Greek word which originally applied to the cooing of doves, and later to those who secretly conferred and conspired together. Since such clandestine conspiracy often resulted in disagreement and debate, the word was used to describe such a condition, and then to "querulous discontent" as defined by Thayer, who says it is used here as the opposite of a "cheerful and willing mind."

"Questioning" is from a Greek word expressing the mental process by which one deliberates or revolves various ideas and reasons in his mind, seeking for a satisfactory solution. Since such a person examines or questions each recurring idea, and hesitates in the acceptance of any, the word took on a special meaning about which Thayer says, "When in reference to what ought to be done, hesitation, doubting." One has no right to grumble about or question the requirements of God, since all of these are for our good.

"Blameless" is from a word which referred to one against whom no charge can be brought and sustained by evidence, therefore, one who does not deserve or merit censure. Accusation may be made against an innocent person, as it was against Jesus, but such a person is "blameless" if the evidence does not convict him of the fault.

"Innocent" is from a term which meant "unmixed, not mingled together." It was applied to wine which was not diluted with water, and to metals which had no alloy. In reference to the heart, it designated a condition in which there was no mingling of evil, and a freedom from guile. It can be readily perceived that the children of God who maintained a blameless and innocent character would be without blemish. This expression primitively was used to designate one who had no physical flaw or deformity, no noticeable marks or disfiguration. In its spiritual or ethical application it is merely a re-statement of the condition of God's children who are blameless and innocent.

"Crooked" is from a Greek term meaning "curved" and was applied to the twisting, winding trails which were created by following the path of least resistance. An instance of this usage will be found in Luke 3:5, where John the Immerser is regarded as a highway builder who will straighten out the crooked road. The children of God should set a straight course, unaffected by circumstances. The route has been planned and mapped for us. It should be followed over hills and through valleys, without wandering or deviation.

"Perverse" is from a word meaning "to distort, to turn aside." Thayer says it means "to turn aside from the right path." The generation of mankind is "crooked" because it seeks to walk in paths marked out by tradition and custom; it is "perverse" because it continues to turn out of the right path. These are the two evils which the prophet charged against Israel, at God's instruction, "They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewn out for themselves cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water."

"Generation" is from a word which primarily has to do with "begetting," but which eventually was extended to cover the whole process of gestation and birth. By logical extension it was made to refer to those who had been begotten, and especially to the descendants of the same progenitor, that is, to men of the same stock. Since such men would ordinarily be distinguished from others by certain inherited or acquired characteristics, the term began to be applied to "a race of men very like each other in endowments, pursuits, character," as Thayer states it. One more step led to its use to designate "the whole multitude of men living at the same time." Those who are begotten of God are distinct and apart in speech, thought, and deed from the world of unregenerate humanity. They are to be blameless and innocent as children of God in the midst of a world of men who are crooked and perverse. No passage in Revelation portrays more vividly the distinction that exists between "children of Light" and "children of darkness."

The word from which we get "lights" is an interesting one. It means that which gives light, that is "an illuminator." It directly applies to the heavenly bodies, and is used in classical Greek to designate the sun and moon, which the Word of God says were created "to give light upon the earth." Since Philippians 3:20 informs us that the children of God are citizens of heaven, they are actually "heavenly bodies" shining in the world. Archbishop Trench points out that the "world" is not the ethical or moral realm, for this is covered by the expression "crooked and perverse generation," but it is the material world. The children of God have been placed in the material world to shine as luminaries, or stars.

"Holding fast" is the translation in the Revised Standard Version of a word translated "holding forth" in the King James Version. It is obvious that there is a difference in holding fast to a thing, and in holding it forth to others. It is difficult to determine which idea should prevail in this instance, for the word in classical usage sometimes means "to have in possession, to hold," and again, "to hold towards, to present." It is used in the case of extending a gift to another, or of holding out a glass of wine toward a guest. In either application no injury is done to the sacred writings, since we are to hold fast and cherish the Word of life, and also to extend or offer it to others.

"The day of Christ" is the time of final accounting, the day of judgment. "Proud" is from a word very rarely used in profane literature. It is defined by Thayer as "that of which one glories, or can glory." Perhaps the word "glory" would be a better rendering because of the modern connotation of "proud." The fidelity of the saints at Philippi would be a ground for glorying when the ambassador made his final report to the King.

"Run" is from a word of athletic bearing. It refers to the type of exertion in which one who runs a race summons his last ounce of energy, and expends his complete strength in an attempt to gain a goal. "Labor" is also from a word which refers to the act of working to the point of physical exhaustion. The employment of these terms is indicative of the supreme effort made by the apostle at all times, and without relaxation.

The apostle had not only run and labored to the point of exhaustion, but he is ready to die for the cause. The description of death is very striking. He speaks of it as being "poured as a libation upon the sacrificial offering of your faith." It was customary in pagan rites to pour wine or other liquid upon the bodies of the sacrifices being burned in worship of the gods. The Jews also had their drink offerings which were poured out upon the sacrifices and burnt offerings. The libation was not the sacrifice, but was deemed inferior to it, a minor part of the ritual. In humility, the envoy of Jesus regards his own blood as the wine poured out upon the sacrifice of their faith. The red blood pouring from his veins would be insignificant compared to their sacrifice given in fidelity to God. Viewed in this light, as an offering to God, his death could be a cause of rejoicing, and he encourages them to so regard it. His death would be the goal of his race and labors which had been carried out with such fervor.

A Colonial Messenger (2:19-24)

Contents

> I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy to you soon, so that I may be cheered by news of you. I have no one like him, who will be genuinely anxious for your welfare. They all look after their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ. But Timothy's worth you know, how as a son with a father he has served with me in the gospel. I hope therefore to send him just as soon as I see how it will go with me; and I trust in the Lord that shortly I myself shall come also.

Timothy is the Anglicized form of Timotheus. This young man, one of the most constant companions of Paul, was immersed by Paul while on a tour through Asia Minor, which led through Lystra, the home town of Timothy. The mother of Timothy was a Jewish woman who also believed in the Messiah, but the father of Timothy was a Greek. When Paul returned through Lystra on a visit among the Communities he had planted, Timothy was recommended unto him, and he learned that certain ones by prophetic utterance had revealed that the young man would make a valiant soldier in the field. Accordingly, the bishops of the Community laid their hands upon him and thus ordained him as an evangelist. At the same time, the ambassador of the Christ laid his hands personally upon Timothy and conveyed to him a spiritual gift to be exercised in "power and love and self-control."

Because of Jewish prejudice it was deemed necessary that

Timothy be circumcised, and to this the ambassador personally attended, so that the influence of the young man would not be impaired in the synagogues or other Jewish circles. The tribute paid to Timothy in the letter to the Community at Philippi is a verification of the prophetic utterance which singled him out for the task he performed so creditably. Paul entrusted him with great responsibility and dispatched him on missions of the greatest importance.

Since hope is a combination of desire and expectation, the apostle anticipated sending Timothy as a personal emissary. This hope was "in the Lord Jesus," which indicates that every thought and act of Paul was within the realm of the will of the Lord. He conceived of himself as being in the Lord, and thus, every plan and purpose were in recognition of this relationship. The purpose of sending Timothy was that he might bring back a first-hand account of the faith and service of the remote outpost. Nothing would so relieve the burden of his imprisonment as the news conveyed to the apostle of the unity and sacrifice of the saints of God.

There were no doubt many in Rome who were very sincere and anxious to aid the apostle, but of those who were in a position which would allow them to be free to make the long journey to Philippi, there was not another person as genuinely concerned as was Timothy. "Genuinely" is from a term originally applied to legitimacy of birth. It signified one who could establish his parentage beyond doubt, and thus be admissible to full citizenship rights. It also was applied to documents which were not forgeries and therefore, were genuine. The interest of Timothy in the colony of heaven was not a feigned one. He was sincerely anxious for their welfare, and would assist them in any manner possible while among them, and return a true account of their state to the apostle.

Others who were free to go were more concerned with their personal welfare and wrapped up in their own interests.

They were not disposed to make such a hazardous journey, nor endure the necessary hardships. Their own interests took precedence in their thoughts over those of Jesus Christ. This indictment can come with equal force to many believers today who are willing to make a profession provided it does not interfere with their own interests.

"Worth" has to do with character that has been demonstrated and proven by testing. The Community at Philippi knew Timothy. The saints were acquainted with his courage, fortitude and willing spirit. They had seen him manifest faithfulness under the most trying circumstances. They realized the closeness of the apostle and his younger companion, for in the service of the gospel, Timothy was as a son with a father.

The one thing that temporarily held up arrangements was the fact that Paul did not as yet know the outcome of his imprisonment. He was not sure just what awaited him—liberation or the sword of an executioner. As soon as he learned of his impending fate he would carry through the plan now proposed, and with that optimism born of faith, he even hoped to visit the beloved brethren in the distant colony personally. Once more the expression "in the Lord" shows how every thought was centered on the fact that this relationship was the center and circumference of life itself.

Man of Honor (2:25-30)

Contents

> I have thought it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus my brother and fellow worker and fellow soldier, and your messenger and minister to my need, for he has been longing for you all, and has been distressed because you heard that he was ill. Indeed he was ill, near to death. But God had mercy on him, and not only on him but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. I am the more eager to send him, therefore, that you may rejoice at seeing him again, and that I may be less anxious. So receive him in the Lord with all joy; and honor such men, for he nearly died for the work of Christ, risking his life to complete your service to me.

Epaphroditus is not mentioned in any of the other writings of Paul. All we know of him we gather from the letter under review. He was a member of the Community at Philippi, and had made the arduous journey to Rome to bear the gifts of the saints unto Paul (chapter 4:18). In connection with that task he contracted such serious illness that he was very close to death. He recovered from his malady and the apostle proposes to send him back to the Community at Philippi as a bearer of this letter.

In his relationship to Paul, Epaphroditus is called a brother, a fellow worker, and a fellow soldier. The first indicates a common spiritual parentage. We are brothers because we are members of the same family. It is a common origin which creates brotherhood. "For he who sanctifies and they who are sanctified have all one origin. That is why he is not ashamed to call them brethren" (Heb. 2:11).

The second term indicates a mutual service. Paul and Epaphroditus were engaged in the same field of labor. They did not necessarily have the same office, for one was an apostle of Jesus Christ, the other an apostle of a local community. It was not necessary that they be equally gifted or perform the same functions, but they were laboring together for the same objectives. The term "fellow soldier" indicates that the ambassador regarded the world as an area of conflict and combat. There is a spirit of comradeship which binds together those who endure the same hardships on the field of battle, and Epaphroditus was serving under the same Captain as Paul.

In his relationship to the Philippian Community, Epaphroditus was a messenger and minister to the needs of Paul. The first word is from the same word as "apostle," which actually is merely the Anglicized form of the Greek term. It means one who is sent on a mission. Like many other terms, it has taken on a special theological significance it did not have originally. It implies or requires three things: a sender, one who is sent, and a mission or message. In this instance the Community of saints did the sending, the missionary was Epaphroditus, and the mission was to supply the needs of the ambassador in chains. "Minister" has also taken on a theological import it did not have when the Holy Spirit used the term. It simply means "a servant" without regard to the type or kind of service rendered. It was never a title or designation for a particular functionary in the Word of God.

The frequency of communication along such Roman roads as Via Egnatia is illustrated in the case of the sickness of Epaphroditus. He had made the journey to Rome and became very ill. News of this was carried back to Philippi, and tidings of their reaction had been returned to Rome. Accordingly, the messenger was in distress because he knew the brethren were concerned about his condition. He longed to see them that they might be assured by his presence of his complete recovery. It was this longing which made it possible for him to leave Paul at this time.

The gravity of the illness of Epaphroditus is emphasized by the words, "Indeed he was ill, near to death." This case is proof that the miraculous gift of healing bestowed upon the apostles could not be used indiscriminately or to relieve personal suffering and inconvenience. Paul could not remove the "thorn in the flesh" from which he suffered, he left Trophimus sick at Miletus, and he could not cure Epaphroditus. Yet he regarded the recovery of his companion as an indication of God's mercy, and he felt that this mercy was granted to himself as much as to the sick man. God spared him "sorrow upon sorrow." If this noble brother had died the apostle would have regarded the sacrifice as having been made in his own behalf, since the purpose of the trip during which the sickness was incurred was to relieve his needs. This would have added a burden of grief to the sorrow resulting from his imprisonment, privation, and confinement which restricted his travel among those whom he loved.

No doubt Paul would have liked to retain Epaphroditus, whose presence meant so much to him during his imprisonment. But he was eager for the saints at Philippi to see the one about whom they had been concerned, and have the assurance of his presence. In their rejoicing at his restoration the apostle could join in spirit, and his anxiety would be relieved when the fellow laborer was restored to those who had dispatched him on his mission of love.

Men who hazard their lives for the cause of Christ should be regarded with a great degree of respect and honor. They are heroes in the greatest conflict on earth. Not every person in the Lord is willing to risk his all that the Word of the Lord may progress, and those who are should be accorded the honor to which all are entitled who rise to heights "above and beyond the call of duty." Apparently Epaphroditus made the return journey to his home safely, carrying the letter which still remains as evidence of that fact, and as a monument to his fidelity.

The Workers of Evil (3:1-3)

Contents

> Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things is not irksome to me, and it is safe for you. Look out for the dogs, look out for the evil-workers, look out for those who mutilate the flesh. For we are the true circumcision, who worship God in spirit, and glory in Christ Jesus, and put no confidence in the flesh.

The word "finally" is used as a summarization of the whole aim of the Christian life. The attitude which we must manifest is one of joy. This letter was written by a prisoner in chains to a people destined to undergo severe trials in a pagan environment, and yet the theme is rejoicing.

It is possession of such joy produced by unshakable trust which sets the Christian apart from the pessimism and skepticism of the world. This joy which accompanies peace is given by God (Rom. 15:13). It is a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:22). Jesus said to the apostles, "I will see you again and your hearts will rejoice, and no one will take your joy from you" (John 16:22). It is true now that men can neither bestow nor rob one of this joy, for it comes not from relationship with men, but with Christ.

It is possible Paul had previously written to the Philippians. He wrote a great deal over a period of sixteen years, and some of his writings have not been preserved. Again, when he spoke of writing the same things he may have referred to the several references to joy and rejoicing in this epistle.

In any event, he did not find it boring or irksome to repeat a thing if he felt that it deserved emphasis. His concern was for the safety of his hearers, and it was important that they be reminded to rejoice in the Lord, rather than in circumcision or legalistic performances. They were under constant pressure from Judaizing teachers to conform to the Mosaic law and to boast of their attainments under its provisions. James wrote, "As it is you boast in your arrogance. All such boasting is evil" (James 4:16).

The warning to look out is repeated three times. In each instance the thing of which they were to beware is preceded by the definite article showing that the apostle had a specific set of men in mind. There is little question that these were Judaizers.

Frequently in the Bible men are described as animals, because of the characteristics which they possess in common. Thus Herod was referred to as a fox (Luke 13:32), and false teachers are called wolves (Acts 20:29). God's people are called sheep (John 10:3), and Jesus is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah, because of His prevailing strength (Rev. 5:5).

The dog was regarded as an especially unclean animal. It must be remembered that dogs were not so much household pets in ancient cities such as Philippi, as they were shrinking scavengers of streets and alleys. They often formed packs to roam the towns and surrounding areas, and were a menace to children and others.

One who wanted to illustrate the lowest form of persons used the dog as a symbol. This is apparent in such references as 1 Samuel 24:14 and 2 Kings 8:13. The dog returning to his own vomit became proverbial of the individual who lapsed back into his previous state of immorality and wickedness after having been cleansed (Prov. 20:11; 2 Peter 2:22). The snapping, snarling dog was used as a type of greedy individuals fighting others for everything they could get (Is. 56:11).

To the Jew, the dog was especially degraded, because it ate all kinds of flesh and garbage. From the very inception of the law it was provided that such meat as was unfit for human consumption should be flung to the dogs (Ex. 22:31). It was this fact which caused Jews to refer to Gentiles as dogs. The Rabbis had a saying that, "The nations of the world are like dogs." Acceptable food was not thrown to dogs, which illustrates the saying of Jesus to the Canaanite woman, "It is not fair to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs" (Mt. 15:26).

The Gentiles did not limit themselves in their diet to clean meats and were thus regarded as detestable. By referring to the Judaizers as dogs, the apostle reverses the charge. These false teachers sneaked in wherever they could, upsetting congregations and unsettling hearts. They taught that unless believers were circumcised according to the law they could not be saved. Thus they predicated hope of life, not upon faith in Jesus, but upon legalistic conformity.

To the apostle such men were predators, rending and tearing the body of Christ. They were unclean in their methods, unfair in their tactics and unscrupulous in their aims. He branded them as the lowest kind of beings, expressing his disgust with their blatant claims that they alone belonged to God because of an external mark, while all others were outside the pale.

The Judaizers were evil-workers. That they were workers no one can question. They were aggressive and assertive, dogging the step of the apostle, seeking to enslave men as rapidly as Paul freed them. Evil is a term applied to any destructive action or teaching. In this case, the infiltrators of Gentile Communities boasted of their righteousness, but it was a form of righteousness which denies the efficacy and need of the death of Christ.

If man is saved on the basis of his own righteousness by law-keeping, Jesus died in vain. The cross is of no effect. The purpose of God is thwarted. Nothing can be more destructive of peace and trust than to impress upon the necks of God's people the yoke which He removed, and which they were never able to bear. So Paul brands these busy propagandists as workers of evil.

Circumcision, as they advocated it, was simply mutilation. To circumcise means to cut around, and it refers to the cutting off of the circlet of flesh called the foreskin on the external organ of procreation in the male. It betokened that one was a partaker of the covenant made with Abraham, and thus under the law given to the fleshly descendants of Abraham.

But Jesus fulfilled that covenant and took away the law as a means of justification. We are now justified by faith in Him, not by legalistic rites. But to accept circumcision as a term or condition of justification was to reject Christ as its basis. "Now I, Paul, say to you that if you receive circumcision, Christ will be of no advantage to you . . . You are severed from Christ, you who would be justified by the law, you are fallen away from grace" (Gal. 5:2, 4).

It was said of the Judaizers that they did not really respect the law at all, "but they desire to have you circumcised that they may glory in your flesh" (Gal. 6:13). They were scalp-hunters, bragging about the number who had fallen victim to their subtle teaching. They were engaged simply in flesh-cutting and were members of a "mutilation party." They did not lead men into covenant relationship with God. They lured them away from it.

Paul refers to the saints in Christ as the true circumcision. To cut off a little circle of flesh without purging the heart or mind of evil would accomplish nothing spiritually. In his letter to the Romans, Paul drove a keen distinction which places the whole subject in focus. "For he is not a real Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external or physical. He is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart, spiritual and not literal. His praise is not from men, but from God" (2:28, 29).

Real circumcision is a matter of the heart. What must be cut off from the heart? The answer is supplied in Colossians 2:11, 12. "In him also you were circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of flesh in the circumcision of Christ; and you were buried with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead." Literal circumcision is cutting something off the body of flesh; spiritual circumcision is cutting off the body of sins, making possible a new creation.

The true seed of Abraham by faith is characterized by worship of God in spirit, as opposed to externals. Worship in spirit is not affected by time or place. It is not conditioned upon ritual or liturgy. It may make use of these means of expression, but never confuses them with worship which is an attitude and attunement of the inner self in harmony with the divine. Hearts filled with the Spirit will seek ways by which to praise and glorify Him who cleansed and purified them as His temple or dwelling place.

Another mark of identification is that the true circumcision finds its glory in Christ. Paul is very free in his usage of the word for glorying or boasting. It is employed thirty-six times in the Scriptures, and all but two (James 1:9; 4:16) are in Paul's letters. To glory in Christ is to trust and rely upon Him wholly and unreservedly as the foundation of all hope. Without Him, life has no meaning. Actually, there is no life, so there can be no glorying.

To put no confidence in the flesh is explained by the following passages. It embraces circumstances of birth, ethnic origin, parental stock, moral rectitude, ceremonial conformity, ritualistic performance and legalistic exactitude. It must not be confused with bodily tissue, bone and sinew. These are elements that are material. In the sense that the apostle talks about the flesh it is anything outside of Christ Jesus upon which man relies for justification or standing in the presence of God. One must choose whether he will glory in Jesus or something else. Whatever the "something else" may be, it is the flesh.

Paul's Personal Proposal (3:4-11)

Contents

> Though I myself have reason for confidence in the flesh also. If any other man thinks he has reason for confidence in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew born of Hebrews; as to the law a Pharisee, as to zeal a persecutor of the church, as to righteousness under the law blameless. But whatever gain I had, I counted as loss for the sake of Christ. Indeed I count everything as loss because of the surpassing worth of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord. For his sake I have suffered the loss of all things, and count them as refuse, in order that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own, based on law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith; that I may know him and the power of his resurrection, and may share his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, that if possible I may attain the resurrection from the dead.

If there were any special advantages accruing from the flesh, Paul could have claimed a great many of them. In this respect he would have outshone any of the Judaizers who trusted in such matters. He lists the advantages of which he could have boasted under two heads. Some of them were the result of parentage, others were the personal accomplishments or attainments of his own life. The catalog as given would have been a source of real gratification to any Jew.

The first item which he mentions was circumcision received on the eighth day. It is given priority because this was the very thing the Judaizers sought to bind as essential to salvation. The law specifically required circumcision on the eighth day (Lev. 12:3), and it was in compliance therewith that Jesus was thus circumcised (Luke 2:21). It is probable that some members of "the circumcision party" who were so urgent for others to undergo the rite could not boast of this conformity with the law. Those who embraced Judaism in the Greek world received circumcision in adulthood and could not match the ground of which Paul could have boasted.

The second significant factor is that Paul was of the people of Israel. The term the people was used by the Jews to designate only those in covenant relationship with God. Others were called "the nations" but were not regarded as a people. Paul's parents were not of mixed stock. He was directly from the line of the fathers— Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Abraham also fathered the Ishmaelites, and Isaac the Edomites, so to claim fleshly descent from either of these would not necessarily reflect a pure covenantal heritage.

When Jacob was enroute to Canaan upon his return from twenty years of voluntary exile, he wrestled with an angel of God, and because of his tenacity was given the name of Israel, or prince of God (Gen. 32-8). The covenant was confirmed to him and to his seed, and Paul was in the lineage. The implication is that the Judaizers could not all make this claim.

The third alleged advantage is tribal affinity with Benjamin. Many of the workers of evil would not establish relationship to any specific tribe. Those who were proselytes would have no claim to such relationship. The tribe of Benjamin remained attached to that of Judah in the cleavage created by Jeroboam, and after the Babylonian exile returned to help rebuild Jerusalem and restore the law. It was also this tribe which furnished Mordecai and Esther to preserve God's people from genocide in the plot of Haman (Esther 4:14). In spite of some of the sordid incidents in the history of Benjamin, and there were many such, it was still a tribe to which one could belong with pride.

Paul was a Hebrew born of Hebrews. This might appear to be merely repetitious of previous claims, but it is not. The term Hebrew had to do with language as much as with ancestry. The Jewish people were scattered throughout the world. Every major city had a great concentration of them. Unlike other nationalities, the Jews were not assimilated through intermarriage. They stubbornly refused to be absorbed by Grecian culture which imposed itself upon all others.

However, because of environment and exposure, the posterity of the scattered Jews often began to speak the language of the people among whom they resided. As a result they lost the ability to converse freely in Hebrew. This was not true of Paul. He was ethnically and linguistically pure. His parents were Hebrews and he was a Hebrew.

It is true that Paul was born in Tarsus, an important city in Cilicia. But it is also true that he received his schooling in the academy of Hillel in Jerusalem, where he matriculated under the tutelage of the eminent Gamaliel (Acts 22:3). When he addressed the furious mob from the stairs leading to the military barracks in Jerusalem, he did so in the Hebrew language (Acts 21:40). This all indicated his distinctive Jewishness. Certainly many of his detractors could not make such a claim.

In his attitude toward the law and its interpretation, Paul was a Pharisee. Because of the denunciation of members of this sect by Jesus, we may allow our view of them to be colored with considerable prejudice. In our day we hardly regard Pharisaism as a ground for pride or boasting. But we are not looking at the matter as Jews, nor do we live in the age or clime in which Paul wrote.

The word Pharisee means "a separatist," and there was a great deal to be said for the Pharisees in their origin. They began in the period between Malachi and John the Baptist as a protest movement against the infiltration of the Hellenic culture which was causing so many Jews to compromise the ancient faith. The Pharisees refrained from engaging in politics with the Romans and others, and were zealous for the law of God. They accepted the whole law as divinely given and believed that it was to be strictly observed and taught.

In connection with this it must be remembered that the term Pharisee was bestowed by their opponents. They had from their origin referred to themselves as Chasidim, the pious (1 Maccabees 2:42; 2 Mace. 4:6). The Pharisees believed in celestial beings and their manifestation. They accepted the concepts of spirits and of a resurrection. In the fierce conflicts which arose between the political and religious sects in Judaism, it is easily seen how one's pride would rejoice in being a Pharisee.

Paul had demonstrated his zeal in action. He thus contrasts his fervency for the law with that of the Judaizers. They were content to proselyte, but Paul actually persecuted those whom he believed to be walking in defiance of the law. This was misdirected zeal, but it was in conformity with Paul's conscience at the time.

Luke described what Paul did. He recognized no privacy and spared neither sex in his vicious attacks. He "laid waste the church, and entering house after house, he dragged off men and women and committed them to prison" (Acts 8:3). He vocalized his threats and murderous intentions and secured a permit from the high priest to go to a foreign city and arrest believers in the synagogues and bind them for conveyance to Jerusalem (Acts 9:1, 2). Years later Paul described what he had done to a Jewish mob which had tried to kill him. He told them that he was "zealous for God as you all are this day" (Acts 22:3).

"As to righteousness under the law blameless." In the area of legal rectitude Paul had studied the requirements until he was thoroughly conversant with them, and he had obeyed them with meticulous conformity. A blameless person is one against whom no charge can be made by another and sustained by evidence. As used here it has to do with human judgment rather than divine. None of his contemporaries could successfully charge Paul with infraction of the legalistic demands.

We come now to the great transformation with its complete change of values. "But whatever gain I had, I counted as loss for the sake of Christ." Paul does not abandon the things which he enumerated because they were evil. They were not sinful and were actually blessings. Zeal is not evil and neither is flawless conduct in harmony with the law. It is the trust in these things as saving virtues, the subtle regarding of them as a savior, which is to be deplored.

When Paul came face to face with Jesus he saw himself in a true light. He was no longer a perfect Jew, but a convicted sinner. The light on the Damascus Road revealed that he was really in darkness. He fell on his face both literally and figuratively. When he saw Jesus in a real light, he saw himself the same way. And what he saw in himself was not good by comparison.

Just as Jesus did not count His previous life in heaven as a thing to which He should cling, but emptied Himself in order to be exalted, so Paul did not count his past life as supremely important and emptied himself. Jesus gave up His life to win men. Men must give up their lives to win Christ. Paul did not simply discount his life a few percentage points. He wrote it off as a total loss. The word loss was written across the page of his past life. He was "in the red" in the account book of life.

The ultimate in man's attainment on earth is to know Christ. Paul calls it "the surpassing worth," and the term relates to the value judgments which man must make. To know Christ, that is, to enter into a vital and life giving relationship with Him, is greater than anything else which gives seeming advantage in this life. All other associations, attainments and attributes fade into nothingness in comparison with this.

In 2 Corinthians 8:9 Paul says, "For your sake, Christ became poor." In Philippians 3:8 he writes, "For his sake I have suffered the loss of all things." Paul went beyond this. He not only regarded his life as a loss, but counted the things which had comprised it as refuse. This last word is from a Greek term which refers to garbage, or more literally, to that which is thrown to the dogs. In ancient cities, dogs roamed the streets and acted as scavengers. Refuse from the table was thrown into the streets and gutters where it was fought over and eaten by dogs.

The same word was often applied to excreta from the body and by some translators is rendered "dung." The significance in the expression is that Paul not only counted the things in which he had trusted as loss, but also something not to be again coveted or desired. One may seek to recoup his losses, but he no longer desires to dabble in that which has been thrown on the garbage dump.

The express purpose of the apostle is found in the term, "in order that I may gain Christ." It is not always true that the price one is willing to pay indicates the value of that which he seeks to gain or secure, but it certainly indicates the value he attaches to it. All the grounds of boasting were freely surrendered to gain Christ.

It was not enough to merely gain Christ, but the apostle wanted to be "found in Him." He wanted to be identified with Christ and share life with Him. It is characteristic of the writings of Paul that he uses the expressions "in Christ" and "in Him" repeatedly. He wanted to be found in Christ, "not having a righteousness of my own, based on the law." Righteousness based upon law must always be one's own. It depends upon one's own efforts. It is based upon one's own work.

Such righteousness is like being cast into the middle of the ocean. One must fight to keep afloat, yet the very effort wears one down. There is always a tendency to give up because of the futility of the exercise. One feels that he cannot make it, regardless of how hard he tries. Eventually, he will come to the end of his strength and go down, yet he must keep battling as long as possible.

Righteousness based on law means that one must know all things in the law. He must understand all things perfectly. To fail because one did not know or understand is to make one a lawbreaker. One lives by doing. Not to do is to die. In the final analysis, law does not so much tell us what is good, as it tells us what is sin. "For no human being will be justified in his sight by works of the law since through the law comes knowledge of sin" (Rom. 3:20).

"Righteousness under the law" was one of the things which Paul threw to the dogs. In spite of his own outward conformity, he was not proud of it. Whatever gain he had from it he counted as total loss. It was confidence in the flesh, and it was misplaced confidence. "For I know that nothing good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh" (Rom. 7:18). Any attempt to attain righteousness by law is doomed from the start. The weakness lies not in the law but in the man. No law can be perfectly kept by an imperfect being. But, if righteousness is by law, the law must be kept perfectly, for life is dependent upon law-keeping. "Cursed be every one who does not abide by all things written in the book of the law and do them." Paul concludes that "all who rely on works of the law are under a curse" (Gal. 3:10).

He had learned that "Now the righteousness of God has been manifested apart from law, although the law and the prophets bear witness to it" (Rom. 3:21). To bear witness to a thing is to testify of it. The law and the prophets testified that God would make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. It was not to be according to the one made with their fathers when He led them out of the bondage of Egypt. That was a covenant of law written on stones. It was external. In the new covenant the law or principle of action was to be written on their hearts. They were not to be under a written code.

Habakkuk (2:4) wrote, "The just shall live by his faith." Paul quoted this and applied it to the Good News about Jesus (Rom. 1:17). This was justification "apart from the law." Justification by deeds of law affirms that one will be justified, that is, rendered guiltless by perfect keeping of the law. Justification apart from law, declares that one is counted righteous because of faith in Jesus. Thus, the conclusion of Romans 3:21 defines righteousness apart from law as "the righteousness of God," and declares it is "through faith in Jesus Christ for all who believe."

Paul tells the Philippians that there is a righteousness of one's own. It is based upon law. But it is contrasted with the righteousness from God. In the first, one seeks to earn justification, or guiltlessness. If he achieves righteousness, it is his own, because he earned it. But "righteousness from God" cannot be earned. It is always undeserved. It does not come from faith in one's own power or ability to deliver the goods. It is not the result of prowess or performance. It is "through faith in Christ."

A right relationship with God is not the result of human effort. It is not a reward for unremitting toil. It is not given because of keeping your nose to the grindstone. It is freely given of God to those who have no righteousness of their own, and must trust in Jesus absolutely, fully, completely. It is thus Paul wanted to "be found in Him." And we can rejoice that he thus wrote to the saints in Philippi, with their bishops and deacons.

They were beset by Judaizing teachers who sought to involve them in the law and with circumcision. What a blessing to be lifted completely out of the whole problem of law-keeping as a means of obtaining righteousness with God. What freedom from fear, what liberty of conscience we receive!

Paul had suffered the loss of all things and counted them as refuse in order that he might gain Christ, and be found in Him. One reason was "that I may know him and the power of his resurrection." The original word for "know" was not limited to the accumulation of facts, or the development of a philosophy, or the acquisition of principles. It did not refer to what is sometimes called "head knowledge." It would have been fairly easy for Paul to know about Jesus, but this is not what he meant.

The word know means to experience. It has to do with an intimate relationship. Indeed, in the old covenant Scriptures it is employed to designate the sexual relationship. "And Adam knew Eve and she conceived and bore a son." We still use the term "carnal knowledge" in legal phraseology for sexual intercourse. Paul wanted to become one spirit with Jesus (1 Cor. 6:17), as a man becomes one flesh with a woman.

To the apostle, the resurrection was more than an event. It was a historical fact and it proved that Jesus was the Son of God (Rom. 1:4). But it went far beyond that in its effect. It validated preaching and made faith genuine. It made forgiveness of sins possible, and gave assurance that those who died in Christ have not perished. Such is the remarkable argument made in 1 Corinthians 15:13-19.

The resurrection of Jesus has great implications in the past, present and future. In the past, it provides a basis for our faith. If it were not for the resurrection we would simply be honoring a dead hero. The claim of divine Sonship would be empty and vacuous. In the present, the resurrection is the source of our strength and effort. It gives impetus and motivation to life. We know that we shall see Him so we walk in newness of life.

But it is the hope for the future which is aroused by the resurrection which makes life here worthwhile. The grave is not the end. It is temporary, not permanent. The power which rolled away the stone will remove the marble and granite slabs above us. The voice which spoke to Lazarus will echo through the vaults of the earth and rouse the sleeping dead. To experience the power of the resurrection is to share in the most awesome demonstration in the history of mankind. Paul considered it of greater value than all of his past. Every human attainment paled into insignificance when compared with it.

"And may share his sufferings, becoming like him in his death." It is amazing how much time, money and effort go into the relief of physical suffering. A prodigious amount is spent each year on what are called "pain relievers." Pharmaceutical companies make millions from drugs designed to stop aches. The advertising companies make millions in advertising them. It seems incongruous to modern man that anyone would want to participate in acute human suffering. Yet, this was an ambition of Paul.

He held that life in Christ was a constant sharing. "As we share abundantly in Christ's sufferings, so through Christ, we share abundantly in comfort too" (2 Cor. 1:5). "It is the Spirit himself bearing witness with our spirit that we are children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ, provided we suffer with him in order that we may also be glorified with him" (Rom. 8:16, 17).

In the sentence immediately following, Paul writes, "I consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed to us." When one reads the list of his sufferings it seems incredible that he should appear almost contemptuous of them. It also demonstrates how great the glory would be. To the Colossians he wrote, "Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and in my flesh I complete what remains of Christ's afflictions, for the sake of his body, that is, the church." Whatever Jesus would suffer for the sake of His body, Paul was willing to suffer in his body.

"If possible I may attain the resurrection from the dead." The apostle believed in a universal and general resurrection. He had a hope in God "that there will be a resurrection of both the just and the unjust" (Acts 24:15). It may be that he regarded the resurrection of a martyr, one who had died for the Lord, as of special glory and honor. If so, he coveted death as a means of glorification when those who slept were called forth.

Toward the Goal (3:12-16)

Contents

> Not that I have already obtained this or am already perfect; but I press on to make it my own, because Christ Jesus has made me his own. Brethren, I do not consider that I have made it my own; but one thing I do, forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus. Let those of us who are mature be thus minded; and if in anything you are otherwise minded, God will reveal that also to you. Only let us hold true to what we have attained.

At this juncture Paul introduces a subject with which those in the Greek world were quite familiar, the striving in the games, especially in the foot races. Athletic contests occupied an important place in the social life of the people. There were four chief games to which they came from all parts of the Roman Empire. They were the Olympic, the Isthmian, the Pythian and the Nemean. The first of these was the most important. The Olympics were held every four years in the plain of Elis in honor of Zeus.

In addition to these, other cities and villages staged annual contests. Archaeologists have discovered and excavated stadia, and uncovered the actual tracks. The one at Athens was one-eighth of an old Roman mile. The one at Ephesus was longer. The runners ran to the end of the course and back to the starting point. In some cases there are stone blocks at the starting place with depressions for the heels of the runners, to give them a springing start when the cord stretched before them was dropped.

The winner in one of the great games was awarded special honors. He was crowned with a chaplet of leaves. At the Olympics it was made of wild olives, at Corinth of pine. It was the most coveted recognition in the land. The winner was given a triumphal entry through the gates of the city. That city was accorded great respect. The family of the winner enjoyed tax-free status for the year. Its members were acclaimed when they appeared in public.

In our day we have a national organization of "Athletes for Christ." Its members have gained renown in various branches of athletic endeavor. They are using their own recognition to bring honor to Jesus. In their appearances at banquets and before gatherings of young people they witness to their faith in Christ. But in Paul's day he regarded the entire Community of saints as composed of athletes. He thought of them as in a spiritual arena, with tiers of seats filled with pagans looking down upon them.

To the apostle the very Christian life was a racecourse. The finish line was death. The ultimate award was resurrection with its never-fading crown of life. He knew he had not "already obtained this." He did not consider himself "already perfect." The word rendered perfect is an interesting one. It is teleios. It does not refer to abstract or sinless perfection. Telos is the word for end, so the form of the word here used refers to reaching the end for which a thing is intended. It has to do with adequacy rather than with character.

Paul was not yet claiming the victor's crown. He had not obtained the degree of suffering for which he strove, and had not completed the agonizing which would make him share in the glorious resurrection awaiting the martyr who placed his life on the line for Jesus. However, he was pressing on, a phrase which comes from a word meaning to pursue. Paul had not relaxed. He was speeding on earnestly. His own aim was to grasp for his own the realization of the dream which Jesus had for him when He appeared to him on the road to Damascus.

The apostle had never forgotten that occasion. Now, in a Roman prison, after having run the race for many years, his mind reverts to the time when he was a persecutor of the believers and Jesus revealed Himself to him. He remembered the words, "Rise and enter the city and you will be told what to do." He recalled how, when he rose from the ground and opened his eyes, he could see nothing. He had to be led by the hand and be brought to the house of Judas, on Straight Street.

The memory of the visit of Ananias returned. He knew that Ananias had been summoned by the Lord to meet him and tell him what to do. Ananias came after Paul had spent three sightless days praying, without food and drink. Ananias had not wanted to come to him, but the Lord said to him, "Go, for he is a chosen instrument of mine to carry my name before the Gentiles and kings and the sons of Israel; for I will show him how much he must suffer for the sake of my name" (Acts 9:16).

Like a runner in the stadium, between the white lines which marked his course, Paul was straining and pressing forward. Jesus had chalked the route which was his, and called him to enter it, and was even now waiting for him at the end of his race. There could be no stopping, no resting, no hesitancy. Even in prison the suffering was still going on. Jesus had made Paul His own to suffer for His sake. He must continue until he departed to be with the Lord.

"Brethren, I do not consider that I have made it my own." This is not a mere reassertion of a previous testimony about his lack of attainment. The use of the endearing term of address shows the affection with which he regarded those to whom he was writing, and the importance he attached to what he wanted to tell them. It must not be forgotten that he is writing here in contravention of "the dogs, the evil workers, and those who are flesh mutilators" (verse 2). These were advocates of circumcision as the crowning glory. Their confidence was in the flesh. To them, the only suffering needed was the temporary pain involved in cutting off the circlet of flesh.

Paul speaks of them as "mutilating the flesh," but they thought of themselves as having arrived. They were not in a race. They were not straining and sweating in the arena. To be cast into prison and endure suffering for the faith appeared ridiculous to them. As Paul thought of them and their possible influence upon the community, he could not resist writing that those are the true circumcision who worship God in spirit and glory in Christ Jesus. He discounted the very things in which they took pride. He regarded these as actually having hindered him until he discarded them.

Sitting in the Roman prison he was free. Those who were outside and trying to persuade those in Christ to be circumcised were enslaved. They were in slavery to legalism, they were bound by the fetters of fleshly forms. Unlike them, Paul did not put his trust in righteousness of law, and though he had been circumcised on the eighth day he did not feel that he had claimed for his own that for which Christ had chosen or claimed him.

Paul speaks of his consecration and concentration. "This one thing I do." All of us are aware of the distractions which life brings to bear upon us. But the athlete cannot afford to think of other things. Of all the persons in the world of his day who could have been bothered by other things it would seem that Paul would have been in the first row. The great lesson to be learned is that he fitted every experience in life into the race. His motto was "what has happened to me has really served to advance the gospel" (1:12).

It was Paul who also wrote, "We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28). Our task is not to rebel against things, but to allow God to fit them into the purpose for which He has called us. We are under the umbrella of His love regardless what happens. If we recognize His work in everything we will not be diverted from our purpose by anything. Everything will contribute unto the one thing which advances us toward the goal.

"Forgetting what lies behind." This does not mean that Paul's mind went blank as to his past. He recalled that he "formerly blasphemed and persecuted and insulted Christ," and he also remembered that he received mercy because he had acted ignorantly in unbelief (1 Tim. 1:13). But he did not run looking back over his shoulder. He had learned the great lesson of life, as expressed by our pioneers that "you cannot grind any grist with water which has already gone over the dam."

Vain remorse for the sins and failures of the past will make it impossible for us to enjoy the present, and will doom us to a bleak future. We need to recognize the tremendous potential of God's grace manifested in His forgiveness, and to trust in His promises. Then we can face the future unhampered by problems which intrude upon his attention. It is for this reason the writer of the letter to the Hebrews says, "Let us also lay aside every weight . . . and let us run with perseverance the race that is set before us" (Heb. 12:1).

"Straining forward to what lies ahead." The picture is one of an athlete with every muscle taut, body bent forward, taking in great gasps of air, legs churning, as he drives forward. The contrast between this and the Christian life as generally evidenced in our day is great. It calls for a personal re-examination of our lives to determine if we really conceive of them as an agonizing and gruelling contest for a crown, or merely an alternative way of life. It is obvious that few of us ever become exhausted from the rigorous discipline of life in Christ.

"I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus." Once more, Paul speaks of pressing on, which, in the original, is from a term referring to pursuit. It did not relate to useless running. There was an object to be overtaken, a point to be reached. The goal was always in view. Every effort must be made to reach it. Only at the goal was the prize awarded.

The reaching of the goal required human endeavor. One pressed toward it in spite of aching limbs and shortened breath. But the prize was from the hand of Jesus. In the Olympic races, the tired runner was summoned from the arena where he had valiantly struggled to the judges' dais. Amidst the shout from the populace a crown of leaves was pressed down upon his head. In some instances a purse containing a sum of money was given into his hand. This was the prize for which he had striven toward the goal.

No fleshly example or metaphor is ever adequate to portray fully that which is spiritual. This one is no exception. In the physical race all of the emoluments lie at the conclusion of the running. It is not so in the spiritual realm. The prize is related to "the upward call of God." That call comes to the apostle while he was still a persecutor of God's people. He was confronted by Jesus on the Damascus Road and called to a life of arduous service. The word klesis, here rendered calling, is always used in the new covenant scriptures of a heavenly calling. The idea of an invitation seems always implied. In 2 Timothy 1:9 it is referred to as "a holy calling," and in Hebrews 3:1 as a "heavenly calling." The prize was the final blessing of the high or honorable calling.

"Let those of us who are mature be thus minded." The word "us" is an appropriate one. Paul uses good psychology in including the Philippian saints as well as himself in being mature. Again there is a contrast with Judaizing teachers. They are still in the childhood age represented by law and circumcision. They have not matured to the place where they can grasp the great truth that "Christ is the end of the law, that every one who has faith may be justified" (Rom. 10:4).

Those who have grown up in their thinking to the place where they are no longer trusting in righteousness of their own based on law, should no more return to that than a grown man should return to his childhood thoughts and actions. He has outgrown his childish attitudes and is mature enough to press toward the goal. He is not a toddler but a runner. As full-grown he can fulfill God's purpose in his life.

"If in anything you are otherwise minded, God will reveal that also to you." It is those who are mature who will receive and appreciate God's revelation. The immature and frivolous are not capable of grasping deep truths. But as one matures he does not at once grasp every fact or truth. Maturity is as much an attitude as an attainment. If the saints resolve to adhere to the rule as given, and there are minor points they have not yet seen, God will allow them to gain insights which will complete the range of knowledge. We do not stop growing in knowledge when we reach maturity. If we do, we lapse into immaturity again!

"Only let us hold true to what we have attained." All truth is true, and we must hold it as such. It is the foundation upon which we must build for the future. We must never relinquish the truth we have, because we do not have all the truth. The acquisition of additional truth depends upon our attitude toward that to which we have attained. Knowledge is not dumped upon us in a great heavenly outburst. We must study, think, ponder and meditate, and we come to a gradual absorption of the facts of God's purpose for our lives. It is not necessary that we know all to be true, but it is necessary that we be true to all we know!

Perhaps the greatest exercise in which we could engage for the present and future would be to sit down and evaluate our feeling toward what we have attained. It is possible we are not employing it for the design of God. Knowledge unused is debased; knowledge misused may be dangerous. We cannot be true to our gifts by "wrapping them in a napkin and hiding them." We cannot be true to their Giver by being untrue to His gifts.

The Colony of Heaven (3:17-21)

Contents

> Brethren, join in imitating me, and mark those who so live as you have example in us. For many, of whom I have often told you and now tell you even with tears, live as enemies of the cross of Christ, their end is destruction, their god is the belly, and they glory in their shame, with minds set on earthly things. But our commonwealth is in heaven, and from it we await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself.

"Brethren, join in imitating me." It is difficult for us to constantly bear in mind that this was a letter written with difficulty by a man in prison. In the eyes of the world he was a loser. He has just finished reminding his readers that he divested himself of all the trappings of which men generally boast. He craved to share in the sufferings of Jesus. He did not regard himself as perfect. Yet he urges the brethren to imitate him.

The original of the word has been transliterated into our English term mimic. A mimic is an actor who portrays another. He seeks to copy or imitate the life and mannerisms of another with such fidelity that one can feel he is in the presence of the original. The apostle wanted the brethren not only to imitate him, but to mark others who did so. The word for mark is skopeo, to look at, to observe, contemplate or watch. We use the expressions "keep an eye on," or "keep an eye out for." By watching others who use the apostle as an example we can better imitate his life ourselves.

It is interesting to note that the apostle declares that "many live as enemies of the cross of Christ." He declared that he had often told them of this. Perhaps upon the occasion of his visits among them he had warned them publicly and privately about those whom he deemed unworthy of trust. It is possible he referred to false teachers who wormed their way into the community to teach that justification was not really by faith, but by deeds of law. Such men were enemies of the cross because they substituted something else for it. They may have been "missionaries," traveling about, taking advantage of the hospitality of the saints to teach obedience to the law and circumcision.

Paul told about such men "even with tears." Although this letter has been called one of rejoicing, it still records Paul weeping as he wrote. Rejoicing in the Lord does not preclude tears. In Ephesus he declared, "that for three years I did not cease day or night to admonish every one with tears" (Acts 20:31). To the Corinthians he said, "For I wrote you out of much affliction and anguish of heart and with many tears, not to cause you pain but to let you know the abundant love that I have for you" (2 Cor. 2:4). Tears are not a sign of weakness. They are overt demonstration of the strength of an inner compassion.

The end of the enemies of the cross is destruction. The preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish (1 Cor. 1:18). Those who do not know God and do not obey His gospel "shall suffer the punishment of everlasting destruction and exclusion from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his might" (2 Thess. 1:9). The preaching of the cross is a fragrance from death to death, and from life to life, to those who are perishing and to those who are being saved (2 Cor. 2:15, 16). The cross falls heavily upon those who deny it.

"Their god is their belly." They worship their own desires, appetites and lusts. They walk after the flesh. They engage in gluttony. It is apparent that the love feasts were infiltrated by selfish profligates. Jude says, "they are blemishes on your love feasts, as they boldly carouse together, looking after themselves" (verse 12). Peter calls them unsteady souls and accursed children. He brands the way they partook of the love feasts as dissipation (2 Pet. 2:13). Such men must have been a source of embarrassment to the communities in an alien world. The apostle declared that "they count it pleasure to revel in the daytime." They were open and brazen about their actions.

"They glory in their shame." One can tell a great deal about others by determining that in which they take pride. To glory in that which should be a source of shame is indicative of a warped sense of values. Jude speaks of them as "grumblers, malcontents, following their own passions, loud-mouthed boasters, flattering people to gain advantage." He declares that they are "scoffers, following their own ungodly passions," and that "It is these which set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit."

In our days of more orderly behavior and conduct it seems a little incredible that the communities of the reconciled should have been disturbed by those described as "wild waves of the sea, casting up the foam of their own shame." It is sad to see men guilty of shameful behavior, but it is worse to see them proud of the very things which are shameful. Surely their conduct denies the power of the cross which was to transform character.

"With minds set on earthly things." It is the mind-set which determines our life style. Carnal minds result in carnal actions. The apostle exhorts the Colossians to "put to death what is earthly in you." He defines what he includes in the term as "immorality, impurity, passion, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry." He declares they once walked in these when they lived in them. He urges them to put them all away.

As a contrast to those whose minds are disposed toward earthly things the apostle writes, "But our commonwealth is in heaven." This is the Revised Standard Version rendering of politeuma, which has to do with the life of a citizen. Our English word "politics" is related to it. The Authorized Version has conversation, which had to do with the manner of life when the translation was printed in 1611. It served as a contrast with the behavior of those who mind earthly things. The word "conversation" has taken on a different meaning in our day and is too limited to express what is meant by politeuma.

The word commonwealth refers to an organized body of people living in a community, and may approximate what is meant here. The Twentieth Century New Testament uses the word "Empire." The Concordant Literal New Testament has "our realm." J.B. Phillips has "citizens of heaven." Charles Kingsley Williams translates it "our common life." Weymouth uses "free citizens of heaven." The Authentic Version has "our form of government."

I have quoted all of these so that you might recognize the difficulty encountered in the attempt to find a modern equivalent for the word *politeuma. After weighing them all and considering their merits, I accept that of Moffatt in his version as the most appropriate. He renders it, "For you are a colony of heaven." To the Christians in a Roman colony this would convey a special significance. Just as Philippi was a colony planted by the emperor in a distant capital, whom many of the citizens had never seen, so the community of the redeemed was a colony planted by a King from the New Jerusalem which those upon the earth had never seen.

Roman colonies were visible evidence of the power of Rome as a world conqueror. They were established to help maintain the Pax Romana, the peace of Rome, which was to be universal. Wherever such a colony existed, it maintained its ties with Rome through regular channels of communication. Its petitions were addressed to the emperor. Its allegiance was to him. The citizens of such a colony dressed like Romans, acted like Romans, and used the speech of Romans. Their values were not those of the people who surrounded them, for they regarded themselves as in an alien world.

What a powerful upsurge of emotion comes when we regard a community of those who have been called as "a colony of heaven." Such a community exists to further the interests of a peace that passes understanding. Its citizens do not belong to the world. They dress, act and speak as those who have been redeemed from the world. The community of saints is to be a little heaven, as a Roman colony was to be a little Rome. By looking at a colony of heaven one should be able to see in a faint way what heaven will be like. He should derive from it a foretaste of the glory that will be revealed.

"From it we await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ." The greatest event in the life of the Roman colony was a visit from the emperor. Children were taught to live for such a day. They were instructed to do nothing of which they might be ashamed when they faced the emperor. The announcement of an impending visit spurred a frenzy of preparation. Houses were whitewashed. Streets were cleaned of all debris. Sometimes the calendar was changed and the future was dated for the royal visit. Coins were struck with the face of the emperor upon them. Hadrian's travels can be followed by the commemorative coins which marked his progress. It was as if a whole new set of values began with the advent of the king.

The communities of heaven are to be in joyous expectation of the coming of their King to "review the troops." Just as ancient kings marked their coming by setting prisoners free and by bestowing gifts upon the faithful who were permitted to sit down with them on the platform, so our Lord will grant a crown to those who have overcome. We should teach our children and our children's children to look forward to the coming of the King. It will provide the end for which all of life was intended. It will be the capsheaf event of the new creation. Now we come to Christ; then He will come to us!

"Who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body." Literally, the term "our lowly body" could be read as "the body of our humiliation." It is used in a good sense. The apostle had a high regard for the body which was the dwelling place of the spirit, the real man, and was also the temple of the Holy Spirit. The body is subject to pain and decay. It can be bruised and battered. It is appointed unto death and decomposition.

But it will be changed and all of the physical characteristics will pass away and we will be like Him. Our altered body will be spiritual, powerful and magnified. We shall see Him as He is. We will become like Him. This is the glorious promise which awaits us. It is our hope. And it will be accomplished "by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself." He is Lord of all. He is Master of everything. His power knows no end. It is appointed unto death and decomposition.

Help These Women (4:1-3)

Contents

> Therefore, my brethren, whom I love and long for, my joy and crown, stand firm thus in the Lord, my beloved. I entreat Euodia and I entreat Syntyche to agree in the Lord. And I ask you also, true yokefellow, help these women, for they labored side by side with me in the gospel together with Clement and the rest of my fellow workers, whose names are in the book of life.

Much of the work of dividing the Bible into chapters was done by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto-Caro. It is said this work was finished about 1236. Obviously the cardinal did not have an English Bible with which to work. While we can be grateful for his having undertaken such a momentous task, we can only be somewhat critical of the finished product. A good case in point is the one before us. It would appear that logically it is the conclusion of the subject-matter of the previous chapter. The introductory word "therefore" seems to indicate this.

Regardless of where the verse belongs the meaning is not altered. It is a clear demonstration of the deep affection of the apostle for the community at Philippi. The usage of the address "my brethren" speaks of a relationship that is tender and deep. It almost seems that he goes out of his way to use the word brethren. In 2:12 he speaks of them as "my beloved" and in 3:1 again addressed them as "my brethren." The attitude exhibited by such terms of endearment should characterize everyone who is associated with a community of the reconciled ones.

"Whom I love and long for." How touching is this language when we remember that it was written from prison. Prison life can be endured only by identification through memory with those one has known before. Bars cannot wall out love. Locks are powerless to restrict it. The apostle had already written that "It is right for me to feel thus about you all, because I hold you all in my heart as partakers with me of grace, both in my imprisonment and in the defense and confirmation of the gospel" (1:7). He wanted to send Timothy so that, as he wrote, "I may be cheered by news of you."

Longing is always the result of desire. Here it refers to an intensified or strengthened form of desire. As the apostle penned these words which we read, while chained to a prison guard, his mind must have reverted to the days when he first came to Philippi and was released from the local jail, and visited Lydia, "and when they had seen the brethren they exhorted them and departed" (Acts 16:40). Even now he was dreaming of coming to them again (1:26).

"My joy and crown." Joy is abundant gladness. It is sheer delight. It is a state which affects the whole being. Here it is used by metonymy to indicate the occasion or cause. The life and thoughtfulness of the community at Philippi was the source of feeling which bubbled and boiled up within the apostle. This is truly a "joy letter." The words "joy" and "rejoicing" occur in at least sixteen places. They are found in every chapter. It is good to know that people were Paul's joy.

There are two words in the Greek rendered by "crown." One was diadema, a kingly crown. Every crown is a symbol, and this one was bestowed as an emblem of regal or imperial dignity. The other word is stephanos. It was generally woven of ivy, parsley, myrtle or olive. It was the crown of victory placed upon the head of the winner of a race or contest. It was a visible manifestation of honor bestowed by kings on their visits to provinces or colonies.

It is stephanos which Paul uses here. The brethren were interlaced with one another to form a crown of victory. Those who composed the colony of heaven represented a triumph over the pagan realm about them. The crown of the apostle was made up of persons. It was living. So that victory would not be turned into defeat, the apostle exhorts the saints to stand fast in the Lord. Faith was needed until the end of the race. There could be no faltering on the course.

It was at this juncture the apostle had to insert a special note to two women. Apparently a disagreement had risen between them. It was of such intensity that Paul felt obligated to notice it. All that we know of the principals is found in this brief mention. We can be reasonably sure they were identified with the community at Philippi and had been fellow-workers with Paul and others. Something had happened to disturb their mutual relationship and it affected the colony of heaven. Paul wrote to them as sisters. They did not need to agree to be in the Lord, but because they were in the Lord, they should seek to agree.

Euodia, whose name means "fragrance," and Syntyche, whose name means "fortunate" will be remembered in all ages only because they quarreled. Paul demonstrates his concern by urging them to settle their problem. He did not reveal to us what it was, but his handling of it provides a guideline for dealing with such a situation. He did not assess guilt or take sides. He did not lump them off together. He made a personal entreaty to each. "I entreat Euodia, and entreat Syntyche." There was no hint of favoritism shown.

One can only wonder what happened in the community at Philippi when this letter was read. Did the two women resent it? Did they burst into tears and embrace one another while the rest of the disciples wept? It would seem incredible that this warm entreaty of a lonely man in a far-off prison could have gone by unnoticed. Paul did not stop with merely writing a note to the women.

"And I ask you also, true yokefellow, help these women." It has always been a matter of speculation as to whom Paul addressed as his "true yokefellow." Some have conjectured that he used a proper name, Syzygus, which means one who works well beside another, one who pulls his share of the load in a harness made for two. Was the letter delivered to a faithful co-worker of the apostle, and read by him to the assembled community?

We can be sure that whoever was intended he could be trusted. He was true and genuine. The apostle had confidence in his ability to alleviate a trying situation and to mediate in a case of sufficient concern as to merit mention in a letter to the community. Was the true yokefellow one of the elders? Was he one of the deacons? We do not know. It is certain he was a man of tact, feeling and interest, or he would not have been exhorted to "help these women."

"They have labored side by side with me in the gospel." This one statement seems to remove Paul from the charge of certain moderns that he was a male chauvinist. The idea seems to have developed among those who do not respect the Word as of divine origin that Paul, who was unmarried, wrote his personal prejudices against women into the text. It is charged that the one body has been influenced to make women second-class citizens of the kingdom because of this. In reality, I suspect that we have read some of the accumulated prejudice of the ages back into what Paul wrote.

Much probably remains to be done in uncovering the attitude of the primitive saints toward the work of women. Such research may reveal that some of the prohibitions of our day were not a part of the early communities of the faith. It is evident that in many respects the concern for the oppressed, the widows and orphans, and the actual ministering to them by women in the Lord was so outstanding as to gain the applause of the pagans. The famous rhetorician, Libanus, tutor of John Chrysostom was credited with the statement, "Bless me! What women these Christians have!"

In the absence of additional testimony we may never be able to pinpoint the actual labors of Euodia and Syntyche, and other faithful women. Our conclusions must be rendered upon the basis of all the scriptures teach, together with declarations of the history of the period. From the passage before us we know that these women labored with the apostle; that it was intimate and close, and that it was in the gospel. The unity and accord indicated by the term "side by side" had now been lost by the two women, and it must be restored.

How did these women labor "in the gospel"? It would seem, from other scriptures bearing upon their work, that they were not sent forth as evangelists, or public proclaimers of the Good News. Perhaps they served as "deaconesses," charged with instruction of the other women, and their preparation for baptism. The free and easy access between the sexes was not then possible. The apostles could not enter the "women's quarters" in the home. There was no such thing as visitation of women in private by men. Phoebe was a deaconess of the community at Cenchreae, who had been a helper of many and of Paul as well (Rom. 16:1, 2). Timothy was provided qualifications for those to be admitted to the "widow ministry," supported by the saints (1 Tim. 5:9-16).

"Together with Clement and the rest of my fellow workers." This portrays a closely-knit group of brothers and sisters, the unity of which would be broken up by a quarrel. We cannot identify Clement. It is fanciful conjecture that he was Clement of Rome. The name was a popular one which meant "merciful."

"Whose names are in the book of life." The book of life is the record of all those who will share in the fulness of eternal life. It contains the names of those who have not adopted other gods (Ex. 32:31-33). It contains the names of the overcomers (Rev. 3:5). It contains the names of the worthy (Rev. 20:15). It contains the names of those who are undefiled, who do not work abomination, and who do not lie (Rev. 21:27). It is important to have one's name in many books on earth, but it is imperative that it be in the book of life.

The Peace of God (4:4-7)

Contents

> Rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, Rejoice. Let all men know your forbearance. The Lord is at hand. Have no anxiety about anything, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God. And the peace of God, which passes all understanding, will keep your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus.

"Rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, Rejoice." Great things have been written in prison. John Bunyan wrote "The Pilgrim's Progress" while in the Bedford jail. It has passed through more translations and circulated more copies than any other work except the Bible. In March 1555, Rawlins White, sentenced to die at the stake for preaching the Word, wrote from the jail in Cardiff, Wales, these words: "I, with all my heart and mind, give unto God most hearty thanks, that he hath made me worthy to abide all this, for his holy name's sake."

But to me the words of Paul seem the most appropriate. Rejoicing is exultation and happiness expressed. To be free enough in spirit to encourage his friends to rejoice even while he was in chains reaches the highest peak of the divine-human relationship. To send out words of jubilation from his cell is an encouragement to every one who is persecuted for the sake of Jesus.

"Let all men know your forbearance." The word rendered forbearance presents a real challenge to an English linguist. It is epieikes. There is no single word in our language which captures its full implication. Perhaps the word big-heartedness comes nearest to doing so. Translators have used such words as leniency, generosity, geniality and considerateness. It embraces all of these, but they do not wholly encompass the meaning.

Aristotle declared that it referred to justice, but sometimes surpassed it. He explained by saying it recognized the law, but also realized that all laws were sometimes deficient because they were general. Perhaps, as someone has pointed out, the term "sweet reasonableness" is as near as we can come. Such an attitude should be recognized by all. It is not to be kept "bottled up," but the fragrance should be spilled upon all men. It is a social need, a public value.

"The Lord is at hand." This is subject to several interpretations. We dare not be dogmatic about any of them. In the absence of clear-cut explanation by the apostle we should not impose our own as the final word. Opinions are private deductions, not public dogmas. It would seem a little doubtful, in view of what Paul wrote in 2 Thessalonians 2:1, 2 that he meant to imply the imminent return of Jesus.

The statement could mean that Jesus was near, beholding their conduct and attitudes. It could mean that death which brings us into a deep relationship with Him is but a breath away. Of course, the apostle could be urging the second coming of Christ as a reason why we should consistently serve Him and one another in love. He could do this without setting a day. The Philippians no doubt knew how to apply the statement, and were comforted by it.

"Have no anxiety about anything, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God." Jesus taught that worry is a sin. In a notable passage, recorded in Matthew 6:25-34, He shows that worry about what we shall eat, drink, or wear is a demonstration of lack of faith. It mistakes values. Life is more than food. The body is more than clothing. It discounts God's care for nature. He feeds the birds. He clothes the flowers. Anxiety puts us in the category of the pagans. It borrows concern about tomorrow rather than meeting the needs of the day.

Anxiety accomplishes nothing of a positive nature. It only creates a state in which one can hardly act upon the forces which beset and surround him. Prayer is an active approach to our problems. It places things in the hands of Him who can handle them. Supplication generally refers to asking in behalf of one's own needs. Intercession refers to asking in behalf of another. However, the latter term in the covenant scriptures carries with it the idea of making a request or presenting an entreaty to a superior personage.

The original for thanksgiving is eucharistia. It has been transliterated into English as eucharist. It will be seen to be built around charis, undeserved kindness. The prefix eu means well, or good. Thanksgiving is the freely given expression of gratitude for blessings received. Cicero, who had much to say about gratitude, called it "the mother of all virtues, and the capital of all deities." Jeremy Taylor declared that "Every furrow in the Book of Psalms is sown with the seeds of thanksgiving."

Among the ancients, gratitude was both the most deified and the most practically neglected of all human qualities. It was easier to serve with the lips than to share with the heart. Paul not only enjoined it, but exemplified it. He began his letter with thankfulness (1:3-5), and ended it with a burst of gratitude for the gifts the saints had sent (4:18). If we are thankful to men for the grace of their gifts, surely we need to be thankful to the Father for the gifts of His grace.

"Let your requests be made known to God." Men of prayer can only offer the prayers of men, but the requests of men become the bequests of God. To refer a request to God reduces it to reality. Men can only ask, but only God can answer. One is shortsighted who seeks solace solely in his own heart, when the bountiful bestower of blessings beckons him to beseech Him for comfort. Prayers, supplications, thanksgiving and requests. All of these are human approaches to the divine. The recognizing of need produces the need to recognize that God is ready to reward.

"And the peace of God, which passes all understanding, will keep your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus." Four things are here affirmed of true peace— its origin, nature, function and sphere of influence. No one can know the peace of God who does not know the God of peace (Heb. 13:20). The word for peace, eirene, occurs in every book of the new covenant scriptures except 1 John. It signifies harmonious relationship. It is achieved with God through justification by faith in the Lord Jesus (Rom. 5:1).

Such peace passes all understanding. The word in the original is nous. It is the word for mind, the seat of reflective consciousness. The mind is the organ of perception. The peace of God is not the result of human rationalization. It was not conceived or devised by the human thinking process. It is unfathomable in its dimensions, undiscoverable by logic, and unattainable by mere study. Peace is the gift of God made possible by reconciling grace.

That peace will keep our hearts and minds. To keep implies to watch over, to guard or preserve. Nothing else can equal the peace of God in providing inner calm or restfulness. To know that one has been forgiven and cleansed is a source of great satisfaction. Cicero describes peace as "liberty in tranquillity." Max Lerner wrote in The Gifts of the Magi, "You may call for peace as loudly as you wish, but where there is no brotherhood there can be no peace."

Things to Think About (4:8, 9)

Contents

> Finally, brethren, whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is gracious, if there is any excellence, if there is anything worthy of praise, think about these things. What you have learned and received and heard and seen in me, do; and the God of peace will be with you.

The letter of love is drawing to a close, but the apostle would not conclude without an exhortation. Knowing that what one thinks will determine what he becomes, he is anxious to provide categories of thought which will edify. He specifies six areas in which thought should be concentrated.

"Whatever is true." The term whatever is all-embracing. The word true in the original carries the idea of that which is open, plain, and unconcealed. Ancient sculptors covered their statues of Mercy, Justice, etc., but Truth was always left naked. It is the opposite of sham, falsehood and hypocrisy. Truth has nothing to hide. It is revelation rather than mystery. To the Greek mind it was the reality behind all that we can see. It was the genuine. It was the essence.

"Whatever is honorable." This is the word rendered "grave" in some places. At first, it signified that which was revered, or venerated, that is, accorded deserved respect and honor. Archbishop Trench, in his book on synonyms, points out that to do full justice to it, there must be dignity coupled with gravity. The disciple must be both serious and above reproach in speech and behavior. He dare not spend his time with the frivolous and inconsequential.

"Whatever is just." Justice is the agreement of one's acts with his profession. It was, among the Greeks, the according to the gods and to one's fellows what was due them. It is obvious that in the social stream others have rights as well as ourselves. One cannot be just and selfish. He cannot interpose his demands to the exclusion of others. Neighbors, friends, relatives, and brethren have a right to fair treatment from us. They are deserving and we must provide for them in respect and love.

"Whatever is pure." The original refers to that which is not contaminated. Just as food and drink may be mixed with poison, or become defiled by introduction of a foreign element, so ideas may also become impure. As the eating of food which has had a dangerous substance introduced may result in death, so the spiritual man can also suffer from digesting those thoughts which have become defiled.

"Whatever is lovely." This is the only occurrence of the word in the new covenant scriptures. In some versions it is rendered by attractive. William Barclay said that winsome is the best translation of all. It is that special quality which causes the pure and wholesome to be attracted.

"Whatever is gracious." The original is difficult to translate. It is euphemos, which is carried into our language by euphemism. The word literally means "good speaking." Barclay renders it fair-spoken. The King James Version has "of good report." It is evident it means that which is appealing to one who is chaste. Perhaps it conveys the idea of something fit for God to hear.

"If there is any excellence." Paul here uses a word highly esteemed in pagan thought. It appears over and over in classical literature, yet this is the only time the apostle uses it. It could apply to anything which was deemed to be of outstanding quality or which was noteworthy in its field. It is possible that Paul was summoning his readers to think of their highest aspirations for good in their former lives and contrast them with his message of divine love.

"If there is anything worthy of praise." Nothing is eliminated that is virtuous or praiseworthy. The child of God is to cover the whole spectrum in his mental processes. If all of us would heed this admonition and limit our thinking to the various things here mentioned, we could immediately uplift humanity.

Paul reminds the Philippians of what they had learned, received, heard and seen in him. These they were to do. They had been instructed by him. He had conveyed to them the revelation of God which they had received. Not only had they heard from his lips what they should do, but he had practiced it among them. They had his example as well as his verbal tutelage. In verse 7 he speaks of the peace of God. In verse 9 he speaks of the God of peace. The latter will be with them. The former will be in them. The admonition to think properly begins and ends with peace.

Learning the Secret (4:10-13)

Contents

> I rejoice in the Lord greatly that now at length you have revived your concern for me; you were indeed concerned for me, but you had no opportunity. Not that I complain of want; for I have learned, in whatever state I am, to be content. I know how to be abased, and I know how to abound; in any and all circumstances I have learned the secret of facing plenty and hunger, abundance and want. I can do all things in him who strengthens me.

"I rejoice in the Lord greatly that now at length you have revived your concern for me." Someone has called this section an example of Christian courtesy. It begins with rejoicing in the Lord and that greatly. Everything which Paul did he recognized as being in the Lord. In this case it was a recognition that, after a long period in which the Philippians had lost track of him, their concern had blossomed afresh after they had learned his whereabouts, and they had resolved to send again to his relief.

Their real concern for him had never abated. Through the years they had not forgotten him or his ministrations to them, but they were unaware of his location and had no opportunity to assist him in his sufferings and need. It is noteworthy that as soon as the opportunity was presented they moved in to help.

"Not that I complain of want; for I have learned in whatever state I am, to be content." The original for the last word is autarkeia. It means entirely self-sufficient. It was the grand ideal of the ancient Stoics. They refused to acknowledge any emotional or other need. Their method was to stifle all desire and passion and will not to care. Contentment must be learned. It does not come as a natural consequence. Paul achieved it by faith, while the Stoics sought it through fate. They had faith in themselves. Paul had faith in Jesus.

"I know how to be abased, and I know how to abound." To be abased means to exist in deprivation and humble circumstances. To abound means to have plenty. Paul had suffered afflictions, hardship, calamity and hunger. He had been poor while making many rich. He had existed as having nothing and yet possessing everything. He had run the whole gamut of human experiences and had shared in every kind of circumstance possible.

It is interesting that he speaks of "learning the secret" of contentment. Contentment escapes many in this world because they have never sought to penetrate the veil of concern. Paul attributes his ability to see behind the veil of Christ. "I can do all things in him who strengthens me." Nothing seems quite so prevalent in our day as discontent. All of us need to study and learn the secret. It would end domestic, national and international strife.

Seeking the Fruit (4:14-20)

Contents

> Yet it was kind of you to share my trouble. And you Philippians yourselves know that in the beginning of the gospel, when I left Macedonia, no church entered into partnership with me in giving and receiving except you only; for even in Thessalonica you sent me help once and again. Not that I seek the gift; but I seek the fruit which increases to your credit. I have received full payment, and more; I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the gifts you sent, a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God. And my God will supply every need of yours according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus. To our God and Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

"It was kind of you to share my trouble." In the Roman prison Paul was without provision except as contributed by friends from outside. He was alone and it came as a blessing to him to have Epaphroditus appear with the tangible proof that the saints at Philippi were sharing with him again. When the gospel was first introduced into Europe by Paul, who was then forced to leave Macedonia, the community at Philippi was the only one which entered into fellowship with him financially. At Thessalonica, the next stop, they sent to him at least twice.

"Not that I seek the gift." Paul told the elders of Ephesus that he had coveted no man's gold, or silver or apparel (Acts 20:33). His whole attitude toward making gain of the gospel is a rebuke to many who have acted in the opposite manner. He wrote to the Corinthians, "I will not be a burden, for I seek not what is yours, but you; for children ought not to lay up for their parents, but parents for their children. I will most gladly spend and be spent for your souls" (2 Cor. 12:14, 15).

"I seek the fruit which increases to your credit." There is a reward for ministering to servants of God. That which is given is regarded as seed which is sown (2 Cor. 9:6) and the promise is that God "will supply and multiply your resources and increase the harvest of your righteousness. You will be enriched in every way for great generosity, which through us will produce thanksgiving to God."

"I have received full payment and more." The apostle continues to use commercial language. The original for "received payment" is apecho. In papyri and ostraca it generally had the sense of a receipt given for payment. Sometimes, as here, it was accompanied by panta, which makes it "payment in full." The letter Paul was writing is one that has this receipt attached to it.

"I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the gifts you sent." This language seems to imply that more than money was sent. We have no way of knowing what was supplied. The gifts may have included clothing, reading matter, writing materials, and food. Paul asked for some of these later (2 Tim. 4:13). It is possible that money would have availed but little in the restricted confines of prison and in the inflation obtaining in Rome at the time.

"A fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God." This beautiful language comes as a high compliment. It is the equivalent of that used to describe the sacrifice of the altar which was described as having come like perfume into the nostrils of God. The things sent to Paul came as if anointed with incense. If we could catch the thought that our giving to one another is an acceptable sacrifice, pleasing unto God, we would be delivered from our grumbling over sharing what we have received as a bounty from Him.

"And my God will supply every need of yours according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." It was a firm conviction of the apostle that God would supply every need of those who were generous, thoughtful and kind. Nothing that a congregation gives to the needy will ever go unrewarded. God beholds every act, knows the motivation of every heart, and rewards every deed of compassion. Out of the abundance of divine glory there is showered upon every person who is in tune with the divine whatever is required to meet his needs.

The Final Greeting (4:21-23)

Contents

> Greet every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren who are with me greet you. All the saints greet you, especially those of Caesar's Household. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.

"Greet every saint in Christ Jesus." The letter began with the inscription, "To all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi." It closes with a greeting to every saint. Rich and poor, free and slave, young and old— all were included. No one was to be left out or omitted. The love of the apostle was wide enough to embrace them all. Every person whose faith had led him to acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God and to enter into relationship with God through the Spirit was to be greeted.

"The brethren who are with me greet you." We do not know who was included in this expression. Certainly it would include Timothy who co-authored the letter. It would also include those who were made confident in the Lord because of his imprisonment, "and are much more bold to speak the word of the Lord without fear" (1:14). The sense of fellowship which pervades the letter is wholesome and encouraging.

"All the saints greet you, especially those of Caesar's household." We have no way of ascertaining how many disciples of our Lord were in the great world capital at this time. Paul had contact with them and they knew of this letter, and joined in an expression of their love for those in the Roman colony. The saints in Caesar's household were probably the slaves and servants in the retinue of Nero. History informs us that many of these had come from Macedonia. Perhaps some were from Philippi. But they had announced their allegiance to a greater than the earthly monarch and were bound by ties of the Spirit to all of the saints.

"The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit." With this lovely sentiment the letter to the colony of heaven closes. No one could think of a better sentence with which to conclude such a warm and friendly epistle. I close my little treatise on it with the same words. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit!

IN THE BEGINNING

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Index of Books

- Title Page
- In the Beginning
- Grilling the Editor
- Who Wrote the Bible?
- Buried Treasure
- Preaching Under Difficulty
- Three Great Errors
- Positive and Negative
- The Sheep on the Hills
- The Spirit and Liberty
- Wild Grapes
- Fear of Love
- Waging Peace
- Thoughts on Fellowship (1)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (2)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (3)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (4)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (5)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (6)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (7)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (8)
- Thoughts on Fellowship (9)

IN THE BEGINNING

Contents

And so I am sure that God, who began this good work in you, will carry it on until it is finished on the Day of Christ Jesus.

— Philippians 1:6

Originally Published by

Mission Messenger

Saint Louis, Missouri

1980

In the Beginning

Contents

In the Beginning is not just another book about creation. It does not deal with the primal order of things. Rather, it is about the beginning of a new approach to the vexing problem of sectarianism in our day. It was an approach made by one who had long been steeped in the sectarian spirit without realizing it. It represents some of the things said and done in order to discover freedom in Christ and to stand clear of all that opposed such freedom. It is not by any means the last word in such a struggle. It is possible there will be no last word on earth.

The articles appearing herein were all written about 1957. Some of them were sent forth in fear and trembling. "I was with you in weakness and in much fear and trembling" (1 Cor. 2:3). Some were delivered orally. There has been no intent to be slavishly wedded to them as they originally appeared. Changes have been made in their construction. They have been altered and amended to better convey the idea originally hoped to achieve. The only thing that can be said about them is that they represent an honest attempt to find and recommend a better way than the one previously known.

There is probably nothing more traumatic than for one who has been shut up as a sectarian to be delivered by the grace of God and the power of the Holy Spirit. It is as if an earthquake had occurred which leveled the prison and left one standing in the midst of the wreckage unharmed and unhurt. All that had ever furnished security and protection is now gone, swept aside by the elements. There is no retreat to be found, no shadow in which to hide. All of the subtle little hypocrisies of the past, the cavilling and the accommodations are gone. There is no place to flee except to Christ.

It is very difficult to confess that one has been in error much of his life. All past training is opposed to such a confession. It stifles pride. It runs counter to the ego. There is the question of those one has taught. His fellow-prisoners resent his admission. There is the problem of the congregations he has planted. Many of them would rather continue where they are than to acknowledge they have been mistaken. They prefer to embrace the errors with which they are familiar than the truth that is new.

There is the tendency to dart furtive glances in this direction or that, seeking some solution which will allow one to hold on to his own prestige. There is the frantic search for an escape. But none of these can avail. It is only when one admits that he is wrong, and has been wrong all of his life, that he can shed the past as a snake divests himself of his old skin, and be ready to move on to new heights. In the final analysis it is the best thing to do. One does not want to be forever trapped by his own past.

I began in the Missouri Synod Lutheran Church. It was a venerable institution with a stately ritual. Gathered about it were all of the grand teachings of the Monk of Erfurt. Not the least of its history was the tacking of the Ninety-Five Theses on the church door at Wittenberg. I entered it by inheritance. My grandparents were from Denmark and Schlesweig-Holstein. Like thousands of others they brought their religion with them. It was one of form and not of substance. They knew but little about it and nothing of its origin.

But they bitterly resented any attempt to merge with the social order around them. They kept their manners, customs, and language. They expected all to conform to them. My grandmother even kept her old-world form of dress as far as possible. They resented all change with a deep hostility. They were old-order. When I was sprinkled by the Rev. Mr. Peterson I was really inducted into a way of life, more than into a church.

I left the Lutheran Church shortly before I was twelve. In spite of the tenderness of my years the plea that one could be a Christian and Christian only, without being some special kind of a Christian, gripped my heart and provided a certain kind of exultation. It was genuine and now almost sixty years afterwards, I remember how the Spirit strove with me. I recall the deep inward sense of gloom which was mine and the ineffable joy which came when I surrendered to His claim upon my life. I was immersed in a clear creek which wound its way through the pasture, and knew that I was forgiven for the childish sins I had committed.

It was only after I had been preaching the good news for a number of years that I awakened to the fact that I had not been a Christian only, but a partisan. I was actually a Church of Christ Christian. Although it came as quite a shock to find it out, I did not feel betrayed or frustrated. I realized it was a natural development. But I began from that moment on to recognize that the body of Christ was greater than any movement within it. The community of the reconciled was not limited to a movement which began arrogating to itself the name "Church of Christ" but embraced every saved person on the face of the earth. I was helped by a crisis experience in North Ireland in which I was brought face to face with Jesus. If I had never left the United States, or if it had never happened. I would no doubt be today exactly where I was. God forbid!

From 1951 to 1957 I went through all of the "withdrawal symptoms" essential to coming off the party spirit. I lay awake in bed at night and thought of all I had advocated that was wrong. During the day I studied the Word, and prayed, and sometimes wept. How precious it all seemed to me then. I read every copy of the Millennial Harbinger, every Christian Baptist, and all of Lard's Quarterlies, during that time. I finally became convinced that we had betrayed the restoration movement as it was in the beginning. In its stead we had contrived something of our own which we advocated and which pampered our hearts into thinking we were heirs of that wonderful idea of those who launched it.

I became conscious of the scriptures we had twisted to justify division which was always condemned by the Spirit. Finally I was ready to launch out. It was in 1957 that I first began to advocate what has now become much more popular than it was in those first days. What I advocated was an idea whose time had come. Gradually, as we gained courage and momentum, and as knowledge increased and multiplied, the Mission Messenger began to grow until it went to every continent on the globe.

In the Beginning will recover for you some of our feeble attempts to help men think, to let them see a brighter vision, and to lift them to a broader fellowship in Christ the Lord. As you read it, we sincerely hope that you will recognize it for what it is the first faint vision of a fellowship which is truly non-sectarian, based upon His will for the lives of us all. It is not the last word upon the theme. Much more and better material will be written by others in the future. May God use it all to His purpose and to the glory of Jesus!

Grilling the Editor

Contents

Editor's Note. The following recorded interview may be of some interest to our readers. It represents my reply to questions proposed relative to my views on current topics. It was recorded and has been transcribed from the recordings. There have been occasional deletions and alterations made in order to clarify my position. I trust that you will give it a careful reading.

1. I have noticed the repeated usage of the term "restoration" in your writings. What do you mean by this expression?

By the term "restoration" I mean the full and complete return to the ancient order as established by our Lord through the holy apostles; that is the reinstatement upon this earth of the community of saints as originally planted in conformity with the purpose of heaven.

2. Does this mean that you consider that no existing religious organization has yet achieved this goal?

Exactly! We have not yet arrived at the place where any congregation or group of congregations can assert that they represent the primitive order in its fulness. There remains yet much land to be conquered.

3. Why is a restoration necessary in the first place?

The ancient order began to be corrupted even during the days of the apostles. Paul declared while he was yet alive that "the mystery of iniquity" was already working. The plan of God was obscured, the sun was eclipsed, and the congregation forced to flee "into the wilderness." The actual bondage in spiritual Babylon lasted for 12 years, before the first rays of light began once more to penetrate the darkness. We are not completely free from the influence of Babylon to this very day.

4. Is this attempt at restoration a new thing in the earth?

Not at all. It began in England with such men as John Wycliffe in the fifteenth century, and was carried forward by Martin Luther in the sixteenth century. While these and their contemporaries were actually reformers of the existing order, they laid the groundwork for such men as Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, et. al., who actually sought to go back beyond the Roman and Protestant schisms, and restore the original order as ordained by God. Our efforts are enriched by their discoveries of the last century.

5. Has progress in restoration been as rapid in the last fifty years as before?

Not at all! Those who were the spiritual descendants of the men mentioned made the mistake of thinking that they had taken them all the way back to the original, and thus have rested on their oars. They have spent much of the last half century trying to defend what they already have and wrangling with each other over what it is. As a result they have ceased to be a movement and have become a monument. A movement is ever changing. A monument stays where it is. It is visited by many to celebrate the accomplishment of dead heroes instead of living giants.

6. What has been the end of all previous reformation and restoration attempts?

Every such attempt has invariably ended by producing another sect, generally more narrow, intolerant and uncharitable than those which have preceded it. As men concentrate on what they have discovered, they build a wall around it to protect it. All sectism is built upon fear— a fear of losing what has been gained. It is a strange phenomenon that when one learns something and leaves where he is to embrace it, it is being faithful to the Word, but when another learns something he has not discovered, and goes on to accept it, he is departing from the faith.

7. Do you see any tendencies to indicate that the movement for restoration which was launched a century ago may suffer the same fate?

Indeed, the most casual observer can detect such portents upon every side. The aim of Campbell and his fellows was to unite all true believers in Christ in one body. The descendants are themselves divided into some twenty-five factions, each one of which proclaims it is the only faithful body on earth today, and designates all the others as sects. The original movement was vibrant and living. It penetrated all kinds of defences thrown up by various individuals. But it was fair and open. Campbell allowed anyone to write for the *Millennial Harbinger. He encouraged a full exchange of views regardless of how much they differed from his own.

The closed-door policy of many of our papers today effectively put a halt to the exchange of new ideas. They became a clearing-house for the traditions of yesterday. Nothing would upset one of their editors like a new thought expressed. The result is that we have become parrots instead of "birds of passage." We are setting hens and not soaring eagles.

8. What real contributions to restoration were made by the Campbells?

They contributed much by their discovery that the blessings of God were contingent upon His ordinances. Thus they recaptured from error the place, nature, purpose and design of baptism, as well as the relationship of the Lord's Supper to the community of the saints. They also began a work of rescue for some of the terms used by the Holy Spirit which had been much abused in the sectarian jargon of the day. Indeed, in his Synopsis of Reformation Campbell gives this first place, as well he might. We can never be too grateful to these pioneers who blazed the trail across the untrammeled wilderness of sectism. They did a noble job and made all of us their debtors.

9. Do you have any well defined ideas as to what realms need further examination to effectuate the restoration?

Yes, I do. Of course, I hold that every generation of men is obligated to make a complete and thorough investigation of God's entire system of revelation, so that the faith of each generation will not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God. It is too easy to become traditionalists, and most people become such for two reasons— they are by nature hero worshipers and they are mentally lazy. I grew up with a Bible in one hand and a sermon outline book in the other. It was only when I divested myself of the latter that I became free in Christ Jesus. What a difference it made.

As a stimulation to my personal study I have listed ten categories in which I think we are yet influenced greatly by the sectarian spirit, and where considerable research will be required before we approach the walls of Jerusalem. I doubt that many will be delivered from their mistaken views along these lines. There is too much verbal assault, and too much persecution to be expected. They are guarded by too many important men who either cannot understand what is being said or prefer evil to truth.

10. It would probably take too long to enumerate all ten of these, but I wonder if you might mention a few of them which you consider to be of greater importance.

They are all important, for all have to do with our approach to God, and nothing is unimportant in that area. But I will mention a few. (1) A candid study of the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit. We need to recapture the original distinctions between such terms as gospel and doctrine, preaching and teaching. The gospel is good news. It is news of what God has done for us in Jesus Christ. It is not a compendium of laws, a moral code, or a volume of ethics. Jesus Christ is the gospel and the gospel is Jesus Christ. The gospel was fully proclaimed on Pentecost and not one word was ever added to the message which Peter there delivered. The gospel is for the world and not for the church. It is an evangel and you do not evangelize the saved.

We need to batter down unscriptural distinctions in such terms as minister and communion. Everything the saints do together is part of their communion. The Lord's Supper is just a part of it. We commune when we sing and pray together. We need to study diligently such words as fellowship and heresy, which are bandied about by individuals with "an axe to grind." I am doing extensive research on these last two now and hope to publish something relating to them soon.

(2) The means of induction into Christ. We have reduced this to a sort of five step, kitchen stepladder method, by which men have become convinced that they can pull themselves up into God's grace and place Him under obligation to save them. We have the whole thing worked out in a simple and easy method, a sort of five-finger exercise, which has been handed down to us and is sacred because of its longevity.

The idea of a personal covenant with the Lord, based upon conviction, conversion and consecration is almost foreign to our thinking. The concept of a covenant with God is wholly unknown to thousands among us. The congregations are filled with many who were converted to water baptism but were never converted to the Lord Jesus Christ. They have confused the physician with his prescription, the captain with his orders, and the sower with his seed. Immersion in water is essential. But we should be immersed not because we believe in baptism but because we believe in Jesus. We have but one Savior. It is not a rite, ritual or ordinance, but entrance into a divine person.

(3). The subject of worship and what constitutes it. There is a general and widespread ignorance on the subject at present and the idea of "five items of worship" is no more in the Bible than the expression itself. Of all the Greek words translated "worship" not one is ever applied to anything we do when we assemble together on the first day of the week. The term "act of worship" is not even found in the sacred scriptures. Whatever I do in adoration of God is an act of worship, whether washing dishes or mowing the lawn. "Whatever you do in word or deed do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving God the Father the glory through him."

(4). The subject of the official name of the ecclesia of God. In this matter we are following the lead of the world of sectism about us, without due regard to God's revelation. We are defending our traditional pattern simply because we have always done it that way. These are a few of the ten areas of scriptural thought on which I feel we must make some adjustment if we restore the ancient order. It will be a difficult task for us. Many will not go along, preferring to stay as they have always been without disturbing the status quo. They confuse walking in the old paths with wallowing in the old ruts. Such people will become part of the problem and not part of the answer.

11. What do you consider the greatest hindrances to resumption of the restoration movement?

There are a number of hindrances. One is prejudice.

Someone has said, "Reasoning against a prejudice is like fighting against a shadow; it exhausts the reasoner, without visibly affecting the prejudice." We are generally opposed to anything which cuts across our thinking, and we condemn it without investigation. It seems ridiculous that anything could possibly be right if we have not known it.

Then there is traditionalism. Most of us, like the Chinese are ancestor worshipers. We want to do things like they do them "down home" although they may he wrong "down home." I suspect pride is our worst foe. Seneca said, "Tis not the belly's hunger which costs so much, but its pride." And it has been very costly to us. We have berated and ridiculed other religionists so long, it goes against the grain to have to admit that we have been wrong on some things.

One of the greatest hindrances is the divisive state of those who claim to be "The Church of Christ." In some localities there are as many as five congregations, all claiming to be the one, holy, apostolic, and catholic Church of God, not one of which will even be civil to the other, many of the members living in such mortal fear of "the powers that be" they will not even speak to each other on the street. It is difficult for the remainder of the religious world to see how a family can pull the drawstring of unity with one hand while slashing at each other with a meat cleaver in the other hand.

12. Do you think what is generally referred to as "The Church of Christ" today is co-extensive with the scriptural expression "the body of Christ"?

Of course, I might ask which "Church of Christ"? But I think I know what you mean. The congregation of God spoken of in the new covenant scriptures is identical with the one body mentioned in the same scriptures. It is composed of all the children of God. Not one saved person on earth is outside of it. God adds to it every person who surrenders to the sovereignty of His Son and enters into covenant relationship with Him on the basis of the terms laid down by heaven. Every person on this earth, motivated by faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God, who has turned away from sin, and submitted to immersion of his body in water on the basis of that belief, is a member of God's family. He is my brother. I am not sure that when we use the expression "The Church of Christ" that we use it in that sense. It is possible that we use it as a designation for a small and exclusive segment of believers who agree with our position on various points of teaching. Thus, we would imply that thousands of immersed believers in the Christ were not added to the family of God. This is, of course, a sectarian usage of the term.

13. Do you believe that some of God's children may be in sectarian bodies?

There are many people who belong to sects and yet are not sectarian. When fleshly Israel started out of Babylon they did not all leave at once. A contingent went out under the leadership of Zerubbabel, later another went out with Ezra, and still later another under Nehemiah. Those who were in Babylon until the last were as much God's children as those who had already arrived in Jerusalem. They were just in Babylon for a longer period. Thus it is with spiritual Israel in "Mystery, Babylon the Great." They may not all go out of Babylon at once, but as they become aware of their state, learn that they are in a foreign place, and have the glory of the city of Jerusalem pictured to them, they are led to evacuate the city of exile and start the trek toward Beulah land.

14. Does this mean that it is possible to be saved in sectarianism?

Let us put it this way! No sectarian can be saved, regardless of where he is. Sectarianism is a personal attitude toward truth. It is the "party spirit" and is condemned just as adultery, fornication, murder, lying, theft and drunkenness. When a man becomes convinced that the party spirit is sinful, he ought to leave it, just as he abandons adultery or lying when he sees the guilt attached to them. You might as well ask if one can be saved if he continues in adultery as to ask if he can be saved while he continues in sectism. If one of God's children sees that he is in a party which separates, segregates and aggravates the remainder of God's children purely out of partisanship, he ought to get out of it and do so at once. Otherwise he will be lost because of his factious practice.

15. Would this not imply that some might have to get out of "The Church of Christ" in some places?

Certainly. It might be necessary to leave "The Church of Christ" in order to remain in the church of Christ. If one is a member of a group that is sectarian in its attitude and practices, he would either have to reform them in harmony with God's revelation, or leave them regardless of what name they wear. But he must do this in love. If he hates those whom he leaves, he will prove to be as sectarian as they. "Passions, intrigues, dissensions and factions" are called works of the flesh and it is said "that those who act this way will not inherit the kingdom of God."

16. Do you not personally oppose theological seminaries and the one-man minister system as well as other things which some baptized believers endorse, and if so, does this not make you sectarian according to your definition?

Yes, I oppose both of the things which you mention. I oppose the first because I believe it sets up a plurality of bodies where God has set up only one; and I oppose the second because it sets up one minister where the Lord has set up many. But I am not creating an "anti-college party" or an anti-ministerial party." I have convictions, very deep ones, upon both of these matters. I recognize that I stand almost alone. I do not deny that those who differ with me on these things are my brethren. I go among them, work with them for the glory of God, talk with them, and truly love them. There are many who hate me, speak evil of me and misrepresent my position. They cannot understand how it is possible for someone with my convictions to labor with them. But I feel no rancor towards them. I am too busy working for the kingdom to indulge in hate. My brethren might be right!

17. Are there not some who believe you are allied with a sect because you use more than one container for the fruit of the vine in the Lord's Supper and worship with congregations which have classes for Bible Study?

This is true and we should not forget that there is not a single group on earth that is not branded as a sect by some other group. We should rejoice that we shall be judged by the Lord rather than by men, for then no person could be saved. Many earnest, conscientious persons believe that for the Lord's Supper to be acceptable, the fruit of the vine must be dispensed in one container. While I do not have that view, and think it is unduly and unnecessarily exclusive I do not disfellowship those who hold it. I am not a leader of a "multiple cups party." Those who hold to the one container are my brethren, and I love them. We have the same spiritual father and mother. I think it is sinful to call them "one cuppers" and to divide the family of God into "cups groups" and "one-cup groups."

Such language is the terminology of narrow sectism and reflects the party spirit. I am trying to purge myself of it, although it is difficult to do so, because we have always used it as a reflection on those who differ from us. But the same God who is over us all is rich unto all them that call upon Him. A realization that these are really my brethren, and the cultivation of sincere love for them, which rises above partisanship, helps me to eliminate hurtful and hateful phraseology. I trust that some day many of us will actually be able to work together as one in Christ, but I know that I cannot promote unity while defending partisanship.

18. How do you regard the Mission Messenger as relates to the thing you are striving to achieve?

I am firmly resolved that it will not become an "official mouthpiece" for any sect, clique, party, or faction. The paper is my own individual enterprise. It is my means of communicating my views to my brethren and friends throughout the world. It is just a loudspeaker tuned in on a world frequency. Nell helps me to mail it out and is my constant stay and strength. God bless her! I know that many papers are recognized as official organs of various factions. The editors can often make or break a man. I feel sorry for brethren who are subservient to such a party spirit for they are not free men in Christ Jesus. Their lives are miserable.

I have asked several brethren to share regularly in this medium of expression and have invited all to do so to the extent of limited space. But Mission Messenger is purely a personal, individual undertaking, and nothing more! Occasionally pressures are applied upon me to eliminate someone from writing with whom some of his brethren disagree. There are many who are anxious to use such a medium to get their views and opinions before the people, but they want to deny other brethren the same privilege and they become disgruntled if I publish something with which they are out of harmony. But so long as I publish this paper it will be a free journal and not the organ of a sect or faction. I thank God that he delivered me not only from the faction with which I was once associated, but from the factional spirit. That spirit exists before the faction and the faction grows out of it.

19. Do all of the regular contributors agree fully with your views?

I have never asked them, but I am almost sure they do not. I am sure that I do not agree with any of them upon every matter. It is not necessary that they agree with me upon everything to get their material printed. I do not agree with everything they write for the paper, nor demand that they agree with everything I write. But I do defend their right and freedom to think, speak and act for themselves. If I disagree with something they write, and I think it is important enough, I'll attach a dissenting note; they also have a right to reply to anything I say, and so do any of our readers.

Emile Gavreau said about the public press: "Careers, reputations, friendships, life-long labors; the sanctity of homes; confidences in business; errors long atoned for; feuds long buried; the guarded secrets of the heart; innocent pleasures, loyalties— all the things that hitherto were inspected and honored in the society of men, this monster (the press) violated, ripped up, disgorged, blasted, and threw, mangled and bleeding, to the scavenging rabble, that fed ravenously upon it, and clamored always for more."

The tragedy of it is that all of this can be affirmed of the religious papers of our day in their onesided and lopsided presentations. I believe in the sacred God-given right of every person to study the scriptures for himself and the corollary that accompanies it, the right to form private judgments upon what is read. If this is done by someone who deeply loves the Lord I will regard him as my brother in the Lord, even though we may differ about the ideas he has formed. Jesus died for men and not their opinions. I refuse to destroy that for which He died for something for which He did not die.

20. What are your personal primary aims for the future?

There are two of them which I think to be of vital importance. I want to help in my weak way to restore the primitive pattern for the ecclesia of God, and also to lift up my feeble voice in behalf of the unity of all the believers. I hold that the sheep of God have been neglected and driven out to wander among the hills of sectism. It is my fond hope, that if my life is extended sufficiently, that I may help to summon them to the high mountain where salvation and safety await. I would like to put my shoulder to the wheel of the Restoration vehicle and push it out of the mud and mire of neglect and indifference where it has been stalled so long.

21. How do you plan to accomplish these objectives?

I plan to go wherever the Lord opens up a door for me. My constant daily prayer is that he will open up great doors and effectual unto me even though the adversaries be many. Thus far about the only adversaries I have encountered are among the brethren I know best. I have spoken several times in large Jewish synagogues. I have participated in two Schools for the Christian clergy conducted by Temple Israel, and have publicly asked questions and filed objections which were well received. I secured permission from Rabbi Jacobs to attend weekly meetings at the Hillel Foundation for Jewish students and have contributed my part. I was the only non-Jew in attendance at the School of Judaism in Saint Louis.

I have met with Roman Catholic classes and discussed with the priest in the presence of the students. The discussions became so intense that I was asked not to return. I deeply regret that as I believe that we were accomplishing a great deal of good. I loved those who attended, even the priest, and I do not believe they regarded me as an enemy. On several occasions I have met with members of the clergy of the Lutheran churches and have discussed the implications of our various positions. I have held lengthy talks with members of the Concordia Seminary and have been upon their grounds many times. I have repeatedly eaten with young seminarians at their luncheon in the refectory and talked with them about sprinkling as a substitute for baptism.

In none of these conferences has anything but a spirit of humility and kindness prevailed. No one became angry or heated, despite our great differences. I shall miss no opportunity to go where I can find a hearing. It is ridiculous to refuse to go to a place where there is no one who sees things as I do. That is the place where I want to go. If the apostles had refused to go to a place where there was no congregation, there would be none on earth today. They purposely chose the very places where there were none who agreed with them and so shall I. Fortunately, I have lost all fear of what men shall do to me, and my whole trust is in God.

The vision of many preachers is frightfully limited. They refuse to go to a place where there is no "faithful church" and yet there can be no "faithful church" until they go. On that basis, the greater part of humanity would be doomed to hell, unless they accidentally stumbled on to the truth and started a congregation. Then they could get a preacher to come and tell them what was wrong with them. I want to go where people do not see things as I do. I get uncomfortable around a congregation where everyone is lined up with me. I want to get into virgin fields, or fields where Satan has been having a field day. I do not like to build upon another man's foundation all of the time. I want to go beyond the present regions. If I wait until there is a congregation there I will never go, and I know that if I never go, there may never be a congregation.

22. Are there any encouraging aspects to be observed at present?

Yes, there are. I do not worry about such things, and the word "discouragement" is not in my spiritual vocabulary. The One whom I serve opened up the Red Sea for His people, and caused the walls of Jericho to fall down before them. He has not lost any of His power. He has the whole world in His hand. No power on earth can stand against Him. The political attitudes of all those who seek to manipulate God's people will some day fail.

All I need to do is to get my bearings and march forward in faith. He will open up the way for me.

It is my task to sow and plant. It is his responsibility to give the increase. His word will not return unto Him void. All I need to do is to fulfill my part. But there are some good omens. Many people are being shaken, jolted and scared into studying more than ever before. I have spoken several times in denominational meeting-houses of late and been well-received. The question period which always follows my addresses have elicited many pointed and excellent questions. One encouraging feature is the increasing interest among some of my good Jewish friends.

23. Have you always held your present views with reference to restoration?

No, I have not! I came into this fellowship from a Lutheran background. My people on the maternal side were Danes. At first, I labored under the misconception that because we had discovered some truths which had been long hidden that we had found them all. Thus there was a time in my life when no problem was too great for me. I had all of the answers. I accepted without question the orthodox sermon outlines which had been handed down from previous generations, but when I saw they misapplied many scriptural texts, and violated most of the laws of Biblical interpretation, I began to investigate for myself.

I became convinced that we were well on the road toward creation of another sect. I saw the pressure groups manipulated by editors and preacher cliques, and beheld how the bulk of God's sheep were often exploited for the fleece. I learned how little any of us really knew, and how much more there was to learn. Accordingly, I began to lift up my eyes and look upon the fields. I saw how white they were to the harvest. My love for truth grew and with it a burning desire to share truth with my brethren and the world of mankind. I have made many mistakes which are saddening to reflect upon. I have wasted much time. However, I trust in God to extend unto me His amazing grace, and to save me through His mercy and love. Without that prospect I am sure that I would be of all men most miserable, but with it, I am lifted up and walk on higher ground.

24. What do you feel is the first great need of the congregations which are restoration minded?

The first great need is to exhibit toleration for those who differ with them. Toleration is not the endorsement of anything that is wrong but the simple enduring of one who thinks it is right. By remaining together and receiving one another in love we shall grow toward each other instead of away from each other, and we shall find that the word of unity will help to produce unity of the word. If we separate or drive one another out we will then be reduced to the need for fighting one another from that time on. This will only hinder us in our real purpose.

25. Do you think the holding of public debates will hasten the real restoration?

No, they may actually hinder it. I doubt that they will achieve any substantial good, for the simple reason that in modern public debates, two factions each select a champion and throw them both into the arena in defense of partisan views. Debaters today are actually representatives of party positions. I know that theoretically their purpose is to examine the evidence, sift it, and determine what is true, but practically it does not work out that way. Debates, as now conducted, do not lend themselves to calm, unbiased appraisal of the issues. There is the constant temptation to use any means at hand to gain personal victory. The lust for combat fires the brain and kindles the blood. I would not want to become a professional debater or a recognized Goliath for any company of Philistines.

It is true that I have engaged in some public debates but not often from choice, and it troubles me that I like debating. I may be forced to debate again rather than to see truth stigmatized, but my honest opinion is that in the long run, the cause may suffer in a community where such forensic struggles are waged. A much better approach would be that of the forum. With an unprejudiced chairman, two speakers would sit down at the same table on a public platform. Each in turn would be allowed 15 minutes to question his respondent, and the audience would be permitted to question either or both for an hour.

I am losing confidence in hit-and-run speakers who will not permit their positions to be examined in free and open questioning. Why should I spend two hours of my precious time listening to a man air his views and haranguing an audience, when I am not given opportunity to request clarification, or to examine those views? I thank you for these questions and even if you disagree with the answers I have given I still love you very deeply and cherish you.

In the Beginning

Who Wrote the Bible?

Contents

The book I hold before you in my hand is easily recognizable. It is the volume we call the Bible. I say we call it that because it nowhere refers to itself by that title. Indeed, we do not know who first called it the Bible. The name originated from the ancient seaport on the Mediterranean Sea which came to be known as Byblos. It lay about twenty miles north of the modern Beirut, and was originally called Gebal. It became the center of the maritime trade in ancient times. Sailing vessels from everywhere converged upon it to secure loads of cedar and copper.

Egyptian dealers brought papyrus to Byblos for export. It was made from strips of pith taken from reeds which grew along the Nile. These were pounded together and dried into sheets which were then used for writing. We get our word paper from papyrus. There were warehouses filled with this writing material in Byblos. The papyrus soon took on the name of the city where it was purchased wholesale. At first the word "biblos" was applied to all little books of papyrus, but gradually it came to refer to the volume called "the holy Bible" to distinguish it from other books.

The Bible I am holding looks a great deal like other books. It is bound in blue cloth over boards. The type was set by a computer. The paper was made from pulp to which trees of the forest were reduced. It was printed on a press, gathered, stitched, glued, and bound like other books in your library. It is obvious that men had much to do with its production. But where did it come from? How did we receive it?

It will not be too much to concede that its origin was either natural or supernatural. If it was natural it originated with men. If it originated with men they must have been either good men or bad men. It would be incredible that bad men would have written it. It commends only what is good and condemns everything that is evil. It ends with all bad men in a lake of fire, suffering the pangs of eternal torment.

But it is the nature of bad men to excuse their evil. They constantly seek to justify it. They do not want to be held accountable. They try to make it appear that they are no worse in the final analysis than anyone else. They want to escape punishment. I doubt that wicked men would write, "There will be tribulation and distress for every human being who does evil, the Jew first and also the Greek" (Romans 2:9). Certainly they would not write, "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive good or evil, according to what he has done in the body" (2 Corinthians 5:10).

While evil men would not have written it good men could not have done so. The Bible claims to be a revelation from God. If it is the product of men, that is a falsehood. If it is a sham and pretence, those who wrote it could not have been good, for good men would not have palmed off such a cruel hoax on the world. The Bible is unique. It could not have been an invention of unlearned men. If it had been, men today with better education, equipment and knowledge should be able to produce a better Bible.

William Jennings Bryan, the "silver-tongued orator of the Platte," was called upon to deliver an address in Chicago, May 4, 1911, in celebration of the 300th anniversary of the King James translation of the Bible. In the course of his remarks he said: "Let the atheists and materialists produce a better Bible than ours if they can. Let them collect the best of their school to be found among the graduates of universities— as many as they please from every land. Let the members of this selected group travel where they will, consult such libraries as they please and employ every modern means of swift communication. Let them glean in the fields of geology, botany, astronomy, biology and zoology, and then roam at will wherever science has opened up a way; let them take advantage of all the progress in art and in literature, in oratory and in history— let them use to the full every instrumentality that is employed in modern civilization; and when they have exhausted every source, let them embody the results of their best intelligence in a book and offer it to the world as a substitute for this Bible of ours. Will they try? If not, what excuse will they give? Has man fallen from his high estate, so that we cannot rightfully expect as much of him now as nineteen centuries ago? Or does the Bible come to us from a source that is higher than man— which?"

Perhaps it would be wise to allow the Bible to testify in its own behalf. What claim does it make for its origin? Do those who penned it claim to have originated it? The answer is that they uniformly claim for it a divine origin. There are about forty-two writers. They wrote over a period of sixteen hundred years. The first was Moses. The last was John. Every chapter in Exodus, the second book of Moses from six to fourteen begins with the expression, "The Lord said to Moses." In some of these chapters almost every paragraph thus begins. Now the Lord either spoke to Moses or Moses falsified. Yet history bears out that what God had predicted and promised came true.

John was an aged man when he wrote the Revelation letter. He had been banished to the isle of Patmos "on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus." He declared that he heard behind him a loud voice like the sound of a trumpet. He turned to see whose voice it was and saw a divine personage who identified Himself as the Living One who said, "I died and behold I am alive forevermore." He communicated to John and commissioned him to write what he saw in a book and send it to the seven churches in Asia. What we have is that book.

In the interval of sixteen centuries between these two all of those who wrote said they did so at the bidding of God. Isaiah declared he heard the voice of the Lord (6:8). Jeremiah said the word of the Lord came to him (1:4). Ezekiel said the word of the Lord came to him and the hand of the Lord was upon him (1:3). Peter writes, "First of all you must understand this, that no prophecy of scripture is a matter of one's own interpretation, because no prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (2 Peter 1:20, 21).

There is something to be understood before one approaches the scriptures. It is foundational. It is basic. About it there should be no doubt. No scripture of prophecy is a matter of one's own interpretation. He is not speaking of our application of our mental powers in an attempt to fathom what the prophet meant. He is dealing with the origin of the message. The prophets did not see events and then seek to interpret them. They were not forecasters of the future, basing their predictions upon what they saw.

Prophecy does not come from human impulse. No prophecy of scripture ever came that way. Isaiah did not see the conditions around him and hazard a judgment about the results. The prophets were motivated by the Spirit. They spoke from God. Isaiah began by crying out, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken" (1:2).

Paul said about his gospel, "For I did not receive it from man, nor was I taught it, but it came through a revelation of Jesus Christ" (Galatians 1:12). He said, "For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you" (1 Corinthians 11:23). God chose to make known His will to men through men. When one whom God chose and qualified as an ambassador makes known the word of God there is a responsibility upon the part of the hearer. So Paul said "And we also thank God constantly for this, that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers (1 Thessalonians 2:13).

What it really is! The word of God. But we have a check-point. It is at work in you believers. Now if the believers demonstrate a life-style which differs from those about them and from their previous conduct, it can be attributed to the word of God as a motivating force. Jesus declared "Ye shall know them by their fruits." He asked some pertinent questions. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Of course they do not. Grapes are gathered from grapevines. Figs are produced on fig trees.

Jesus continues, "Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." Wherever the Bible has been discovered it has worked reform. It has overthrown superstition. It has elevated mankind. Let us give you an example from the Book itself.

Josiah was eight years old when he began to reign over Judah. He was the son of Amon and grandson of Manasseh. Both of these were very wicked. It was said of the first that he filled Jerusalem from one end to the other with innocent blood. But they did not have Jeremiah the prophet, or Huldah the prophetess, or Hilkiah the high priest to instruct them as did Josiah. It was in the eighteenth year of his reign that Josiah commissioned Hilkiah to begin repair of the temple. Hilkiah found the book of the law which Moses had written many years before and sent it to the king.

When the king heard the words of the book he tore his clothing. He summoned all the people both small and great to the temple. Standing by a royal column he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant. He "made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments and his testimonies and his statutes with all their heart and all their soul, to perform the words of this covenant that were written in this book. And all the people stood to the covenant."

The result of this renewal was a great reformation. Idols were broken down. Altars were smashed to bits. Priests who had been appointed to conduct the worship for the sun, the moon, the planets and the stars were deposed. Cult prostitutes and homosexuals were driven out. Horses dedicated to the worship of the sun were removed with their chariots. The Passover was celebrated again. It is written that "No Passover like this one had ever been celebrated by any of the kings of Israel or of Judah, since the time when judges ruled the nation."

It was the restoration of scripture which worked the mighty reforms of Luther, the Augustinian monk. In the lonely castle at Wartburg where he had been a virtual prisoner for his own safety he meditated upon these things. One historian records that "The doctrine of the Church, the scholastic theology, knew nothing of the consolations that proceed from faith, but the Scriptures proclaim them with great force, and there it was that he had found them. Faith in the Word of God had made him free. By it he felt emancipated from the dogmatic authority of the Church from its hierarchy and traditions, from the opinions of the schoolmen, the power of prejudice, and from every human ordinance. Those strong and numerous bonds which for centuries had enchained and stifled Christendom were snapped asunder, broken in pieces, and scattered round him; and he nobly raised his head freed from all authority except that of the Word."

A papal decree had forbidden giving the Bible to the German people in the vulgar tongue. But Luther had said "Would that this one book were in every language, in every hand, before the eyes, and in the ears and hearts of every man." He saw that the translation of the scriptures was the one essential to delivering the people from what he termed "The Babylonian Captivity of the Church." "Scripture without any comment is the sun from which all teachers receive their light." All of the tremendous gains which have been made, and which have swept like a tidal wave over the heart have come as a result of the translation of the Word of God in the vernacular of the people.

J. R. Green, who wrote a "Short History of the English People" which made a book of 872 pages, says, "No greater moral change ever passed over a nation than passed over England during the years which parted the middle of the reign of Elizabeth from the meeting of the Long Parliament. England became the people of a book, and that book was the Bible. It was as yet the one English book which was familiar to all Englishmen; it was read at churches and at home; and everywhere its words, as they fell on ears which custom had not deadened, kindled a startling enthusiasm."

Green continues, "But far greater than its effect on literature or social phrase was the effect of the Bible on the character of the people at large. Elizabeth might silence or tune the pulpits; but it was impossible for her to silence or tune the great preachers of justice, and mercy, and truth, who spoke from the book which she had again opened for her people. The whole moral effect which is produced now-a-days by the religious newspaper, the tract, the essay, the lecture, the missionary report, the sermon, was then produced by the Bible alone, and its effect in this way, however dispassionately we examine it, was amazing."

It seems to me that the Bible had to be given because of our deep need for it. Men required light and the sun was given for it. Would God withhold from man the moral light which was required to illumine his steps? It is true that Nature speaks of God. The heavens declare his glory. The firmament demonstrates his handwork. By familiarizing ourselves with her marvelous works and interlacing power we can learn a great deal. But there is still required a special revelation to inform men of the nature and origin of sin and the means of his salvation from it.

He who reads the book of Nature reads from a page that is blackened with men's sins. "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." All of creation awaits with eager longing for God to reveal his sons. "For creation was condemned to lose its purpose, not of its own will, but because God willed it to be so" (Romans 8:19, 20). The fall-out from man's transgression has created a smog over the universe so that we see through a glass darkly. Genius is the interpreter of Nature but not the prophet of God. It may tell us a great deal of what is below the sun but can tell us nothing that is above it.

Reason is the placing of two known facts together in such a manner as to arrive at a third and new fact called a conclusion. But if one of the facts is supposition the conclusion will not be correct. It is possible to draw the wrong conclusion even if the facts are correct. Human reason is faulty. It has often betrayed its possessor. It is limited. There are things we cry out to know which we cannot discern. Conscience has its recurring moods of hesitation and bewilderment. The religious instinct may betray us into bowing before an idol, trembling in the presence of an eclipse, or shuddering at the contemplation of death. Much can be learned by Science in the study of man, but Science is limited to data which is at hand, to man as he is. It cannot probe beyond his beginning. It is forced into guesswork by his origin educated though that guesswork may be.

The inutility of man's power to think without enlightenment from God can be seen in the gropings of the most profound thinkers of ancient paganism. The finest truths uttered by them were splendid guesses rather than assured certainties.

They were celebrated as much for what they did not reveal as for what they disclosed. Socrates advised his pupil Alcibiades to forego his sacrifice at the temple until a teacher from heaven could be sent. He said, "We must wait patiently until someone, either a god or an inspired man, teach us our moral and religious duties."

Plato, when addressing the Athenians, says that, "unless God, in pity, send them an instructor, they must remain in a state of ignorance forever." Xenophanes, founder of the Eclectic sect, closes his work on Nature with the sentence, "No man has discovered any certainty, nor will discover it, concerning the Gods, and what I say of the universe. For if he utters what is even most perfect, still he does not know it, but conjecture hangs over all." So God had to speak or man was doomed to remain in a state of ignorance forever. Pope has said, "Either God finally has spoken or there is no God, and man is the incomprehensible creation of chance, and the sport of the chance that has created him."

Those who deny the Bible as an authoritative statement of moral truth, generally prefer to live in a culture which has been shaped by it. Atheism has built no hospitals. One of us could hardly assess the effect of the book upon the lives of all of us. Most of us could say with John Wesley, "I am a creature of a day, passing through life as an arrow through the air. I am a spirit, coming from God, and returning to God: just hovering over the great gulf; a few moments hence I am no more seen; I drop into an unchangeable eternity! I want to know one thing— the way to heaven; how to land safe on that happy shore. God himself has condescended to teach the way. He hath written it down in a book. O give me that book! At any price, give me the book of God! I have it. Here is knowledge enough for me. Let me be a man of one book. Here then, I am, far from the busy ways of men. I sit down alone. Only God is here. In his presence, I open, I read his book for this end— to find the way to heaven."

If the thesis be true that there is a need for the Bible, and the Bible was given to meet that need, we should be able to show that once it was given there was a noticeable change in man. That such was the case can be easily demonstrated.

Pascal wrote, "And it happened that in the time of the fourth monarchy, before the destruction of the second temple, the pagans in multitudes adored the true God and led an angelic life; women consecrated to religion their virginity, and their lives; men voluntarily renounced all the pleasures of sense. That, which Plato was unable to persuade a few of the wisest and best informed of men of his time to do, a Secret Power, by means of a few words, now effected in thousands of uneducated men."

But in order to enforce our reasoning let us consider the state of the world when it was entered by the Christian faith. We shall not make reference to the sensuality and passion which were a way of life among the more uncivilized regions of the earth. Instead, let us look at the localities where the light and moral vigor of the heathen world were concentrated. Let us survey Rome and Greece, where philosophy held her court, and literature and the arts were cultivated with the utmost devotion and success.

Paul, who lived at this time, and who sought to take the teaching of Christ into the very territory in which we are interested wrote that, "Claiming to be wise they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man or birds or animals or reptiles." He further declares that they were "filled with all manner of wickedness, evil, covetousness, malice. Full of envy, murder, strife, deceit, malignity, they are gossips, slanderers, haters of God, insolent, haughty, boastful, inventors of evil, disobedient to parents, foolish, faithless, heartless, ruthless."

Deities were multiplied until there was a god for everything and anything answered for a god. There was a god for the trees of the forest and each tree in the forest could become a god. Athens which became a center for learning was full of statues dedicated to different deities. Those of various countries were so crowded together that it was said, "In Athens it is easier to find a god than a man."

Rome exceeded Athens in the number of her gods only, by having, as mistress of the world, all nations to collect from and all forms of paganism to countenance. In "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" Gibbon says, "the deities of a thousand groves and a thousand streams possessed in peace their local and respective influence; nor could the Roman who depreciated the wrath of the Tiber, deride the Egyptian who presented his offering to the beneficent genius of the Nile. Every virtue and every vice acquired its divine representative, every art and profession its patron, whose attributes, in the most distant ages and countries, were uniformly derived from the character of their particular votaries. It was the custom of the Roman to tempt the protectors of besieged cities by the promise of more distinguished honor than they possessed in their native country. Rome gradually became the common temple of her subjects, and the freedom of the city was bestowed on the gods of mankind."

At the very time when Peter was announcing to the Gentile Cornelius the only remedy for sin and evil, the gospel of Christ, Seneca, the Stoic professor, was writing, "The world is filled with crimes and vices. Things are too far gone to be healed by any regimen. Men are battling for the palm of reprobate manners. Each day lust waxes and shame wanes. Trampling down all that is good and sacred, lust hies it whithersoever it will. Vices no longer shun the light. So barefaced is wickedness become, and so wildly does it blaze up in all bosoms, that innocence is not to say rare, but is nowhere to be found."

Contrast this with the letter of Clement to Diognetus. After eloquently demonstrating the vanity of the heathen idols, and the superstitious practices of the Jews, he continues: "The Christians are not separated from other men by earthly abode, by language or by custom. Nowhere do they dwell in cities by themselves. They do not use a different speech, or affect a life of singularity. They dwell in the cities of the Greeks and barbarians, each as his lot has been cast; and while they conform to the usages of the country in respect to dress, food and other things pertaining to the outward life, they yet show a peculiarity of conduct wondrous to all. They inhabit their native country, but as strangers. They take their share of all burdens as citizens, and yet endure all kinds of wrong as though they were foreigners. Every strange soil is their fatherland, and everyone's fatherland is a strange soil unto them. They are in the flesh but they live not after the flesh. They tarry on earth, but their citizenship is in heaven. They obey the laws, and they conquer the laws by their lives. They love all, and are persecuted by all. They are unknown and yet are condemned; they are killed, and made alive. They are poor, and make many rich. They are blasphemed, and yet justified. They are reviled, and they bless . . . What the soul is to the body, that Christians are in the world. The soul dwells in the body and yet is not of the body; and Christians dwell in the world but are not of the world."

In the Beginning

Buried Treasure

Contents

When our Lord was upon earth he spent his entire life in an occupied country. Roman soldiers were garrisoned throughout Palestine, and were not always considerate of the feelings of the Jewish populace. Frequently unprovoked attacks were made upon their homes and anything of value was confiscated. Many of the country and village inhabitants had little use for the officials in Jerusalem, because they regarded them as collaborationists with the occupational forces.

For this reason many people hid their valuables in the earth, or in caves. Often the location was forgotten, or the individual who deposited the money, or other securities, was killed. It was not an uncommon thing for one to stumble rather casually upon a treasure trove, and this gave rise to one of the parables of Jesus. Our Lord told two stories of discovery which bear some relationship to each other.

The first is that of a gem merchant, possessed with an obsession that he must locate a flawless pearl. He traveled over the face of the known globe and finally found that for which he had diligently sought. The second is the story of a man who was walking through a field and inadvertently came upon a treasure that had been hidden. I am convinced that the point of these parables is the different way in which truth is discovered. Some men find it only after long and arduous sacrifice and effort. Others, almost without effort, seem to be kicking about, and there it is.

My purpose today is not to emphasize the methods involved in locating truth, but to draw attention to the fact that there is a hidden treasure available, and there is no greater adventure possible for the human mind, than to seek for it. I have long held that the Creator of the universe and the Author of truth, wrote two books called Nature and Revelation. Both of these have one feature in common— they release their knowledge constantly and on an ascending scale. Therefore, no generation will ever exhaust the possibilities of either.

I do not believe there is a single atom that has come into existence since God rested on the seventh day, but we are discovering new facts about atomic energy every day. Thousands of gleaming laboratories all over the earth furnish testing grounds for every conceivable kind of research into natural phenomena, and yet it is the universal opinion of scientists that we have just scratched the surface. I am persuaded that when our Lord descends from heaven with a shout, when the heavens shall be rolled back as a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat, there will still be unsolved problems in the physical universe.

In the same way I hold that there has not been a single truth added to the revelation of God since the lonely seer upon crescent-shaped Patmos, penned the words, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all," wiped the ink from the quill, and rolled up the scroll. Since that day tens of thousands of books have been written on Biblical themes, and never a day goes by that the whirring presses do not turn out hundreds more in all of the recorded languages of mankind. Yet there are depths not yet probed, and veins not yet mined.

It is one of the tragedies of the ages that each generation thinks it has exhausted the possibilities of Biblical research and, instead of seeking for regions beyond, concludes there are none, and girds itself to defend the status quo. Almost every great breakthrough has come because of efforts of intrepid and courageous individuals, and almost every one has been violently opposed by the church. The fact is that history will show that we owe all of our spiritual progress to men who were branded as "heretics" and hounded out by their contemporaries.

Almost all of us are at least possessed of a passing knowledge of the troubles incurred by Galileo. When I read of his remarkable discoveries in the fields of mathematics, science, and medicine, and realize how each bit of modern research serves but to confirm what he taught, I am amazed that he could encompass within one mind all that he learned. But the institutional church of his day had declared the earth to be fixed, and the center around which the rest of the universe revolved, and when Galileo adopted the Copernican theory he was summoned to appear before Pope Paul V and admonished to relinquish immediately the heretical proposition that this is a solar system, and that the sun is the center.

Our position with reference to this is that it is exactly what you might expect from Catholics, and that popes are handy about plastering the label of heretic upon anyone who does not agree with them. But I suggest that we continue to assail Rome and not examine our own history too closely. We have had our share of Galileos also. It is abundantly evident that every religious movement eventually gravitates into the control of the priestly class, and when it does, the prophets are killed. Priests are interested in maintaining things as they are. Prophets are concerned with having things as God wants them. The first tells it like it is, the other like it ought to be. One wants to continue turning the cider mill; the other often upsets the apple-cart!

There has never been a reformation that was not sparked by heretics. The heroes of today are the heretics of yesterday. A heretic is one who has not yet waited long enough. One generation stones the prophets to death, the next gathers the stones and piles them up as a monument so their memory will live. In view of the unpopularity of original thinking, and the dangers incurred in Biblical exploration, precious little of it has been done in the realm of the Spirit. Thus, while we have made great strides in bringing the physical universe closer together we have accomplished relatively little toward uniting the whole family of God.

To some extent we have discouraged original thought and held a threat over the heads of those who engaged in it. This always results in three things. First, it produces sterility. Inbred thinking is like inbred social structure. It perpetuates and proliferates weaknesses until eventually virility disappears. In the spiritual realm it produces a generation of parrots who proclaim over and over the same inherited sermon outlines whether relevant to cultural needs or not. And anything which produces parrots is for the birds.

Second, it creates an atmosphere of unhealthful fright. Men whose inner beings throb and pulsate with the urge to speak forth the whole truth are held back, perhaps because of one elder, or an organized clique or claque, whose theme song is "I Will Not Be, I Will Not Be Moved!" It is hard to chase the devil while looking over your left shoulder to keep an eye cocked on your brethren. Most preachers are never allowed to get up steam of their own. They are kept hot under the collar from the warm breath of a posse of vigilantes blowing down the necks of their Drip-Dry Arrow shirts.

Third, it stifles the spirit of adventure. The word of God is loaded with hidden treasure never yet brought to light. But much of it will not be found by those who get a vicarious thrill from reading "The Gold Bug" by Poe, or "Treasure Island" by Stevenson. All of us have the longing for adventure when we are young. I used to lie in the hay-loft on a rainy day trying to decide whether I would be a lion-tamer, an Arctic explorer, or something useful, like a pirate. But when I really met Jesus Christ the problem was settled, and the greatest adventure possible began.

I am aware of all of the implications of the statement of Jesus about accepting his teachings as a little child, but I personally wonder if he may not have included in it the wide-eyed wonder with which a tow-headed kid accepts the challenge of that which lifts him in imagination out of his everyday world. As some of you know, a few years ago I did a series of articles entitled, "Adventures in Religion," and I confess that it was an exhilarating experience in my life.

It seems too bad that the church has to get old, and grow senile, and its members become sedentary, and want to doze in the rocking-chairs on God's front porch, and growl at the "Jesus Folk" who can walk barefoot on the rough sidewalk or pebbly driveway. The church was never intended to be a retirement center or a vacation retreat. It should be a research center, a truth laboratory, the headquarters of a divine exploration society. Certainly it should not have the atmosphere of a morgue.

Of course there are no truths new to God, but there are truths which can be new to us. They are old when measured by time, but new when judged by our understanding. And some which were once known, have since been lost, and need to be rescued from the ocean floor and brought to the surface again. We are indebted to every person in the world who shares a truth with us, but we must ourselves become explorers of God's rich domain and bring to light those concepts which will brighten the world.

The great Pennsylvania oil deposits were discovered by an astute observer. A farmer noticed that his cows would not drink from the waters of a creek which flowed through his pasture. He found an oily scum on the surface of the water. He decided to sell the place as soon as he could find a buyer, and he did so. The new owner also found the scum, but he had it analyzed and found it to be oil of a high quality seeping up from a subterranean depth. The original developer continued to pump until his wells began to slack off a bit. Then he sold out, congratulating himself upon his cleverness. But the next investors drilled deeper and discovered a pool which made the first one seem like a puddle.

Those who think they have already discovered all there is to find are always upset when I talk like this. They write me blistering letters and accuse me of encouraging people to "go beyond" the doctrine of Christ. They ask me to name one thing in God's plan they have not restored. Most of the time I just write "Humility" on the bottom of their letters and mail them back. But the trouble with such brethren is that they suffer from delusions of grandeur and fantasies of infallibility. No one will go beyond the doctrine of Christ as long as he delves deeper into it. His tunnel may bring him up outside of our party walls, but he will not be the first person to escape from prison unexpectedly.

I am quite convinced that there are depths we have not yet explored, and when we get more fully into them we will find ourselves increasing in appreciation for God's grace. For example, a few years ago, while I was in Scotland, I became interested in studying the relationship of the synagogue and ekklesia, or synagogue and church, as we would say. When I returned to the United States I haunted the libraries of great seminaries, reading assiduously and following every new lead as far as I could go.

Repeatedly I found reference to Vitringa, the Dutch scholar of many years ago. I wrote for information to the librarian at Yale, who informed me they had an ancient copy of his work, but it was in Latin. He doubted that it had ever been translated into English since theological studies several centuries ago were all conducted in Latin. But, from the librarian at Princeton, I learned that an English translation had been made by a Gilbert Fellowes. I put four book-finders from the "Antiquarian Book Society" in Great Britain on the trail. One of them wrote that there was a copy in the shelves of the library of the University of Aberdeen, Scotland. I arranged an inter-library loan and was able to have this old leather-bound volume for thirty days inspection and study.

The result of my research changed many of my concepts about the ekklesia of God. I could see why James would write about a gathering of the saints and say, "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come into your synagogue a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, etc." (James 2:1, 2). I received a wholly different impression about the perennial argument over the name the church should wear. The nature and structure of the primitive community of the saints was suddenly clearer in my mind. I came to understand why the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus, in A. D. 70, was essential to the preservation and purity of the Good News.

Of the greatest importance was the insight and incentive that I received for work with the Jews of our day, and the many visits I made to their modern temples and synagogues stemmed from the almost accidental resolution made one day in Scotland to study the relationship of two institutions existing side by side, but sometimes in direct conjunction in the first century. And while I never have developed the theme in class or in print, my book The Royal Priesthood is a by-product. A great deal of the research for it was done in the library of Temple Israel.

I must not bore you with this type of thing but I should like to mention that, among other things, I was forced to change my mind about the Pharisees. When I came to understand their purpose and aim I knew why Jesus told the multitudes, "All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do." I also knew what he meant when he said, "But do not ye after their works: for they say and do not." My respect for the Pharisees was increased by a knowledge of their goal, and this was good, because, while I am quite convinced that we have failed thus far in restoring the first-century church, I do think we have succeeded beyond our dreams in restoring the first-century Pharisees.

There are hidden treasures in many of the words which the Spirit employed. We tend, because of familiarity with them, to run over them, as one would drive a car over gold-bearing rock. Occasionally there is a glint in the sunlight, but we are too busy to stop and investigate. Fortunately, we have better tools with which to labor in our generation. The spades of the archaeologists have uncovered all sorts of meaningful records which are flashlights to illuminate words and passages in the divine record. Each new find corroborates the authenticity and validity of God's revelation. In doing so, it provides us with additional information as a foundation for study.

I think, for instance, that we have not exhausted the possibilities involved in such expressions as "the glory of God." We ought to be deeply concerned about it, because we hope to share in it. I find myself being drawn more and more into a study of "the glory." This is because of my deep interest in the prayer of Jesus for oneness of the believers, as a condition of universal acceptance of the supreme fact of the ages. Many of our brethren who can quote John 17:20, 21, have never stopped to underline the words "glorify," and "glory," in the chapter in which these verses occur.

But the prayer of Jesus is not only for a sharing of oneness in the faith, but of sharing in the glory of God. "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (verse 5). "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee" (verses 20, 21).

What connection is there between the glory of God and oneness in Christ? There must be some relationship because Jesus goes right on to say, "And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one." Does this teach that our oneness is a given unity, and that it is not related to sharing intellectual concepts, ideas, opinions, and doctrinal interpretations? If the glory which God bestowed upon Jesus, is in turn bestowed upon his disciples that they might be one, what is this glory, and how does it produce this oneness?

Our Lord continues in these words: "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me." To be one as God and Christ are one is made contingent upon receiving the glory. The glory existed before the world was made. It was shared with Jesus and now he shares it with the new creation, and he does so that they may be one as he and the Father are one. The divine unity is a sharing of glory, and to possess this unity we must possess this glory.

This means that the Father is in the Son, and the Son is in the saints. "I in them, and thou in me." By sharing the divine glory we become one, not only with one another, but with God and the Living Word. "That they may be made perfect in one." And when this marvelous, transcendent relationship exists two things will result. The world will know that God has sent Jesus, that is, that heaven invaded the earth. And it will know that God loves all of his sons as he loved his only begotten Son.

Now I must confess that I have never yet seen an exhaustive treatise on the nature of the glory of God. There are some excellent word studies, and many precious gems have been mined, but I suspect that there is a great deal more to be discovered. Since Paul declares that one of the things belonging to his kinsmen in the flesh, the Israelites, was the glory (Romans 9:4), perhaps we must await the conversion and commitment of some of these to the Messiah, in order to increase our fund of knowledge.

Not long ago I was thinking about this aspect of it, when I discovered that the Hebrew root word for glory is one which literally means "weight," that which is heavy. Immediately I recalled the words of Paul, given in comfort to the harassed and tormented in this life. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Since that time I have not been able to eliminate either the thought or phrase from my mind. Glory is not an evanescent, fleeting quality. It is not as light as a feather but as solid as faith in the eternal values.

But this is enough about one word and the great unexplored vistas which lie ahead to challenge us. We have not yet scaled all of the snow-capped peaks of revelation. We must enlist mountain-climbers who will toil upward, risking prestige and reputation with the party, to survey distant ranges. There must be "spelunkers" in the church, brethren who cannot rest easy until they have explored the deepest recesses of the cavern of truth. And when they have gone more deeply into God's word they may learn that we should have been emphasizing "the unity of glory" rather than thinking so much of "the glory of unity." For there is no glory in simply being united. The power is present when we are united in and for the glory of the Lord.

The blessing of recovering hidden treasure from the word of God lies in the fact that it helps to consecrate life and sanctify death. And frequently a word or phrase which seems inconsequential will prove to be of inestimable value. A deep-sea diver who specializes in the exploration of wrecks on the ocean floor, recently told how he brought up a small encrusted object which, when carefully pried apart consisted of a handful of antique Spanish silver coins. I felt almost as much pleasure as he did when I discovered what lay beneath the surface of the little word "depart," in the statement of Paul: "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which for me is far better."

The Greeks used the word for "loosing the hawser" of a ship moored to the dock, and allowing the vessel to drift out to the unknown sea. Nothing is more majestic to me than the sight of a huge liner slowly backing out into the harbor in preparation for a voyage to far-away lands beyond the horizon. In life I am bound to the dock. I am not free. Though I may strain at the ropes I am still held captive. But death is the harbor-master who lifts the ropes and casts them off and frees me to sail into the sunset. Tennyson caught the picture in "Crossing The Bar," when he wrote, "And may there be no moaning of the bar, when I put out to sea."

But the Greeks used the word in another sense. It was their term for "striking a tent," that is, taking down a tent and rolling it up, at the end of a campaign. When a weary battle was over, and the sound of fighting had died away, the order was given to take down the tents, and prepare to go home. That is the way Paul regarded death. He had fought a good fight, and he was now ready to move out of the tent in which he had been living under great hardship. The earthly tabernacle was to be folded up and deposited in the container made for it, while the soldier, mustered out, stacked his arms and prepared for the journey back home. When the Christian dies, he does not leave home, he goes home!

There was also a third way in which the word was used. It was employed to describe the removal of a load from the back of a pack animal at the close of day. Picture, if you can, a long train of camels or donkeys, each carrying a heavy burden, plodding along through the heat of the day. The animals grow ever more footsore and weary. Then as the sun turns the western sky to red and gold, and the cool breeze of the dusk fans the desert, a halt is called, and the loads are lifted and thrown to the ground. The welcome rest has come at last.

Death is the lifting of the load. No more sorrow, pain and grief can cause heaviness. There shall be no more pain, or sorrow, or weeping. All of this is caught up in the word "depart" as used by Paul, and it makes death more tolerable, more welcome and friendly. And there are hundreds of words such as this, flecked with the precious ore which, once released will brighten our lives, kindle our hope afresh and give meaning to the frail existence which is ours in this world.

It is for this reason that I trust that none of you will be content to simply camp upon the slopes to which our fathers have attained. There are higher mountains yet ahead, and more noble peaks to be ascended. Do not be content with a mere holding action. We were not called to hold the fort but to storm it. Our task is to climb walls and not build them. If you make of yourselves divine researchers in the fields of God, you may yet recover for us some glowing bloom of truth, and there will be one less flower "born to blush unseen and waste its fragrance on the desert air."

We must use our Bible classes as launching pads to put us into orbit, and not allow them to become simply feeding stations where we come to fill ourselves on the food which others have processed, and grow lazy and torpid because of the ease of picking up that which others have scattered. The mind must be exercised if it is to become strong, and this means that it must be taught the art of meditation, a word which, in the Hebrew, means "chewing the cud."

Just as a cow regurgitates the food she has collected in her first stomach and chews it over and over to derive every particle of nourishment from it, so we must recall the things which we have studied to mull them over in a serious fashion and extract from them every bit of precious meaning. The sheep of God, like all other sheep, were intended to be ruminants, and only as we ruminate upon truth can we survive.

Preaching Under Difficulty

Contents

I think that, among all of the preachers of the gospel mentioned in the Bible, Timothy remains one of my favorites. This probably results from my knowledge of the circumstances which combined to make it difficult for him to achieve his goal. It has been said that you can prove by the law of aerodynamics that a bumblebee cannot fly. The size of his body, coupled with the shortness and frailty of his wings makes it impossible for him to lift his body into the air. Fortunately, the bumblebee has not studied science, and does not know what he cannot do, so he goes on and does it anyway. It must have been a little that way with Timothy and preaching.

If he had been attending the Sunrise School of Preaching in Lystra, he would undoubtedly have been voted the student least likely to succeed. Just about everything was against him. And if you are discouraged by some of your little hangups and setbacks, it might serve a good purpose for you to review a few of his handicaps.

1. Timothy was the offspring of a racially-mixed marriage. His mother was a Jewess, but his father was a Greek. We do not know what possessed Eunice to fall in love with a man of another, and a despised race. She was Orthodox, and she knew what the social penalty was for one who was married to a Gentile. I wonder what transpired at home when she informed her mother of her intention. In any event she went ahead with her plans, and we hope that when little Timothy arrived on the scene, all was forgiven.

But I would also like to know what happened when the baby approached the eighth day of his life. Eunice had been reared in the unfeigned faith of the Law. She realized that without circumcision her baby would not be recognized as one of the covenant people. Perhaps his father thought that this rite was silly and unnecessary, and he may have actually forbidden it. In any event, we know that the little lad was not circumcised.

2. So Timothy was the scion of a home which was divided over religion. And I can personally testify of the impact of such schism upon the mind of a tender child. When I first remember the home into which I was born, I recall that my father was an agnostic and my mother a devout Lutheran. Hers was a family tradition running back for several generations in Denmark. And although I was sprinkled and christened before I was a month old by the Reverend Mr. Peterson, I was still a pawn for family strife after I became old enough to realize it.

It is a tribute to the grace of God that our family eventually became united in Christ. We are not certain that the father of Timothy ever became a believer. There is a reasonable presumption that he did not. Was he a patron of one of the philosophic cults, or a worshiper of false deities? We do not know. We are certain of one thing, that an unpretended faith dwelt in the grandmother as well as the mother of Timothy.

3. Timothy was reared in a pagan environment. He was far removed from the center of Jewish influence, the temple, the priesthood, and the daily liturgy. The children with whom he played and attended school were from heathen homes. He was subjected to all of the superstitions with which the area was rife, and it was one of the worst in Asia Minor.

4. Timothy was subjected to prejudice, probably from both Jews and Greeks. Circumcision was an explosive issue, filled with opportunities for demonstration of open hostility, and this undoubtedly created a traumatic situation for a growing lad. Even when he was grown and had been converted to Christ, it was necessary for Paul to circumcise him because of the Jews who resided in that region. He would have been barred from synagogues and homes alike if this surgery had not been performed, and even then was no doubt looked at askance because it was not done on the prescribed day.

5. Timothy appears to have been emotional in his own personality. Paul wrote him that he prayed for him both night and day, and eagerly longed to see him. He stated that one reason he was so anxious to visit him was because he knew of the weeping in which Timothy engaged during their separation. Certainly this was a demonstration of tender concern, but it suggests to us that the young man found it difficult to be "a loner," and was deeply affected when absent from the man he respected so highly.

6. He was also weak and sick a good deal of the time. Although one needed a good physique and a healthy body to endure the rigors of travel by land and sea, Timothy was undoubtedly handicapped. Paul writes to advise him to "Stop drinking water, and use a little wine for the sake of your stomach, and to help your frequent illnesses."

Whatever the condition which beset Timothy, we can be certain that it was constantly recurring and chronic, and was either intensified by drinking the water at Ephesus, or induced by it. At the time, wine was recognized as one of the best medicines available to aid digestion and soothe stomach upset. This was before the days of Tums and Di-Gel. The prescription of the apostle helps us to realize the misfortune which beset the young preacher.

7. One hardly needs to read between the lines to realize that Timothy also suffered from times of depression in which he probably doubted the wisdom of continuing to pursue the work of an evangelist. At such times he allowed the gift of God to be unused and its power to erode away, while he gave way to unnatural fears and unwholesome attitudes.

It is interesting to study the psychology of Paul in snapping him out of his mood and getting him back into the service. Perhaps you will pardon me for mentioning the method employed by which to renew his spirit.

1. The apostle tells Timothy how much he meant to him. He states that he daily thanks God for making it possible for him to come to know him. Paul had much for which to thank God because both he and his forefathers had long since served God with a clear conscience, but in spite of all that had happened, it was a high spot in his life to know Timothy.

2. The faith which operated in Timothy was a rich and priceless heirloom from his mother and grandmother. They had clung to it, cherished it and nourished it, even in a pagan world. And their faith was genuine. It was real. If Timothy failed or washed out, he would break the hearts of those who loved him most. From a child they had taught and prepared him in the sacred scriptures, and he was their hope of keeping the light shining.

3. Paul reminds him of the time when he was ordained to go forth as an evangelist. One who possessed the gift of prophecy had designated Timothy as a potential candidate to further the work of evangelism. When the day came for the local presbyters to lay hands upon him and dedicate him to this holy function, the apostle also laid hands upon him and bestowed an enabling gift. Apparently there was a fervency about Timothy at this time that was beautiful to behold.

4. Paul tells him that the purpose of God's gift was not to produce craven fear in the heart. One who loses confidence and draws back from his responsibility is not pleasing God by such action, but is unfitting his life for the fulfillment of the divine purpose.

5. Timothy is again told what God provides for one who is completely committed to the divine will. He is made the recipient of inner power which will not desert him in difficult times, nor become depleted by distress. God supplies the power to perform his purpose. One need never shirk back in despondency. If he marches forward at the command of God he will open up the way as he did for Israel.

God provides love. This is the greatest deterrent to discouragement, the dynamic to devotion, and the dedication to daring. Love eliminates fear like the sun burns away the fog, or drives away the night. And he who gives us love also gives us the spirit of self-control. There is no adequate way to translate sophronismos into English. William Barclay writes that someone translated it as "the sanity of saintliness."

Certainly by this time we can all see that the letters which Paul wrote to Timothy were simply that— letters of an older preacher to a young one whom he loved, written to encourage, strengthen and fortify him for the difficult work in which he was involved. Paul was not writing "to lay down the law to Timothy," nor to lay down a law for us. He was expressing himself in love when he said, "That is why I send you this reminder to keep at white heat the gift that is in you and which came to you through the laying of my hands upon you; for God did not give us the spirit of craven fear, but of power and love and self-discipline."

I don't want you to get a false impression about Timothy, or conclude that he did not make it, or that he became a wishy-washy, muddle-headed, whining minister of mediocrity. The tremendous lesson to learn from all I have said is that, in spite of his physical, sociological, cultural, natural and temperamental handicaps, he did not give up. And the apostle paid him high tribute for the victory he won.

Of course, we are liable to credit all of this to the fact that he had received a special gift through imposition of the hands of Paul, and excuse our own laziness and neglect by saying with a deep sigh, that if we had been as fortunate as young Timothy we too might have made the grade, instead of having the grade we made. Many a man lets his teeth decay while bemoaning the fact that he was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth, and any of us should know that a good set of teeth is worth more in the mouth than a good set of spoons.

But I happen to know of a man in our age who was much like Timothy. I learned his story from others in a simple rural area where I held a good many meetings. His father died when he was but a little lad, and the widowed mother was left to depend upon her own efforts and the mercy of the neighbors for survival. The boy, Tom, hired out to work for nearby farmers from the time he was old enough to drive a team of horses. And he seemed to be imbued with the idea that he wanted to become a preacher of the Word.

He read the Bible every spare minute. He memorized so much of it before he got out of the eighth grade that people thought he was developing into a religious fanatic and would "crack up." He grew into the habit of practicing public speaking while riding the cultivator and was subjected to all kinds of merriment and ridicule. When he was in a crowd someone would say, "I hired Tom to plow that ten acres down by the creek, and he can't tell the difference between a cornfield and a mission field. He held a revival up and down the rows and converted six stalks of corn and a hickory sapling. Apparently his message is corny because I could see all of the stalks bending their ears as he went by."

But Tom would not be discouraged, and finally a couple of men went over to his mother's house one night to talk with him. They told him that they came as friends but they wanted him to know that his obsession was a crazy fantasy, and he ought to give it up, and that everyone was laughing at him behind his back. He was sixteen years old at the time, but instead of giving up he asked the men if they would try and arrange for him to speak at the Sunday morning meeting.

When nothing else would prevail they agreed, and when the time came Tom made a miserable failure. He was nervous, distraught and shaky. He had to give up and sit down after about ten minutes. His subject had completely fled from his memory. The elders told him that he had now demonstrated that he did not have what it took, and asked him to give up the crazy notion. It was then that he asked his mother to move to a distant state and to a city where some of their relatives resided. This they did.

To shorten this narrative let me mention that two years before I came into the area, Tom had been called for a series of gospel meetings. His messages kindled a fire in the hearts of the hearers. The audience grew to such proportions that several hundred stood outside the house to listen. Standing on the same platform where he had made his failure he preached with such power and fervency that people were led to Christ at every service. He immersed more than a hundred persons in two weeks, including most of the grandchildren of the very ones who had advised him to give up the idea that he could preach the gospel.

Now, with your kind indulgence, I want to note with you again the apostolic charge under which the evangelist goes forth into the world to fulfill the purpose of God in his life. It is found in 2 Timothy 4:1, 2. "I charge you in the presence of God and of Jesus Christ who is to judge the living and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom: preach the word, be urgent in season and out of season, convince, rebuke, and exhort, be unfailing in patience and in teaching."

The greatness and majesty of an action can often be judged by the nature of those in whose presence it is performed and who are called upon to witness it. Frequently the newspapers show a picture of the president of the United States signing into law a bill submitted by the Congress. Generally he is surrounded by a group of dignitaries and high officials, and their presence as witnesses adds dignity and luster to the proceedings.

The charge delivered by Paul, who was an ambassador for Christ, was pronounced in the presence of the Father and the Son, and thus we can be sure that it was given with their approval and sanction. There are three things added about Jesus which are calculated to enforce the charge and increase the solemnity attendant upon it.

1. Jesus is judge of the living and the dead. Those who accept responsibility for any phase of service must do so with the understanding that they will give an account for the manner in which they discharge the task. When Daniel Webster was asked to state the most important thought which ever occurred to him, he replied, "The most important thought I ever had was that of my individual responsibility to God."

2. Jesus is coming again. The evangelist is charged in view of his appearing. Now the word for appearing is an interesting one indeed. It is epiphaneia, and this is the word which was used when the Emperor went to visit one of the cities or provinces. It was always a tremendous event, a great holiday filled with pageantry and color. And it necessitated a lot of preparation.

Houses were painted, streets were cleaned, public buildings were decorated, and all of the citizenry attired in the finest clothing possible. The approach of the Emperor was heralded by a trumpet, and when he arrived he bestowed gifts and honors upon the deserving. It was my good fortune to be in North

Ireland just before a visit of the Queen. Everything was carried on in anticipation of this great event, and a state of constant readiness was maintained. This is the way in which we should look forward to the coming of the Son of God.

A number of years ago, in Omaha, a mother had taken her little girl to hear a very famous evangelist, who spoke on that Sunday afternoon on, "The Second Coming of Christ." The mother supposed that her little child had not listened very intently, but as they were walking home, the little girl looked up at her mother, and asked, "Mother is Jesus really coming back again?" "Yes, darling," the mother replied, "he is coming." "Well, is he coming to Omaha?" "Yes, he is coming to Omaha, dear." "Mother, is he coming to our house?" The mother said, "Yes, he is coming to our house, but why do you ask that." The little girl replied, "Well, if he is going to come to our house, we'd better hurry home and get ready for him."

3. Jesus is coming in his kingdom and glory. The first time he came in the form of a slave, but when he comes again it will be as King of kings, supreme in all the universe. I must ever be conscious that the message I carry is not a common message. I am on business for my king. The word I carry is his word.

Then, what does it mean to preach? The answer is simple. The Greek word means "to proclaim as a herald." It may be difficult for us to grasp the significance of this because of our modern inventions for disseminating news. We are conditioned by the printing press, the radio and television. But before there were any of these media, the news was carried and announced by the mouths of men.

Accompanying the armies were fleet-footed runners. It was the duty of these men to carry the tidings of battle to the waiting populace. Often the people gathered on the wall and its ramparts with eyes glued to the horizon, waiting anxiously for sight of the runner with the news of the battle. The most famous of these in history was no doubt the anonymous Athenian who ran the eighteen miles from the plains of Marathon to Athens with news of the defeat of the Persian army under Darius the Great by the Athenian forces under the celebrated general Miltiades.

These runners were heralds and they were especially welcome when they brought news of victory. Their coming meant that there would be great joy in the city. It was precisely this picture Paul had in mind when he talks about the victory in Jesus which saved the lost race of mankind. "But how are men to call upon him in whom they have not believed? And how are they to believe in him of whom they have never heard? And how are they to hear without a proclaimer? And how can men proclaim unless they are sent? As it is written 'How beautiful are the feet of those who herald good news.'"

Do you consider yourself a herald who has just come through the fire of conflict and been delivered from impending death? Do you feel your heart bursting with the message of deliverance, which you want to make known to those who are still wavering between hope and despair? Are you more concerned with getting through with the good news or with getting your salary on time? Is the comfort of the message of greater priority than your own physical comfort? These are questions which we must face if we are to be heralds of the king.

We are to be urgent in season and out of season. That is simply another way of saying that we must be on the job all of the time. "In season" means when everything seems just right, and "out of season" means when everything seems all wrong. Sometimes when things are stacked against us, God has done the stacking. If we are discouraged and disgruntled, and sitting on the sidelines, the work will lag at the very time that it ought to get going. John Wesley once said, "Get on fire for God, and men will come to see you burn."

Benjamin Franklin wrote in Poor Richard's Almanac these words: "The man who does things makes many mistakes, but he never makes the biggest mistake of all— doing nothing." Thomas Edison said: "When everyone else is quitting on a problem, that is the time when I begin." The preacher who moves because he cannot see anything left to do where he is, will not likely do much where he goes. The problem is not with the community but with himself. There is no excuse for a Christian to have "tired blood" as the television commercials label it, for we are operating with the blood of Christ and not with our own.

One who proclaims the word is charged with the solemn responsibility to "reprove, rebuke and exhort." The first carries the idea of conviction, and this necessitates pointing out guilt or sin so plainly and forcibly that one is judged at the bar of his own conscience, and there falls under condemnation. One cannot be faithful to his mission and let a sinner feel at ease in his sin. Nathan convicted David, Daniel convicted Belshazzar, John the Baptist convicted the Pharisees and Sadducees who made the trek out to the place where he was baptizing. More than anything else today our world needs to be brought to repentance. We stress baptism so much that we often immerse those who have not turned from their sin, and we fill the congregation with "incubator babies," who have to be pampered the rest of their lives, and who never grow up in the faith.

To rebuke is to censure and admonish. It is unfortunate that we live in an age which is permissive. When "anything goes," everything does. But we do no man good when we condone his evil. We become his worst enemy while trying to be his friend. Even Paul was forced to ask, "Am I become your enemy by telling you the truth?" No one can faithfully teach all that is found in the letters of the apostles without rebuking evil. Many of these were written for the very purpose of correcting existing ills, and human nature has not changed.

Exhortation is the encouragement to do that which one is capable of performing. Just as many a gem "of purest ray serene" lies hidden in the earth, never to gladden the heart of man, so many a talent has been undiscovered and the world is the poorer for it.

Sir Walter Scott, in his later years, used to tell how shy and backward he was when a youngster. Upon one occasion, as a mere lad, he was visiting a castle in Scotland, to which the famous poet Robert Burns came. Burns spoke kindly to the boy, and said in departing: "You will be a great man in Scotland, my lad. You have it in you to be a writer." Scott went home and cried all night for joy because of these few words of recognition.

It is possible that Alexander the Great would never have become a world conqueror at all, if it had not been for Clitus, the boyhood friend who encouraged him to press on, and who saved his life at the battle of Granicus. It is a tragic mark against the character of Alexander that he killed his friend, striking him down with the sword in a drunken rage. But I think that it is interesting that the graffiti of ancient Greece, portrayed a friend in the simple drawing of a person, across whose tunic were written the words "Summer and winter." A friend is one who encourages you "in season and out of season."

All of us are aware of how much David depended upon Jonathan, who unselfishly encouraged him to fulfill his destiny as king. And who is there present in this audience, whose own spirit has not been refreshed by reading the words which David penned? I go to Paul for exhortation and comfort as if I had personally known him all my life, or as if he and Tertius lived across the street. And if there come those moments when I wonder about my course or ability to carry on, I go to the divine medicine chest, and read the directions on the prescription as given by Paul, and I am ready to go again.

I am thoroughly convinced that the Good News about Jesus is the message our world needs to hear. I have not one doubt about its dynamic power. It has changed my life, strengthened my spirit, quelled my fears, and given me a vibrant hope for the future. It is the bread of life when I am hungry, the water of life when I am thirsty, the staff of life when I am weary, and the strength of life when I stumble. God's word is like the cool shadow of a rock in a weary land.

In the cathedral at Dijon, France, there is a great and massive pulpit chiseled from stone. Just beneath it is the figure of an angel sitting. It is beautifully and delicately carved. It is the recording angel, holding a writing tablet in one hand, and in the other a pen poised ready to write. The face of the angel is turned expectantly upward to the pulpit, waiting and ready to record what the preacher says.

I want to remember that the recording angel is always present when I speak, whether in a cathedral or a country-church building, whether in a living-room or an assembly room in a Student Union building on campus. And although I may forget the words that I speak, heaven will not. Some day I will face them again. Every word, and every secret thing, shall be brought into judgment. It is for this reason that it seems appropriate for me to close as Paul closed his first letter to Timothy.

"O Timothy, guard what has been entrusted to you. Avoid the godless chatter and contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge, for by professing it some have missed the mark as regards the faith. Grace be with you."

Three Great Errors

Contents

The restoration was the result of the Second Great Awakening, which was a partial spin-off from the French Revolution, among other historical events. It would require too much time and space to document this, and I will forego the pleasure of doing so. It began primarily with sober and serious Presbyterians with an occasional assist from some Methodists and Baptists, and it began as "a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects," as Alexander Campbell referred to it in 1835.

Actually, it was not "the restoration movement" at all, as if it were the only one. It was a restoration movement. It was but one of about sixteen such movements which were launched in those heady days. It was a cultural something, which seemed called for by the times. Some of the movements merged into contemporary sects, but a great many of them died with their emigrant founders. The term "restoration movement" was hardly used by our fathers. They spoke of it as "the current reformation."

This served to distinguish it from the Protestant Reformation which Campbell declared "is proved to have been one of the most splendid eras in the history of the world, and must long be regarded by the philosopher and the philanthropist as one of the most gracious interpositions in behalf of the whole human race."

He continued "We Americans owe our national privileges and our civil liberties to the Protestant Reformers. They achieved not only an imperishable name for themselves, but a rich legacy for their posterity. When we contrast the present state of the United States with Spanish America, and the condition of the English nation with that of Spain, Portugal and Italy, we begin to appreciate how much we are indebted to the intelligence, faith and courage of Martin Luther and his heroic associates in that glorious reformation."

These men were not unaware of the difference in setting and its effect upon their ideals and purposes. The great contrast with Rome and its political intrigues, its rich hierarchy and its mendicant suppliants, its art forms and statuary, its political structures and pompous liturgy, with the American frontier was everywhere manifest. Too, the stolid German character, demonstrated by both the nobility and peasantry was a far cry from the reckless American who was ever restless and ready to challenge the wilderness.

Thomas Campbell relied upon the freedom and liberty of the new world to spread the good news of a united Church. "Dearly beloved brethren, why should we think it a thing incredible that the Church of Christ, in this highly favored country, should resume that original unity, peace and purity which belong to its constitution, and constitute its glory?" Again, "The favorable opportunity which Divine Providence has put into your hands, in this happy country, for the accomplishment of so great a good, is, in itself, a consideration of no small encouragement."

As a frontier movement among all of the churches some success was recorded. There was an appeal to the simple and unsophisticated mind in the idea that one could be a Christian and a Christian only. It began to appear that sectarianism might be swept from the map in the Western Reserve and in the Missouri Territory where it was not as entrenched as it was in New England. Most of the labor was done and most of the gains were registered in the new settlements farther to the west. As Thomas Campbell had said, "The cause that we advocate is not our own peculiar cause, nor the cause of any party, considered as such; it is a common cause, the cause of Christ and our brethren of all denominations."

But it was not to continue so. There were a great many obstacles to the achievement of the noble purpose. The very independence which gave it birth seemed to work against its continuance. Men were free enough to begin to unite across the various lines but not free enough to continue to do so. They had not caught the vision of their leaders. They had not dreamed their dreams. Some of them were willing to unite provided their party could be the prominent one. Others were caught up in the developing cults of Mormonism and the Shakers.

Then too, the power of the sectarian spirit was not properly evaluated. Attacks began to be made by the clergy whose creeds had been assailed. The reformers were accused of plotting the overthrow of the Christian faith. Campbell was branded a traitor and a heretic. He was bitterly assaulted in journals and periodicals. His followers were called Campbellites and it was pronounced with a smirk and a sneer. As time went on there were mistakes made. Some of them were grievous. They resulted in the inception of another denomination. It proliferated into a number of different parties. Today these have lost their original goal of the unity of all believers. Yet it appears that there is the beginning of a re-evaluation.

This first little trickle which betokens the melting of the glacier of indifference and unconcern is precious. It betokens the first warming rays of the sun of righteousness have been effective. Whether it can continue to flow until it becomes a mighty river or will be stifled by the deep freeze of partisan coldness is a question. It is the first indication of a breach with the sectarian attitude. In many cases it began with those who had been more exclusive and bitter than their fellows, as it did in the beginning with Campbell and Stone. This is good because such men have tasted the dregs of the spirit of intolerance and rejected the draught. They will not easily return to it.

I would like to detail three of the many mistakes we have made as a people. In doing so I lay myself open to attack and make myself vulnerable. It seems to me that someone must speak about these matters and I dare not ask another to do what I am unwilling to do for myself. Those who read will probably understand my concern, those who do not will continue to warn against me as if they were thoroughly familiar with what I had said.

BECOMING THE CHURCH

Our gravest error was in allowing the restoration movement to become, in our minds, the church. Nay, even worse and more insulting to the divine intelligence, we made it "the Lord's church," with bold effrontery designating it the "Church of Christ." This immediately changed our aim and goal. We ceased to be a movement and became a monument. A monument marks the accomplishments of the past. People go to it to pay homage to their heroes. We honor the memory of Thomas and Alexander Campbell, Barton Warren Stone and Walter Scott. But where are their successors today? Who is carrying on the work they begun?

Movements are human in origin, but the church is divine. The church did not need to be restored. It had never died. It is impossible for a body to die while its head lives. Movements come and go. They rise and wane. They ebb and flow. But the body goes on forever. When we transmuted the movement into a church we embalmed it. It became rigid and immobile. It must now contend with other "churches" for a place in the sun. The very moment we became a church we automatically inherited rivals, many of them more hoary in age and more respectable than ourselves.

This meant that what Thomas Campbell referred to as "our dear brethren of all denominations" were no longer our brethren. He declared, "You are all, dear brethren, equally included as the objects of our love and esteem." When we became a church we slammed the door upon them. We became exclusivists of the worst kind. All of our "dear brethren" were now with us. Those who were not with us were not our brethren. The body of Christ now met at a certain location in a certain building, and its chief purpose became to attack all who were not in that location and in that building.

Alexander Campbell, in his debate with Rice, alleged that "We have neither national, provincial or sectarian church. We have many churches but no church. Nor do we desire a church, in that sense of the word." We have now created a sectarian church. It has other grounds for fellowship than the supreme truth that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. It has other tests of union and communion than the foundation which God has laid. Its devotees have renounced the restoration movement, departed from the one faith, and ceased to be a force for unity. Their hand is against every man who does not conform to them, and every man's hand is against them.

What steps can be taken to remedy the situation. One simple one is to take down the sign "Church of Christ." The New Testament church has no title or name. It is simply the body of Christ, identified by its location. It is a fellowship of the ransomed ones, a community of the saved. The Church of Christ is universally recognized as another sect. It is regarded as in the same category with the Methodist Church, the Baptist Church, or the Presbyterian Church. The idea that it is a haven of rest for every child of God has long been lost. It is now judged by its particularities and peculiarities, and not by its universalities. It is no longer a meetingplace for Christians, but for a certain kind of Christians, subscribing to certain things.

The Church of Christ as it exists today can never unite the Christians in all of the sects. It has forfeited its right to be recognized as the restoration movement. It has lost its aim, forgotten its goal, and has settled down to becoming one of the churches in the community. Yet it could become a rallying-ground for the needy, the seeking, the harassed and driven people of our day. It could do this without giving up a single truth it has ever held. Is it not a logical thing to do or can we afford the price of a lost world, as the cost for our attitude.

TESTS OF BROTHERHOOD

By the very act of proclaiming a movement the church, we created of ourselves a sect. We shut ourselves off from the saved of God who met under another name and sought to praise Him in other places. Many of these were as righteous as ourselves, conscientiously following in all the things of the Word as they saw them. They were caught up in the sectarian web, but were not sectarian.

Our second great error occurred in 1889. It happened at Sand Creek, in Illinois. The aging brick building still stands. It is empty now. The pews are there. But no one has occupied them for years. Wasps and mud-daubers flit about the interior. Squirrels play in the cemetery outside. Sand Creek was the place where the Address and Declaration was read by Daniel Sommer. It was a reverse of the "Declaration and Address" read just eighty years before by Thomas Campbell at Washington, Pennsylvania.

The Sand Creek Declaration mentioned that "Some of the things of which we hereby complain, and against which we protest, are the unlawful methods resorted to in order to raise or get money for religious purposes, namely, that of the church holding festivals of various kinds, in the house of the Lord or elsewhere, demanding sometimes that each shall pay a certain sum as an admittance fee; the select choir to the virtual, if not the real, abandonment of congregational singing; likewise the man-made society for missionary work, and the one-man imported preacher-pastor to take the oversight of the church."

Loaded language was used in referring to these matters. They were called "Unpleasant, and as we see them vicious things." They were labeled objectionable and unauthorized. Those who endorsed them were called innovators. In conclusion it was said, "We state that we are impelled from a sense of duty to say, that all such that are guilty of teaching, or allowing and practicing the many innovations and corruptions to which we have referred, that after being admonished, and having had sufficient time for reflection, if they do not turn away from such abominations, that we cannot and will not regard them as brethren."

The document was signed by representatives of five Illinois congregations. It was approved by David Lipscomb of the Nashville, Tennessee congregation. It proved to be a Pandora's Box of evils turned loose upon the land. It resulted in divisions, law-suits, claims and counter-claims, which turned the sword of the Spirit against brethren and spilled their fratricidal gore all over the landscape. For generations it perpetuated civil war, hatred and hostility which made of the movement the most bitterly fought and contested territory on the American scene.

It represented the first attempt to "not regard as brethren" those who differed in matters of interpretation and implementation. The few things increased into many. Legalism supplanted love. Motivated by the idea that there was a specific pattern, with all disagreeing as to what it was, the principle of the Sand Creek document became the basis of Church of Christism with its withdrawal of fellowship. Cheap orthodoxy becomes the order of the day and honest dissent paid the penalty.

The first great mistake was disfellowshipping the Christians within the sects. The second great mistake was disfellowshipping the Christians within the restoration movement. Under threat for advocacy or acceptance of anything which differs from the established norm, research stopped and true study ended. The Bible became a book of proof-texts. It was searched not to find what to believe, but to prove what was already believed.

There was no weightier matters of the law, no justice, mercy and faith. Tithes of mint, anise and cummin became as important as trust in Jesus. Indeed, they were used as tests of faith. The attitude toward cups, classes and colleges supplanted the attitude toward the cross of Christ. Clever lawyers twisted the Word of God and manipulated their own ideas for political gain. Passions became inflamed over minor matters, and division occurred over secondary issues.

The kingdom of God became a hodgepodge of things. One could not be a citizen of it who regarded the Sunday School for example, as a matter of indifference. He was forced to take a stand. It was either or else. There was no middle ground. He had to become a partisan to become a Christian. It depended upon what kind of partisan he became as to what kind of Christian he was. To one side he was "loyal," to the other he was "disloyal." If, as the result of concentrated study, he made a change, he was regarded as a convert by one side, and a "turncoat" by the other.

The men who read the document thought they were sincere. They were seeking to protect what they considered as erosion of the faith. Actually what they did was to intrude upon the opinions of men with their own opinions. Not everyone was willing to grant the right of others to legislate for them. The address sowed dragon's teeth. Everyone of them sprang from the earth a soldier in full panoply ready to fight. Debates occurred everywhere. They increased the tensions already existing. Tempers flared. Families divided. Hostility developed.

Peace disappeared from the movement.

CEMENTING THE DIVISION

In 1906 actual division occurred and was recognized. It became a formal thing. The organ was blamed for it, but the division would have occurred if there had been no organ. Men had thought division. It had been preached from the pulpit. It was urged upon men as the will of God. The organ was visible. It could be seen. It was tangible. It could be felt. Men could vent their spleen against it. They did so by literally chopping the offending instrument into bits and throwing the pieces into the backyard. But the rancor existed in human hearts before it was overtly declared.

Slowly there had developed two approaches to interpretation of the Word of God. They were opposed to each other. One said that anything not specifically mentioned in the scriptures was acceptable provided that it did not violate any other scripture. The other said that anything not specifically mentioned in the scriptures was prohibited by the silence of the scriptures. An elaborate argument about the silence was worked out. These two ideas were destined for a crash because they were on a collision course. They met at the point where the instrument was introduced and disaster was the result.

The peculiar thing is that the Bible did not enjoin either of these presuppositions. No one who spoke where the Bible spoke, or remained silent where it was silent, could utter either one. Both had to be siphoned out by the dubious prooftext method which consisted of taking wholly unrelated passages and from them weaving a fabric favorable to a foregone conclusion. Both of them were spectacles donned before reading the scripture. By wearing them only one result could be achieved.

And so occurred once more what Thomas Campbell called "the heinous nature and pernicious tendency of religious controversy among Christians." Debates were held. History was searched. The revelation of heaven was meticulously gone over with a fine tooth comb. Not one organ was ever debated out. And the reason is that the organ was not the real criminal. We did not divide when the organ was introduced, and we would not unite if it were taken out.

We divided when we quit loving each other as brethren. We will unite again when we resume loving one another. The question is whether we want to win a debate or a brother. "By this will all men know that you are my disciples, if you love one another." Love makes no demands. It assesses no requirements. It stipulates no conditions and requires no proof. It does not say that if you give up this or that I will love you. It loves you where you are and as you are. If you have something which hinders the closer walk you give it up, but you will be loved if you never give it up.

It would be a noble experiment to see what would happen in a community where division has occurred if one side were to continue to love the other as if nothing had happened. This would mean recognition of the division but paying no attention to it, treating it as if it were not there. It would include building no walls, erecting no barriers, and not working in a partisan sense. This is the Christian alternative to division the divine balm to be poured into a gaping wound to begin healing from inside out.

We made an inglorious fracture of the movement when we divided over instrumental music, as we thought. And we will never recover from it until we love one another enough to go back and repair it. With our first mistake we ceased to be a movement, with our second we ceased to be a restoration movement, with our third we ceased to be a force for unity. Ever after, men would ask "If you have discovered the secret for unity, why are you divided?" All of the answers we have stammered out, all of the half-truths we have uttered, all of the quibbles we have made have not been satisfactory.

This does not mean the adoption of instrumental music. Far from it. It only means the adoption of brethren who use it. It means recognizing them as brothers, and treating them as such. It means weeping with them when they weep, and rejoicing with them when they rejoice. It means letting each person stand or fall to his own master. It means recognition that the kingdom of God is righteousness, peace and joy, which the Holy Spirit gives. And when someone serves Christ in this way, he pleases God and is approved by others.

We need to rise above the grievous mistakes of our fathers. We have done so in the political realm. Could anything have been more horrible than the violence of the Civil War? Could anything have been more awful than the burning, looting, pillaging, murder and rapine which blighted a great part of our nation? Who is there among us today who wants to continue the smoke and conflagration of that frightful conflict. Who wants to perpetuate the holocaust that swept a great part of our glorious land?

Yet the kingdom of heaven is still subject to brutal attack. Brethren war against brethren. Those of the same family lift up the mailed fist against each other. Let us reverse the decisions of yesterday. We have led the world in sordid division. Now let us lead in a return to unity. Let us dedicate our lives to the undoing of the deeds of yesteryear and to the promotion of peace on earth to men of goodwill. "On Zion, God's holy hill, there will be nothing harmful or evil. The land will be as full of the knowledge of the Lord as the seas are full of water." Lord, hasten that day!

Positive and Negative

Contents

According to the definition of the word, perspective means "to view through." It refers to looking beyond the mere form or structure of a thing. Obviously it makes a difference where a man stands as to what he will see when he looks. One who views the world from the bed of a valley will see a totally different scene than one who has ascended from the valley to a surrounding mountain. The color of the lens through which he looks will also affect the impression he receives.

It is undeniable, I think, that the mind-set influences our interpretation of what we see. And that is a composite of many factors. It would be difficult to enumerate all of them. We are the product of our prior training, coupled with all of the things we have done to ourselves. Our prejudices and biases, our areas of conformity and rebellion, our ideals and our adjustments to our failures to achieve them, make of us all individuals whose attitudes differ and whose approach varies. We need to constantly examine ourselves to be sure we do not trample upon reality.

As a body of people we have learned to look askance at anyone and anything that differs from our norm. Like ancient Israel, "We have seen so much, but what does it mean to us? We have ears to hear with, but what have we really heard?" (Isa. 42:20). We are quick to disclaim anything we have not already incorporated as a part of our theological stance. We have doomed ourselves to go along in the same old rut and have forced ourselves to listen to the same old thing, whether it has any value or not.

While awaiting my train at the station in Nashville, Tennessee, I looked over the array of literature displayed in racks by the various denominations in the city. I selected some reading material from each section as I like to know what others are thinking, and I can learn from all. The "Church of Christ" rack yielded up a booklet bearing the title, "A Church That is Neither Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish." As I read, I thought how typical it was of the negative attitude which is so characteristic of my brethren. Most of their time, money and effort is utilized in telling the world what they are not. Perhaps they have more to boast about in that department.

"Faithfulness" in these days is judged almost solely upon what men disclaim in doctrine or practice. A congregation is deemed "faithful" because it does not support colleges, have a hired minister, contribute to orphan homes, teach in Bible classes, use individual cups, use fermented wine, or expect the Lord Jesus to come before the millennium. It just depends upon what section of the country you may be in, what segment of believers you may be among, or what the latest fight is about. Whatever the current criterion, it will not particularly concern what you believe, but what you do not believe.

A congregation may thus be "faithful" if it is in the doldrums, composed of lazy, indolent, indifferent members, who never talk to a neighbor, distribute a tract, or contribute a cent to support an evangelist in the field, just so long as it does not have a "regular preacher." Its leaders may talk about the Lord's system of mutual ministry, but frequently that is neither mutual nor ministry and the members have to be punched, prodded and programmed before they reluctantly agree to do anything. Yet the church is "faithful" because of what it does not have.

Another congregation may be "faithful" whose members have never supported one aged widow or cared for a single helpless orphan. The members may spend their Lord's Day afternoons driving about in luxurious limousines, attired in the latest fashions, while there are those who languish in hospitals to whom a visit would be like a cool refreshing draught to the spirit. The aged members are neglected, forgotten, and condemned to eke out their days in little cubicles which their old age assistance will cover. No one thinks of taking them for a drive in the country. But the congregation is "faithful" because it does not support orphan homes or homes for the aged.

Now we could run the entire gamut of factions and fractions and the story would be the same. It is not the life of surrender, consecration and closeness to God which is the mark of faithfulness in these days. It is not what you are but what you are not that counts. We do not minimize the necessity of opposition to all evil in faith or practice. It is essential that we stand against what we conceive of as detrimental to the rule of our King. But real Christianity is a positive force. There is a grave danger that we shall conceive of it as wholly negative and thus live helpless and powerless lives.

The divine power provided by the Holy Spirit is not intended to make us always go in reverse. It is not the power of recession but of progression. It is not condemned to be perpetually neutral. It is described as "the immeasurable greatness of his power in us who believe, according to the working of his great might." It is not the power of retreat but of ongoing. There is no shield for the back of the disciple. He is expected to press the fight and to face the enemy. We are followers of one whose bugle never blew retreat.

I trust that I may be allowed to live until I can see my brethren who love the Christ gain a sufficient degree of courage that they may go anywhere, meet anyone, and contend for the truth under all circumstances. I would like to see them have a knowledge of God's word and the English language, so that they would unhesitatingly pass out a tract, bearing the title: "A church that is Catholic, and composed of protestants and Jews."

THE CHURCH IS CATHOLIC

The church of God is the only truly Catholic church in the world. The word catholic means "1. Universal or general; affecting mankind as a whole, or affecting what is universal in human interest. 2. Comprehensive in sympathies or understanding, liberal. 3. Of, or pertaining to the church universal, specifically, designating or pertaining to the ancient undivided Christian Church or a church claiming historical continuity from it."

It comes from kata, throughout, and holos, the whole. It consists of all true Christians. There cannot be two "catholic" churches in the same realm at the same time. The church for which our Lord paid with His precious blood embraces within its fold every saved person on the face of this material globe. There is not one such being outside of it. There may be movements within the church as there are within the ocean. But they are not catholic unless they affect every life within the divine fold.

The church for which Jesus gave his life is catholic as pertains to:

1. Scope. Its ambassadors were told to "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15). They were instructed to "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations" (Matthew 28:19). The apostle says "Through whom we have received grace and apostleship to bring about obedience to the faith for the sake of his name among all the nations" (Romans 1:5). Again, "But is now disclosed, and through the prophetic writings is made known to all the nations, according to the command of the eternal God" (Romans 16:26).

2. Nationality. "In every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him" (Acts 10:35). "It is the power of God unto salvation to every one who has faith, to the Jew first and also to the Greek" (Romans 1:16). "But glory and honor and peace for every one who does good, the Jew first and also the Greek. For God shows no partiality" (Rom. 2:10, 11).

3. Social Classes. "There is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free" (Col. 3:11). "Whatever good any one does, he will receive the same again from the Lord, whether he is a slave or free" (Ephesians 6:8).

4. Sex. "There is neither male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28). "Nevertheless, in the Lord woman is not independent of man nor man of woman; for as woman was made from man, so man is now born of woman. And all things are from God" (1 Cor. 11:11, 12).

5. Languages. "Thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue and people and nation" (Rev. 5:9). "Then I saw another angel flying in midheaven, with an eternal gospel to proclaim to those who dwell on earth, to every nation and tribe and tongue and people" (Rev. 14:6).

6. Membership. "And the Lord added to their number daily such as were being saved" (Acts 2:47).

One who claims to be a Christian must either be a member of the catholic church of God, or of a sect. The Greek Catholic Church is neither Catholic nor is it the church of God. The Roman Catholic Church is not the church of God. It is a sect; indeed, the mother of many sects. It is Roman, but it is not Catholic. That which makes it Roman keeps it from being catholic. It cannot be provincial and universal at the same time.

Any person who contends for the church with which he is affiliated, yet admits that it is possible for people to be saved outside of the circle of communion which he recognizes, is a member of a sect. The church of God, the body of Christ, is not a sect. It contains every redeemed person from every kindred, tongue, people and nation.

As God looks upon it there is one body (Eph. 4:4). There is only one and can never be another. One can no more create another body than he can make another Holy Spirit. The body is a divine organism and not a human organization. Everyone who has been baptized has been baptized into that one body. Not one has ever been made the member of a denomination. Not one has ever been baptized into a party, either the one of which we are members, or any other. "For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body— Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit."

Jesus is not the head of a party. He is the head over all things for the community of believers, which is his body. That church is catholic. It is the fulness of him who fills all in all. It is the body of Christ. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ?" Every person who participates in the body and blood of Jesus is a member of that great catholic, universal, cosmic church. "Because there is one loaf, we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the same loaf."

We have splintered the body into fragments. We have shattered it into particles. We have ripped it into shreds. Yet as God looks at it, it is one body. Oh, if we but had the vision of God. If we could just see things as He sees them. If we could just view them as He views them. What a difference it would make. We need a physician to heal our wounds. We need a repairer of breaches to mend our breaks. We need to recapture the concept of the catholic church in the very best sense, and labor to let the world see it.

COMPOSED OF PROTESTANTS

A protestant is one who makes or enters a protest. The verb form of "pro" and "testare" is to be a witness. It is a mistake to think that to protest means to be against something. Indeed, the first definition of protest is "to assert; affirm, aver." One makes a protestation of faith in the Messiah when he publicly acknowledges him, for the word means the "act of protesting, or solemnly declaring true, existent, or the like; a public avowal." Any person who makes an affirmation or declares a truth is a protestant. One who is not a protestant in any sense would be in a sad condition.

Of course, a protest is also "an expostulation; complaint; objection or remonstrance." One who objects to being designated a protestant proves the designation is correct by his objection. It is not an uncommon thing to see a man protesting that he is not a protestant. One thing wrong with members of the church of God in these days is that not enough of them are protestants. They accept anything that comes along, submit to being robbed of their rights, privileges and prerogatives without ever raising a protest. No man can be a true follower of the Christ without being a protestant. One reason why our Lord was killed was because he was such a strong protestant.

COMPOSED OF JEWS

Every member of the body of Christ is a real Jew; every real Jew is a member of the body of Christ. This is clearly taught in the New Testament, which also teaches that no one can be a Christian without being circumcised. "In him also you were circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, by putting off the body of flesh in the circumcision of Christ; and you were buried with him in baptism, in which you were also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead" (Col. 2:11, 12). Only those who are thus circumcised are real Jews and in covenant relationship with God.

There are those who claim to be Jews outside the body of Christ, just as there are those who contend they are catholic or protestant outside of it, but the first are not real Jews any more than the others are really catholic or truly protestant. "For he is not a real Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external and physical. He is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart, spiritual and not literal" (Rom. 2:28, 29).

Instead of delivering talks on why we are not catholic, protestants, or Jews, why not let the world know we are? I will be happy to see the day come when my brethren will not, through ignorance, surrender perfectly good words to a group who will capitalize and misuse them, but will have the courage to take a positive attitude toward the new covenant religion. I want to see them bold and brave enough to flood the communities with a non-sectarian tract about the church that is catholic, and composed of protestants and real Jews.

The Sheep on the Hills

Contents

The prophet Ezekiel paints a graphic picture of the flock of God scattered among the hills, a prey to lurking beasts, and filled with fear and distress. He attributes their condition to two sources. First, the shepherds who were to feed the flock, fleeced them and fed themselves. Instead of searching for those who were driven away and seeking for those who were lost, they ruled them with force and cruelty.

As a result, God declares that He is against those shepherds and will hold them responsible, even requiring his flock at their hand. It is interesting to note that those who are called shepherds by Ezekiel (34) are called pastors by Jeremiah (23:1, 2). The word is identical in the original Hebrew. Jeremiah writes, "Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture, saith the Lord . . . Ye have scattered my flock and driven them away, and have not visited them; behold, I will visit upon you the evil of your doings saith the Lord." It is apparent that God's sheep have been scattered by the very leaders to whom they looked for guidance and instruction.

Another factor in the production of the condition is the arrogant, proud and boastful attitude of the fattened members of the flock. They are depicted as pushing and thrusting with side and shoulder, and horning the humble and meek aside, until they are scattered abroad. They are charged, not only with eating the best pasture and drinking the pure water, but also with trampling the remainder into muck and mire, and fouling it and defiling it for the rest. "And must my sheep eat what you have trodden with your feet, and drink what you have fouled with your feet?" This is an apt portrayal of religion in many places today, where the sheep are exploited by an official board, forced to meet a budget they did not arrange, and subscribe to a program they did not originate. They must knuckle under or get out.

"My sheep wandered through all the mountains and upon every high hill, yea my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, and none did seek or search after them." That is a picture of the flock today. They are wandering through the mountains and hills of sectarianism. They are separated and scattered because of neglect, abuse and cruelty, to which they have been subjected. This is not the will of God. It is his desire that they be together, that there be but one flock and one shepherd. He does not want them divided by partisanship or factionalism but united in love and peace. They were scattered in "a cloudy and dark day" but a brighter day is coming.

God has designed that his sheep shall be brought out from the people, gathered from the countries, and restored to their own estate, where they shall be fed in a good pasture, upon the high mountains of faith and truth. There will the flock be safe under the supervision of one shepherd, the prince of David. They shall have a covenant of peace, and will dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. None shall make them afraid. They shall know that the Lord is with them and they are His people.

We live in an age of cacophonous sounds of a strident nature. One says, "Lo, here is the Christ," while another says, "There he is." The command of the true shepherd is "Do not believe it." He said, "For false Christs and false prophets will arise and show great signs and wonders, so as to lead astray, if possible, the very elect." The burning question of this day is not where you stand upon some secondary matter, but "What think ye of Christ." There are scores of things which may be right but they are subservient to the greatest question of the ages. Our eyes must be upon the shepherd, not upon his rod or staff, important though they may be.

Our appeal goes forth to all of the scattered flock wandering over the hills which have been created by men. We would do our humble best to search and seek after every good and honest heart "scattered upon the face of the whole earth." Every person in the whole wide world who possesses such a heart is my brother— either in prospect or reality. They do not all bring forth the same degree of fruit. Some produce thirtyfold. Some produce sixty. A few may produce a hundredfold. But all are God's children and all are my brothers and sisters, for the kingdom of heaven is likened unto them.

Those who have heard and learned, and come unto Christ, believing in Him, and demonstrating their faith by immersion into His death, are the sons of God. Never mind where they are. Do not be concerned about what mountain or hill they wander over. They are His children, and my brothers, wherever they may be wandering as the result of the cloudy and dark days. Those who have not yet been immersed into our dear Lord, because of lack of knowledge, environment or teaching, need only to have the truth brought to bear upon their good and honest hearts, and they will accept it.

The promise of God still obtains. "As a shepherd seeks out his flock when some of his sheep have been scattered abroad, so will I seek out my sheep; and I will rescue them from all places where they have been scattered on a day of clouds and thick darkness." Clouds obscure the vision. They make it impossible to keep the trail. They conceal the form of the shepherd. Some feel they are following him when they are really going off on a tangent. And thick darkness hides the trail from sight. It is not a matter of arrogant accusation for those who have lost sight of the way under such circumstances. Ours is a rescue mission. We must find them and guide them home again.

We plead with all who believe in Jesus, and yet are divided from one another, to be no longer content with the meager pasturage upon the hills. The hand of God beckons on to the high mountain where is the good fold. Salvation is not in the hills. It is not the wish of heaven that we should be divided in heart and spirit. If we are content to be, without doing anything tangible to remedy the state, it is proof that we have been betrayed by Satan. Everyone of us should be actively engaged in trying to get people, not to come to us, but to come to Him.

Let us heal the breaches in Zion. Let us repair the walls and set up the gates. Let us restore the good way and walk in it. Our dear Lord does not want those who believe in Him to be split into divers sects. Even small communities are often fractured into Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran and Roman Catholic fraternities. Some of these represent the adherence to a certain order; others to a certain ordinance. One signifies the man who gave them being, the other make a point of being both Roman and universal. How it must grieve the heart of God to see such division among these who profess faith in Jesus as the hope of the world.

Those who compose these bodies all affirm emphatically that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God. They do not deny a single fact connected with his personal ministry. They are divided over the interpretation they place upon these facts, or their opinions about them. They each demand that every person have the same opinion as do they about the things they have deduced from what Jesus has said. They bind upon the consciences of men things they cannot possibly accept.

But it is true that God loves every one of them. It is true that Jesus died for every one of them. It is true that God wills they should all be one. It is true that Jesus prayed they might be one. Is it true, then, that they can never answer that prayer? Is there no solution for the problem? Are we doomed to go on until we die in our divided state. Our appeal will never fall with favor upon the ears of those who love the party spirit, regardless of the party to which they are attached. Our appeal is addressed to the good and honest hearts in all parties. Let us arise and return in spirit and in fact to Him who died for us all. Then shall we be a blessing as he has promised, "And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will send down the showers in their season; they shall be showers of blessing."

I want to see the showers of blessing. I want to see the parched earth revived again. I want to see the flowers bloom and the fruits borne. I want to wet my searing lips in the rain from on high. I want to be a partaker of his promise. "And the trees of the field shall yield their fruit, and the earth shall yield its increase, and they shall be secure in their land; and they shall know that I am the Lord, when I brake the bars of their yoke, and deliver them from the hands of those who enslaved them." That is what I crave. It is what I long for. I want to dwell securely where none shall make me afraid.

God has given us a revelation from heaven. It is like the rain and snow which comes down from heaven. It does not return to heaven but waters the earth. It causes it to spring forth and sprout, giving seed to the sower and bread to the eater. Thus it is with the word which goes forth from His mouth. It will not return unto Him empty, but it will accomplish His purpose. It will prosper in the thing to which He sent it. We have tried to catch that rain in our own cisterns. We have sought to keep others from drinking of it unless they use our dipper.

But it is a divine love letter to the world. It is not to be caught and treasured in a sectarian cistern. If we love its author as we claim to do, let us labor to help fulfill His eternal purpose. Let us seek to unite in Him, and upon the basis He has given. It is later than you think! The world hovers on the brink of despair and destruction. We have but two alternatives. We must convert the world to Jesus, or the world will commit universal suicide. All that is essential to leading the world to believe in Jesus, is for those in the world who believe in Jesus to become one. This is His own blessed assurance. "Neither pray I for these alone, but for all them also who believe on me through their word; that they may all be one . . . that the world may believe that thou has sent me."

The cost of a divided people is a lost world. Can we afford to pay that tribute to our fractured state. Does any person of reason doubt that if we all became one tonight that the world would be a better place tomorrow? Have we not exported our divisions to places in the world which are not ready to receive them? Each sect sends its own missionaries to reproduce abroad the same kind of institution which sent them forth. Thus, we have not only fractured ourselves into warring clans over here but have set humble native peoples at each other's throats in their home-land and done so in the name of Jesus.

What would be the glorious result of the unity of which we speak? Wars would cease and the rumble of cannons die away. The power of nuclear fission could be directed toward the relief of mankind. The shrieks and groans of dying men upon the battlefields of the earth would be heard no more. The mighty energies of the universe could be expended in the betterment of all mankind. We could safely travel any place upon earth. Prejudice and hate would fade away. The desert would blossom like a rose. We would experience a true brotherhood of man under the benign fatherhood of God. Fellowship based upon mutual sonship would exalt the peoples of the earth.

In the face of such a benign prospect, how pale and insignificant are the doctrines and dogmas of men, the opinions and interpretations which rend the hearts, and set us back into the jungle of passion under the reign of fang and claw. Sectarianism, division, party strife and schism must be dethroned. They cannot be tolerated in a heart in which the Lord is sanctified. Let us seek the one Lord, the one faith, the one body. Let us come unto Him through the one baptism He has appointed.

What can we do? Those of us who love the Lord more than men, who exalt His revelation above human rationalization, who seek to restore the one body to its primitive perfection, must seek to study together, to investigate, to question that we may know "the Way." Regardless of what party we may now be in, we must seek the ultimate destruction of all parties by merging through mutual acceptance of the truth, into the grand concourse of all saints which will compose the one body.

We must further our aim in love. Nothing that is not of eternal value is great enough to divide the church over here. "Then they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another: and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name" (Mal. 3:16). To help in my very feeble way, I offer personally to go to any synagogue, cathedral, or church building which I can reach, at home or abroad, and express my views on these issues, and submit to questioning at any length. I will respect those who differ and love their souls. I will patiently listen to their views.

Brighter days are coming. A mighty army of earnest seekers after truth is being raised up all over the earth. Men are beginning to discard the shackles of slavery devised by human agency. The sheep on the hills are lifting their gaze to the high mountain peaks of safety. Their ears are tuned to the sound of the voice of the shepherd. Men are examining their positions by the Book, rather than by the light of tradition. The campfires of the pilgrims can be seen flickering all along the road to Jerusalem.

Let us here issue a word of warning. Let not those who are fortunate enough to have discovered the green pastures first, devour and tramp the residue with their feet. Let not those who have been drinking of the deep waters foul the pure stream by jealousy and bigotry. It is no time for those who have found certain great and abiding principles "to thrust with side and shoulder, and push the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad." Brethren, make room for them. Let them in.

God's sheep are coming home from the hills. There is room on the mountain for every good and honest heart. His house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples. For you shall go out in joy and be led forth in peace. The mountains and the hills before you shall break forth in singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Will that not be a glad day when there will be singing on the hills of Zion?

God has reserved thousands who have not bowed the knee to Baal! Longing eyes are looking upward. Hungry hearts are turned heavenward. The sheep are starting to move toward the shepherd, slowly at first, but with gathering momentum. They have heard the voice of the shepherd again as it echoes among the hills. He has promised to them "within his house and within his walls a monument and a name better than sons and daughters, an everlasting name that will not be cut off." Don't stone them or beat them back with force and with cruelty. Let them come home to the prince of David. They are his sheep, and not ours. We also are His sheep. We are a part of the gathering throng.

The Spirit and Liberty

Contents

Within this tenement of clay called the body, dwells a spirit. God hath "formed the spirit of man within him" (Zec. 12:1). That spirit is the inward man which can be renewed daily, even while the outward man perishes (2 Cor. 4:16). It is strengthened with might by the Holy Spirit (Eph. 3:16). It is the spirit, held captive in the body, which longs and groans for the day of adoption when the body shall have redemption (Rom. 8:23). It is the spirit, confined to an alien realm, which aspires to a higher sphere; which yearns and gropes and reaches out to embrace its creator and to know again the bliss of perfect union which was so rudely shattered by sin.

The spirit of man can expand and grow only in the atmosphere of freedom. It was never created to be dominated, brutalized or made subservient to men. It should never be subject to coercion or undue pressures. Our fleshly parents gave us our physical bodies, and they may chastise them for our social need, but they did not give us our spirits and these are not subject to them. "We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits, and live?" (Heb. 12:9)

We are accustomed to the anguished cry of parents who have reared their children in a certain sect, that, when they became older they "left the faith." Sometimes it is said that, in their marriage they went to a different church. Did they do, either? Did the boy renounce his faith in Jesus? Did he turn his back upon the Savior? How could he go to a different church when there is only one? If he still loves Jesus, and recognizes Him as his head, is he not as much a member of the one body as he ever was. Should we not rejoice in his fidelity to our precious Lord rather than whining and making trouble for his family.

Our fathers may set forth principles of religion which they deem to be worthy, and while we are young they may take our bodies to the place where they worship, but in the final analysis we shall be judged, not by what they thought God meant, but by what He said. And here we must reason with God as individuals, for we shall be judged in that manner. Is not the whole purpose of the faith to develop in each of us a certain kind of character? Is it merely the recital of empty liturgy, the grinding out of ritual which may be meaningless to us. And when we see the kind of character or lifestyle in evidence, may we not conclude that Christ is there?

A man and a maid decide to form a union, and in marriage they create a social unit called a home, or family. It was the first such unit created by God and received His blessing. Over this unit the husband and father is the head. But this gives him no rights or prerogatives in the spiritual realm. "He shall cleave to his wife and they shall be one flesh." "But he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit" (1 Cor. 6:17). "The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband; and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife" (1 Cor. 7:4). To which it may be added that neither one has any jurisdiction over the spirit of the other. "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth" (Rom. 14:4).

In the dim and distant past I have heard parents say, "I would rather follow my daughter to the grave than see her married to a Baptist." Sometimes it was to a member of the Christian Church, although it was generally the Baptists, because there were a lot more of them. This is the bitter and vitriolic language of sectarianism which intrudes itself into the most sacred relationships of life. It creates barriers and walls where there should be none. It makes a wife unable to respond to the caresses of her husband whom she regards as an alien in spite of his dedication. She fears to give herself fully to him, lest she prove untrue to her father and mother, and the way in which she was reared.

Marriage is too sacred to make it into a tug-of-war to see which one can proselyte the other. It might astound one to realize how many divorces have resulted from the party spirit carried into marriage. It might be still more amazing how many couples have given up on religion, to the utter impoverishment of their children who so desperately need Jesus as a focal point of life. He could be their shadow of a rock in a weary land. Almost every frightful drift in our day has resulted from loosening our grip upon Jesus and the erosion of our faith. It is natural for a ship to drift aimlessly when it has slipped its hawser and is no longer moored to anything solid. We have already paid dearly for that work of the flesh— the party spirit — but we shall pay even more dearly. "They that do such things shall not inherit eternal life."

It should be a source of comfort to us to realize that no one else can control or manipulate our spirits. Many are exercised in conscience, because, as they grow older, they find their thought pattern differing from that of their parents. They suffer inner pangs of chastisement because they are torn between loyalty to the belief of the parents and fidelity toward God. But no parent can form a code of spiritual conviction for his offspring. He can teach what commends itself to him to be the truth, he can exemplify his teaching by his conduct, but he cannot tyrannize the minds and hearts of his children.

Wise parents will teach their children to love truth for truth's sake; they will encourage them as they develop, to seek and search for truth as the chief aim in life. They will make such amendments and adjustments in their own thinking as are necessary to conform to newly discovered truth, and freely admit their past errors to their children. Thus will be produced emotionally mature children who will not hesitate to adopt truth, regardless of the cost.

It is the truth that makes men free. But for truth to accomplish this it must be free, and not shackled by human dogmatism or political pressure. A veil upon the heart in approaching God's revelation will shut out the light of truth, as effectively as a window shade while drawn will exclude the light of the sun. This is the problem of our Jewish friends today. Their heart is not turned to God, but to a defence of Judaism. They fear to depart from the traditions of their fathers. "But whenever the heart of the nation shall have turned to the Lord, the veil will be withdrawn. Now by 'the Lord' is meant the Spirit; and where the Spirit of the Lord is, freedom is enjoyed" (2 Cor. 3:16, 17).

Those who are in the Christ have been called unto freedom (Gal. 5:13). They are exhorted to be free men (1 Peter 2:16). Even a slave, whose body was purchased by an earthly master was still free. "For a Christian, if he was a slave when called, is the Lord's freed man" (1 Cor. 7:22). His body still belonged to a master, but his spirit was free in Christ. "You have all been redeemed at infinite cost: *do not become slaves to men. Where each one stood when he was called, there, brethren, let him still stand— *close to God" (1 Cor. 7:24).

There is the big problem of the ages! Men are not content to let him stand where he stood when he was called. They must mould, shape and alter him to fit their pattern. If he does not do so, they conclude he does not belong to God, because he will not bow to them. After he is called they will work him over, and make him conform to their pattern— Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran, Presbyterian— or dare I say it? What is the answer to all of this. It is the words of scripture, "Do not become slaves to men— stand close to Christ."

Ever since the day Christ set men free, there has been a constant struggle to maintain that freedom. In a less enlightened era, the rope, the stake, the cross, the rack, and the whip were employed to torture the bodies of men to bring their consciences and opinions in line with the orthodox religious views which prevailed. In these days men employ more exquisite means of torture, such as ridicule, malignant whispering, misrepresentation, lying and boycott. The same spirit which lighted the fires of Smithfield, and prompted the Spanish Inquisition, motivated the "powers that be" at Freed-Hardeman College to arrest Leroy Garrett and cast him into a filthy jail cell, because he would not conform. He was treated as all dissenters are treated when they cannot be answered.

But we cannot bring the hearts of men into subjection by force or tyranny. Even atheistic communism learned that lesson in Hungary! We are limited in our attempts to change the minds of men, by the very nature of Christianity, to reason and persuasion. Christ's spirit must be equally dear and honored, no matter where it is manifested. To confine God's love or his good Spirit to any party, sect, or name, is to sin against the fundamental law of the Kingdom of God. It is to break that living bond with Christ's universal church which is one of our chief helps to perfection.

Charity and sincerity are characteristics of the true religion and it must utterly disown bitterness and hypocrisy. These things must not once be named among us. They are unworthy of Jesus and unworthy of His followers. These are the weapons in the arsenal of false and vain religion, which must deceive where it cannot persuade, and force where it cannot deceive. Of what good are abuse, ranting, cavilling and misrepresentation? Can we adjust the hearts of men with a wrench as we would tighten a resistant lug or bolt? Can we use the thumbscrew on the mental processes and force them into a certain mode of thought.

Is not an error in thinking a species of intellectual lameness? Will such lameness in another hurt me any more than if he had a crooked leg or a deformed arm? Will a wild opinion do me any more injury than a wild look out of his eye? Why should I become so enraged or provoked by his internal defects any more than his external ones? Shall I try to force every cripple I meet to walk as I do, by twisting his deformed leg, or shall I not rather lead him to the physician and surgeon of my acquaintance who can straighten the crooked member? And how shall I regard him during the straightening process— with sympathy and charity, or as an object of my spite and ridicule?

I must maintain the dignity of every man's spirit. To do otherwise is to reflect against me and not against him. I cannot force another to grovel and kneel before me without first losing my own dignity. I must defend his right to think, reason and act for himself, or establish the principle by which I will lose my own right to do so. If I fail to see in my enemy the image of God, though defiled and shattered, I shall fail to restore myself to that image. One who is egotistic, proud, arrogant, conceited and boastful, and who feels that God belongs exclusively to him, reveals he does not yet belong to God.

These are the sins I fain

Would have Thee take away;

Malice and cold disdain,

Hot anger, sullen hate,

Scorn of the lowly, envy of the great,

And discontent that casts a shadow gray

On all the brightness of the common day.

Wild Grapes

Contents

Have you ever read the song of the vineyard by Isaiah (5:1-7). It is a portrayal of God's disappointment with his people. It demonstrates how little esteemed are the blessings which heaven bestows. The Lord planted his vineyard in a fertile hillside. He fenced it for protection; gathered out the stones, thus removing obstacles and impediments; planted it with the choicest vines; constructed a tower for guarding it; and made a winepress in anticipation of the fruit. But when the time of vintage arrived it consisted of bitter and acrid wild grapes.

The vineyard was the house of Israel. The men of Judah were the pleasant plants. From them God expected to glean a harvest of justice and righteousness. Instead he received only oppression and strife. The lament of the husbandman is thus recorded: "What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?"

God's great disillusionment with his people is aptly portrayed in Psalm 80, where David makes a statement and asks him questions. God brought a vine out of Egypt. He drove out the nations and planted it. He cleared the ground for it, and it took deep root and overspread the land. The mountains were covered with its shade. The mighty cedars were protected under its branches. Then the question is asked why its walls were broken down so that even the casual pedestrian could pluck its fruit. The boar from the field ravaged it and all that move in the field feed on it.

Now for the application. After the congregation of God was given two great wings like an eagle, and fled into the wilderness, to be nourished by God in the secret recesses of the heart for more than twelve centuries, the time came when under the intrepid leadership of Wycliffe, Tyndale, Luther and Huss, as well as other noble souls who loved not their lives unto death, the veil which had eclipsed the face of truth was slowly lifted. As the word of God began to have free circulation, however, men followed leaders and thinkers of great ability, who sought to codify their interpretations and make them the basis of fellowship and salvation. Thus the work of the reformers crystallized in the formation of a group of intolerant schismatic sects, the adherents of which battled against each other with a fury unsurpassed by even the papal dogmatists.

Then, after the commencement of the nineteenth century, and in the midst of the Second Great Awakening, began a movement which seemed destined to sweep the world for Christ. It was launched by men of deep conviction who were affiliated with various sects. It did not begin in America. The fire first burned in the bosoms of honest individuals in Ireland and Scotland. But it was in this new land where there was no establishment of religion, where men were reaching, grasping, seeking and searching for new homes, new fortunes and liberty, that a fertile hillside was created for planting the new reformation vineyard. Here where men were free to think, free to speak, free to act, to question, challenge and dispute, it seemed that providence had combined her talents to provide the proper setting for the great drama of the ages.

The choicest vines were planted. Persons of noble character, high ideals and brilliant intellects, abandoning the parties of which they were members, resolved to be no longer partisan defenders, but to use their talents and fortunes to advance the cause of the absent King to whom they declared allegiance. They did not seek to unChristianize others. They recognized all truth regardless of who held it; they rejoiced that Christ was preached regardless of who proclaimed Him. They opposed error but loved all men; they sought to maintain even the human dignity of an opponent. They did not "stoop to conquer."

It was not their idea to plant another church. Instead, men of various sects formed themselves into "a religious association under the denomination of the Christian Association of Washington, for the sole purpose of promoting simple evangelical Christianity, free from all mixture of human opinions and inventions of men." They were chiefly Presbyterian, but were joined by some Methodists and a few Baptists. One could still worship where he was affiliated and remain a member of the association.

Article IV of their constitution declared, "That this Society by no means considers itself a Church, nor does at all assume to itself the powers peculiar to such a society; nor do the members, as such, consider themselves as standing connected in that relation; nor as at all associated for the peculiar purposes of Church association; but merely as voluntary advocates for Church reformation; and as possessing the powers common to all individuals, who may please to associate in a peaceable and orderly manner, for any lawful purpose, namely the disposal of their time, counsel and property, as they may see cause."

To further their "lawful purpose" they composed a "Declaration and Address" to share their thinking with "all that love our Lord Jesus Christ, in sincerity, throughout all the Churches." One part of it said, "Dearly beloved brethren, why should we deem it a thing incredible that the Church of Christ, in this highly favored country, should resume that original unity, peace, and purity which belong to its constitution, and constitute its glory? Or, is there anything that can justly be deemed necessary for this desirable purpose, both to conform to the model and practice of the primitive Church, expressly exhibited in the New Testament? Whatever alterations this might produce in any or in all of the Churches, should, we think neither be deemed inadmissible. Surely such alteration would be every way for the better, and not for the worse, unless we should suppose the divinely inspired rule to be faulty, or defective. Were we, then, in our Church constitutions and managements, to exhibit a complete conformity to the apostolic Church, would we not be, in that respect, as perfect as Christ intended we should be? And should not this suffice us?"

Seldom did two of them agree in all points. They held widely divergent views as to the work of the Spirit, the functions of grace, the nature of man, the subject of future judgment and the problem of eternal punishment. But they conceived that Christ was greater than their personal views, and they tolerated the divergencies of opinion, believing that to make of an opinion a test of fellowship, would only create two diverse parties, and they had too recently fled from partisan division to the city of refuge.

They built into their Declaration and Address the necessary safeguards to prevent division. Consider this: "That although inferences and deductions from scriptural premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God's holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so; for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore, no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but do properly belong to the after and progressive edification of the Church. Hence, it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the Church's confession."

In a practical sense, it was observed by Alexander Campbell: "But men cannot give up their opinions, and therefore, they can never unite, says one. We do not ask them to give up their opinions:— we ask them only not to impose them upon others. Let them hold their opinions, but let them hold them as private property. The faith is public property; opinions are, and always have been private property. Men have foolishly attempted to make the deductions of some great minds the common measure of all Christians. Hence the deductions of a Luther, and a Calvin, and a Wesley, have been the rule and measure of all who coalesce under the names of these leaders. It is cruel to excommunicate a man because of the imbecility of his intellect."

It was not long until there came an opportunity to apply the principle to see if it would work. Aylette Raines, who preached that all men would be eventually restored without exception, applied for membership in the Association which also sheltered the Campbells. Thomas and Alexander Campbell were present at the meeting where Jacob Orsborne brought the matter formally before the gathering and asked that it be definitely and finally settled. Thomas Campbell, after expressing profound regret that such matters would have to be introduced, said: "Brother Raines has been with me the last several months and we have fully unbosomed ourselves to each other. He is philosophically a Restorationist and I am a Calvinist, but notwithstanding this difference between us, I would put my right hand into the fire and have it burned off, before I would hold up my hands against him. And from all I know of Brother Raines, if I were Paul, I would have him in preference to any young man of my acquaintance, to be my Timothy."

The very sound of such a plea fell like welcome rain upon a parched earth. The religious world was jaded and jaundiced. The petty bickerings and fierce antagonisms of the sectarian world had driven many to skepticism and infidelity. The plea that all who recognized the sovereignty of Jesus could be one in him, and no one surrender any truth he ever held, was one to rally the thinking hearts. It appeared that simple as Christianity.

Some believed it was a millennial harbinger.

What happened to the powerful movement to restore the ancient order and to unite all believers in the Christ? As it was in the days of Isaiah, it has come to pass again. In spite of all that heaven did in behalf of the vineyard, it is producing wild grapes, bitter, acrid, poisonous with venom and hate. The noble effort of the giants of yesteryear has been diverted by men of pygmy stature into an excuse for civil and fratricidal strife which makes it a laughingstock to the world. Those who know it best make sport of it. The restoration movement which proposed to unite all in Christ is now shattered into more than two dozen warring factions, each of which proclaims itself to be the bride of the Messiah, and all of which are contesting the provisions of His will before the court of human opinion.

That you may savor just how wild are the grapes we have produced, let us mention but a case or two by way of illustration. The Son of God left the community of saints a feast of fellowship, by which the citizens are to proclaim His death until He has returned. All who are sealed unto God are to participate in unity of purpose. "We are all one bread and one body, for we are all partakers of that one bread." But the children have fallen out with each other and because the Lord has delayed His coming, they have taken to smiting each other. The very expression of unity and fellowship of the one body have been made one of the most frightful causes of division and disfellowship.

Think of it! Men have divided over whether the bread which represents his body shall be leavened or unleavened; whether it should be prepared with oil or some other ingredient; whether it should be passed whole; whether it should be made of wheat or some other grain. Congregations have actually been rent asunder over whether the fruit of the vine should be fermented or not; whether it should be passed in one container, several, or many. Here is the spirit of intolerance and the love for factionism gone to seed. And when factionism exists in the hearts of the members, it does not make any difference how they partake of the elements — it is not the Lord's Supper. When a congregation is filled with the party spirit, until the members eye each other with disdain and suspicion, they need not be concerned about how they prepare or pass the emblems for they are an abomination unto God when they pretend to communion with him and hate their brethren.

The one who died in agony for my sins has bound me to eat the bread and drink the cup in memory of him until he comes. When I sit down at the table with the saints, I shall not scrutinize or examine the bread to see if it is leavened or unleavened, or made with oil or not. I am not told to examine the bread. I am told to examine myself that my motive in participating be without reproach. I shall not concern myself with how it is broken and how it is passed. I am told to eat the bread and thus share in his death. Regardless of the grain from which the flour was made, whether there is yeast in it or not, it is bread, sanctified by the giving of thanks to its purpose and I shall seek to discern the Lord's body, rather than trying to discern what my brethren are thinking.

I know that factionalism is sinful! It is a work of the flesh. To build a party around a type of bread, or a manner of presenting it is a sin! A man may have scruples as to the type of bread. I should recognize them in the community of saints, and out of love should determine to keep from offense of my brother. It is a sin for either of us to build a party so that the body will be rent into a "leavened party" and an "unleavened party." And that goes for the cup of the Lord. There is no such thing in Christ as "multiple cups churches" and "one-cuppers." These terms represent divisions created by men.

They are semantical, divisions of vernacular, and they belong to the vocabulary of narrow, intolerant, factional spirits. They are disgraceful and sinful. Those who love the Lord should purify their hearts of the attitude which creates such unscriptural verbiage so that they may purge their tongues and pens of such language. We are disappointing God with our wild grapes of hate, bitterness and the party spirit. God help us to rise above the schisms we have created.

Fear of Love

Contents

It was while he was sitting on the hill that day, with his disciples gathered around, that Jesus opened his mouth and taught them. What he was saying seemed almost casual. Too casual. Yet those who heard and took it to heart would never be the same again. Not with the second mile lifestyle! But it was the freewheeling, uninhibited and unrestricted love which made the real difference. This put the finger on the Grade A, number one problem of the whole world. It created for us an opportunity to compromise and try to cover up by explaining away what He said, so that the guilt of the excuse actually became greater than our frightful tampering with his teaching.

"For if you love those who love you, what reward have you? Do not even the tax collectors do the same?" That separates the men from the boys. It also separates the righteous from the wicked. Of course there is nothing wrong with loving those who love you. That isn't the point. It's loving only those who love you, when there are a lot more people in the world who need loving and need it desperately. Some of them are quite loveless. Some are real problems— sticky problems. Even tax collectors, social outcasts shunned by polite society, and given the brush-off by nice people, love those who love them. No one can file claim for a reward for acting like a tax collector.

"And if you salute only your brethren, what more are you doing than others? Do not even the Gentiles do the same?" What about one who does not even want to salute his brethren? One who slips out of the side door or goes down the other side of the street, to keep from meeting and greeting certain ones? It is implied that disciples of Jesus should do more than others. They should be more friendly, more hospitable, more generous, and more kind. They should be less egotistical, less selfish. Merely coming up to the standard of the Gentiles is not enough. To greet only your brethren is still to fall short. It is to miss the mark! The love that Jesus commanded is as wide as the ocean, as boundless as eternity, and as high as the heavens. It is not peanut-sized, and is bigger than life.

In the face of such teaching all else becomes secondary. Differences in social standing, dress style, ethnic background, race, all fade into oblivion. The things which loom so great in our sight, which become such frightful barriers to fraternization are swept away by Him who taught us to love the evil and the good man, to become children of the Father which is in heaven. Every person on earth needs to be loved and appreciated. Everyone needs to be shown courtesy, be given a greeting, and be warmly received.

We live in an age of frustration, disappointment, and discouragement. In a land of plenty men are not satisfied; living in luxury and physical comfort they are not at ease. Our educational institutions are filled to overflowing, but so are our courts for juvenile criminals. In spite of the numerous organizations dedicated to mental hygiene and social welfare, there are more neurotics and insane than at any time in our history. A symptom of our times is found in the tremendous upsurge of publications dealing with how to attain peace of mind, and the variety of suggestions is so great, and often so contradictory, as to upset the minds of some who were relatively at peace. The manufacturers of sedatives, tranquillizing drugs and barbiturates are having a field day. America has one big headache and hangover. She is paying the price for insecurity.

In this state of crisis what contributions are being made to the welfare of humanity by believers in the Messiah? When He came personally into the world it was in much the same state as now, except that wars had been ended by the sway of a universal empire. The very extremity of man was an opportunity for God. The sun of righteousness beamed brighter because of the darkness of slavery, corruption, degradation, immorality and suicide of the world. If ever Christianity should be able to exhibit itself to the greatest advantage, it is under such conditions as presently obtain. Instead, the nominal disciples of the Master, seem actually to be enlarging the problem rather than providing a solution. The moral defections of those reared under Christian influence, the nervous and mental breakdowns suffered, constitute an alarming barometer of unhealthful attitudes.

It is high time that we awake out of sleep! The expenditure of effort to promote factionism and hate will take its toll of wrecked minds and sick bodies as certainly as we now live. Hate and fear are toxic poisons. They will kill as certainly as arsenic or strychnine! Many of my own brethren are the most unhappy people on the earth today. They are gloomy, morose, and despondent. They are fearful and unbelieving! They are worried and scared! They are spiritually sick! Many who put on an outward show of gay spirits are troubled with worries, jealousy and envy. They cannot save the world, because they have nothing real to offer it. What would be the gain for men to leave the world where they have been fighting their enemies to come in the church and start fighting their brethren?

Why is it that Christianity does not arouse the vibrant passions, kindle and enflame the spirit, and surcharge men with the thrill and joy that the first believers experienced? It is because men persevere in right actions and service to others, merely through force of habit, or because of social consciousness, or to escape from the brooding thoughts engendered by an imperious conscience. It is the lack of a guiding principle which poisons the springs of happiness in action, and makes life dull and spiritless.

The guiding principle of Christianity is love! But it is not love for a particular race, nationality, faction, congregation, segment, or group. It is love for mankind not for a certain kind of man. To be children of God implies more than entering into a relationship with God; it entails the responsibility of growing Godlike in character. But "God is love!" The expression of that love was universal, "God so loved the world." God had wisdom and power, but we are not told that God is wisdom and power. His was a divine philanthropy. He loved men because they were men, made in his image. "But after that the kindness and love of God our Savior toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us . . ." (Titus 3:4, 5).

It is an amazing thing that under the guise of religion we are being taught today to not love men! The human heart was made to love. But it cannot retain a vacuum. If love is educated out of it, hate will rush in to fill it. Love is the most powerful, vital and active force in the universe. It is world-shaking and revolutionary. Nothing can stand before the application of its full potential. But a universal love for mankind is designated sentimentality, it is ridiculed, scoffed at, belittled even by those who profess to be children of that God who is love.

We are urged to love our group, our race, our church our nationality, our sect. We are afraid to love all men. To do so will upset our "little world" of security. It will make us vulnerable. We will be turned out of our little nest we have woven about ourselves. The churches of our land are employed to foster prejudice and animosity "in the name of Christ." We are taught to have nothing to do with Catholics, Presbyterians, Baptists, Jews, Moslems, Buddhists or Negroes. All of these are caught up in the human predicament. Each one is treading a path toward the grave.

God loves everyone of these. He sent His Son to die for them. The Son came among those who hated him. He ate with publicans and sinners. He visited in the homes of Pharisees. He touched lepers and the unclean. He forgave the woman caught in the very act of adultery. But we are told not to visit people who differ with us. We are instructed to keep away from them. They are not "faithful." We are! So our physicians are ministering to "the well." We have no sick among us. We do not really love the spiritually sick. If you want our love and service, you will have to get well. You must not be a problem.

Have you ever heard our brethren try to explain Matthew 5:43-48? Then, have you ever watched them try to put it into practice?

"Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that you may be the children of your Father which is in heaven." Love! Bless! Do good! Only by this means can you be the children of God. Jesus came to reveal God as a "servant-God." When the apostles were arguing heatedly about who would be the greatest in the Kingdom, Jesus arose from supper and girded himself with a towel and washed their feet. He accepted the role of a servant.

The world of mankind is divided into friend or foe as respects relationship to each of us. Every person I meet falls in one or the other of these categories. There are some who love us and some who hate us. There are some who bless us and others who curse us. But both are men and if we love mankind as such, we will have no problem of loving the various categories within the human realm. God made us men, but we have made various things of ourselves. We should love men because God made them, and in spite of what they have made of themselves.

Celsus, who was a bitter critic of the early Christians, and the target of apologies written by Origen, said, "These Christians love each other even before they are acquainted." If I am a true child of my Father, I shall desire and yearn for every man to be my brother. Man was created in God's image, and in whatever respect he has lost that image I must help him repair or regain it. He did not shatter that image because he was a Jew, a Negro, or a Japanese. Sin antedated the advent of racial differences. In the attempt to help one regain the spiritual image of God, I am not to see him as a Jew, Japanese, or Negro, but as man. "For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him."

One of Jimmy Dolittle's flyers after spending many months in a dirty prison camp, where he was brutalized, said: "They were ignorant and mean, but we thought there was some good in them. The only way to develop that goodness was by understanding and education— not by brutally mistreating them as they did us. You can smile if you want to, but it made sense to me in that prison camp, and it still does. So I am going to a missionary school for training, and then I am going to return to Japan and spend the rest of my life there, teaching the importance of love among men."

Henry W. Shaw said, "Love looks through a telescope, envy through a microscope." To restrict our love to those who agree with us on some points of religion, is to deny at once the very basic element of Christianity, the equal and infinite value of every human soul. To love all men is actually looked upon as a sign of weakness. The truth is that it takes a strong man to really love his enemies. Weak men hate, despise and feel envy. Cowards are jealous, embittered and distrustful. Love makes one vulnerable. It exposes his very being to exploitation. When Jesus said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he was meek, but he was not weak.

Those who are afraid to love all, may actually love no one.

It is observable that those who cannot love all men, end up by disliking most men. Those who would restrict their love to their own brethren, do not even love those brethren, and will backbite, undermine and seek to destroy them. It is amazing that through the years those who have not learned to love, and who censure a deep affection for others than those with whom they associate, will divide those associates, and soon will not love even a part of them.

Tertullian was the first important Christian writer in Latin. He was born in Carthage, the son of a Roman centurion. He studied law and actually practiced in Rome. It was while there that he became a convert to the faith. In his De Oratione he wrote. "Do we suppose that we can approach the god of peace without being ourselves men of peace? Can we ask for forgiveness of sin with our own hearts full of hatred? How can the Father who condemns anger, receive us if he sees us full of spleen against our brother? It is not only anger that the Christian man should abjure, but everything that may hinder his prayers. He should breathe a spirit in harmony with him into whose presence he comes. The God whose spirit is holiness and joy and liberty, cannot receive a soul defiled, angry, or enslaved. Opposites cannot meet, without sympathy, no relation is possible."

Our problem is not so much of having love dwell in us, as it is of our dwelling in love, as a state. God who made all men, cannot live in a heart that hates any man. "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." Dwelling in love means that it forms the world in which the Christian abides. He eats love, drinks it and breathes it. He has no life aside from love. No man can say he is like God whose love is partisan, national or racial. "Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world." Many bold blatant race-haters will be sniveling cowards in the day of judgment. There can be no boldness when they are stripped naked and are seen as they truly are.

Paul begins with man and his misery. He talks about him in his wretchedness. He speaks of him under condemnation. But John begins with God and His perfection. God is the Absolute Being. He is the Great I Am, whom no eye hath seen or can see. All perfection dwells in Him. He is at once life, light and love. He is the inexhaustible source of life the sole principle of everything that is. John gives us a concrete notion of His moral goodness when He says that God is love. Love is not only a manifestation of His being. It is His very essence.

Love is so assuredly the absolute truth, that he who loveth is of the truth. When the inspired record says, "Hereby we know that we are of the truth" it is because the preceding verse says, "Let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." When love is reduced to its essence it is truth, and that truth in the absolute is a person. It is God. How silly it is for feeble man whose mind can only comprehend so much to say there is no absolute truth. How foolish it is for him to try and walk as if that were so and he was left to guide himself without chart or compass.

Truth is all that God is. To be of the truth is to be born of God, to possess Him, to be what he is. He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him. "We know that we have crossed the frontier from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." Every person on this earth who is born of God and knows God is my brother. If I allow sectarian walls to be built and separate me from him I am a murderer and there is no eternal life abiding in me. I must seek out, search out and recognize all who are the children of God and I must love them, or I will suffer the fate of those who do not confess Him. "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God."

The lever which will move the world to Christ is love.

Regardless of how pure your doctrine will be, it will repel, instead of compel, when set forth in bigotry, intolerance and animosity. Even though you may divest yourself of everything, sell all your possessions and distribute them to the poor, it will avail nothing without love. If you consign your body to the flames and allow persecutors to fasten you to the stake and reduce your mortal frame to ashes, and have not love, it will only be burning flesh unless it is done in love for Him "who loved us and gave Himself for us." No one can be forced to accept Jesus Christ. You cannot drive men nor compel them. You cannot argue nor debate them into the new relationship which is eternal life.

The real test of faith in the Christ is the reformation worked in your own life. "For we ourselves also were at one time foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another." We must learn to see ourselves thus. We must quit trying to make it appear that we were guiltless and admit our guilt. We must make it apparent to all that we have changed. We have heard the call of the shepherd. We have heard the voice of our Lord. Now we have become associates of the Father and the Son, purveyors of love unlimited.

Jeremy Taylor said, "Love is the greatest thing that God can give us, for himself is love; and it is the greatest thing we can give to God, for it will also give ourselves, and carry with it all that is ours. The apostle calls it the bond of perfection; it is the old, the new, and the great commandment and all of the commandments for it is the fulfilling of the whole law. It does the work of all the other graces without any instrument but its own immediate virtue."

Waging Peace

Contents

The word for peace in the old covenant scriptures is shalom. It literally means "wholeness." It is the original used in Joshua 8:30, 31. "Then Joshua built an altar unto the Lord God of Israel in mount Ebal. As Moses the servant of the Lord commanded the children of Israel, as it is commanded in the book of the Law of Moses, an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron; and they offered thereon burnt offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace offerings." The stones were shalom, because they were unhewn. They remained whole as in their natural state.

It was used in Nehemiah 6:15 where the wall was completed. "So the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days." To finish means to make whole. In the Septuagint Version shalom is often rendered soteria, salvation which means "to restore to wholeness." The terms saved and made whole are used interchangeably in the new covenant scriptures. "And he said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace" (Luke 7:50). "And he said unto her, "Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace" (Luke 8:48).

Sin has shattered the personality. It has fragmented man. It is as if a beautiful vase had been struck with a rock or other foreign object and left in pieces. Then someone comes and with the eye and hand of a master craftsman puts the pieces together again and restores the vase to its former state. The vase cannot save itself. It has to be saved. It is dependent upon a power from without. The intimate relationship between peace and salvation is important to any proper understanding of our trust in God.

In the revelation of God peace seldom is used to describe what happens with the cessation of hostilities or the signing of a truce. It is not mere absence of war. It's lack is characterized by a breakdown of personal relationships with Jesus. "For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." These are strong ties by nature. Anything which disrupts them must also be powerful. One of the proofs of the magnetic power of Jesus is his effect upon the natural ties of the flesh. He transcends all such. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me."

Peace is the restoration of those broken relationships through Jesus. Just as the relationships of life break down because of attitudes toward Jesus so they are restored by an attitude toward Him. "There is no peace, saith the Lord unto the wicked" (Isa. 48:22). His very coming was announced by "a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace toward men of goodwill." He said, "These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world" (John 16:33).

Peter declared to the household of Cornelius that "the word of God was sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all)" (Acts 10:36). Our peace is not a written agreement. It is not a signed document. It is not a creedal statement. It is not a book of ethical precepts or legal commandments. It is a person, a divine person who came to share the lot of us all. "For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us" (Eph. 2:14). He did not demand that the circumcised become uncircumcised. He did not demand that the uncircumcised become circumcised. He simply removed the wall between— so making peace!

Jesus is the great wall-wrecker between men. Just as he removed what seemed to be an insuperable wall between Jew and Gentile, so he labors to remove every wall between the believers today. As he used the cross then, so he uses it now. It was by the cross that he reconciled two divergent peoples unto God in one body. It is by the same instrument that he effects the same thing in our day. As men cease to emphasize their opinions and interpretations and exalt the cross of Jesus they see their differences disappear. No one can exalt an opinion or a man unless he denigrates Jesus, or places him in an inferior role.

Those who were sometimes afar off were made nigh by the blood of Christ. It was not by adoption of a rite which had no relevance in Christ. At the same time the blood made us near it wiped out everything which alienated and made us afar off. It purged away our alienation. We became fitly framed together. We were builded together. It is that togetherness we are to keep in the bond of peace. To break it up would nullify the work of the cross. It would count the blood of the covenant wherewith we were sanctified an unholy thing.

Peace within begins with our justification. And justification means to declare one sinless and to treat him thus. It does not mean that he is sinless, for no man could ever qualify. But God, by His abundant grace, can reckon us as such, and do so freely, for the scripture says "we are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24). And the ground of our justification is faith, absolute unresolved trust in the merit of His blood. This is "the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all who believe" (Rom. 3:22).

One can never know that absolute and perfect peace within as long as he has a conscience laden with guilt. With remorse for his past sins gnawing away at him, internally, with constant uneasiness as to whether he has been forgiven, with the fear of death before his eyes, he will not only chastise himself within, but will lash out at others about him. He will be of all men most miserable. He will isolate himself from his best friends and make enemies of those who love him. All of the troubles, all of the aches and pains for the body of Christ have been caused by those who did not believe they were justified, and who try to project their guilt toward others.

"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Man is aware of the fact that he is a sinner. As such, he is drawn by the lusts of the flesh. He fulfills all the desires of the flesh and of the mind. He is a child of wrath. He is an enemy of God and alienated from Him. In this frightful state God, who is rich in mercy and filled with great love, lets down a rope which man can grasp, and he is raised up from an otherwise hopeless condition. He must be reconciled to God, and the death of His Son makes this possible. By faith in that tremendous act of history, the most momentous thing which has ever occurred in the annals of this world, man is restored to a proper relationship with God.

He becomes a part of the new humanity. He is a new creation. Old things pass away. All things become new. He is at peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. He stands in the grace of God. He rejoices in the hope of the glory of God. And everything falls into proper perspective. Tribulations, patience, experience, hope. He is dead to the past in Christ. He lives only in Jesus. He has no time for anger, wrath and malice. Hatred is foreign to his new way of existence. He is delivered from plotting the downfall of others.

The word eirene, the Greek word for peace, occurs in every book of the new covenant scriptures except 1 John. In every instance but one, in the Authorized Version it is rendered by "peace." It signifies that state of harmonious relationship attained by acceptance of the grace of God. It is active, not static. It is aggressive, not latent. It is from God, who is frequently called the God of peace. It is from Christ who is called the Lord of peace (2 Thess. 3:16). To be in perfect peace is to be whole and complete. It is to be saved, in the very fulness of that term.

The religious world is in turmoil. Believers in the Lord Jesus are fractured into hundreds of warring camps. The partisans in these splinter groups are often filled with bitterness and hatred. They have carried over into the Kingdom their previous dispositions. "For we ourselves were once foolish, disobedient, led astray, slaves to various passions and pleasures, passing our days in malice and envy, hated by men and hating one another" (Titus 3:3). They are acting as if the goodness and loving kindness of God our Savior had never appeared, and as if He had never saved us. All of this is contrary to the will of the Father. It is opposed to the prayer of Jesus. But the condition exists and it is useless to deny it. What should be the attitude of one who deeply loves the Christ and his fellowmen, as respects the problem of disunity and strife?

It would seem that his course is clearly outlined in the new covenant scriptures. First, he must recognize the party spirit for what it is. It is a work of the flesh. It will debar one who practices it from inheritance in the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:19). This will eliminate the possibility of mistaking a desire for unity for mere ambition to build up a party. Secondly, he must actively engage in the attempt to promote peace. He must be a peacemaker if he would be called a son of God (Matt. 5:9). He cannot be indifferent, unconcerned or unmoved by the rents in the body of the Christ. He dare not withdraw into the castle and snap and snarl at those who are actively engaged in trying to do something. He must seek to promote harmony or forfeit his right to be called a son of God.

In the third place he must recognize that peace is not an accident. Unity is not a chance happening. Peace must be sought and pursued (1 Peter 3:11). It is a fruit of the Spirit which is reaped by those who sow the seed (James 3:18). Not only must peace be planted, but it must be tended. It must be fertilized. It must be cultivated and nourished. It must be aimed at. It cannot be hit upon by those who wave their weapon aimlessly and pull the trigger. "Aim at righteousness, faith, love, and peace, along with those who call upon the Lord out of a pure heart." A state of division exists. It is contrary to God's will. We are charged with bringing about unity. Unity is the result of purposeful planning. It is never accidental. It follows then that true children of God must have a definite, positive approach to this problem, and they must be working on it.

We must not think we can be saved by maintaining the status quo. If a man is struck by an automobile in front of my house, I cannot shrug it off by saying that none of my immediate family are hurt, therefore, it is no concern of mine; nor can I be justified by criticizing the methods of help used by my neighbors. So it is while the body of Christ lies bleeding and broken. I cannot excuse myself by saying it does not affect my congregation or group, nor will I be justified by sitting in an ivory tower complaining that the bandages and remedies applied by others are inadequate and useless. What am I doing to bring peace to this troubled world. I must face this question some day. I want to face it now. It is not a question for the "sweet bye and bye." It is a question for the "now and now." Peace will reign in the world to come. But will it reign in this present evil world?

Peace must be waged! Some men wage war and endure hardship, privation and suffering to attain their objectives. Yet war is hell, according to one of the great generals of the past. By the same token peace is heaven. What am I willing to sacrifice as a soldier for peace, with a part of my uniform the footgear of the preparation of the gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15)? Can I slog along across No Man's Land, wading through mud and gore, seeking my objective? Or will I stay in General Headquarters and play it safe? The soldier for peace must make himself vulnerable.

Can I continue the campaign if others mistake my motives, seek to undermine the strategy of peace, misrepresent what I say, and hate me for not hating others? Can I endure it to be called a rebel, a heretic and a traitor? These are all terms in the vocabulary of the factionalist. Can I endure the long hours of study, the absence from loved ones, and the constant pressure? That all depends upon whether the Cause in which I have enlisted is a passing fancy, a shimmering delusion, or a real and consuming passion.

If I am dedicated to the Christ, crucified to the world and sanctified by the Spirit, then "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself." The disunity, bitterness, party spirit and division which exist today have come from the seeds of animosity and hatred, planted in fertile soil by our forefathers. They separated from one another in their anger and fed the growing atmosphere of distrust by their stubbornness. Shall we continue to walk in the same weary rut like a blind horse on a treadmill? Will we bequeath to our children and grandchildren a granary stored with the seed of distrust and malice? If peace is a fruit it cannot be gathered until men prepare the soil and sow the seed. Shall I not leave a heritage of working for peace? Shall I not show them the gate leading to blessing, rather than to death?

How can peace be waged? Perhaps we have practiced disunity so long we do not know how to plead for unity. I will venture to state a few convictions which I feel must be a part of the strategy for peace. Peace must be waged in love. "If there is . . . any incentive of love . . . complete my joy by being of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind" (Phil 2:1, 2). Love is the incentive to unity and not vice versa. We do not love each other because we are of the same mind; we come to be of the same mind because we love each other. It is not unity which promotes love, but love which promotes unity. "If you love those who love you, what reward have you?" (Matt. 5:46). I must begin, continue and finish in love.

It is inconceivable that I would mistreat, abuse, or take unfair advantage of someone whom I love. Therefore if one differs with me upon matters relating to the service of God, I must make a difference between the person and what he advocates. Jesus died for him. He may not have died for what he argues. It will help me to realize that he is sincere about what he says although I may deem it to be in error. He cannot say anything else if he really believes it. I cannot suggest unity based upon the sacrifice of honestly-held conviction. I can receive him while mentally rejecting what he assumes is correct.

I must listen to what he says, weighing it carefully and dispassionately, always acceding to what is truth, and then, in kindness, reasoning with him, on points of disagreement. It is quite sectarian to imagine that he is wrong upon everything because he is mistaken about some things. My first task should be to see where we can agree, rather than to ferret out areas of disagreement. We can stand together upon anything that both of us conceive of as truth. And from that we can reason toward greater agreement upon other matters.

Under no circumstance must I sacrifice principle in order to have the good will of men. However, I must distinguish between those things that are basic and essential to a relationship unto God and those matters which are incidental. "It is my prayer that your love may be more and more accompanied by clear knowledge and keen perception, for testing things that differ, so that you may be men of transparent character" (Phil. 1:9, 10. Weymouth). Love accompanied by clear knowledge and keen perception. What a trio of excellencies! To be willing to talk together, to exchange views in love, to treat each other as equals, does not imply an acceptance of all the varied viewpoints at once— or ever!

All truth is equally true but it is not all of equal importance. It is true that the scriptures teach that Methuselah was 969 years old when he died. And I believe that. But it is not nearly so important as the fact that Jesus died for my sins. It is a fact that after the Supper Jesus and the eleven sang a song and went out to the Mount of Olives, but that does not strike a responsive chord in my heart as does the account of what transpired in the Garden of Gethsemane. I have known men to get so intense in debating about the way in which the supper was served that they never got around to its real purpose.

Any strategy of unity for those who have been estranged must begin with association. It cannot begin anywhere else. If a married couple have gotten on each other's nerves until the wife has had to leave, they will never be together again until they begin to meet. So long as they stay aloof and nurture their hatred they will grow farther apart. The same thing holds true in the realm of religion. If there has come a formal break it can never be repaired until the two sides begin to associate together.

We do not shoot men full of peace nor bombard them with unity! Peace and unity come as a result of patient striving in love, of long years of fruitful discussion and contact, of mutual understanding arrived at through long periods of prayer and study together. Unity can never be secured by two persons or groups who draw their rigid battle lines, and seek only to replenish their own supply of ammunition from God's arsenal so they may blast each other into submission. Such a course makes for wresting the scriptures, creating arguments where God has made none, public debates with their rabid followings, and the drawing away in sadness of those hungry souls who ask for bread and are given a stone, who ask a fish and are given a serpent.

Fair treatment of those who differ with us, a recognition of brotherhood in Jesus of all immersed penitent believers— these do not mean endorsement of error, compromise with false concepts, nor acceptance of interpretations that we believe to be wrong. They rather constitute only the foundation upon which we all may explore our major problems, and from such contacts as are established build a better and brighter prospect for tomorrow.

It is only those who have an inner fear that they lack truth who shrink back from contact and withdraw into the confines of partisan citadels. Let us feel a sense of compassion for those who dare not face the battle, but let those who possess the vision and courage not be daunted, but press the battle for peace. "For God hath called us to peace."

Thoughts on Fellowship (1)

Contents

"God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. 1:9).

The church of God at Corinth consisted of called saints, those who were sanctified in Christ Jesus (1:2). The state or condition to which they were called by God is expressed by the term "the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ." To this state they attained through "the grace of God which is given by Jesus Christ" (1:4). Because they were called into such a state they were to avoid all schisms among themselves (1:10). Being bound by a common tie, they were to avoid those things which would disrupt the community, or place strains upon their union. They were to "endeavor to guard the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. 4:3). By this means they would "walk worthy of the calling wherewith you are called."

What is involved in "the fellowship of Jesus Christ our Lord"? How do we attain unto it? Who are participants in it? How do they remain in it? What action will separate them from this state? How do we guard it? Surely these are matters of grave importance, and should challenge the thinking of every person on earth who believes that there is a God, and that Jesus Christ is His Son, and our Savior. The state of fellowship represents a complete change in relationship. The prior condition is described as being "alienated from the life of God." The new state is described as one of sonship, in which the participant is "an heir of God through Christ" (Gal. 4:7). From a state in which there was no sharing in the blessings of God, a transformation takes place in which the one who is called becomes a sharer of the divine bounty as a son.

It is our conviction that the community of saints in Christ Jesus is the earthly culmination of that eternal purpose which is described as "a plan for the ages to gather together in one all things in Christ" (Eph. 1:10). The mystery of fellowship was hidden in God from the beginning of the world (Eph. 3:9). In other ages it was not made known unto the sons of men, but in this final age on earth, it was revealed unto the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit. The purpose of this revelation was "to make all men see" (Eph. 3:9). If, then, we are to see the truth upon this wonderful subject we must go to the revelation contained in the Christian scriptures. Our ideas, opinions and notions relative to fellowship mean nothing unless they coincide with God's revelation. Our task is to ascertain from the new covenant scriptures what significance and meaning is attached to the term by the Holy Spirit.

The concept of fellowship with the Father, and with the Son, belongs to mankind only since that Son came in the flesh. This is abundantly clear to the student of the first epistle of John. Judaism provided an elaborate system of rules and ceremonies by which its adherents were kept apart from God, each other, and the world about them. The keynote was struck at the foot of Sinai, when their constitution was to be announced. Bounds were placed about the mountain so that the people would not come near. The threat of death was held over the Israelites. They were literally fenced off from God. "For they could not endure the order that was given, If even a beast touches the mountain, it shall be stoned. Indeed so terrifying was the sight that Moses said, I tremble with fear" (Hebrews 12:20, 21). The ritualism of the law maintained barriers between the people and God. The Almighty communed with them from the thick darkness of the most holy place. He was separated from them by a thick veil.

The temple had its court of Gentiles, and across its barrier no Gentile dared step to mingle with the chosen race. Josephus, in his description of the Temple says, "When you go through these first cloisters unto the second court of the Temple, there was a partition made of stone all round, whose height was three cubits. Its construction was very elegant; upon it stood pillars at equal distances from one another, declaring the law of purity, some in Greek and some in Roman letters that no foreigner should go within the sanctuary" (The Wars of the Jews, 5, 5, 2). In 1871 one of these prohibiting tablets was actually excavated. The wording on it reads, "Let no one of any other nation come within the fence and barrier around the Holy Place. Whoever will be taken doing so will himself be responsible for the fact that his death will ensue."

There was the Court of the Women with its partition enclosing it, and there was the court of the People, who were Israelites and males, then there was the court of the Priests, and finally the Holy Place itself. The temple was a series of barriers which discouraged fraternization at all under the threat of death. Even in the Greek world the caste system reared its ugly head and Cicero wrote, "As the Greeks say, all men are divided into two classes— Greeks and barbarians."

The death of the Messiah marked the end of this state with its exclusive and artificial barriers by a startling symbol. As he expired on the cross "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom" (Mark 15:38). That veil was thirty feet high. If it had rent from the bottom to the top it might have been urged that it was done by man. But to be rent from the top to the bottom is assurance that man had naught to do with it. The significance of this is graphically depicted by the writer of the Hebrew letter: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh: and having an high priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith" (Hebrews 10:19-22). The boldness and full assurance which is ours should be contrasted with the excessive fear and trembling at Sinai. There the command was "Draw not nigh!" Now the invitation is "Let us draw near!"

The death of Jesus not only established a nearness of the people of God expressed by His language, "I will receive you, and be a Father unto you" (2 Cor. 6:17, 18), but it also removed barriers which separated men from their fellows. "For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us . . . that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby" (Eph. 2:14, 16). It is worthy of note that the work of achieving unity is not credited to man. That is the work of Jesus. He made both one. He broke down the barrier of separation. He abolished in his flesh the enmity. He made in himself of two one new man. He reconciled both unto God in one body. He came and preached peace.

It is through Him we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father. "Therefore . . . ye are fellowcitizens with the saints" (Eph. 2:19). Not because of what we have done, but because of what He has done. The unity is achieved by the Spirit. It is called "the fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil. 2:2). All we can do is to guard and maintain that "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Any person who erects a wall of partition to divide, separate and segregate brethren, regardless of what that wall may be, thereby opposes the work of God's Son and does despite to the Spirit of grace. He runs counter to the divine purpose in the world.

The temple with its sacerdotal orders and its ritual pageantry is gone. It "stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. 9:10). What has taken the place of these things since Jesus has entered "into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Hebrews 9:24)? My answer is that the koinonia, the fellowship of God, through the Spirit, has displaced the ceremonies and rules of the Mosaic dispensation. These things "could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience" (Hebrews 9:9). There was an impenetrable barrier between the person and His God, for "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest."

What a change has been wrought by grace. The veil has been rent! We have access unto the Father by one Spirit. From an aching heart to an accepted heart in one beautiful act. I need not climb a sacred mountain nor make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to feel a closeness with God. It is no longer a question of this place or that place, of this spot or that one. "Neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father . . . the true worshiper shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." The true worshiper does not think of attempting to worship God with things. He does not attempt to confine Him to a specific place. God is a Spirit. He is unconfined and unconfinable.

The spirit of man is that part of man which looks beyond the carnal, the physical, the fleshly. It is the part of man which dreams dreams. It is that part of man which cannot always be confined in a prison-house of flesh but which will someday break through the barriers of sense and feeling. True worship is when the spirit, the invisible and immortal part of man, speaks to and meets with God who is immortal and invisible. This is not done on sacred mountains. It is not confined to golden temples. God is a Spirit and he seeks a worship which is in spirit and in reality.

My body is a temple. My heart is a most holy place. God dwells in me even as I dwell in Him. "This is a great mystery, and I take it to mean Christ and the church" (Eph. 5:32). What a fellowship! What a joy divine! We mutually come closer together. "Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you" (James 4:8). "Ye are the temple of the living God, as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people" (2 Cor. 6:16). This fragile structure of clay houses the Deity. The symbol of God's presence in the tabernacle was the Shekinah, visible as a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. The Holy Spirit rests upon us as the cloud did upon the tabernacle in the wilderness.

"In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord, in whom we also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2:21-22). A holy temple! A habitation for God! How this transcends the kind of ritual which is done over and over, grinding out devotions like a heathen prayer wheel. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit which is in you, which ye have of God and ye are not your own" (1 Cor. 6:19). What a wonderful temple. What a glorious tenant. He is with me every hour of every day. Worship is not something offered in five special acts. It is the prostration of myself before the Spirit, the bowing of myself before His regal presence. It is the very consciousness that He is with me in everything I say and do.

"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you" (1 Cor. 3:16). What a transformation. In other days we had to go up to God. "Three times in the year shall all the males appear before the Lord God" (Exo. 23:17). Now God has come down to us. He has appeared before us. He dwells in us and walks in us, not at stated seasons, but every hour of the day and night. How foolish for men to talk about sacred seasons and holy days. There are no special sacred places and no special sacred days. Every place where a Christian is is a sacred place. Under the old regime nothing was sacred unless it was fenced off from the profane on every side. The word profane means before the temple. It referred to that which was left outside when one entered a pagan place of worship so that it would not be constituted sacred. Under the new order all that God has made sacred, and nothing is profane except for one who defiles it by his sinful attitude. "For the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof" (1 Cor.

10:26).

Fellowship has to do with sharing. It can never be divorced from this idea. Through grace Jesus shared our lot. "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood he also himself likewise took part of the same" (Heb. 2:14). "He emptied himself, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2:7). "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich" (2 Cor. 8:9). The Christian life is a shared response to God called forth by the gift of God of which we have been made partakers. We are made partakers of Christ through the gospel. Our obedience to the demands of the gospel, introduces us into that state or condition called fellowship with God. We are in fellowship with each other only because we sustain the same relationship to Him. We cannot create that state. We cannot invent the terms by which we enter it. We are called into it by the Father.

1. Fellowship with God is not conditioned upon perfect knowledge of the divine revelation. "If anyone imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know" (1 Cor. 8:2). One who professes that he knows everything, is guilty of a highly inflamed imagination.

2. It is not contingent upon attainment to a life of sinless perfection. "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1 John 1:8). "For we all make many mistakes" (James 2:2).

3. It is not contingent upon an ability to explain or expound every point of doctrine. If it were we could not grow after becoming members of the body. "Let not many of you become teachers, my brethren, knowing that we who teach shall be judged with greater strictness."

It is contingent upon a complete surrender of self to the Christ, and a willingness to follow as He leads. On the divine side, fellowship is a union with and a participation in the life of Christ through the Spirit; on the human side it is a communion with brethren whose mutual relations were transformed by the Spirit. If fellowship were limited only to those who had perfect knowledge, led perfect lives, or could explain every point of doctrine perfectly a lot of us would never experience it at all. It is regrettable that those who create such terms only eliminate themselves

Thoughts on Fellowship (2)

Contents

The word "fellowship" is generally from the Greek koinonia. This word is rendered fellowship 12 times, communion 4, communication 1, contribution 1, distribution 1, to communicate 1. Actually the term koinonia has such varied aspects no single English word is able to express them all. It is so rich in meaning that it more than exhausts the meaning of any term we have. It is a derivative of koinos, the word for common. "Common" has two different meanings in English. It can refer to that which is jointly held by a large group, and it is in this respect that Jude speaks of "the common salvation."

It can also refer to that which is commonplace and vulgar as contrasted with that which is rare and distinguished. In this sense, it came to be applied to that which was unhallowed or not ceremonially clean (Cp. Acts 10:14, 15). The word vulgar is from vulgus, the crowd, the common people. The Latin Vulgate was a version which was given to all and made available to the commoners. This is comparable to the word "profane" from the Latin. This refers to that which was pro fanum, that is, left outside the temple or sanctuary, and thus not consecrated. We speak of profane history in contrast with that which was inspired, and had a sacred origin.

The basic definition of koinonia as given by Joseph Thayer, is: "Fellowship, association, community, communion, joint participation, intercourse." In its application to the New Testament usage, he divides it into three parts: (1) The share which one has in anything, participation; (2) intercourse, fellowship, intimacy; (3) a benefaction jointly contributed, a collection, a contribution. It is interesting to note that this last is a use unknown to profane authors. It is an acquired meaning given only by the New Testament writers, and even though Thayer defines koinonia as "a collection, a contribution," he adds, "as exhibiting an embodiment or proof of fellowship." Actually, the gift or benefaction is not the koinonia at all, as we shall later demonstrate. It is a manifestation of it. The koinonia (fellowship) is already existent and prompts the gift. We shall learn that for Christians, the only genuine riches we have are those we share in the Christ, and we supply the bodily needs of each other because we all alike are redeemed and in Him. The sharing of earthly goods is a spontaneous expression of our sharing in the divine wealth.

The word for "fellow" came into our language from the Old Norse term for a comrade or associate. The suffix ship is Anglo-Saxon in origin and is generally found in connection with nouns denoting persons. It relates to a state or condition in which such persons move. We speak of friendship, partnership, and sonship. Ignorance of this fact prompts many to use ridiculous and absurd expressions. Indications of some of these regularly come from the disciple brotherhood. Men write and ask me if I fellowship cups, classes, colleges, fermented wine, orphan homes or instrumental music. I would like for someone to tell me how to do so, if I wanted to.

One of the most tragic misconceptions is based on the idea that fellowship is synonymous with, or equivalent to, endorsement of anything or everything the other "fellow" may hold or advocate. In any final analysis this must lead to the conclusion that no two persons could ever be in fellowship until they both reach perfect knowledge and complete agreement upon every minute detail. The folly of such a view can easily be detected by any thinking person. We do not make other kindred terms subject to such unreasonable interpretation. Can friendship exist between those who do not agree upon all issues. Can partnership exist between persons who are unequal in knowledge and attainment, and who possess divergent views? Certainly there are many close friends who disagree upon some matters, and many partners who associate in business in spite of divergent opinions.

We are to be in fellowship "with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 John 1:3). Does this mean that God did not accept us into fellowship until our understanding of all things is equal to his divine knowledge? If so, how can we "*grow in grace and knowledge of the truth" after we come into Christ? Now, if God being perfect, can be in fellowship with us in our ignorance and imperfection, why do we set up a standard for others which he did not set up for us? If it be argued that John meant only the apostles were in fellowship with the Father and the Son, the difficulty is not lessened.

Were James and John in the fellowship of Jesus when they were making the demand that one of them sit on His right hand and one on the left when He came in His kingdom? Were the others who became angry at this in His fellowship? Was Peter in His fellowship when He tried to thwart His death by saying "Be it not so, for this shall not be unto you." Was he in the fellowship of Christ from Pentecost to the time of his vision on the housetop at Joppa? Certainly he did not realize that God had removed the restrictions upon eating of meats and zealously followed the ceremonial regime of Judaism. Nor did he previously grasp the great truth that "God is no respecter of persons." If he could be in the fellowship until he learned these truths, may not others be in the same fellowship, while learning the way of truth more perfectly?

The fact is that the fellowship of the new covenant is not based upon unanimity of opinion, interpretation, or even understanding of scriptural doctrine. It does not imply nor indicate endorsement of the position of one with whom we may differ. Fellowship is one thing; endorsement of the position taken by another is a wholly different thing. Fellowship of Christ, and in Christ, is a state or condition into which we are called by God through the gospel; endorsement of an interpretation or idea of one in or out of the fellowship is a rational act of our own minds. It is the jumbled, mixed-up thinking on this point that has created the factionalism, partisan spirit, and sectarianism, so rife among the heirs of the restoration movement.

Not long ago I attended a meeting conducted by a young brother. He announced in the newspaper that he would hold a "gospel meeting." His gospel consisted of informing the partisans who were present that grouping of students in classes to study the sacred oracles of God was a tool of hell and an instrument of Satan. This was the Good News of salvation! It was for this Jesus died on the cross. It was this to which all of the prophets gave witness. After the meeting I introduced myself to him, and he in turn introduced me to several about him. He was careful each time to say "Mr. Ketcherside." As I spoke to him and to each of the others, I addressed him as "brother." During what he referred to as his sermon the speaker alluded to "the brotherhood" several times. I asked him if he considered me a member of it, and if not, to tell me what I would have to do that I had not done to become a part of it. He hemmed and hawed and was hesitant to commit himself on either count.

Later, at my urgent invitation, he attended a service where I was speaking. I mentioned my joy at his presence and requested him to lead in prayer. He shook his head in refusal. Afterwards he told me he could not "fellowship" me because I did not oppose Bible classes, and he was afraid that if he prayed to God at my request, it would consist of "fellowship." I felt sorry for him, for I grew up in the same kind of bigoted and partisan relationship. I can recall how we used to discuss whether it was right to call a man a "brother" who disagreed with us on colleges, orphan homes, classes, cups, instrumental music, or the millennial theory.

I was afraid to call upon a man to pray to God who was not of "our group," for I realized what "the brotherhood" would do to me if they found it out. I did not want to be put through the meat grinder or sausage mill. It seems incredible to me now that we once drove out from us one who addressed a Christian Church elder as brother and asked him to lead in prayer. I am thrilled that the grace of God delivered me from such littleness. I have recently very carefully scrutinized my heart on all of these controversial issues. I find that I have not materially altered my position on a single one of them. I am stronger than ever in my previous convictions on most of them. But I am no longer afraid of what men will do unto me! I refuse to be the mouthpiece of a faction, or the cat's paw of a clique! I am no longer a party pigeon or a Simple Simon. I want to belong to the Lord and bow unto Him only. To us there is but one Lord!

I have learned that those who differ with me on these issues are my brethren, because of their relationship to the family, or household of God. We are not brothers because we have the same opinions but because we have the same Father. We also have the same mother, for Jerusalem which is from above is the mother of us all. If having the same Father and Mother does not make us brothers, pray tell me what it would take. Every baptized penitent believer on this earth is my brother, and we are in fellowship because we are a part of the brotherhood of Christ. That is the only brotherhood on this whole wide earth in which I am the least bit interested.

I do not agree on much with most of those who are in it, and do not fully agree with any of them, but fellowship in God is one thing, and perfect agreement is a wholly different thing. My father had six children, and they often differed with each other and even with their parents, but it never once occurred to me to deny they were my brothers and sisters because we argued loud and long. We were brothers not because of what we had done but because we were introduced by birth into a family state or relationship. The relationship into which we are introduced by the new birth is the fellowship of the new covenant. We have been in fellowship with a lot more people than we ever realized, or even yet realize. I am in fellowship with every saved person on this earth, that is, if I am saved. When I was younger, the family of God was a little one but now that I have grown out of my own provincialism, that family has increased perceptibly. Praise His name!

Every person who has received Christ Jesus, and thus has been born of the water and of the Spirit, who has experienced the riches of the glory of God's mystery "which is Christ in you, the hope of glory," is in the fellowship. They are partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, having been delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the Kingdom of the Messiah. Having been called into the kingdom and glory of God, and having been sealed by the Holy Spirit they are in communion with God and with every other person on earth who has been born again. They are the beneficiaries of the grace of our Lord, of the love of God, and of the fellowship of the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14).

When the apostle wrote to Corinth he told them they had been called into the fellowship of Jesus Christ. They were torn by partisan strife, tolerant of immorality, intolerant of the scruples of the brethren, impleading each other in heathen courts, and even so factious they could not eat the love feast together. He was fearful of coming among them lest he find quarreling, jealousy, anger, selfishness, slander, gossip, deceit and disorder. Yet he did not tell "the faithful" to go and start a "loyal" congregation! He did not even intimate that he would split them and take out a group when he arrived. He asked, "Do you not know that Jesus Christ is in you?— unless indeed you fail to meet the test" (2 Cor. 13:5). What was the test? Was it an attitude as to classes for Bible study, individual cups, fermented wine, unleavened bread, orphan homes, etc.? These are tests which men have concocted to shatter and split into factious groups those who are in the fellowship.

God devised no such tests. Jesus Christ can be in men, who in their weakness and ignorance, differ in opinion as to these things. Paul said "What we pray for is your improvement" (2 Cor. 13:9). Not once in all of the divine revelation of God was a congregation of believers ever advised to split or separate. Not once was a group of believers told to come out from, or separate themselves from the other believers. If so, where is the place? Paul did not advise the congregation of Corinth to divide. He did not advise the establishment of two "Churches of Christ" in Corinth— one a "heathen courts congregation" and the other an "anti-heathen courts congregation."

Here is what he wrote: "Mend your ways, heed my appeal, agree with one another, live in peace, and the God of love and peace will be with you." Never in the checkered history of the saints has this exhortation been needed more than at present. Every word needs to burn and sear our hearts until "we put no obstacle in any one's way, so that no fault may be found with our ministry" (2 Cor. 6:3). The Christian life is difficult enough in these days without adding an extra burden of hate and animosity kindled by the factious spirit. Let us labor for unity!

Thoughts on Fellowship (3)

Contents

The essence of true spiritual investigation is to attempt to understand the real meaning contained in the revelation of God. The Holy Spirit conveyed to mankind the will of the Father in words employed by men in their communication with each other. Our task is to determine the meaning which God attached to those words. In order to do this we must divest ourselves of prejudice and bias, otherwise we will read into the scriptures our slanted views. It is an acknowledged fact that every sect in Christendom claims spiritual authority for its exclusive doctrines. Those who go to the word of God expecting to find confirmation for a preconceived idea will generally find it, although they get out of the scriptures something which God did not put into them.

What is generally true of the religious world is also applicable to the various factions in the disciple brotherhood. As a case in point we mention the controversy over the use of mechanical instruments in public worship, in which some of the arguments in its defense are about as ridiculous as those used by its opponents. Both groups have gone to the Book to confirm their respective positions. They found that for which they were looking. On the subject of "fellowship" even wider divergence is found among the two dozen splinter groups, few of whom even take the time to find out what God meant by His use of the term.

A short time ago I wrote a prominent leader in the faction which makes a test of fellowship out of the matter of grouping students to instruct them in the word of the Lord. I presented to him a hypothetical case as follows. There is one brother in a congregation who does not think it is right to have classes to study the word of the Lord. All of the other members have a deep conviction that it is right and proper to do so. The elders go to the dissenting brother and express their regard for him and their respect for his personal views. They encourage him to come and participate in the corporate worship and mutual edification, and assure him that no reflection will be made against him if he waits to come until the classes are concluded. They confirm their love to him as a brother in Christ.

I asked the brother who is a factional leader these questions. What would you advise this brother to do? What scriptural basis would you give for such advice? He replied that he would advise the man to leave the congregation, call for a "loyal" preacher, and try to establish a "faithful" church. In the event that none of the members of the "disloyal" group would come out and take their stand, he would advise the man to move off to a locality where he could worship with a "loyal church." And as a basis for this conglomerate scheme he cited just one scriptural text— 2 Corinthians 6:14-15.

Brethren, regardless of your position on grouping students to study the sacred oracles that is sectarianism gone to seed! This preacher, in spite of his protestations of "loyalty" is slashing the body of God's Son to pieces. He is ripping it into bloody shreds. He is giving counsel which may destroy the souls of those who heed it, and is actually doing despite to the Spirit of grace. And he demonstrates his utter ignorance of the very basis he quotes for his divisive advice. We propose an investigation of this scripture which has provided a weapon for carving the church of God into ribbons.

"Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? and what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God, as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you."

Nothing is clearer to the honest student of God's word than the fact that the primitive disciples of our Lord regarded themselves as a community of saints, separated from unbelievers and idolaters by faith in the Messiah as the hope of their salvation. Through the bond of this faith in Him, they were linked together as a family of God. They constituted a temple or shrine in which dwelt the living God. Their faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God, constituted the basis of their communal life. The believers were not always agreed among themselves, as witness the congregation at Corinth, but those in Christ who disagreed were not "unbelievers" and were never so designated.

They might hold different views in Christ about the validity of the gifts of the Spirit, or about the proper conduct toward eating in idol temples, or toward the resurrection or the millennium, but these did not make them unbelievers in the great basic truth which united them. There was room in Jesus for differences over many items, and the umbrella of God's love sheltered them all. They were still children of light. They constituted the temple of God. They were not disenfranchised by their views honestly held and advocated.

There were two great communities upon earth. One was the church, the other was composed of the pagan world. The first was a koinonia of light, and in Him is no darkness at all. The temple in which God dwelled through the Spirit was aglow with the light of His presence. It was a kingdom of light not because of the perfection in life and knowledge of those who composed the temple, but because the Light of heaven dwelled therein as the pillar of fire rested upon the tabernacle in the wilderness. It was not the material of which it was composed that lighted the tabernacle, and it is not the stones which compose the living temple which have the light. "In Him was life and the life was the light of men."

The other was a koinonia of darkness. It was the habitation of Belial in whom is no light. Those who walked in it were past feeling, having given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. They had their understanding darkened, because they were alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in them, because of the blindness of their heart. They were a dominion of darkness from which we were delivered by Him and transferred into the kingdom of his beloved Son.

Each of these communities had its sacrifices. Each expressed its fellowship the only way it can be expressed, by communal acts. Since eating and drinking together was an open manifestation of fellowship, this came to be the symbol of the mystic bond which united them. One temple sacrificed to God; the other to idols. One temple brought man into sacred unity with heaven; the other into fellowship with the demons who motivated the idolatry. The apostle writes: "What say I then? that the idol is anything, or that which is sacrificed to idols is anything? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of demons" (1 Cor. 10:20, 21). Be sure to note the usage of the terms "fellowship" and "partakers."

We are now prepared to note the passage in 2 Corinthians 6:14-18. The admonition to "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," has no application whatsoever to any alliance or association between members of two branches, or sects, in Christendom. It has been frequently misused with reference to the marriage of a member of the Church of Christ with a Baptist. Regardless of the advisability of two people who have been reared in different legalistic frameworks seeking to form an intimate union, this passage does not deal with it topside or bottom.

Most brethren are not willing to take the recommendation or command to "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." This would break up at once every marriage on earth between people of two sects. But a Baptist is a believer in Christ in the fair sense of the term. The problem of sectism among various kinds of believers is post-apostolic. It did not occur during the time of the apostles and there is nothing written about how we ought to treat each other with our various theological speculations. But to label such people as unbelievers when they freely confess that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, is to do serious injury to the word of faith.

Sometimes it has been used to keep a brother from buying a filling station in league with a Methodist. How silly can we become? Most of us at sometime or other in our lives are linked with people of various religious opinions. Workers in automobile assembly plants, teachers in the public schools, and employees in almost every kind of establishment in the world are forced to work with those who see things differently than they do, but these people are not pagans. They are not heathen.

The instruction certainly has nothing to do with whether a girl from a "one cup congregation" should date a boy in a "cups congregation" as the distinction is so naively and childishly made by some of the brethren. Regardless of whether such ought to happen, or whether they are suited to one another or not, it was not the purpose of the Holy Spirit to suggest it here, and some of the more common applications made of the passage would be downright amusing, if it were not for the serious fact that factional leaders, with more ambition for personal power than love for unity in Jesus, cram such thoughts down the theological throats of gullible and unsuspecting partisans, who in their ignorance defeat the very purpose of the cross, and do so under the guise of "loyalty" to Him whom they crucify afresh and put to an open shame.

In the scriptural usage of the term "believer" it refers to every person who accepts Jesus for what He claims to be regardless of their hang-ups on various concepts of doctrine. It has no concern with legalistic hang-ups which have separated the Christian world. It refers to one who is not a pagan or heathen. By the same token the word "unbeliever" refers to one who is afar off, who has no love for Jesus and no concern for His kingdom. To apply it to those earnest souls today who may understand some of the implications of the doctrine of the new covenant scriptures differently than we do is to do an absolute injustice to those who are as much believers as we are.

What does the passage mean? The koinonia of heaven is expressed by the terms righteousness, light, Christ, believer, and temple of God. The koinonia of the underworld is expressed by the terms unrighteousness, darkness, Belial, infidel, and idols. There is a community attached to Christ. It includes the angels of heaven and the men on earth who have acknowledged Jesus as their prince. There is another community presided over by Belial. It includes the demons of hell and those on earth who are idolaters, refusing to acknowledge the sovereignty of God over their lives. The two are absolutely incompatible. There can be no more fellowship between these communities than there is between their respective princes. They have nothing in common. So long as God walks in us and lives in us, we cannot participate in idolatrous rites, practices and services.

What is meant by the expression, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate and touch not the unclean thing?" This is the handle that fits every factional tool ever devised. It has been used as the wedge to shatter us into fragments. It is the axe in the hand of spiritual demagogues used to split and splinter those who met and worked together for years. It has been made the agent of separation, heartache and tears, and in many localities has clabbered the milk of human kindness, and inspired such gall and bitterness, that those who once sat together at the Lord's Table, have set up rival tables, and treat each other with such lack of courtesy and compassion as is not so much as named among the Gentiles.

First of all suspicion has been sown, generally secretly and clandestinely. Those who are soft have been sought out like termites look for soft wood. Suspicion leads into doubt of faithfulness to the thing that is made the rallying-ground and when the time comes the boom is lowered and division comes. Then there are two opposing parties who regard each other across well-defined lines and proselyte each other with a fervor which was never shown in former days when the world was on one side and the church on the other.

Does the scripture mean that when my Baptist neighbor, who is so kind, generous, and friendly, invites me to listen to his preacher in a special meeting, that I must draw the garments of my self-righteousness closer about me, to keep from being defiled by his touch, and insult him, because he does not know that I am to "be separate and touch not the unclean thing"? What is the unclean thing? Is it a Bible class for little children, individual cups, fermented wine, a special way of breaking the loaf, colleges, orphan homes, etc.?

Remember the preacher to whom I posed the question about the brother who did not believe in classes, would advise him to try and rend a congregation at peace among themselves in Christ, and this was the scripture he gave for dividing believers in the Lord! To him "the unclean thing" was a system of grouping students to teach them to develop faith in the Christ. Could ever a more damaging, destructive idea be advanced from that which would take the word of God and completely ignoring its purpose, use it in such a manner as to shatter the body of the Lord? This is carving the body of Jesus into bits with the sword which he furnished to subdue an alien world.

The unclean thing which we are not to touch, refers to the contaminating lust and vice associated with the impure mystery of idolatry. The term is not even remotely related to differences among brethren as to interpretation of various scriptures. It would be impossible to describe the degradation and degeneracy growing out of idolatrous worship, and believers in the Christ are to have nothing to do with such practices or those who engage in them. It was an age of moral suicide, of unnatural lust, and of murder. What agreement hath the temple of God with idols?

Even though modern sectism is deplorable, it is still a condition existing among believers in the Christ. Our opposition to it must not be based upon the idea that our religious neighbors are infidels or idolaters, motivated by a voluntary love for an attachment to Belial. My Baptist and Methodist friends are firm believers in the truth that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. They are certainly mistaken about certain items contained in His will and they have exalted their love for a party above their love for a unity of all believers. But to quote the verses under consideration and apply them to those who are of a different order in Christendom, for the purpose of forbidding association, even in order to reason with and teach them, is to make of us the most rabid of all sectarians. These people do not constitute a realm of "darkness" or "unrighteousness" as the terms are used here. Many of them live above moral reproach and have never engaged in filthy or immoral conduct because of idolatrous leanings. They are frequently good examples in moral behavior for some of their attackers. It ill becomes a preacher who is carrying on an affair with another man's wife, to get on the radio and slash away at others of the religious community as sectarian and in "darkness" when their lives are a credit to his own.

Every honest, sincere believer in the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth is my brother, either in prospect or in fact. If such a believer has submitted to immersion on the basis of his faith in Jesus, he is my brother in reality, a child of God, and a member of His family. He may not have understood all of the blessings accruing from baptism into Christ, and he may have been mistaken as to the time of the bestowal of some of them, but his ignorance of effect or time will not nullify God's grace or promise, if he surrenders his will to that of the Messiah. Since his birth, he may be in error about many things pertaining to his responsibility, worship or service, and he may require a tremendous amount of teaching and adjustment, but he is still my brother, and I will teach him as a brother, and not count him as a pagan or an infidel. If our hearts are both honest we will grow ever closer to each other as we both "grow in grace and knowledge of the truth." The transformation in our lives through conformity to the life of Christ, will produce uniformity of heart and thought in the two of us.

Not all believers have been immersed. Some are still in the womb of the new covenant, the Jerusalem that is from above. What shall be my attitude toward these who are in that state? It will be the same as that of a family toward an unborn child. We do not revile, castigate or belittle a child in the womb. We rejoice that it has been conceived and with an air of expectancy prepare for its arrival. So I shall labor to aid those who have been conceived by faith, to come to birth and full delivery into the glorious fellowship of the sons of God. If they die before delivery I shall mourn our loss; if they are born again I shall seek to nurture, strengthen and support them until they can walk alone. To this I am dedicated, believing it is the will of him whose slave I have become.

Thoughts on Fellowship (4)

Contents

Some brethren are concerned about my explanation of fellowship and they are unable to reconcile it with traditional explanations of certain scriptures. It is difficult for them to see how we may be in fellowship and differ on any point, although most of them claim to be in fellowship and differ on many points. One of my most regular critics is thoroughly convinced that those who employ instruments of music have abandoned the faith and jumped off the deep end, while he is just as certain that those who oppose cups and classes are extremists of the worst kind. Boiled down to its real meaning, any one who agrees with him perfectly is thinking clearly while those who differ in either direction are candidates for exclusion.

It was said that when Charles V was trying to bring the world to a uniformity of belief, and employing the thumb-screw and rack to achieve it, he was one day experimenting with three clocks in his retreat at Yuste. Unable to make the three clocks keep exactly the same time, he gave it up in disgust, exclaiming, "Here I was trying to make a whole world believe exactly alike, and I can't even make three clocks keep the same time." Wesley once said, "I have no more right to object to a man holding a different opinion from mine than I have to differ from a man because he wears a wig and I wear my own hair. But if he takes his wig off, and shakes the powder in my eyes, I shall consider it my duty to get rid of him as soon as possible."

One passage which seems to give the brethren trouble is

Amos 3:3. "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" It is assumed that this teaches absolute unanimity of opinion as a requisite to fellowship in the Christ, and since I contend that fellowship is a state or condition into which we are called by God, through acceptance of His Son, and that we may walk together in Him while we are learning, even though we now differ in some particulars, it is concluded that my contention is contrary to God's plan and purpose.

Accordingly, it will be necessary for me to take time out from my outlined study on fellowship to deal with this problem, and while I am anxious to get on with my theme, I do not want to travel with such rapidity that I ignore objections which brethren consider valid. We have thought disunity and practiced it so long that it will be difficult for us to reverse our trend and go the other direction. Some of us will never be able to do that. We will continue to pursue our intractable and implacable way until death do us part.

It is obvious that my thesis is in conflict with the common interpretation of Amos 3:3. That interpretation is fortunately limited to preachers of the Churches of Christ. I do not know of many others who are naive enough to offer an argument for conformity based upon it. I do not think that my position is in conflict with what Amos said, but it is in conflict with what some brethren think he meant by what he said. This would point up to us several grave dangers. One is that of jumping at conclusions while ignoring the context, or setting of a scripture. A text without its context is a pretext, as someone has pointed out.

Another danger is that of creating an unwritten creed out of our interpretations. We are obligated to accept what God says: we are not obligated to accept what any person thinks that God meant. The basis of God's judgment will be His word, not some interpretation of it. He will open the books and we will be judged out of the things written in those books, every man according to his own works. God will not open up the books I have written, nor will he use the Mission Messenger as a basis of judgment. I may be judged by what I have written, but you need not be.

Either my general proposition is in error, or the common interpretation of Amos 3:3 is wrong. Before I ever began this series of discussions on fellowship, I carefully listed every passage which might be deemed as being in opposition to the thinking which has crystallized in my heart. I examined critically every one of those passages. If even one had been in apparent controversion of my view, I would never have expressed that view. I confess that I looked for a way out. I wanted to discover a scripture which would justify my position. This passage was first on my list. In my examination of its bearing on the subject, I became convinced that it has been misused and sadly abused. I have been no less an offender than others, and I must apologize for my weakness and error.

"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" Of course they can. They do so all of the time! I have never fully agreed with any brother upon every interpretation of the holy scriptures, yet I have walked in soul-stimulating partnership with many of them for years. Many a married couple has walked and worked together in spite of serious disagreements at frequent intervals. I doubt there has ever been a married couple that has not fallen out over something, when both of them were capable of thinking. Anyone who says he has not had an argument with his wife in twenty-five years would probably lie about other things if he got the chance. Many congregations have worshiped together in spite of varied and diverse concepts. Their love for Jesus was greater than their love for their own views and interpretations. To affirm that two cannot walk together until they have reached absolute agreement upon all issues is to deny the testimony of human history, and give the lie to our own experience. Anything less than perfect obedience would not be enough, for it would prove that two could walk together who were not agreed.

The common explanation is a good indication of what happens to those who engage in textual preaching. Nothing else has scrapped the scriptures, or disjoined and butchered God's revelation, to the degree it has been done by the popular method of preaching from a text. We want to deliver a talk on unity. Amos 3:3 looks like a good foundation, so we lift it out and start to work. And the sad result is that we employ it in such a manner as to actually divide God's people and create disunity. The purpose of any talk on unity should be to bring brethren closer to the Christ and to each other, but if you convince them that it is impossible to please God and to walk together if they are not agreed upon every point, then when they disagree on any point, they will sever relations and think they are doing God service.

But what did Amos mean? To understand this you will have to know a little bit about the man and his mission. Amos was not a recognized prophet, nor a product of the school of prophets (7:14). He was a lowly herdman and a gatherer of sycamore figs, which were used as food by the very poor. God summoned him to travel north and pour out a condemnation in the very courtyard of the king of Israel, the ten tribe northern kingdom, with its capital at Samaria. The statement in which we are interested occurs in one of the denunciatory speeches delivered by Amos. It is only one of a series of questions, intended to show the reason for his sudden appearance on the scene as a prophet. Here is the contextual matter.

"Hear this word that the Lord hath spoken against you, O children of Israel, against the whole family which I brought up from the land of Egypt, saying, You only have I known of all the families of the earth: therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities.

Can two walk together except they be agreed? Will a lion roar in the forest when he has no prey? will a young lion cry out of his den, if he have taken nothing? Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him? shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all.

Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid? shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it? Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets. The lion hath roared, who will not fear? the Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?"

The prophet is here using the common logical argument that for every effect there is a cause, and the cause is adequate to produce that effect. If a lion roars in the forest you can be sure he has prey. He is silent when stalking other game. If you hear a young lion in his den you can be sure he is devouring something. If a bird is caught in a snare it is because the trigger (gin) was set; if you see a trapper run to take up his snare it is because he has caught something. A trumpet is sounded in a city when danger approaches. It is a signal for the people to run for cover. In the same manner when one of God's prophets speaks, you can be sure there is a reason. God no more speaks aimlessly through his prophets than a watchman blows his trumpet for his own entertainment.

The expression "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" is only one facet of the argument. The term agreed is from yaad, which Strongs' Exhaustive Concordance says is a primitive root. It is defined "To fix upon (by agreement or appointment); to summon (to trial), to direct (in a certain quarter or position), to engage (for marriage)." It is obvious that the point under consideration is that when you see two people walking together, it is the result of an appointment to meet at a stated time. The purpose of the meeting is not under consideration. They might meet to debate their differences as they walk along together, but the fact they are walking along together, indicates an agreement to meet. They had an appointment.

It is possible in our thickly populated areas of today, that one might run into an acquaintance and walk along with him, but Amos did not live in such an area. J. R. Dummelow, M. A., in his comment on the passage says, "R. V. 'Have agreed,' have an appointment. If two people were seen walking together in the desolate regions with which Amos was familiar it might be assumed they had not met by chance. Nothing happens by chance. There is a reason and cause for Israel's calamities.

There is not one thing in the definition given by Strong which has to do with absolute agreement as two people walk together. The original word relates to an initial agreement to meet, regardless of the purpose. It does not cover the period of marriage, but relates to the engagement; it does not cover the trial in court, but relates only to the summons; it does not cover the purpose of the meeting, but merely an agreement upon time or place. I might agree to meet my dentist at a certain time, and we might be together by appointment. But that does not argue that I am in harmony with all of his views upon technique. I'm not!

I do not argue that absolute conformity upon all matters of interpretation is not an ideal for which we should labor. I do argue that it is not a prerequisite to fellowship in the Lord. We do not come into relationship with the Christ because we understand every point of theology, but because we have come into Him, we seek to reach a greater degree of mutual understanding. We are not in fellowship because of complete unanimity of opinion but in spite of our divergencies of opinion. We walk together because we have made an appointment with Him to do so. If we wait until we get together upon all of our varying opinions, we will never walk together at all!

God, who is rich in mercy, out of the great love with which he loved us, has quickened us together, raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus (Eph. 2:4-6). We are together because of grace, the undeserved kindness of God. We walk with God and He walks with us and in us. Is this conditioned upon our perfect understanding of all things as God sees them? If God can walk together with me while I am learning, seeking, searching, and yearning to know more about His will, can I not walk with all others in Him who are in the same condition? Jesus walked with two disciples on the way to Emmaus, and asked them, "What is this conversation which you are holding with each other as you walk?" After hearing their stumbling explanation, he said to them, "O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken," and beginning with Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures concerning himself. Will He who then walked with foolish men who were slow to believe all that was spoken, refuse to do so now? Or, will His gentle grace abide with us, through His Spirit, that our hearts too may burn within us while He talks with us on the road?

God's purpose as to ourselves has not yet been perfected. It cannot be as it pertains to each individual, until the individual reaches the ultimate in his spiritual attainment. The temple of God is a growing structure. Each generation finds it reaching outward and upward. The ropes are lengthened and the stakes are strengthened. It is not static, but active. Strangers and foreigners become fellow citizens with the saints and members of the household of God. These are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets. Jesus is the chief cornerstone. In Him "the whole structure is joined together, and grows into a holy temple in the Lord" (Eph. 2:21). The act of joining the stones together is a divine one; the act of growth is a natural one, aided by the Spirit. Growth always indicates change and adjustment. We must make that in order to fit more fully into the plan of Him "in whom you are builded together for a dwelling place of God in the Spirit." The fellowship is the joint participation in the Christ which makes us a part of the building. We are held together, not because of ability, genius, attainment, accomplishment, or opinion, but by the cement of love. That cement allows for soul expansion as "we grow up in every way into him, who is the head, into Christ" (Eph. 4:15). How shall we treat each other while we are growing?

In the Beginning

Thoughts on Fellowship (5)

Contents

The divided state of believers in the Messiah is one of the most tragic blights upon our modern world. It is the chief deterrent to the subjection of this alien world to our King. We must face up to the full implications of this condition, for we will not escape in the final judgment, any personal responsibility for creating or perpetuating it. We dare not slight or try to ignore the situation. This fact was clearly recognized by our forefathers and they sought to alleviate and eliminate the sectarian status. Thus Alexander Campbell wrote:

"Tired of new creeds and new parties in religion, and of the numerous abortive efforts to reform the reformation; convinced from the Holy Scriptures, from observation and experience, that the union of the disciples of Christ is essential to the conversion of the world, and that the correction and improvement of no creed or partisan establishment in Christendom could ever become the basis of such an union, communion, and cooperation as would restore peace to a church militant against itself, or triumph to the common salvation— a few individuals, about the commencement of the present century, began to reflect upon the ways and means to restore primitive Christianity."

The resultant effort amazes every student of the history of the church of God. Sectarian citadels were shaken to their very foundations. Those who were "tired of new creeds and new parties in religion" imbued with an unquenchable desire for unity in order to achieve the purpose of the Messiah upon earth, attained such goals as made it appear that this whole nation might be brought to the foot of the cross. Of the fierce ambition which burned within the hearts of these worthies, Campbell wrote:

"Next to our personal salvation, two objects constituted the summum bonum, the supreme good, worthy of the sacrifice of all temporalities. The first was, the union, peace, purity, and harmonious cooperation of Christians— guided by an understanding enlightened by the Holy Scriptures; the other, the conversion of sinners to God. Our predilections and antipathies on all religious questions arose from, and were controlled by these all absorbing interests. From these commenced our campaign against creeds."

It is interesting to note the simple way by which it was proposed to unite all Christians. We quote again from Campbell:

"A deep and abiding impression that the power, the consolation and joys— the holiness and happiness— of Christ's religion were lost in the forms and ceremonies, in the speculations and conjectures; in the feuds and bickerings of sects and schisms, originated a project many years ago for uniting the sects, or rather the Christians in all the sects, upon a clear and simple bond of union; upon having a 'thus saith the Lord' either in express terms, or in approved precedent, 'for every item of faith and of religious practice' . . . making faith in Christ and obedience to him, the only test of Christian character, and the only bond of church union, communion and co-operation."

What is the present status of those who are spiritual heirs of the "few individuals who began to reflect upon the ways and means to restore primitive Christianity?" Are they tired of new parties in religion? Are they seeking to restore peace to a church militant against itself? Do they still look upon the union, peace and harmonious co-operation of Christians, as an object of supreme good? Do they deem this object worthy of the sacrifice of all temporalities? Are they yet laboring on the project of uniting the Christians in all of the sects?

Far from it! They have been enticed into the business of producing sects. The noble ideal has been shattered. There are more than two dozen splinter parties which have grown out of the restoration effort. Each of these claims to be the one holy, catholic and apostolic church. Each contends that it alone is the kingdom of heaven. Each one is "the brotherhood." Each one is "the loyal church." There is no project to unite the Christians in all of the sects, for each sect claims, like Rome, to have all the Christians there are under its inconsistent wings. This is the bread upon which we have been fed, this is the factional milk we have drawn from the paps of our factional religious mothers, and upon it we have been nurtured and nourished into spiritual dwarfs of bigotry, hate and exclusiveness, which say, "Stand by thyself, come not near unto me, for I am holier than thou" (Isa. 65:5).

Physical dwarfs sometimes develop warped personalities. In a world of men of normal stature they must be over-assertive, pugnacious, resentful of every imaginary slight. They must walk with a swagger, cultivate a deep voice, and growl at every one else. Napoleon, the little Corsican, set out to capture the world, to prove his power despite his diminutive stature. The same psychological reaction may be characteristic of spiritual dwarfs. Little men may appear big if they can rationalize all others into inferiority. A small faction can appear of tremendous importance if its members can be made to believe they constitute the sole survivors of the Israel of God, and are the exclusive recipients of God's grace, while every other person on the face of the earth is doomed to damnation because he does not see eye to eye with them on every minute point of practice. But such delusions of grandeur are fatal to the intellect and deadly to the heart.

Indicative of the effect of such attitudes is the wresting of certain scriptures which may be twisted to justify schism and the party spirit in direct contradiction of those passages which forbid and condemn it. Men now love the party spirit. They advocate disunity and preach division among brethren. Under such circumstances any passage which seems to condone separation is seized upon with joyful abandon. As an example I cite Ephesians 5:11, which says, "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Brethren seem to be overjoyed that they find here the expression "Have no fellowship." All they need to do is to make the term "works of darkness" elastic enough to cover the item currently in dispute, and another division is born.

A short time hence I was in correspondence with a brother who was contending that one could not scripturally engage in the Lord's Supper, except with fermented wine. He was bitterly partisan. I asked him for the scriptural ground upon which he made this a test of fellowship. He merely wrote down in big letters Ephesians 5:11, underlining it twice. Upon such ignorance of the intent of God's plan or purpose a new sect is introduced into the strife-torn religious world.

Did Paul who wrote in one verse instructing the congregation at Ephesus to manifest "all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love," write in another verse for the same brethren to fracture into splinter parties over opinions and preferences? Did he who wrote, "Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," write again to the same group to "have no fellowship?" Even a cursory examination of the context would demonstrate the folly of any such interpretation.

"Have no fellowship with the unfaithful works of darkness!" Are these works to be interpreted to refer to classes to study the Bible, individual cups, leavened bread on the Lord's Table, orphan homes, and other such matters? Brethren should not add the stigma of being ridiculous to that of factionalism? Whether the things enumerated, or a score of others in the same category, are right or wrong, this passage is not even remotely related to them. "The works of darkness" in verse 11 are the "things done in secret" in verse 12. These refer to the indescribable vices and licentious practices of the mystery cults of the Gentile world. Under cover of darkness and in the inner recesses and secret chambers of idol temples such gross sensuality was engaged in that the depth of depravity can hardly be fathomed by minds not attuned to base immorality.

Fornication, unchastity and idolatry debar from inheritance in the kingdom (verse 5). These things bring the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience (verse 6). Because of these considerations the disciples were not to be partakers with them (verse 7). The state in which they existed had been changed. The apostle said, "You were sometimes darkness." Once they were steeped in idolatry and all of its filthy and abominable practices. "Now ye are light in the Lord. Walk as children of light." To get a true picture of the darkness of which the apostle writes, one need only read Romans 1:21-32 and ponder the significance of the statement, "God gave them over to a reprobate mind."

Now to apply these passages to those in the realm of Christendom who are of a different order than ourselves and cite them as the basis for a refusal to be partakers with them in their rituals and worship is to stultify any claim we make to fairness as scholars of the sacred oracles. There may be, and there are, good and sufficient reasons why we cannot endorse, assist or participate in the religious performances of many about us, but they do not fall within the category of characters described by Paul. The divided state of believers in Christ is a sad and dreary thing to contemplate, yet in every sect and segment, there are good men and noble, those who are pure, chaste and holy in life. We owe much to the scholarship of such men in the Church of England, Methodist, Baptist, and Quaker communions, as well as others. It ill becomes us to accept the fruit of ripe research from their hands, and then bite the hand from which we take it.

Please observe that we are now dealing with whether or not such people are Christians. Our present treatise does not concern what they are, so much as what they are not. And we affirm that they are not the type of characters to whom Paul alludes in this passage. No sincere believer in the Messiah, who is morally above reproach falls under this condemnation. To assume that a man is degraded or degenerate because he honestly disagrees with us upon the subject of baptism, for example, is a greater reflection against our reasoning powers than against his. Many of my neighbors are members of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist and other protestant sects, which today portray so graphically the deplorable state of division into which the world has fallen. But they are not walking in the darkness of which Paul wrote, nor do they have fellowship with the unfruitful works which he contemplated.

Theirs is the wrong of perpetuating a party to the division of God's people. This is a work of the flesh. But there is a difference in the influence upon society and the moral tone of the world in some of these works, as every logical reasoner must admit. Moreover, many of the adherents of the various religious parties are to an extent innocent victims of birth, environment and other circumstances beyond their control. And many love the truth, seek after it, and sigh for a greater knowledge of it. They pray for the unity of the church of God and long for a better day for Zion.

A person in one of the numerous sects of Christendom today may be a child of God, or he may not. That is also true of those who are in "The Church of Christ." Certainly one who is a child of God and still attached to a sect or party, is a child of God and something else. The mere fact that a man is in the Baptist party does not argue that he is not a child of God, but he may be a child of God and a Baptist, in the partisan sense of that term. I am a baptist, but not a Baptist. Our task is not to deny that he is a child of God, but to get him to cease being a partisan, for the party spirit is a sin. The dividing of God's children into schismatic groups labeled by partisan names, designed to keep them apart, is sinful. God wants all of His children to be one in Christ. All who are truly His children are dedicated to the destruction of all religious parties, regardless of which one they may be associated with at present. A follower of the Lamb cannot condone, defend, uphold or perpetuate the party spirit. If he finds himself in a human party, he must either transform it or come out of it, if it's impossible of reformation.

We must be careful that in our opposition to the party spirit we are not mere partisans. I am fully convinced that many of my brethren are opposing sectism from a sectarian standpoint. They are interested in getting people out of "their sect" and into "our sect." Of course they would not admit that, but that is what it amounts to. No doubt they are honest in their endeavor for they too are the victims of the circumstances of birth, training and environment. Some feel that sectism cannot exist in a religious body bearing the name "Church of Christ." They think it serves as an amulet or charm with special powers for exorcising the demon of sectism. But some of the most partisan and bigoted sectarians in our modern world operate under that title. The very usage of the term in a segregatory and separationist fashion is indicative of the sectarian spirit.

There was a "Christ party" at Corinth. They were condemned in the same language as those who called themselves after the name of Paul, or Cephas, or Apollos. It is just as sinful to divide the body of Christ by saying, "We belong to Christ," with the intent to separate yourselves from other brethren, as to say, "We belong to Paul," for the same purpose. It was to the members of this party that Paul wrote, "Look these facts in the face. If any man is fully persuaded as regards himself that he belongs to Christ, let him consider again with himself, that just as he is Christ's, so also am I" (2 Cor. 10:7).

Paul had accepted the Good News and been immersed into the Lord, and he did not propose to be dispossessed of his citizenship by those who claimed to belong to Christ in a special way, because they had formed an exclusive party wearing the name "Christ" to distinguish them from other persons who had been immersed into Jesus. There are scattered sheep on the hills of sectarianism today who could say to those calling themselves "The Church of Christ," as Paul said, "Let them consider again, that just as they are Christ's so also are we." God's children have not all been gleaned from Babylon yet, and it will not help to wall off a little segment of Babylon and label it "Jerusalem."

What is the essential equipment for those who would help answer the prayer of Jesus for unity of all who believe in Him through the testimony of the apostles? It is possible that we cannot detail all that is required. We have exercised such poor personal judgment in the past, and have so often mistaken the factional spirit for the spirit of righteousness, that we may be in a poor state to make suggestions. However, in humility and sincerity we mention the following as attributes of him who would walk toward the greatest goal that can challenge the thinking of the slaves of God on earth.

1. A firm and unshakable conviction that sectism is a sin, a work of the flesh, and will keep all who wilfully indulge in it out of the kingdom of heaven.

2. The ability to distinguish between the person and the party to which he belongs. Many are attached to sects who are not sectarian. Wholesale denunciation without recognition of the varying attitudes and degrees of knowledge is unwise and unreasonable.

3. A rigid determination to be non-partisan and to call upon all men to rally to the cross, that at this common center we may become truly one in the only One who has a right to draw all men unto himself.

4. A spirit of forbearance and patience while men are learning. The road from Babylon to Jerusalem will not be covered in a day. Let us be content to contribute our little bit to the great work of the ages, and He who made the ages will weave it into His pattern so the thread will not be lost. No one of us can develop the whole pattern of God for the whole world in his lifetime.

5. A love of truth for truth's sake, which will crucify within us the dogmatic spirit, and make us realize that our intellectual "Geiger counters" may indicate a rich deposit of heaven's precious ore in areas where our human wisdom would cause us to pass by and leave unexplored. Let us prospect every inch of ground for truth.

Thoughts on Fellowship (6)

Contents

Fellowship in Christ is that blessed and glorious state or relationship into which we are called by the gospel. All who are immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, as believing penitents are in that fellowship. We are holy brethren because we share in a heavenly call (Heb. 3:1). We are fellowheirs and members of the same body, because we are partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel (Eph. 3:6). In view of this we are to live "in such harmony with one another, in accord with Christ Jesus, that together we may with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:6). In order to do this we must "welcome one another, as Christ has welcomed us, for the glory of God" (Romans 15:7).

We are joined and knit together as a body (Eph. 4:16). We have access in the one Spirit to the Father (Eph. 2:18). We must be "eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" seeing that there is only one body and one Spirit (Eph. 4:3). So long as the Holy Spirit dwells in any man he is bound by an invisible cord to heaven; and by the same token, he is bound to every other person in whom the Spirit abides. This is "the fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil 2:1). It is created by the Spirit, and it is maintained by the Spirit. Any alliance of those who are not indwelt of the Spirit is a selfish and useless one. Any fellowship that is of the Spirit is at once meaningful and active.

Because we sustain that relationship we are urged to "complete my joy by being of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind" (verse 2). We complete the joy of the apostle when we are able to walk and work together in the same mind. This does not mean to be of the same opinion. It does not mean that we are cut out by a kind of divine cookie cutter. But we have the mind of Christ. We do not come into the fellowship because we are of the same mind, or have the same love but we come to be of the same mind and have the same love, because we are in the fellowship. It is the beautiful garden in which we "grow up into Him in all things." It is the atmosphere in which we "grow in grace and in knowledge of the truth." God brings us into fellowship through grace; we grow together by mutual eagerness to maintain that unity.

One of the greatest tragedies of this age has been the lack of eagerness to maintain unity. There has been an eagerness to divide. It has become almost an obsession. It is a passion which engulfs us and fragments us, but there seems to be a decided reluctance to unite. Men have no fear of separation, but live in mutual dread of ending it. Nowhere does the word of God counsel division among believers. In scores of passages unity is urged. Yet we could not be more divided if the word of God had commanded it. No one is so unpopular in some circles today as he who speaks for unity. Brethren take counsel together to stop the mouth of one who pleads for it, and if they cannot stop his mouth, they stop their ears.

This is the sad state to which Christendom is reduced by our littleness, fears, frustration, bigotry and hatred. Is it any wonder that under such circumstances we seek and earnestly look for scriptural warrant for our ungodly procedure? We are a Bible believing people. We have boasted so long that we do nothing without scriptural backing. So it becomes necessary that we search the scriptures to justify what we are doing. We have charted our course by ourselves; we must alter God's chart and map to condone it. We now place a ban upon unity and a blessing upon division. "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter! Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight" (Isa. 5:20).

Think of the frightful cleavages that invest the realm of Christendom. If you disregard the great division between Romanism and Protestantism, and regard only the latter as filling the nominal Christian domain, behold the almost three hundred sects and cults which cumber our own fair country. If you restrict your narrowed vision to the heirs of the restoration movement, you must contemplate no less than twenty-five splinter parties, each one belaboring all of the others as sects and factions. Nor is the end yet, for the germ of the seed which has produced this state is not dead or dormant, and there must follow more division, factionism, strife, contention and bitter debate. We will bequeath to our children and our children's children a legacy of hate and intolerance, so they will bite and devour one another, and long after our bones moulder in the earth, the feuds will go on and damn our offspring to the flames of hell. With all of our modern skills and scientific acumen we have not yet solved the problem of how all believers in Christ can be one. Is it any wonder we cannot solve our national and international problems? The greatest challenge to Christendom today is to find an answer to the prayer of Jesus. There has to be one!

Those who love God and revere His word will seek for the answer in that word. But they must learn how to handle it properly. It is a sword, and such a weapon in an unskilled hand may slay more friends than enemies. We want to deal in this essay with one passage of scripture which we have used in a factional sense. It has been used over and over to create and widen schisms in the body of the Lord. We refer to 2 John 9, 10. "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed, for he that biddeth him Godspeed is partaker of his evil deeds." This is the handle that has been shaped to fit every factional tool man has invented. It is the seasoning which flavors every partisan pot.

In Tennessee, a man reaches the conclusion that it is a sin to teach little children the word of God in a Bible class in the meetinghouse. This is made his party test of loyalty to Jesus. "If any man bring not this doctrine, receive him not." In Texas, a man decides that the fruit of the vine must be passed to the congregation in one container. To do otherwise would be to negate the value of even partaking of the Supper. This is made his party test and "if any man bring not this doctrine, receive him not." In the same factional strain, one in his congregation concludes that the fruit of the vine passed in one container must be fermented. This becomes his party test, and "if anyone bring not this doctrine, receive him not."

To one "this doctrine" means a special way of breaking the bread, to another it refers to the support of orphan homes, to another our relation to civil government, to another it has to do with certain regulations of marriage. But whatever the party test, one must bring this doctrine, or he is an outcast, and must be given the cold shoulder, disregarded as a brother and treated like a pagan. Schools have arisen to be identified with one facet or another of this doctrine, and the students go forth gleefully preaching their peculiarity and fragmenting the body of Christ with gusto.

Did the apostle of love intend to create such a conglomerate mess as we now behold? Did he who wrote that "we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" also give instruction to club the life out of them or to drive them forth when they could not conscientiously agree with some childish point of interpretation? Did he who said "Any one who hates his brother is a murderer," provide us with a verbal dagger by which to stab our brethren to death doctrinally? Did he who condemned Diotrephes because "he refuses to welcome the brethren, and stops those who want to welcome them and puts them out of the church," lay down a principle which would propagate the Diotrephesian cult in every congregation? Did the holy apostle initiate the beginning of a Russian-type purge which would make every congregation the lurking-ground for fright and terror? Was he referring to individual cups, Bible classes, leavened bread, fermented wine, a special method of breaking the loaf, orphan homes, colleges, radio programs, instrumental music, tuning forks, baptisteries, collection plates, and a host of other items too numerous to mention? Was this a concealed blast against the congregational support of Herald of Truth whether such support is justified or not?

Whatever this doctrine was, the man who did not bring it was not to be welcomed when he came, nor speeded on his way with good wishes when he left. We are of the opinion that we can only understand what John was talking about in consideration of the background and circumstances under which he wrote. John spent his final days in Ephesus, laboring in the vicinity of Asia Minor. Ephesus was the home of Cerinthus, a Jew who studied in Alexandria, and who is credited with being the original propagator of the theory which was destined eventually to divide almost every congregation in the Greek world. He was a contemporary with John. It is a conviction of ours that John was spared to deal the death blow to this cult of Greek mysticism, even as Paul was destined to save the church from the inroads of legalism derived from a mistaken idea of the role of Judaism in God's plan.

The first and second epistles of John were written to deal with this problem. No one can rightfully understand them if he ignores this fact. We cannot here enter into a full analysis of Gnosticism, its origins, nature and effects. The word is from the Greek *gnosis, i. e., "Knowledge." Paul alludes to it in warning Timothy to avoid "the contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge (gnosis)" and affirms that "by professing it some have missed the mark as regards to the faith" (1 Timothy 6:20). Timothy was in Ephesus, which was "the eye of the storm" when that was written to him. Although, because of its speculative nature, gnosticism finally took many forms, it generally denied the pre-existence of the Son of God in some fashion. It clearly affirmed that he did not come in the flesh.

Cerinthus taught that God was exalted above all contact with the world of nature and sense, that the world was created by angels, and presided and ruled over by one of them, who was the Sovereign and lawgiver of the Jews. He affirmed that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary by the natural process of birth, and developed and grew in such a degree of wisdom, and of favor with God and man, that he was deemed to be worthy of divine honor. At his baptism by John, the Logos, that is, the divine wisdom and energy, descended upon him, thus making him the Christ (the anointed one). By this supernatural endowment of the divine pneuma he was permitted to work miracles and reveal the divine purpose, which the Logos could penetrate. Cerinthus further taught that when Jesus was arrested, the Logos left him and returned to the Father, so it was just the man who died, and not God, or the Son of God. It was affirmed that man could not kill God and that anyone who could be killed thereby proved he was not God. One who is familiar with the teachings of the Jehovah's witness cult will at once recognize the similarity in their doctrine and that of the Gnostics.

John wrote to refute this dangerous theory which had already infiltrated most of the congregations during his lifetime. It was aided and abetted by the philosophic turn of mind of most Gentile converts. This will explain many of the statements and emphases in his gospel record. The great representative of the Alexandrian school was Philo. He was contemporary with Jesus and was born about a quarter of a century before him. In attempting to synthesize a system which would bring together the best in Aristotelian philosophy with Christianity, he affirms that God is the absolute, eternal and invisible Being. This God is separated from the material universe by an abyss which excludes all idea of immediate contact.

He was not the creator of matter. Matter existed from all eternity. It was not permitted, it was not possible, for the blessed God to come in contact with matter. He has arranged the universe by means of the Logos, which is represented, now as one, now as manifold, and in which the Mosaic creative word, the King of Israel's personification of wisdom, and Plato's world of ideas appear to coalesce. So John starts out in his account of the Good News with the affirmation, "In the beginning was the Logos, and the Logos was with God, and the Logos was God." One can only imagine what a controversy this aroused. It was like throwing a lighted brand into a barrel of gunpowder.

But he then declares that "The Logos became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1:14). The idea that the Logos came and brought his own tent with him cut across all of the philosophic brilliance of that day. It was impossible, according to the philosophic idea that God could become material, for all matter was essentially and inherently evil by nature. So John begins his first epistle by asserting that he had personal audible, manual and visible witness of the word of life, that this life had pre-existence with the Father, was manifested to the witnesses, and proclaimed to others so they might also have fellowship with the proclaimers, the Father and His Son Jesus Christ (1 John 1:1-3). The message of the proclaimers was that God is light! To say that one has fellowship with God while denying the manifestation of God (in Jesus Christ) is only to lie, and to walk in darkness. "To walk in the Light" (i. e., to be in God) is to be in fellowship with one another and in contact with the cleansing power of the Son of God (1:5-7).

No one can be in the light (that is in God) who is not in the Son, for they sustain a divine relationship. "No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also . . . If what you have heard from the beginning abide in you, then you will abide in the Son and in the Father. And this is what he has promised us, eternal life" (2:23-25). What was it they had heard from the beginning which must abide in them, so they could abide in God? "The life was made manifest, and we saw it . . . and proclaim to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest unto us."

To say one is in fellowship with the Father while denying the pre-existence and revelation of the Son makes one a liar (1:6). "Who is a liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? This is antichrist, he who denies the Father and the Son" (2:22). There are many kinds of liars, but the one with whom John was dealing while writing this epistle was the one who denied the Messiahship of Jesus. The Gnostic was not a follower of Jesus, but an antichrist. These men had created a party or heresy, for we read, "They went out from us because they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us, but they went out that it might be plain that they were not of us" (2:19).

The saints were not to believe every spirit. They were to test the spirits, because many false prophets were abroad. The criterion was simple. "Every spirit which confesses that Jesus is come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which does not confess Jesus is not of God." By this the Spirit of God could be identified (4:1-3). "Whoever confesses that Jesus is the Son of God, God abides in him, and he in God" (4:15). "Every one who believes that Jesus is the Christ is a child of God, and every one who loves the parent loves the child. By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and obey his commandments" (5:1, 2).

We are now ready to appreciate 2 John. It was written to a sister in the Lord. Some of her children were followers of the truth (verse 4). The congregation may have met in her house. John wrote the same thing to her in verses 5 and 6 that he wrote in 1 John 2:7-9. He tells her that many deceivers have gone out into the world (verse 7) as he previously had said, "Many false prophets have gone out into the world" (1 John 4:1). He identifies these as "men who will not acknowledge the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh" (Cp verse 7 with 1 John 4:3) and labels them in both instances as "antichrist."

In verse 9, he tells the sister, "Any one who goes ahead and does not abide in the doctrine of Christ does not have God; he who abides in the doctrine of Christ has both the Father and the Son." The doctrine of Christ is the testimony "that the Father has sent His Son as the Savior of the world" (1 John 4:14), that is, that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (4:2). Those who go ahead and do not abide in this conviction do not love God, but those who retain this conviction, have both the Father and the Son. As phrased in 1 John 2:23, "No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also." To "deny the Son" in this expression is equivalent to the expression "does not abide in the doctrine of Christ" in the other place.

The instruction is "if any one comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into the house, or give him any greeting: for he who greets him shares his wicked work." The abuse of this passage by men motivated by a partisan spirit is indescribable in its awful effects; only eternity will reveal the tragic loss of souls caused by such abuse. It has been quoted to justify driving out into the cold those humble souls who would not bow to clerical domination; it is the whiplash that has cut into the hearts of sincere believers in the Lord who would not do abject obeisance to an arbitrary interpretation of some despotic and tyrannical faction. It is the sword that has spilled the blood of the saints, the axe that has wrecked the house of God; and the rude hand that has torn the fabric of fellowship into a hundred bits and flung the pieces into the face of Christ of Calvary who died that we might be one in Him. Dear Lord, forgive us the sin of mistaking zeal for your kingdom with the blood lust of the sectarian spirit! Let us know your will.

Most of our brethren are better than their creeds. Their hearts transcend their practices. They will not only receive into their houses those to whom they profess to apply this scripture, but will ardently canvass a community seeking to get them to come. They bring in a bevy of eager-beaver college students to work the area and get as many as possible to attend. They put out flyers and stick advertisements in the paper with the blatant notice "Everyone Welcome!" They compass land and sea to make one proselyte.

In their preaching they do not hesitate to apply 2 John 9, 10 to a preacher who believes in instrumental music. He is guilty of the Number One sin. Yet, when one attends he is greeted with a toothy grin and a huge smile and given an old-fashioned down home greeting. An usher will scamper half way across the auditorium to give him a songbook open to the proper hymn. He is encouraged to "participate in the worship" along with other sinners who are present. However, if someone makes the mistake of calling on him to lead in prayer, it creates a furor of gossip, and the man who did it will lose his job, for compromising truth with error. It is alright to pray provided you have a tune to it, but it is wrong to do so to four-four time without a melody attached.

Such is the mixed-up mess and the messed-up mix to which our puerile reasoning has brought us. We could not be farther from the truth or more hypocritical in our application of it, if it were God's will. The book plainly tells us not to receive into the house a false teacher of the kind John had in mind. It specifically tells us to give him no greeting. Whoever you apply the first part to, you are obligated to apply the second part to. I do not believe that most of our brethren are willing to apply the remedy prescribed to one whom they have diagnosed as needing it. I have never seen them give "the bum's rush" to one who disagreed with them. I have seen them argue with one until after midnight, with everyone so sleepy no one was really listening. The only one I have ever seen conducted to the door and sent on his wobbly way was an occasional drunk who was staggering by and dropped in to take a rear seat and start crying in his suds.

The thing that strikes most of the brethren is the phrase "Receive him not!" It is right down their alley. This furnishes them the right to reject anyone who is bold or simple enough to assert an opinion contrary to the unwritten creed. It affords them ground for renouncing the scripture which says, "Accept one another, then, for the glory of God, as Christ has accepted you" (Romans 15:7). For the glory of God. If it is to God's glory to accept all whom He has accepted it contravenes His glory not to do so. But our brethren are selective. If a really prominent Baptist, one who has been president of a Baptist school, shows an interest, they can get together in a back room and agree to spirit him in on his previous baptism. A run-of-the-mill, common, everyday, garden variety Baptist will have to be baptized "scripturally," that is by one of our preachers, to get into the Lord's church. Politics make for strange bedfellows, and strange bedfellows make for politics.

Men may have God, and God may have men, who sincerely differ on Bible classes, individual cups, leavened or unleavened bread, fermented or unfermented wine, lesson leaves, baptisteries, and a host of other things. Men may abide in the "doctrine of Christ" of which John speaks, and hold conflicting views about implementation of God's will for us in this age. It is a matter of our attitude toward truth. But those who split, tear and rend the body of God's Son, then try to call heaven's blessing upon their destructive ways, by quoting as justification, "If any come and bring not this doctrine, do not receive him into your house, nor give him a greeting," are the real factionists and troublers of Israel. Such a spirit is more dangerous to the well-being of the church of God than some "innovations."

Those who profess to be defenders of the faith, those who pose as champions of orthodoxy may be intolerant advocates of unwritten human creeds. We are not apologists for error, nor do we excuse divisions in Christ, of those who are earnestly striving to know His will, but we do not propose to settle our problems by driving out of the house our brethren who disagree. We shall not throw the baby out with the bath water! The members of the present factions and dissident groups need to get on their knees before the Savior lest they be forced to do so before the Judge of all the earth. It is time to repent. Reformation must precede true restoration. Let us all love the brethren, and in that spirit resolve that we shall end factionism and party strife. The night is far spent, the day is at hand!

Thoughts on Fellowship (7)

Contents

Dr. Erich Lindemann, while directing clinical work at Massachusetts General Hospital made an epochal discovery. He specialized in research with patients suffering from mental and physical illness induced by grief and sorrow. Many of these developed severe sickness or depression years after the loss of a loved one. The researchist uncovered the basic fact that to repress feelings of grief may lead to morbid and abnormal relations later on. In our modern culture, the idea has obtained that emotional outbursts are to be avoided, and that one should be ashamed of tears and paroxysms of sorrow. Psychiatry has now discovered that expression of grief is a healing process for the soul, while repression of sorrow leaves wounds and scars on the fabric of life. Joshua Loth Liebman, in his book Peace of Mind, points out how the Bible long ago taught this elemental truth and cites the open and unashamed expression of sorrow by Abraham, Jacob and David as examples.

This is but one case among many where men have discovered that the real teaching of the Bible is in direct contradiction to the accepted view and common practice. We are glad when men like Dr. Lindemann find the solution to problems of mental stress and depression, so they can help the victims of emotional disturbance to have a happier existence. During the 1940's and 1950's groups of psychiatrists and students of mental health began experimenting with music to soothe their patients. Apparently this development began independently in several mental health centers almost at the same time, and thus constitutes another case of what might be called simultaneous invention.

Great and dramatic results were reported by various researchers. Some noted specialists feel that in some patients it can have an effect which transcends that of any drug they can administer. Yet, in the Bible, we read of the same treatment in the case of Saul, who showed openly signs of being a schizophrenic of the worst kind. But the Bible records the first instance of the use of music in such a case of a disturbed personality. "It came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took an harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well and the evil spirit departed from him" (1 Sam. 16:23).

We believe that the Bible has long held the answer to a problem which has vexed and plagued the disciple brotherhood. It has been there all of the time but our very familiarity with the Book has drawn cataracts across our eyes and obscured our vision. The problem is that of division, strife and factionalism, with all the kindred ills which attend it. It is everywhere manifest and is detrimental to the achievement of the purpose of restoration, the unity of all believers in the Christ. The answer is simple, but it is exactly opposite to the generally accepted position. That the present view is not achieving the proper purpose is evident in the fact that factions are multiplying and the possibility of unity recedes farther into the distance with each passing year.

The discovery we are going to mention can revolutionize our lives, revitalize the restoration movement, recharge our spiritual batteries and change our whole relationship to the religious world. It can make us apostles of world brotherhood in the van of a great movement to lead mankind to a closer walk with God and with each other. But it is so simple you may be inclined to underestimate it and overlook its power-packed vitality. You will need to think upon it for a long time before the full potential dawns upon you. You will need to understand what a tremendous change it can work in your own life and practice by transforming your attitude and altering your perspective. The unlimited possibilities it will provide will be in direct contrast to the spiritually restricted life which has been yours. Through grasp of this great truth God will open up for you "a great door and effectual." Read what follows carefully and thoughtfully. Let the words trickle down into your consciousness.

*Fellowship in Christ is not the result of our agreement upon matters of opinion and interpretation; but our agreement upon things comes as result of our fellowship.

Do you ask what is so great about that? First, it is the exact reverse of what most of us have been taught and have taught. It may, therefore, produce unity where our previous attitude has produced division and disunity. It is obvious that our past course has produced grievous disorders in the ranks of the spiritual. We have been looking for something which cannot and does not exist outside of Christ, as the very ground for our proper association in Him.

Second, it begins with fellowship and ends with agreement; whereas we have been trying to start with agreement and work toward fellowship. But it has been impossible to agree because we have had an improper attitude toward each other. We have regarded each other as aliens, enemies and opponents. We have been suspicious of each other. We have been fearful of one another. We have credited each other with false motivations. In this spirit the area of disagreement has widened. Fellowship has been thrust further away. We thought that we could not love each other as brethren until we agreed, yet we could not agree until we loved each other as brethren. This produced an impasse with a new faction given birth almost every year.

It would seem that if a doctor tried the same prescription time after time, and each time the patient died, he would want to begin to change. Common sense would seem to dictate to us that we are abject failures in one of the greatest enterprises upon earth, and that if we continue to pursue our present course we will end up hating one another and spiritually bankrupt. There simply has to be a better way than the one we have taken. It has led us in all of the wrong places.

Third, this places our fellowship in proper perspective. It makes it infinitely greater than any matter of interpretation or any difference of opinion. In the past even minor opinions have been deemed greater than fellowship. As a result fellowship has been sacrificed at every disagreement. The body has been cleaved asunder every time a wart appeared. In reality, there is room for differences and disagreements inside the circle of fellowship, provided the royal law of love is not forgotten or forsaken. As it is, this sovereign principle has been disregarded and dethroned every time there has arisen a disagreement. Love is the spiritual law of gravity which draws us toward a common center. So long as it is operative, we all may differ greatly on many things, and still remain in the domain of Christ, even as men may differ in the political world and still remain citizens of the United States.

Fourth, fellowship is attained at once through the grace of God, while agreement upon spiritual implications and interpretations may be the work of years, and achieved only through intensive study and mutual intercourse of thought. We are called into the fellowship by God. We arrive at understanding through the exercise of our rational faculties. To recognize that fellowship is a state or relationship into which we are brought by divine power, and to conceive of every immersed believing penitent as being in that relationship, will allow our own spirits to expand and the love of God will then be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which has been given unto us.

Fifth, this concept, if understood and taught, will assure that not another division will ever occur among those who sincerely love Christ. Moreover, a number of breaches now existing will be healed. We recognize that "there must be factions among you in order that those who are genuine among you may be recognized" (1 Cor. 11:19). In the past, the genuine ones could not be recognized, because they joined up with one or the other of the factions. We take it that if two parties were created in the church, the genuine ones would not be recognized if they aligned themselves with either. The genuine ones are those who refuse to be factional.

If a congregation is divided into parties over an interpretation of Revelation 20, and there is a pre-millennial and a post-millennial faction formed, the genuine ones, regardless of their views on the millennial question, would recognize all as brethren, and refuse to become partisans in the matter. Those who are genuine exalt Jesus above any opinion and refuse to divide those who are in Him; those who are factional exalt an opinion above Jesus and refuse to recognize those who differ as even being in Him. Our misconception of the New Testament teaching has tended to make more of us factional than genuine!

But what about our guarding of the truth? There is a great difference between guarding the truth and an opinion about the truth. Truth need not be protected. It was given to protect us. It needs to be turned loose and not kept tied up or kept in prison for its own protection. But an opinion about truth is always subject to examination and scrutiny by others. And their opinion may be as good as ours.

Fellowship is not a fruit of agreement but agreement is the fruit of fellowship! Does the Bible teach that? Do we come to be in the fellowship because we are of the same mind, or do we come to be of one mind because we are in the fellowship? Much depends upon the answer you give. If we come into fellowship by agreement upon opinions, then how many things must we agree upon, and which ones, before fellowship commences? If we must agree upon all views and opinions then no fellowship at all exists today for no two persons are wholly agreed. If we need not agree upon all, who is to determine which ones we may eliminate from the area of agreement without impairing fellowship? If we decide which opinions and views we must agree upon to have fellowship, what happens if one learns more on some point and changes his mind? Shall he be put out of the fellowship for "growing in knowledge"? On the basis that fellowship is contingent upon agreement in matters of opinion, no congregation existing a hundred years ago could now be in fellowship, and no congregation now existing would be in the fellowship a hundred years from now if our Lord tarry that long.

No such difficulty is encountered if we regard fellowship in the proper light. Allowance will be made for ignorance on many points a century ago, and for the increase of knowledge a century in the future. Neither ignorance nor growth affect fellowship unless the first is wilful and the second disregards the principle of love. One cannot be too ignorant to be in the fellowship and cannot grow too greatly to be a part of it. There will be room for minds that are liberal and conservative to work together in love, the first lending fresh outlook and new vision, the latter exercising proper restraint to keep the progress within the pale of God's revelation. But is this concept scriptural. We assert that it is!

Every admonition in the New Testament to be of one mind, to agree among yourselves, or to speak the same thing, was given to those who were in fellowship. In no case were brethren told to achieve peace in order to be in fellowship, but, having been called into fellowship, they were to achieve peace. "And above all these put on love which binds everything together in perfect harmony. And let the peace of Christ dwell in your hearts, to which indeed you were called in the one body" (Col. 3:14, 15). It was those who were in the one body who were to put on love, and to allow the peace of Christ to rule.

Paul wrote to the saints in Christ Jesus at Philippi with their bishops and deacons and instructed them to "Complete my joy by being of the same mind, having the same love being in full accord and of one mind" (Phil. 2:2). His joy began when they entered the fellowship of Christ. As they grew closer to each other in that area and achieved unity of thought and purpose, his joy and theirs abounded. "I shall remain and continue with you all, for your progress and joy in the faith" (1:25). On what basis were they told to achieve the same mind, the same love, and full accord? The previous verse hinges its accomplishment upon "encouragement in Christ, the incentive of love, the participation (fellowship) in the Spirit." With such encouragement, incentive and fellowship they were to labor toward unity of thought. But while they were struggling the fellowship was not impaired!

The church of God at Corinth was composed of those who "were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. 1:9). It was because they were in the fellowship, that the apostle said, "I appeal to you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that all of you agree that there be no dissensions among you, but that you be united in the same mind and in the same judgment." They were rent into schismatic groups but were still in the fellowship. Paul pleads with all of them as brethren, regardless of the party names they wore. To them all he recommends love as the answer to their predicament, for "love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong, but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, endures all things" (13:4-7). Paul rises above all partisanship in this letter. He takes sides with neither group, not even with those who said "We are of Paul." He addresses them all as brethren, and admonishes them "as my beloved children." He says, "Finally, brethren, farewell. Mend your ways, heed my appeal, agree with one another, live in peace and the God of peace will be with you" (2 Cor. 13:11).

Let us again state this revolutionary principle. Fellowship in Christ is not contingent upon agreement upon matters of interpretation and opinion; but agreement in these is contingent upon fellowship. What practical changes will be made by recognition and application of this law.

Perhaps we can best illustrate by example. A group of brethren from another section of the country reared in a different traditional background, and in a congregation which is opposed to Bible classes, move to a northern city to find employment. They find a congregation of saints meeting there and attend with them to break bread. The procedure is different than that which they have been accustomed to and some things are very difficult for them to see. Fortunately, all of them are sincerely motivated by a deep love for Christ.

They meet together in Christian love to discuss the problem. All agree that they are brethren. All recognize that they are in the fellowship, not because of personal agreement, but because of their relationship to God through the Holy Spirit. All resolve not to tear the fabric of fellowship because it is greater than any personal view relative to teaching the Word of the Lord, however dear that view might be to their hearts. They first decide to list and discuss those things in which they stand together, believing that emphasis upon these will lay a more solid foundation for discussion of differences. They find the area of agreement much greater than the area of disagreement, and they concede that it would be foolish to give up this ground which has already been gained in their struggle to possess the small remainder in unity.

All are patient and kind. No one is jealous or boastful. No one is arrogant, rude, irritable or resentful. No one insists upon having his own way. (Read 1 Corinthians 13:4, 5 again). The brethren who have moved to the city, agree to work with the congregation in every way possible and to allow each one's personal conviction to be the determining factor as to how far he can go in cooperating with the classes for Bible study. As several years pass, their love for each other is deepened through sharing in times of joy and sorrow, prosperity and adversity, health and sickness, and pain and death. Their children have married and they are bound together by ties of affection. The congregation grows so large it is deemed best to plant another.

The brethren who have opposed the grouping of students ask permission to form a new congregation in which they can conduct a teaching program more in conformity with their views. Consent is given and all labor together in planting the new unit. They continue to meet together once per week for mutual study of the word, they exchange physical labor upon the two meetinghouses, and also exchange talent for the purpose of edification. They recognize that because brethren meet in two different places and hold some varying views does not justify disfellowship, and frequent association will mean a closer unity as they come nearer to the ideal of Christ.

Would not such a course be better than the procedure generally followed? Would it not be more consistent with the tenor of the sacred revelation? Then, why have we not acted in this fashion? There is just one answer. "For you are still of the flesh. For while there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not of the flesh and behaving like ordinary men?" (1 Cor. 3:3). Christians are to be extraordinary men. They are not to be conformed to the world, but transformed by the renewing of their minds. Men of the world quarrel, fight, and separate into cliques and parties. When we do the same, we are conformists to the world. We can only be transformed when our minds are renewed by some great overwhelming, powerful thought. We will never achieve unity by devising ingenious human schemes and drawing up formal professions. The very existence of these testifies to a lack of love.

We are today exactly where our thinking has brought us. We will be tomorrow exactly where our thinking takes us. If we will change the tragic picture of division, desolation and spiritual destruction, we must alter our thinking. So long as we seek to achieve fellowship by agreement upon propositions we will divide every time someone learns a new truth. Unity will not be achieved by external documents and forms. It must come from within. It must probe the deepest thoughts of our hearts. It must plumb the very depths of our beings. It must bubble up through all of the debris of years of wrong thinking and seek the surface of new lives.

We must feel that we are one in Him with every other person who has accepted Him as Lord. That feeling will do more to promote peace, and prove to be a surer bond of lasting union than all of the pacts, concordats and comity agreements men have written. We are in fellowship! We are one in Christ Jesus! We have been raised up together and made to sit together in heavenly places! We were all part of the original redemption agreement. We were all set free by the grace of God. The Holy Spirit dwells within us as a seal of our fellowship with God and with each other. Under the benign influence of that Spirit, let us move closer to having one mind, the same love and full accord. God hasten the day! Peace must be waged, as others wage war and strife.

Thoughts on Fellowship (8)

Contents

Martin Luther wrote about the "church fathers" in these words, "Though they said nothing decisive about justification by grace, yet at their death they believed in it. The worthy fathers lived better than they wrote." That last sentence is applicable to most of our brethren. Their practice is better than their unwritten creeds. Many secretly believe what I am writing about fellowship. They rejoice that I am saying it. They eagerly await the day when it will become the norm and they can exit from hiding and affirm the same truths which I express.

Others practice it and just as openly deny it. When they meet a brother, of whatever stripe, outside of their bailiwicks they are the very soul of courtesy and attention. They will climb up beside him on a stool at the local coffee shop and fraternize with him as if the two had no differences on earth. It is only when one is in the pulpit that he feels vulnerable and threatened and must take a hard-nosed position. The same warm and affable person when by himself becomes cold and indifferent when representing the last bastion of faithfulness, as he regards the church which pays him.

The day is coming when more and more brethren will begin to get their eyes open and will free themselves from the frightful bondage of the spirit which holds others aloof. What is now being said will be of such general acceptance that few will remember the need for saying it. There will be those who will hold on for a long time to the legalistic position. They will equate it with the faith once delivered. But one by one they will come to see it for what it is, a human tradition passed along to curse them by feuding fathers.

Tolbert Fanning, wrote far back in 1844, as follows: "What is the love of the brethren? Perhaps on no subject has the human heart been driven to greater extremes, than what is generally termed love of the brethren. The boundaries of each faction, are usually the limits of the love of the respective denominations; while the deep and abiding hatred of most religionists is limited only by the universe. Romanists love their own; Calvinists love Calvinists; Arminians love not all Arminians, but each Arminian sect rejoices in itself alone. Deep seated party prejudice is the 'love of God' in party religions. Baptists feel in their souls that they love Baptists, and hence fancy that this prejudice is the love of the brethren, and indubitable evidence of a passage from death unto life."

To this poignant statement might well be added in our generation the "Churches of Christ." It is well known that the brotherhood is restricted to those who agree upon certain things which have been elevated to a prominence they do not possess and are made tests of fellowship. Each group has its own brotherhood and there is no such thing as the "brotherhood." If deep seated party prejudice produced this state among those who are not of us, as enumerated by Brother Fanning, pray what produces it among us?

Alanson Wilcox in "A History of the Disciples of Christ in Ohio" relates that in 1804, Barton W. Stone made a trip to Meigs County, Ohio, for the purpose of immersing a Presbyterian preacher named William Caldwell. While there he accepted an invitation of the Separate Baptist Association to preach to them. He says: "The result was that they agreed to cast away their formularies and creeds, and take the Bible alone for their rule of faith and practice; to throw away the name Baptist and to accept the name "Christian," and to bury their Association, and to become one with us in the great work of Christian union. Then they marched to the stand where we were preaching, shouting the praises of God and proclaiming aloud what they had done. We met them, and embraced each other in Christian love."

That is beautiful and blessed. But it could not happen today. Instead, these brethren would have been rebuked for being disorderly in meeting and would have been met with signed propositions demanding a debate. How have the righteous fallen and the faithful perished from among the children of men. We need to weep as we read these stirring tales of yesteryear from the pens of those who were so on fire for the unity of God's people that they allowed nothing to stand in the way.

In this current series which I am doing on fellowship, the koinonia of the disciples of our Lord, it is appropriate and important that we consider the related term koinonos, which designates the sharer or partaker. As William Barclay points out in "A New Testament Wordbook" this term in classical Greek means a companion, a partner, or a joint-owner. In secular usage it was a business term. In Luke 5:10 we are told that James and John were partners with Simon in a fishing enterprise. In the same sense Paul informed those who asked about the status of Titus that he was his partner (2 Cor. 8:23). When asking Philemon to receive back his runaway slave as a brother, the apostle says, "If you consider me a partner, receive him as myself" (verse 17). In the New Testament, therefore, the word is used of partnership in either secular or spiritual pursuits.

The Galilean fishermen who became ambassadors for the Christ would not need an explanation of what it meant to be a koinonos in the Lord. They understood its implication from the partnership of the fishing nets. They had been joined together by a common objective, they had mutually toiled and endured hardship, and had shared in prosperity and adversity, depending upon the size of the catch and the vagaries of the market.

When Paul seeks to enforce the point that those who eat the bread and drink the cup together are in fellowship, he cites an example. "Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?" (1 Cor. 10:18). A certain portion of some sacrifices was to be eaten by those qualified under the law. Those who thus ate were partners or sharers in the benefits and blessings derived from attendance upon the whole service centered about the altar. Paul extends his reasoning to show that one cannot be in partnership with the Lord and with demons at the same time (see verse 21). There is nothing in common between God and idols. One exists in the mind of the worshiper. The other exists independently. So there can be nothing in common between ourselves and both at the same time. "You cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and the table of demons."

We share with each other in Christ because He has shared His bounty and grace with us. We are not in the fellowship because of our attainments in wealth, power, prestige, wisdom or knowledge. They do not necessarily debar from fellowship, and neither do they enhance it. The mere fact that one may be worth a huge amount while another is in poverty will not affect their fellowship in Christ. It is not based upon that. The fact that one may be in a political office and the other a virtual unknown will not affect our fellowship in Christ. He received us both regardless of circumstances and brought us into the glorious fellowship. We were made partners, not through anything we did, or because of any accomplishment of our own, but because of the riches of His grace.

We are not in the fellowship because we understand everything alike, or because we have reached a certain stage of spiritual development. We did not come into the fellowship by making an "A" on a test on doctrinal matters, or by passing a test. The fact is that we are in all sorts of developmental stages from lisping babes to mature men. Even those who are mature have much yet to learn. The fact is that we will never pass beyond the disciple stage in this life. "The brotherhood" we are told to love (1 Peter 2:17) does not consist merely of those who agree with us upon some controversial point such as Bible classes, colleges, individual cups, the pastor system, contribution baskets, long hair, or a manner of breaking the bread. There are those who would like to limit it to those who wear ties, have their hair cropped and have no beard. But they are schismatic and factional in their outlook. They suffer from restricted vision and spiritual astigmatism. "The brotherhood" of Christ stems from the fatherhood of God. Jesus is not ashamed to call us brethren because we have the same Father as himself. He said "Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father" (John 20:17).

Every person on this earth who is a child of God is my brother. He is in "the brotherhood." When we talk of the brotherhood in such a manner as to exclude any of God's children we are sectarian. We are also ignorant. We reflect not upon the children but upon the Father when we deny their paternity. In an attempt to defend our own views we actually exclude God. Such a partisan usage of the term is quite frequent. It is promoted by factional leaders and editors. I regularly receive a number of journals and reports of those preachers who contribute news to them. All speak of work "in the brotherhood" but they do not speak as the Bible does. They do not mean the same thing by the term that the word means.

To one the brotherhood is limited to those who oppose classes, to another those who use fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, to another those who break the bread in a certain fashion, to another those who oppose orphan homes, to another those who object to individual cups, to another those who employ instrumental music, to another those who oppose its use.

It is a rather strange phenomenon that all of these various factions have a paper, and generally the editor and certain chosen cohorts in his favor, constitute the ruling hierarchy of each "brotherhood." Regardless of how you stand in the grace of God, if you do not continue in the good graces of the editor, you will be ruined and hounded out of the brotherhood. You must "walk the chalk line" and bow to the whim of the editor, or you will be "drummed out of the corps." Nothing is more certain than your falling into disgrace if you dare to oppose the pet project of "the powers that be." Why men will allow themselves to become so enslaved that they dare not think for themselves constitutes the anomaly of the ages.

Pressures are exerted to keep people "in line" and brain-washing methods are employed to stifle individual thinking and to confine men behind the "paper curtain." It has long been a question with me as to whether the schismatic spirit produces a faction which then creates an editorial mouthpiece, or whether an editor creates a faction "in his own likeness, and in his own image." But there is no denying that the sectarian spirit is so rife, and there are so many "brotherhoods" in existence, that the one thing which is unique in these days is a wholly unsectarian plea, and when brethren hear it they say like the ancient Athenians, "May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears" (Acts 17:19, 20).

It seems incredible that angels and archangels waited with such wonderment the birth of a little chiefly American party to save the church from the frightful error of teaching the word in Sunday Schools. Or, that John the Baptist came in the spirit and power of Elijah to announce the advent of a kingdom whose great objective was the preservation of the world from the awesome tragedy of singing praises to God accompanied by an instrument. Even more astounding is it that Jesus, heralded by all of the prophets, introduced by a chorus of angels, and proclaimed throughout the world to every tribe, tongue and language, ended up reigning over a little problem filled group.

I am thrilled that I have been delivered from the "Mickey Mouse" mentality which kept me from being a koinonos with precious souls who love my Lord so much and seek to obey him to the full extent of their understanding. For years I thought the kingdom of heaven was an institution. I did not know it was a reign or rule and that everyone who enlisted under that sovereignty was a citizen. At that time it was composed mainly of those who lived in one section of our own country. There were few books and little knowledge. We were mainly ignorant in spite of our sincerity. We were hostile toward others, very suspicious, and always combative. But when Jesus struck the scales from my eyes, and removed the fetters from my heart, the kingdom expanded and the family grew larger.

Any group which forces you to believe something other than the great fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, as a condition of admission to their fellowship, has laid another foundation than that which has been laid, which is Jesus Christ. And that "something else" is the creed of that group, and the group constitutes a sect in the fair import of the term. And any group which establishes admission to brotherhood upon any other basis than the new birth is doing despite to the Spirit of grace, and opposing God's plan for the ages.

We are participants with God because we share in the divine nature. The very word koinonos is used in this connection. "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (2 Peter 1:4). Being partners in the divine nature brings us into intimate relationship with all who share in that nature. It effectively frees us from all the demands of the carnal human nature. We are no longer debtors to the flesh to live after the flesh. Sin has no dominion over us.

It also obligates us to use our faith as a foundation and upon it to build a life structure using as materials the "excellencies" which are enumerated. The new life is not static, stunted or stifled. We are to grow and glow. This indicates that when we are called to glory and virtue we are far from being spiritually perfect or intellectually mature. We are one in Him, not because of personal attainment but because of His grace.

Due to differences in early training, environment, and temperament, as well as variations in aptitudes, skills, and opportunities of study, there will be many things upon which we will disagree. These differences can be resolved if they need to be. There are some matters on which we may always differ, but they are of such little consequence as to warrant no particular effect upon us; there are others of a graver nature, but upon these we should bestow more abundant study and consultation. The whole problem is one of attitudes— toward God, His word, and each other. A recognition of kindred ties in Jesus will enable us to treat each other as brethren while we draw closer to Him and each other in our efforts.

Thoughts on Fellowship (9)

Contents

This is the final article in a series on the above topic. In all of these we have humbly set forth our convictions without regard to our past ideas and conclusions. We have not sought to bind them upon others. We respect and love those who disagree with the thoughts suggested. It is not at all necessary to concur with our statements to be received in the Lord, or to be loved and respected as our brother in Him. We trust that our readers have been stimulated to think, reason and discuss relative to the important problem that confronts us. Our views may not be so important but none of us doubt that fellowship in Jesus is very important. We begin herewith a summary of our views.

1. Believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are divided and torn into warring sects, and these defeat the purpose of our absent King. But they are still believers. They have heard the good news proclaimed and have sought to reply to its demands upon their lives. Regardless of how far apart they may seem to be they differ as believers and not as unbelievers. It is this which makes the whole thing so tragic. They have been splintered by following the ideas which have crystallized in the minds of men. Not one of the divisive things has been created by God. It is not belief of the gospel which is the problem but the something else in each case.

2. His will is that all who believe in Him should be one, and for this He prayed on the night before His death. The thing of paramount importance to Jesus as He faced Gethsemane and Golgotha was the unity of all who accepted Him as the Messiah and God's Son. With the shadow of the cross falling across His pathway He prayed that all who believe in Him through the apostolic testimony should be one. He prayed that this oneness might be of the quality that existed between Himself and the Father. He wanted us to be one in them and wanted it to be a visible unity which the world could see. For he realized that the world could not be won to believe in Him until those in the world who believed in Him would be one. It may seem strange that God would condition the salvation of the world upon such a fragile thread but He did so. We pay the price of a lost world for our divisions.

In some indefinable way our unity is connected with the glory which Jesus dispenses and which Jesus had with the Father before the world began. He declares, "I gave them the same glory you gave me, so that they may be one, just as you and I are one. I in them and you in me, so that they may be completely one, in order that the world may know that you sent me and that you love them as you love me." That may yet be a mystery unto our human minds but the design of it is clear. Our disunity reflects against the glory of God and keeps Him from being magnified.

Just as the Shekinah, representing God's glory in the days of Israel and going before them as a pillar of cloud and fire, brought them together around the holy tent, so the glory of Christ draws us like a magnet to a common center and unites us in the greatest force on earth. The farther we get from the glory of God the more divided we come. The closer we come to it the closer we come to each other. It leads us in our pilgrimage and tells us where to camp.

3. Religious division and sectarian strife is not the normal condition of the body of Christ. Like cancer in a physical body it is a malignant growth and an abnormal state. If medical researchists ever accept cancer as a normal condition they will cease to dedicate themselves to research dealing with its cause and cure, and we will be doomed. Likewise, if we accept sectarianism as the normal state, declare there is nothing to be done about it and cease to labor to determine its cause and cure, we will be doomed to incessant warfare amongst believers, and none of us can be wholly guiltless.

It seems to me that we are in that state now. We have accepted division and agreed to live with it as long as we can, just like a man with an inoperable malignancy. No one becomes greatly exercised about it. No one is worked up over it. Each party is so busy proselyting and trying to grow larger and fatter that it accepts with nonchalance the cancer eating away at its inward being. There are no researchists carefully examining what has brought us to this sad state. We have resolved to go on, each in his own way, without reference to other believers.

Sickness is not normal for the human body. It is the result of sin, either directly or indirectly. Had man continued obediently before God there would have been no disease to plague him, no pain or discomfort. Likewise our sad state in the kingdom of glory is a distortion of the design of the Creator of the body of Christ, It is a hideous growth upon its fair face, making it the subject of odious comparisons by the world which beholds it. We need to see it as it is, revolting, disgusting, and an abomination unto God. We can never be complacent about it. We can never endure it

4. Moved by a fervent desire to help answer the prayer of our benign and blessed Lord, we have sought to investigate the subject of fellowship anew, and we have set forth our own findings in this series of articles. What we have suggested may help only if we do not accept these conclusions as final, but use them as foundations for future exploration and study. Not one of us has the last word to say on the subject of our disunity. It is so mixed and mingled with the temperaments of those involved, so deeply ingrained in their personalities, that it can never be solved by any one person.

I am not so naive as to suppose that everyone will take what I say and seek to implement it. I have become a controversial figure. Many will not read what I write because of their personal feeling toward me. It is impossible to take the position of neutrality on all of our issues as I have without incurring the displeasure of numerous ones who think those issues are all important. I have written with the view that others may stumble across what I have written after I am gone and find that it makes sense. They will not be motivated by prejudice or hatred toward me.

The walls will not be broken down in a day as were those of Jericho for we cannot perform miracles with ram's horn trumpets. But if we can carefully hack away at the structures created by men to keep us apart it may be that we can weaken them until in the after years they will be reduced to rubble and the people of God be restored to one another. If it is in His will that they be removed no one can forever stand against them. It is in this firm conviction we have written in love and without rancor.

5. The question of sectarian strife is a major one with many roots. There is no simple answer or solution. Casual and careless thinkers frequently demonstrate their immaturity by professing to have a glib answer for every problem. It is possible that over-simplification is one of the chief faults in our reasoning. Certainly, it generally ignores the thinking of the other person and his reason for so thinking.

The greatest fallacy of the latter part of the twentieth century is the either/or fallacy. It is appealing because of its ease of application, but it is just as wrong as if it were hard. It ignores the gray areas and brushes away the fog, without seeing what is involved. Our divisions were mostly inherited. They are sanctified by our fathers, now dead and sleeping in the cemeteries. It appears to us that to be true to them we must maintain the status quo. I challenge this. Our fathers were mistaken about many things. Mine was and so was yours. The best way to be true to their memory is by being honest with ourselves and with our God. It will avail nothing to hide truth in order to honor traditions. No skeleton hand reaching out of the grave can point the way for me to walk. New occasions teach new duties!

6. We have suggested that the issue of fellowship is confused because we now use the term in a sense in which it was never employed by the Holy Spirit. It is frequently equated with endorsement of another's position. But fellowship is a state or condition into which we are called by God through the gospel. Our entrance into that relationship which is described as being "in Christ" is contingent upon the belief of one fact, and obedience to one act. That one fact is that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God. The one act is immersion of such a penitent believer in water. This act inducts one into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Such an one is added to the body of Christ.

We do not fellowship things, but persons. The word "fellow" demonstrates this. It is sheer ignorance to ask if one fellowships instrumental music, and folly to ask if he fellowships cups, classes, or colleges. The question is whether or not he is called into the fellowship of those who share the opinion that such things are right or wrong. He is really called into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ, and in that fellowship he can hold an opinion contrary to the general norm about all of the above and a hundred other things and this does not affect his standing with Jesus. The great question is "What think ye of Jesus, whose Son is he?" You can be right about Jesus and wrong about a dozen other things and still be saved, but if you are wrong about Jesus you can be right about everything else and still be lost. Is Jesus Lord of your life? That is the real issue.

7. Unfortunately, and in opposition to the will of the Father of all light, those who believe in our precious Lord are divided and scattered over the hills of sectarianism. They are kept apart, segregated and separated by human creeds, interpretations, and opinions, which have been made tests of fellowship. To alleviate the abnormal condition we must eliminate these factors. We should guard against any future division among believers by resolving never to make anything a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. This one principle accepted and adopted now, will guarantee that no other cleavage will ever occur among earnest believers in the Savior.

8. The problem of offsetting divisions already in existence, some of which are of long standing, will not be so easy. The peacemakers will be called compromisers. Those who plead for unity of all believers, and are devoid of the party spirit, must be prepared to endure misrepresentation, abuse, and false accusation. They must steel themselves against retaliation when their motives are judged as evil. They must never allow themselves to cease to love and pray for those who try to undermine and overthrow them. But the healing of schisms and repairing of breaches is so important to the work of God that it must be dearer than wealth, prestige or even life itself. A restoration must be preceded by a reformation— a change in attitude. The work can only go forward in love, an all pervading love which knows no limit so far as humankind is concerned.

There can be no recovery of the lost ground of fellowship without association. This means association with those whom we once regarded as unfaithful. And this means making oneself vulnerable. It means going among others and openly sharing with them, doing as Paul did at Corinth, commending what you can and refusing to commend what you cannot. It does not mean arguing or debating with them. Sometimes it means deferring judgment. At other times it means withholding it until a later time. "The rest will I set in order when I come." But the repair of every rupture begins with the resumption of associations, whether it be in the domestic, political or religious world. Men must sit down and talk, and to do that they must meet. The peace-makers are the ones to initiate such talks. Gradually, the party spirit will erode away as each gains confidence in the good intentions of the other.

9. There must be a willingness to examine past acts which have resulted in division, and a readiness to admit mistakes. There must be a heart yearning for oneness, a fervent desire to see the will of God done on earth as it is in heaven. Division did not come over night. Unity will not be achieved in a day. Patience and forbearance are prime requisites. We must be willing to plant the seed: the increase will be given by God.

Much of our problem has been augmented by our exclusiveness through the years. Division generally began with a small matter but it has gathered accretions through the years because of ignoring it. It is like a wrecked vessel on the bottom of the ocean. When a salvage crew dives down to bring up treasure, the thing rescued from the briny depths may have all kinds of accumulation clinging to it. There must be care not to neglect something that is really precious. Our task is to get together and scrape away a lot of rust. We may find ourselves much closer to each other than we suspected.

10. If it be true that all who have accepted Jesus as God's Son, and have been immersed by His authority, are children of God, and by this fact constitute a brotherhood, we can regard each other as brethren while we discuss our differences in humility and seek a solution to our problems. We lose nothing by being kind, considerate and courteous to those who disagree with us. A recognition of brotherhood is not evil. But we must want unity. We must wage peace as others wage war. And this means the development of a strategy for peace, and its proper implementation. Many have no such strategy at all despite the fact that it is one of the most important things in the midst of a divided world.

Those who prefer to maintain the status quo will never answer the prayer of Jesus. They stand athwart His path and hinder the accomplishment of the divine purpose. We must be discontent to perpetuate human parties with human names and human aims. These but pamper our pride. We must sigh and cry for something better than what we have. We must pray for unity and toil to achieve it. We must agonize in prayer, and bombard the ramparts of heaven night and day with our petitions.

Above all, we must love every soul for whom Jesus died. The love of God must be shed abroad in our hearts. It must be the motivating principle of our lives. Then, regardless of what men may do to us, we will triumph over hate and envy. We will serve those who would destroy us, help those who would ruin us, and do good unto all men. Love never fails. It never quits either. If we stand upon love, we will stand forever. Nothing can shake us. And this will work as leaven, for it is the leaven of God. It is our only hope of survival. It is the key to future happiness and security. There is no other alternative. We must love all men or perish! We must find the way to oneness, or miss the way to heaven.

One thing essential to offsetting division is fairness and justice. The mind of an editor must not become our criterion of scripturality. The voice of dissent must be heard. We are not like Russia where men are sent to Siberia for voicing something different than the party line. Let those who disagree be allowed to speak up. Truth has nothing to fear by presenting both sides of an issue so that honest and qualified readers may study them side by side. Through equity and kindness we may be able to heal schisms of long standing. Every tendency toward unity of the Spirit should bring rejoicing. Love is the golden key to unlock for us the store-house of God's grace. Let us make use of that key!

If Christ were to come back and walk the streets of any of our great cities today, the heart that bled for the sin of mankind, would bleed afresh because of the condition existing among those who believe that He is the Son of God. He would behold the party spirit parading under the guise of faithfulness, see hate wearing the livery of love, and selfishness enshrined as sacrifice. In the name of Christianity, he would hear men bear false witness against brethren, and behold the malignant spirit stab character and defame reputation. He would see church buildings rising as temples of pride, and visualize the haughty spirit of the Pharisee in modern dress as men still pray in effect: "Lord, I thank you that I am not as other men are."

Sectarian division is our modern scandal. It has raped the church and pillaged God's sanctuary. And because all of us are a part of the Christian realm we are shamed and debased by what has transpired. Because I am a human being I cannot be unaffected by man's inhumanity to man. The tortures and barbarity of Dachau and Buchenwald must rise up to torment my dreams, for all humanity suffered in the gas chambers of those German prisons. The stiff fingers of those who died in the Holocaust point straight at the heart of every person on earth. In the same way, every division that has ever occurred in the Christian world, every rent in the fabric of brotherhood, cannot leave me untouched, even though I do not consciously acknowledge it, and though I seek to disavow it.

Every new schism that appears, every sect that is spawned, every faction that is created must affect me, whether remotely or otherwise, for it makes the task of arriving at unity a greater one, it postpones by so much the answer to the prayer of the blessed Lord, it increases the pressure of endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. I cannot be unmoved or untouched by religious dissension anywhere on earth, for, being a follower of the Nazarene, I am partaker in the momentous effort which cost his life. When a little congregation in a far away place, kindled by jealousy and inflamed by passion, erupts, until those who walked together now walk apart in their partisan spirit of self-righteousness, this pebble flung into the pool of Christianity, creates ripples which will not only break against the shores of my heart, but will not spend themselves until they foam out their mire upon the beaches of eternity.

No one of us can be utterly free from a sense of shame while bigotry, intolerance and factionism exist in the name of religion. We are Christian, and the rents and tears in the Christian fabric reflect against us all, as surely as injustice, inequality and cruelty to human beings in any part of the earth reflect against us as human beings. We cannot disavow our responsibility by arrogantly enquiring if we are keepers of our brethren. We cannot, like Pilate, wash our hands, and be free of the fatal guilt of the mangled body of Jesus, so long as we have made no attempt to pour in ointment and balm and bind up the wounds.

I am impelled by a sense of urgency, because I believe that our civilization staggers today on the brink of a precipice. I think we are doing a crazed and drunken dance on a narrow ledge above the valley of destruction. Unless we can make the Christian concept work, our children, or our children's children, may become mere statistics in an atomic holocaust, their burned, scared and charred bodies mingled with hot steel and choking rubble. Time is running out. The sun is setting. Day is ending. Gog and Magog are gathering for the fray. There is but one thing that can save our world from disintegration. Jesus said that his disciples were the salt of the earth. If that salt loses its strength the earth cannot be preserved. There is no other alternative. We must restore the saving quality of the salt, or we shall all perish.

It is this which prompted me to begin to plead that we increase our labor in love to heal the breaches in the walls of Zion, that we wage peace as diligently as others wage war. Only the peacemakers will be called the children of God. Happy are the peacemakers, says the prince of peace. We must find the way to unity or our boasted glory will lead to the grave. We must recapture the sense of spiritual kinship with all sincere believers in the Messiah. We dare not compromise truth. We dare not forsake principles. But we must find the solution to the problem of division. We cannot fracture ourselves into strength, nor split ourselves into the unity of the Spirit.

Unity will not come by accident. We will not simply stumble into it. We cannot ignore the causes of disunity and restore it. But time is of the essence. The shadows are lengthening. The storm clouds gather. The winds of destiny are moaning and rising. Brethren, do not tarry much longer or it will be too late. "Now is the accepted time, today is the day of salvation."

PILGRIMAGE OF JOY

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Index of Books

Title Page

Introduction by Leroy Garrett

1. Early Years

- In the Beginning
- Mother and Her Danish Kin
- "Ketcherside Town"
- Uncle L. E. and the Sand-Hillers
- The Day My Father Was Baptized
- Life In Our First Meetinghouse
- Critical Times During World War I
- Meetin' House Religion
- My Days As A Boy Preacher

11. Marriage and Evangelism

- Married and Broke!
- And Baby Makes Three
- Ford Country
- The Glory of Mutton Hollow
- The Party and Its Ringleaders
- St. Louis, Here We Come!

18. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

- The Debating Years Begin
- "He Being Dead, Yet Speaketh"

- Mission Messenger Begins
- On Board the Queen Elizabeth
- High Adventure in Great Britain
- When the Snow Fell in Scotland
- Love Feasts in England and Ireland
- More of England and then Home Again

27. The Beginnings of Change

- Life Begins at 40
- The Call of the South
- Arkansas Antics
- Irish Stew
- The Knock at the Door
- Life in the Spirit
- The Land of the Thistle
- Back Home from England
- The Cow Pasture Debate

37. The Change Continues

- The Stormy Fifties
- Years of Change
- What Happens When You Change
- Lava From Above
- The Cutting Edge
- A Letter From Abilene
- Our Enduring Heritage
- Reviewing Our Heritage

46. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

- From Lubbock to Kimberlin Heights
- "One Faith, 10,000 Opinions"
- Recovery of Something Old
- Drama at Harvard
- Still More Drama at Harvard
- "How Did Jesus Get in Here?"

- The Dawn of the 1970's
- Summoned to Come Up Higher
- Waging Peace
- Nothing Is As Important As Jesus

57. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

- 1972: A Year For Renewal
- Getting Acquainted in Texas
- Specters From the Past at Lexington
- Talking Plainly With Each Other
- Jungle Fellowship
- People and Places
- Diverse Ministries
- The Wonders of Koinonia
- Mormons and Jews
- Last Time Around

PILGRIMAGE OF JOY

An Autobiography of Carl Ketcherside with Introduction by Leroy Garrett

Contents

Originally Published By

COLLEGE PRESS PUBLISHING COMPANY

Joplin, Missouri

Copyright © 1991

Introduction by Leroy Garrett

Contents

W. Carl Ketcherside was at last persuaded to put into serial form the story of his life, which he chose to call "A Pilgrimage of Joy." The title itself speaks well to the life of this unusual man, for his earthly sojourn was indeed that of a pilgrim, which to him meant that his life was a plan of God and that his destiny was to fulfill the purpose God had for him in this world. He was a man who was "on his way" to something higher. He was a sojourner in a world that was not his home, but as he passed this way he was joyfully involved in making his own contribution to what he called "this interesting world."

His life was a pilgrimage of joy largely because he made it so by his winsome sense of humor, his contagious enthusiasm, and his undying optimism. If these ingredients— humor, enthusiasm, optimism— do not always make for a joyful pilgrimage in this world, they certainly did in the life of Carl Ketcherside. He was an "up" person who never saw a "down" day. He was a delight to be around, and he had a knack for making people feel good about themselves when in his presence.

Before he brought his monthly journal, Mission Messenger, to a close in December, 1975, after 37 years of publication, we agreed that he would begin immediately to write regularly for my publication, Restoration Review. He announced to his readers that while his paper would no longer be published, they could keep in touch with him through my paper. Many of his readers who were not already taking Restoration Review became subscribers. From 1976 until his death in 1989 he wrote regularly for my paper, his last articles being published posthumously. I think some of his best writing was done in these years in the pages of Restoration Review, perhaps because he was free of the ordeal of having to edit his own paper. And in my paper he knew he was free to say whatever was in his heart and mind, with no strings attached.

I urged him to begin writing his autobiography in serial form on a monthly basis, and to continue as long as seemed appropriate. He wrote for four years (40 installments), supposing that would be sufficient. I encouraged him to continue until he finally wrote for six years, concluding his 60th installment, "Last Time Around," in December, 1981, which chronologically brought his life story up to the time he closed down Mission Messenger. If the series appears a bit disconnected in places, which it may, it should be remembered that it was first published in serial form and without defined parameters.

What is important is that Carl has told his own story in his own way. He was encouraged to make it a kind of intellectual autobiography, reflective of the changes in his thinking through the years. The reader will see that he does share the drama of some of the changes that turned his life in a different direction, from that of a "wing commander" of a narrow sect, a term he frequently used to describe his old life as a sectarian, to that of an envoy of peace, unity, and fellowship through forbearing love. This is especially evident when he describes his own life as a polemicist and how he changed his mind about debating his own brothers in Christ, and when he tells how, after 25 years in the ministry and baptizing thousands, he at last on a wintry night in a little chapel in Belfast, Ireland invited Jesus into his heart, renouncing forever his sectarianism.

It was understood that Carl eventually would write a prologue to his autobiography, bringing the events of his life, along with some of his most recent thinking, up to date. But he never got around to writing that final word to his "Pilgrimage of Joy," which would have been reflections on his life during those last years. It turned out to be more than 14 years from the time he ended his narrative with the demise of his journal to the time of his death.

One purpose of this introduction, therefore, is to fill that 14-year gap with a summary of what he did during those years and in what ways his ministry developed. It will of course have to be brief, for Carl's life, along with his wife Nell's, was as busy as ever once he closed down their journal. As Carl put it, he was as busy as ever but the pace was different. He continued to write extensively for several journals. Within a month of closing down his own paper he had several essays for Mission, Integrity, and Christian Standard, as well as for Restoration Review. He was especially pleased to do a series on the American Bicentennial for the Standard.

Up until the last few years of his life he had travelled and lectured among the colleges and churches as much as ever, and he made several significant journeys abroad. But the most important change in his life in the post-Mission Messenger years was the founding of Cornerstone in 1983, an inner-city mission in St. Louis, which appears to have captured his heart and mind more than any task he had ever set his hand to. It soon dominated his and Nell's life, and they would have it no other way. If Carl's view of ministry changed in those last years, I think it would be that he came to see a greater need for work among the poor and needy than among the established churches. He turned down invitations to hold seminars and give lectures in order to join Nell and others in passing out blankets, food, and clothing at the Cornerstone. He taught as many classes, but now it was mostly in the inner city and at Oak Hill Chapel, his home congregation.

He may have become sort of "burned out" on visiting so many churches for so many years. In the innards of his beloved

St. Louis he was among the rank and file, and that is what he preferred. But he was no less active. He was always revving it up, always on the go, always doing something, up to the day he died. In those last days, when he was giving so much of himself, a friend who was concerned about his apparent fatigue threatened to call his doctor. "You leave that doctor alone," he insisted, as he proceeded to the Cornerstone. He died the way he would have preferred, with his boots on, with his heart on the present and his eye on the future. After one more busy day, he committed his soul to God's safekeeping, got in bed, went to sleep and woke up in heaven. A neat way to do it if one can manage it!

If there is a diary on that last decade and a half of his life it would be in the many letters he wrote to people all over the world. He was an inveterate letter writer, many of the letters being written in longhand, which reflected his gifted penmanship, which won him prizes in his youth. His handwriting did not change with the years. His hand was as steady and eloquent at 81 as it was 37 years earlier when we first began to correspond. Many people have mentioned to me through the years two things that impressed them about corresponding with Carl: that he would bother to write to them, and that he had such a beautiful hand. He delighted in writing love notes, especially to those who were critical of him, and it was common for him to write words of commendation to the author of an article or a book he had read.

We corresponded regularly for almost four decades. Realizing that his letters would one day have historic value, I carefully preserved them, hundreds of them. Carl's letters are a mirror of the real person that he was, occasionally prideful but always showing his strength. Here are a few lines from some of them, all taken from the last 14 years of his life:

Anticipating what he might write in his autobiography about his association with the Daniel Sommer family, who played a significant role in our history, he wrote in 1976:

> I suspect that in dealing with the Sommer family I shall let loose some news not previously known. It is certain that I will show the influence of editors in perpetuating division.

Reuel Lemmons, longtime editor of the Firm Foundation, was often critical of Carl's more open views of unity and fellowship. He editorialized Carl as "Blind in One Eye" and would not allow him space to reply. They pilloried each other in their papers. But Carl was never vindictive nor did he hold grudges, as this note early in 1989 would indicate:

> I am saddened by the passing of Reuel. Now our disagreements of the past seem as a dead leaf blown by the wind. I am especially sorry for his good wife who has been a chronic invalid for years. I earnestly pray that the brethren will help and sustain her.

Sometimes he was philosophical, as in this note on the occasion of the release of the hostages in Iran on the eve of President Reagan's inauguration:

> To be free, as the hostages said, is the greatest blessing in the world, and I am sure that the hostages to systems feel the same way. What a great thing God is doing for us in these days!

And he was sometimes introspective, as in this reflection in 1981:

> It is kind of frightening to think that all of us are leaving our imprint upon the record. It should make all of us a little more careful when we realize that years after we slumber in the earth men will borrow what we have said and use it to His eternal glory or to His detriment. It makes us all feel much more humble as we are called upon to touch the sordid lives into which people have become trapped and snared and to which they are held hostage.

This paragraph on part of his itinerary for 1980 is typical of the three attributes already referred to: his humor, enthusiasm, and optimism:

> I leave for Palisade, Colorado next Wednesday and will be in all kinds of gatherings there. It is a great opportunity to really go all out in the work in that section. Then the next week I am going to Portland, Oregon for a couple of meetings. It is evident on almost every side that God is at work through His Spirit bringing about better days. I am thrilled with what I am looking at all over America and Canada. Would Alexander Campbell have loved these days!

If Carl was an inveterate correspondent, he was also a consummate reader. He was usually reading several books at one time, as indicated in this 1981 paragraph:

> I am currently reading three books. This is a regular practice of mine. Two of them are "Karl Marx: A Christian Assessment of His Life and Thought" and "C. S. Lewis: Mere Christianity." I find both of them highly fascinating. The erudition of the latter is extremely impressive. The third book seems also to be vastly interesting since it contains a kind of panoramic survey of a land in which I grew up. The book is "Pioneer Women: Voices from the Kansas Frontier" by Joanna L. Stratton. The introduction is by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. It is fascinating. It gives you a new impression of the strength and courage of women. Not that I needed that, because I have always believed in it.

Concerning a stay in the hospital he wrote in 1986:

> I spent a week in the hospital with a surgery for prostatitis. But I refused to be kept in bed too long, and through his marvelous grace led my roommate back to Jesus and visited all 21 rooms in Section 1100. I met all kinds of people from all over and we had some thrilling talks about Jesus. You can talk to people in the hospital easier than anywhere else. We are having a great time as we grow older.

He had a way with words, even in his letters. This comment on the Flew-Warren debate, which was held in my home town and billed as "the debate of the century," is vintage Carl Ketcherside:

> Your article on the debate was terrific. That was a first-class fiasco and a goldbrick if ever there was one. I think those who promoted it thought that it would place "the Lord's Church" in the forefront of defence of truth in the evangelical scholastic world and most of them did not even know the debate of the century was being held. It was like inviting the whole world to a gigantic fireworks explosion and then having the firecrackers fizzle and the Roman candles backfire. No wonder people are confused. What with one affirming there is a God and acting as if there was, it is enough to blow your mind and put you in orbit. What with one affirming there is a God and acting as if there were none, while the other denying there is a God and acting as if there were, it is enough to blow your mind and put you in orbit.

In those latter years he was always reporting on his ministry at Cornerstone, which became his first love:

> Nell and I (well, myself at least) are having a "ball" at the Cornerstone. I'm getting ready to teach a Bible Study on Monday mornings. We were there yesterday and helped some of the most sorrowful looking people I have ever seen. Worst are the abused wives. I had experience in a drunken husband stabbing his wife and the children were back home the next day. It goes on continuously! We gave away more Bibles last week than at any time since we turned the place from selling spirits to giving away the Spirit. The river of life is flowing as He said that it would.

He was always writing about Nell. Not only did he tell her every day how much he loved her, but he often told Ouida and me how much he loved her. We were kept posted on her several serious illnesses through the years, and rejoiced that in 1988 she appeared much improved. Then in August of that year she went home to be with the Lord. A few days later Carl wrote to us about the end:

> Nell left us very suddenly. She died almost immediately of a massive heart attack. I arose and opened the bathroom door, not having heard a sound from her. She was lying doubled up with her head between the stool and the tub. I tried to get her to say something but she was gone. She detested formality so much that at her large funeral services at two places— here and at Flat River, I spoke briefly to the crowd, introduced Sue (Mrs. Sue Burton, their daughter) who read the poem enclosed, the four grandchildren sang her favorite song. I asked for those who wanted to pay tribute to her to raise their hands and speak, and we followed with a few words from a brother. I went back to work teaching the next morning. It was hard.

Yes, it was hard. After 60 years of having Nell at his side it was a bit too much for Carl to go it alone. He himself now had less than a year to live. In a letter postmarked the day he died, May 24, 1989, which is probably the last letter he ever wrote, he summarized the agony of the lonely months that had passed: "I am disappointed in myself. I thought that I had the power to overcome grief or anything else which was my lot. I found that I simply do not have." In the same letter he wrote of his engagement to Fran Woodside, a widow in his home church, a former Roman Catholic whom he had baptized into Christ. She had been a friend to both Carl and Nell for several years.

He explained his need to marry to the folk at Oak Hill Chapel: "The loneliness finally got to me. I asked Fran to marry." He said he did not want to live with his children nor in a nursing home. He and Fran would take care of each other and serve God together. They even planned a Hawaiian honeymoon.

But it was not to be, for the end came for Carl several months before the proposed marriage. But again this is vintage Carl Ketcherside, who even at 81 was living on the growing edge, excited by the present and awed by the future.

At our last visit together in Hartford, Illinois, only a few weeks before his death, he was pleased that I was not among those who were critical of his plans to marry. He knew that I understood that a man can be devoted to a woman for 60 years, and then, once she is gone, marry another without in anyway reflecting upon the first marriage. On that occasion he extolled the virtues of his late wife and reconfirmed his love and appreciation for her, and then said as he gestured helplessly, "But she isn't here anymore." It was a touching testimony to the beauty and importance of marital companionship. Since Carl's death I have kept in touch with Fran and find her to be a brave woman who has frequently been smitten by life's vicissitudes, one who has learned to yield to the power of God's healing.

The most significant single event in Carl's life during those last years was his attendance in 1983 at the International Convention of Itinerant Evangelists in Amsterdam, Holland. His enthusiasm for this conference is indicative of the changes that God had wrought in his life through the years, and is reflective of the contribution he was able to make to his own people. If the experience back in 1951 in the little church in Belfast had liberated him from sectarianism, the world evangelism conference in Amsterdam in 1983 confirmed his commitment to the church catholic. It was a rare ecumenical experience for a man who had been years preparing himself to appreciate it. In four installments in the 1984 Restoration Review he tells about the conference and what it meant to him. His evaluation is a commentary on his own pilgrimage of one blighted by the factional spirit to one enlightened by an ecumenical outlook. It is his own testimonial that it is only the love of Christ that can break down partisan walls and make believers one in heart and soul.

There were evangelists present from 174 countries, representing virtually every Christian community in the world. Many from the Third World were so poor, being ministers who supported themselves by some trade, that they were provided a change of clothing during the convention. Carl tells of talking with evangelists, sometimes by translation, from Namibia, Zambia, South Africa, India, Sri Lanka, and several South American countries, to name a few, and he was in seminars with some of the great evangelists of the world. He listened to men who were experienced in witnessing for Christ to Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, atheists and communists. He heard Michael Green of Oxford, an Anglican, at one session and the Metropolitan of the Russian Orthodox Church at another. He sat with Baptists from Yugoslavia and with ministers from the Armenian Orthodox Church.

For ten days he was with leaders from denominations that he had not even heard of before. It was at a gathering of the church universal, the first of its kind in history, and he was impressed that it had but a single theme, Jesus Christ and him crucified. They were there to encourage each other and to learn better how to witness for Jesus Christ in today's world. Carl was an enthusiastic participant, describing it as "a mind-blowing experience." The great truth that he had shared with so many for so long proved true for him in Amsterdam in a special way, that "Wherever God has a child I have a brother or sister."

He tells how one morning as he was walking to one of the sessions he was approached by two men on the street, Arabs, who were curious about the conference, and, seeing Carl's identification badge, asked him what it was about. Carl missed the session so as to spend an hour with the men. He told them that the meetings were not about a what but about a who. He told them that Jesus Christ was the only answer for our ripped-off world. What Carl told those Arabs is a fitting description of what had happened in his own life, and it points up the message that he gave to his own generation. He moved from all the

"whats" of sectarian opinionizing to the "Who" of the Christian gospel. When we first met he was majoring in the "whats." When he died he had given the best half of his life in majoring in the "Who." And what a difference that made, not only in his own life, but in the multitudes that his ministry touched!

Home from Amsterdam, he was asked by his critics what such a conference could possibly accomplish. His answer, as I see it, is a suitable commentary on the significance of the life and ministry of Carl Ketcherside:

> I think we must face the fact that, like the generation contemporary with Jesus, many of us are blind and cannot see afar off. Long life and continuous drudgery in one of the more legalistic sects of this day have blurred our vision and dimmed our sight until "we see men like trees walking." We need "the second touch." Surgery for the spiritual cataracts which cause a milky film across our minds would help. Because of my past orientation I also went with no little skepticism. It was all blown away after my arrival.

In Amsterdam he saw demonstrated on a large scale the liberating truth that had long undergirded his plea for unity, that we can love and accept people, and enjoy the fellowship of the Spirit with them, without approving of everything they believe or practice. At that great conference he found confirmation for what he had long taught others, that we are to make nothing a test of fellowship that God has not made a condition for going to heaven. The only unity that is ever possible is unity in diversity.

Carl Ketcherside admitted that his vision was once blurred by sectarian bias. He once saw men like trees walking. But he received the second touch from the One who kept on changing his life and clearing his vision. And that second touch led him on his pilgrimage of joy.

— Leroy Garrett

1. Early Years

In the Beginning

Contents

I was born early in the morning of May 10, 1908, in a little two-room miner's cabin in a poverty-stricken village called Cantwell, nestled in the eastern foothills of the Missouri Ozarks. My advent was at a very inauspicious time during the presidential tenure of Theodore Roosevelt, for I made my debut on the heels of the great financial panic of 1907, a matter to which I gave little thought at the time. My father was William Ketcherside and he had married Anna Marguerite Hansen some eighteen months before I entered the scene as "a howling success." There were five other children to follow to compose a family circle of three boys and three girls. All of us are still alive as I write these words.

All of the Ketchersides (or Ketchersids, for some dropped the final "e" about the year 1800) are descended from one progenitor, Thomas Ketcherside, who came over from Scotland shortly before the time of the American Revolution. His family settled in Virginia and North Carolina. Our branch of the clan emigrated to Missouri after it became United States territory as part of the Louisiana Purchase, and took up land in the then wild country called the "Black River region." The third highest peak of the Missouri Ozarks appears on our state map as Ketcherside Mountain.

Like a lot of pioneers, the men were hard and tough. They prided themselves on the amount of raw whiskey, called rot-gut, which they could gulp down and upon their ability to settle brawls with their fists in bare-knuckle fighting. My great grandfather deserted his family and "shacked up" with a Cherokee Indian woman who had been abandoned when her family died on the frightful "Trail of Tears" march in which many thousands perished while crossing Illinois and Missouri enroute to the Oklahoma Territory.

My great-grandmother was, so I am told, a gentle Scotswoman who still retained the dialect of "Auld Scotia." She kept the family together, and although none of them ever went to school, or learned to read or write, she invested them with a degree of integrity and a reasonable sense of respect. My own grandfather, Woodson Ketcherside, even as a lad, demonstrated qualities which later endeared him to all who knew him. When he first saw my grandmother, Lavina Moses, she was a mere girl, working barefoot in a rocky hill field and wielding a heavy hoe.

As an orphan, she had been indentured to a man for whom she was required by law to work for her "board and keep" until she became eighteen. The lot of such "bound children" in the days before orphan homes was often a difficult one. Taking compassion upon her when she was fifteen, my grandfather-to-be paid off the sum assessed for the final three years and obtained her release. He bought her a pair of shoes and a simple dress and they were married when he was seventeen and she was still but fifteen. I think their union was one of the happiest and most contented I have ever seen. With the opening of the deep-shaft lead mines near Bonne Terre, they moved to a rugged hill farm some three miles from that struggling town, built a log cabin and began to rear their growing family in a kind of wilderness setting where hardship was a way of life and the wolf of hunger was seldom far from the rude door swung on leather hinges.

There was but little chance for an education and the Coonville school, a couple of miles distant, was in session only sporadically as a wandering teacher came through and arranged to teach a few weeks for a meager pittance while "boarding around" a week at a time in the homes of the scholars in the area. Since the chief aim of the community rowdies was to "run the teacher off" and they felt a sense of abject failure if one remained more than six weeks, opportunities for intellectual development were decidedly limited. The rustic homes were utterly devoid of reading materials. There were no newspapers, magazines or books. Only an occasional Bible was to be found and it was regarded with superstitious awe, as containing a passage which would instantaneously stop nosebleed when read by someone who knew its location in the sacred text.

There were no churches and no regular meetings for religious devotion or instruction. Only when an itinerant Methodist or Baptist preacher rode in along one of the trails and announced "preaching in the schoolhouse" did the folk gather to be exhorted to flee from the wrath to come. A boy was sent on a mule to inform the dwellers in remote cabins about the great event and all came, more for the diversion than for the spiritual uplift. The preachers were hardy, with faces deeply tanned and hands that were calloused. They worked in the fields or in the timber side by side with those who "put them up for the night" and prided themselves that they could lay out a row in the field or hew a beam as straight as "the best of them." They were also fearless and had no qualm about stepping off the platform to walk back and grab a disturbing ruffian by "the nape of the neck and the seat of his breeches" and throw him unceremoniously into the schoolyard. Then dusting off their hands they would invite anyone else who wanted "some of the same" to step forward and request it before they resumed preaching.

As a little lad I used to listen spellbound as my grandfather, who was a master story teller, recounted incidents related to school and church in the backwoods. Always reverential, while being as courageous as a wildcat, he told about the times he had pitched in to help the preacher, and with the aid of a stick of stove wood or a window-prop had converted a lot of toughs from an upright to a prone position. He liked best to tell of a Methodist preacher who was very small in stature and who rode his jaded horse into the community after the last three meetings had been "busted up" by a gang of roughnecks.

The wiser heads tried to dissuade the short, thin man from announcing a meeting but "he allowed as how he could handle it with the help of the Lord." The schoolhouse was crowded to capacity the first night with the better element in fear and trembling, while the boorish louts were scuffling with and pawing at each other in the back. The little preacher stepped behind the teacher's desk and called for silence in order to begin a song to the praise of God. The noise in the rear became louder and more raucous. Nervous tension filled the air.

The preacher calmly said, "We will adjourn to the schoolyard. Follow me, please!" As he walked down the aisle, he was followed by the wondering audience, some of whom whispered that he was scared out and giving up. Without saying another word, when he reached the schoolyard, the preacher stooped down and picked up three walnuts from under a tree, and then yanked a six-shooter out of his hip pocket. One by one he threw the walnuts in the air and without a miss shot them to bits. Then he picked up three more and threw them high into the air at once and cracked all three. The fragments of the walnut shells rained down on the heads of the gaping crowd.

Taking six bullets out of his side pocket the preacher again loaded his gun. His fingers did not tremble. He looked up and said, "We will return to the house. Follow me, please!" The awe-stricken rustics all trooped in behind him. It was still as a morgue when the preacher took his place again. Not a sound disturbed the deathly quiet. Laying his trusty six-shooter on top of the Bible he announced, "I propose to discourse with you tonight about the Prince of peace and I will tolerate no interruption." There was no interruption to tolerate. If someone shuffled his feet the preacher merely glanced at the gun and the shuffling stopped. The meeting lasted three weeks and "the mourners" were all over the place when "the altar call" was made.

In this kind of rural environment my father finished the third McGuffey Reader and mastered the first part of Ray's Practical Arithmetic. It had to be done "in hitches" as someone later explained it. While still a child he contracted smallpox during an epidemic, and due to lack of proper care, since there were no doctors to summon for advice, one of his eyes was permanently impaired and the muscle in one leg shriveled away and left that limb shorter than the other. This did not interfere with his hunting or "frolicking" as the old-timers referred to almost any activity except hard work. He became a crack-shot with a gun and regularly carried off every prize from the shooting-matches. He also became a fiddle-player of note and this made him extremely popular at the hoe-downs which generally continued all night or until someone got "likkered up" and started a "knock-down-and-drag-out."

He got a job underground when he was not yet sixteen years old and this meant working ten hours per day, six days per week, for eleven cents an hour. Every day, at a time depending upon which shift he worked, he went to the changing-room where he took off his street-clothes, hung them up on hooks, and then put on his wet, dirty, slimy miner's garb. He went to the large can of carbide, filled his lamp, hooked it on the front of his cap, stepped on the cage and made his descent into the bowels of the earth.

Perhaps because he was so young, and felt the need to prove himself among the older hard-bitten miners, he developed a vocabulary of profanity which would have shocked people in almost any other part of the world. When I was grown and returned to "the Lead Belt" as the area came to be called, grizzled old-timers would search me out and say, "I knowed your Pap when he first went to work underground. He could out-cuss a mule skinner." They said it with a note of envy such as one uses when he speaks of another who has achieved a degree of proficiency in a coveted art which the speaker has not been able to reach.

The young William Ketcherside, if one may judge by the posed photographs taken by wandering photographers, was a rather handsome swaggering young specimen of manhood. When he was "on top" he smoked a pipe filled with Bull Durham, always allowing the string of the tobacco sack to hang from his shirt-pocket in the latest style. When he was underground he could not smoke because of the danger from powder and dynamite, so he took up chewing Brown Mule, and practiced spitting through his front teeth. He was a foul-mouthed and obscene product of a place and a time where you had to be as tough as a hickory sapling to survive.

When the Spirit of God got through to him and transformed him it was one of the most thorough and traumatic changes I have ever known. It is also one of the first things I remember and, of course, it affected my whole future on earth. I must tell you about it, but before I do I want to tell you about my mother, whose parents came to this land as immigrants from the "Old World" as Europe was then designated.

1. Early Years

Mother and Her Danish Kin

Contents

My mother's grandfather was Lars Hansen. He was born of peasant stock in Denmark on February 28, 1829, the year that Hans Christian Andersen gained recognition for his first stage play after he came to Copenhagen from a boyhood of poverty and persecution at Odense. We never knew the original family names of the women our ancestor married in Denmark. Our only existing records show that the first was Mary and she bore him four children— Lars Peter, Christina, John and Nelson. The first became my own maternal grandfather and after he began to grow up, his father became known as "Old Lars" to distinguish him from his son.

After the death of Mary, "Old Lars" married a woman whose name was Karen, and who was eleven years younger than himself. They had a little girl and boy, and it was while the latter was still quite young the lure of this New World became too great for them to resist. The stories of emigrants who found breathing space and living room among the hills and on the wide expanses of prairie and plain sounded a clarion call in a world which had been bled white by the Napoleonic Wars. The Hansens saved what they could and sold what they had and purchased steerage tickets for the family.

My grandmother often told me of the hardships encountered on the six-weeks trip. All food had to be brought along and in their case it consisted mostly of hard-tack rye bread and cheese. The latter became so moldy it had to be scraped before it could be eaten. All became ill and were so sick and nauseated they could hardly minister to one another for weakness. The little boy died and had to be buried at sea. The emaciated little body was sewn up in sailcloth by a sail-mender. At dusk the little knot of emigrants ascended to the deck where the master of the ship read the Lutheran burial service, at the close of which the weighted body was gently eased overboard and sank from sight in the rolling waves.

On the long journey the Hansens became friends of another emigrating family bearing the name of Mabuce, and learning that they were coming to a place called Missouri, they resolved to stick with them. They eventually settled near Bessville, halfway between Marble Hill and Marquand, a land of rolling hills and spring-fed streams. Three more children, all girls, were borne by Karen, who died on November 14, 1877, still only thirty-seven years of age. "Old Lars" lived on for eleven more years, before he passed away on his fifty-ninth birthday. He was regarded as an aged patriarch in those days when the life-span was much shorter than it is now.

Young Lars Peter had gone to school in Denmark and in the new knowledge conveyed in the village school. He readily learned English but never lapsed in his usage of the tongue he first knew. All of his life he subscribed for newspapers published in Denmark and though they arrived months after they were printed he devoured their contents greedily. He became an adept penman and his letters were models of Spencerian neatness.

When he married Sophia Christensen he found himself with a companion of "the old school." She thought it was a sin to teach children to speak English. She wanted life to be exactly as it was in the towns and villages of Germany and Denmark. To be a Dane in those days was to be a Lutheran, and as the Hansen children were born and grew old enough they were sent to the parochial school where all recitations were in German and the catechism was the most important class of all. On Sunday the ritual was conducted in German by stern pastors who tolerated no questioning of their authority. The colony in which my mother grew up was a little island in an alien sea of humanity. It was a culture transplanted and imposed upon another culture.

At the age of twelve Anna and her sisters were in the field following the plow in the spring, and in the harvest they were shocking wheat. In the fall and winter the girls hired out in the homes of the wealthy where they were sometimes treated as drudges, arising before daybreak and working until long after darkness fell. The pay was two dollars per week and board. The two dollar wage was dutifully turned over to the parents at the end of every seven days.

One of the older girls, Hulda, met and married a man who worked in the mines and they established a modest home in a "company house" in Cantwell. It was while Anna was visiting for a few days in the home of this sister that William Ketcherside first saw her, a lovely, rosy-cheeked German Fraulein who spoke a delightful dialect which she never completely lost during her lifetime. He courted her with the same zest with which he went at everything else and she agreed to marry him only upon condition that he got the full consent of her father.

That was not easy. A good deal of correspondence must have ensued for the general attitude of people in the German colony was simply stated, "I'd rather follow a girl of mine to her grave than to see her married to a man who is not a Lutheran." The idea of allowing Anna to marry a young agnostic must have produced a great deal of furor, but finally the parents had to give in. Many years later I read the final letter of consent written by my grandfather to the man who was destined to beget me and give me life. It was couched in formal verbiage and was dignified, and almost stately.

It required that the young man who wanted to marry Anna respect her Lutheran faith and never ask her to forsake it or exchange it for something else. It bound him by a solemn covenant to have all the children properly christened by an ordained Lutheran minister, duly instructed in the catechism and confirmed in the Missouri Synod Lutheran Church "as God has instructed in his holy word."

It was probably no great issue with the ardent swain. He knew very little about God, less about the Bible and nothing at all about the Missouri Synod Church. Eighteen months after the wedding when I was born, he made no objection to my being christened. Later my mother told me about it. One of my aunts made my long white christening dress and my mother carried me in her arms almost three miles on a hot day to the Lutheran Church where I was christened by the Reverend Mr. Peterson. The christening certificate is now quite yellow with age. More than fifty years later I went to visit a Lutheran clergyman in a little Arkansas village only to find out that he was the assistant who helped out in the service. It probably took two of them to hold me still and keep me quiet.

I was born in our humble home. There was no hospital anywhere near the area and even if there had been no woman would have gone to it to deliver a child. Many years after the event my grandmother told me about my arrival. When my mother began to feel the pains signifying that her time had come, my father went to get my grandmother who had herself delivered several hundred babes in cabins in the woods. Every woman felt safe if "Aunt Viney" was present during the ordeal. An uncle was dispatched to get Dr. McClellan who was delayed somewhat because his horse had unhooked the stable door and headed for the pasture. Fortunately, with my usual good spirit of cooperation I postponed the happening until the principals were present and we got the signal, "All systems go!"

My mother had prepared a homemade cradle out of an I.

E. Dupont de Nemours powder box which my father had carried home from the mine, and she told me later that I was the loveliest child she had ever seen. She also told the other five the same thing in turn. Nine months after I was born she learned she was again pregnant, and when her second son was born she named him Larsen Rudolph in true Danish fashion as she had named me William Carl in honor of my father and the crown prince of Germany.

Ours must have been a typical home in a mining community. My parents loved each other although I have a faint recollection of my mother weeping as she rocked one of us, because of some misunderstanding which had caused my father to "fly off the handle " and use profanity. Sometimes she shed tears because of her yearning for a sight of the faces of those whom she loved in the community where she was reared, and especially because she was homesick for her father and mother. I wonder now if she missed regular attendance at the Lutheran Church, and if there was a pang in her generous heart because she saw us growing up with no catechetical instruction.

Christmastime must have been especially depressing to her. It was a great season in the German community. For days before there was baking and preparation of all kinds. The house was filled with the pungent odor of spices. There was always a huge tree cut down in the forest and hauled home to be erected in a corner of the living room close to the fireplace. It was strung with popcorn and cranberries for there were no commercial hangings. Christmas brought good feelings and mellowness, helped no little by frequently imbibing homemade wine and brandy brought up from the cellar.

Compared to all this Christmas in a mining village was a drab affair. The decorations consisted of drawings by the children on ruled tablet paper. There was hardly room for a tree but we managed a little one. It was not easy for our parents to select something for us because the company store did not feature a variety. Each child received an orange and a peppermint candy cane. To make it really Christmas there was a little book or a ten cent toy, a jumping-jack or a set of blocks.

The thing that really topped it off was the box that came from down on the farm of our grandfather. It always contained a dressed goose. No one in the German community ate turkey for Christmas. There was smoked sausage, stuffed and prepared by grandfather himself, for he was a sausage maker of wide reputation. When the box was delivered from the railway station we could hardly wait to open it and see the things which had been selected from the farm and included. Our mother laughed and cried in turn as she took the things out and laid them on the oilcloth-covered table.

Perhaps I recall her times of melancholy more than her moments of joy. There must not have been too much time to devote to the luxury of feeling sorry for herself. There was washing to do on Monday while she bent over the grooved board in the big tub, a board well-rubbed with pungent homemade soap. There was ironing to do on Tuesday with the flatirons heating on the cookstove out in the smokehouse. There was always sewing and mending. The garden had to be tended and fruit and vegetables had to be canned in Mason jars, or sometimes dried in the sun. I can recall mother's frequent repetition of the old homely proverb, "Man works from sun to sun, but woman's work is never done." Yet she always found time to show her love for us and when we were hurt we could go to her with full confidence that she would stop whatever she was doing and gather us into her arms.

1. Early Years

"Ketcherside Town"

Contents

It is difficult to describe a mining town in the early part of the twentieth century to those who live in our present urbanized culture. The village in which I was born, Cantwell, was one of a string of towns on the surface of the earth loosely following the vein of lead hundreds of feet below. There were no city limit markers for there were no city limits. Cantwell, Desloge, Flat River, Elvins, Esther, Rivermines, and others were flung down in a heap as if some giant hand had deposited them with no attempt to gather them into orderly units. Six miles from Cantwell, in the other direction than the towns mentioned, lay Bonne Terre, which means "good earth," so called by the French because of the richness of the ore deposits.

Most of the villages were not incorporated. There was no city government and "every man did that which was right in his own sight." Families tended to huddle together in the same village and Cantwell was sometimes called "Ketcherside town" because some dozen or more frame shacks were occupied by members of our clan. The land was known as "company ground" because it was owned by the mining interests out of New York. There was a row of company houses, all built exactly alike, and anyone who rented them had the five dollars per month extracted from his check on payday.

One could build his own house by leasing a piece of ground from the company for ninety-nine years, with a carefully spelled out notation in the lease that the right to all minerals below the surface belonged to the company. The company also retained the right to set up a diamond drill anywhere for the purpose of prospecting for ore. A diamond drill had a bit which was set with diamonds and which, by rotating, could cut through the hardest rock, sending a one-inch core to the surface which could be analyzed in the laboratory to determine the direction in which the underground tunnel for taking out the ore should be directed. When a drill was set up it operated night and day and nearby residents did not sleep soundly until they became adjusted to the jarring noise.

There was a company store in our village where all of the miners traded "on time" as credit was designated. Each family had its own account book, and when the storekeeper assembled your purchases on the counter he entered the amounts on a ticket in your book and gave you a duplicate to take home and keep in the spring clip which hung on the wall by the comb case above the wash pan. Everyone used the same towel and comb, and no one used a toothbrush.

On payday the miners lined up at the store to cash their checks and make a payment on the grocery bill. When such a payment was made each miner received a little striped sack of candy called "a treat." It was rumored that if you paid in full you received a double portion, but I cannot testify as to the truthfulness of the rumor because we never paid in full. The company store created a way of life for many people and made of them economic slaves as long as they existed. The idea that you could "buy now and pay later" was dangerous for families like ours which were always on the brink of poverty. The first thing I did when my father was killed was to take the meager amount of insurance remaining and pay off his obligations. It may have been the first time my mother was completely free from debt.

One of my earliest recollections of my boyhood is that of the saloons and the vice associated with them. The saloons were tough joints. They bore such exotic names as "The Blue Goose" and "Klondike" although the one which stood in full sight of our house was called "The Star." Every payday was characterized by a drunken brawl. Frequently the men staggered outside and we saw them crack the skulls of one another with beer or whiskey bottles, the foaming contents mingling with blood and gore flowing from gaping lacerations.

There were always prostitutes hanging around outside the saloon although no one called them that. The men called them "chippies" while the women called them "painted hussies." I used to look through a crack in the fence and watch them take half-soused men into the woods and while I did not know what it was all about I was aware, from what the adults said about them, that it was not "nice."

I remember two occasions which caused those who were referred to as "decent women" to rejoice. One occurred when a little tiny woman got fed up with the "goings-on" and took an axe-handle and laid in wait for the woman who had solicited her husband. Although the chippy was about twice her size and hard as nails, she "worked her over and beat the tar out of her" as I learned by lying on the floor with my ear glued to the crack under the door. This source of information almost proved my undoing, for one day when the gossip was not especially interesting I fell asleep, and someone threw the door open and flattened me against the wall.

The other time of gladness occurred early on a Christmas morning when the village was awakened with the yell of "Fire!" The Star saloon was aflame. A goodly number of neighbors gathered in front of our gate to watch the welcome sight. Bottles burst like machine-gun fire and bottle caps whined through the air like bullets. The women alternately cried and laughed for joy, hugging one another and saying it was a divine judgment and the greatest gift God could have given on Christmas. The saloon was never rebuilt and the chippies all left except for the two who continued to receive customers after dark at the third house up the street from us, the one next to the chat dump, as the massive tailing-pile composed of crushed rock from underground was called.

Life was not unpleasant for us although we were under stern instructions never to step a foot outside the yard without permission. Every yard had a wire fence around it because the area surrounding the village was "open range." This meant that anyone could turn his cows and hogs out to roam at will. Animals were not fenced in, but fenced out. Each family had its own earmark, which meant that all of its animals had pieces cut out of their ears for identification. One man might say to another, "If you see a sow with a bit on the front side of the right ear and a swallow-fork in the left, please tell me, as it is my hog, and I want to put her up."

Sometimes in the middle of the night a family of razorback hogs would put their snouts under the fence and pry up the wire and creep in under it. They would literally clean out a garden before daybreak. Most of the houses were built up off the ground and set on rock pillars at the corners. This was to avoid damp rot and termites, but it also provided a shady place for the dogs to lie and scratch fleas. One morning our neighbor arose to see that her garden had been devastated during the night. As she looked out of the kitchen window she saw the north end of a southbound lanky sow protruding from under her house. She carefully heated a dishpan of water to the boiling point and poured it on the rear half of the razorback but was wholly unprepared for the cataclysmic result. As the sow departed for fairer regions she knocked the back porch off the house and took with her the underpinning from one corner, leaving the bedroom aslant and the furniture slowly slipping down toward the outside wall. Life in the village was not always drab and unexciting.

Although we could not go outside our yard we could always play with the children on either side "through the fence." There were two girls on one side and a boy and girl on the other. Their mothers "took in washing" and worked hard over the scrub-board every day. We were never allowed to mention their fathers because both men were in "the state pen." One was doing time for murder and the other for stealing stuff from the lead company. This last was not regarded as a crime by anyone except the lead company.

Every day we made mud pies and other articles and played store. We cut "money" out of the pages of a Sears-Roebuck catalog hanging in the toilet, and used bottle-caps for "change." The situation was complicated due to the fact that everyone wanted to be the storekeeper and take in the cash. We settled the question by putting a counter on each side of the fence and the storekeepers sold to each other. As my little sisters began to grow up they always wanted to play house, and wanted their brothers to be the papas and come home with their dinner buckets and kiss the dolls like our father kissed us. It was years later that I realized the neighbor children never wanted to play house. They had no father to come home and kiss them.

As I think back upon my childhood I recall one woman who said to my mother, "All children are different, but Carl's differenter than any youngun' I've ever seed." That was because of my utter fascination with printed words. It became an obsession with me. I carried the mail order catalog around with me and every time someone came who could read, and there were not that many of them, I'd thrust the catalog into their hands, point to a description of an article and ask, "What does that say?" In my innocence, bred of ignorance, I sometimes pointed to something embarrassing, and they would quickly flip the pages over to the farm machinery. I soon learned which pages were off limits although I did not then know why they were.

I had to do the buying at the company store by the time I was five because my mother could not read English. When I bought something, if there was no other customer in the store, I'd ask Mr. Watson to read the labels on the cans and boxes. He not only did so but taught me to read on Clabber Girl baking powder cans, Arm and Hammer bicarbonate of soda boxes, and Old Dutch Cleanser and Bon Ami containers. He saved reading material which was undeliverable in the little post office, and apparently told others about me because they brought their Horatio Alger books to pass along to me. If there were too many to carry home with the groceries I'd leave the groceries at the store and take the books home first. I knew my mother would make me go back after the groceries but might not let me go back for the books.

One of the proudest days of my life was the one on which I started to school in the little two-room village educational plant. The folk had managed to save and secure my first pair of new store-bought knickerbockers, as knee-length pants were called. My blouse, as boys' shirts with a puckering string at the waist were then called, was home-made. So was my underwear which bore the bold label across the seat, "Gold Medal Flour—Eventually, Why Not Now?" I took my lunchbox in one hand, and my slate and Elson-Runkel first reader in the other and marched off bravely. I stopped at the corner and looked back. Mother was standing in the door. The early morning September sunshine bathed her presence. She was drying her tears with her apron. She knew life would never be the same. And she was right!

1. Early Years

Uncle L. E. and the Sand-Hillers

Contents

The great change in our lives, one which was destined eventually to affect almost the entire Ketcherside clan, actually began with one man. My father's brother, Lewis, always called by his initials L. E., was very close to him. He was less than two years younger, and in their boyhood days they had been inseparable. My uncle was married the year that I was born. Even before he was married he had begun to sense a yearning deep inside himself for some relationship with the power to provide hope and assurance by enabling him to overcome tendencies and temptations which troubled his sensitive soul. The new responsibility as a very young husband drove him to talk to my father about his feelings. My father laughed in his face and made crude jokes about it.

The Baptist Church was the only one in our village. In the period between revivals it was always in the doldrums, but twice per year, in the spring and autumn, a fire-eating preacher was imported and all of the members were infused with new life and got on a spiritual high. Backsliders wept over their lapses. Alcoholics vowed to renounce liquor. Sinners were exhorted to flee from the wrath to come. The night L. E. went to the tent which had been erected on a lot adjacent to "the church," the preacher happened to be a rough-looking specimen from the backwoods, who chewed tobacco and murdered the King's English. But he knew the Bible!

As he reeled off verse after verse from memory, L. E. was fascinated, and then captivated by the fact that God had spoken, and that we had access to His words, written down in plain English so every man could read them for himself. It was the first time in his life he had ever known what the Bible really was. That night, sitting in an audience of perspiring villagers, under a hot canvas, he resolved that, if God spared him, he would learn the divine will for his life.

He did not sleep that night, but lay awake thinking, meditating and praying. The next day underground he went about his tasks mechanically, and as soon as the whistle blew he ascended on the cage, and left the changing-room to go straight to the home where the revivalist was staying. Years afterward, when we worked together very closely, he told me all about it more than once, and always with the smile for which he was noted. He told the preacher he had already prayed all night and day. The preacher asked him what he felt and he said that he felt like he wanted to do what Jesus said and do it at once. After about an hour, the backwoods evangelist said it wasn't much of an experience, as experiences generally went, but he reckoned it would have to do. That night the Baptists voted to accept his experience and qualify him for baptism. The community was dumbfounded. To convert a Ketcherside was like the bringing of Saul of Tarsus to bay. And at the end of the revival the converts were all baptized in the swimming-hole in the small river. L. E. went straight home, changed into dry clothing and started in on the Bible.

Two weeks later he announced to the local Baptist preacher that he wanted to preach the gospel he had obeyed. At a district meeting of Baptist preachers it was agreed that he was an unlikely candidate, but there was no way of discouraging him short of shooting him. It was decided that, since he was too poor to go away to college, and did not have the entrance requirements anyway, not having finished the fifth-reader, he should study for a year at home, at the end of which time he would stand for examination before three ordained Baptist ministers, and if he met their approbation he would be licensed as a supply preacher for the unstaffed rural churches.

During that year L. E. became a real problem to all of his friends and relatives. Some of his former cronies were convinced that he was "touched in the head." He gave up going to shooting-matches, which gave the other contestants a chance to win. He wouldn't play cards. He quit drinking beer. My father said he was making "a damned nuisance" out of himself and if he didn't quit spouting the Bible at everyone he met he would lose the only worthwhile friends he ever had and end up with no one to talk to but a bunch of sickly, white-livered Christians. My father considered this a fate to which death should be readily preferred.

At the end of the year L. E. put on the suit he had worn at his wedding, the only dress-up clothing he owned, and met with the Baptist tribunal. They questioned him for three hours and it soon became apparent that he knew far more about the Bible than did his questioners. For every query his reply was "The Bible says." When one of the preachers said about one quotation, "I don't remember ever seeing that in the Bible," he picked up the man's book from the table and read it to him. At the end of the examination his questioners retired to a room for consultation. They left L. E. sitting at the table awaiting their decision about his future course.

When they returned the spokesman said, "We cannot approve of you to do supply work or recommend you to the churches. In fact, we are convinced you would kill every Baptist Church in the district if you advanced the ideas you have set forth today. You are not a Baptist at all but a Sand-hiller." L. E. had never heard of a Sand-hiller, so he asked what one was. The reply was unhesitating. "A Sand-hiller is a special brand of Campbellite, and the worst enemy the church has, and you sound just like one." The answer did not mean much to L. E. He did not know what a Campbellite was either, but he left the place with a firm resolution to find out.

The following Tuesday he was assigned a new man to help carry the tripod and set up the drill which rested on it, and with which holes were drilled in the face of the underground wall for tamping in explosives. While they were eating lunch from their dinner-pails at noon, L. E. said to the man, "Did you ever hear of a religious bunch called Sand-hillers?" "I sure have," answered the man, "I'm one of them myself." He then proceeded to tell him this was a nickname given to them by the Baptists because they had originated down in the sand-hills about thirty miles south, and some of them had moved into the mining area to find work. He arranged for L. E. to meet a merchant who was an elder of the Church of Christ, and the first evening they talked together they continued their speech until midnight. L. E. walked the three miles to his home and arose early to work all day in the mines.

He was hungry for the word, and began to attend the meetings in Flat River, a five-mile round trip each time. There was no preacher but anyone of the men in the congregation could teach, exhort and admonish. Sometimes as many as three would take turns speaking briefly. They convinced L. E. that one could be just a Christian and a Christian only. He became convinced of their plea to be simply the church mentioned in the scriptures. But when he expressed a desire to be affiliated with the little group a lengthy interrogation ensued, led by some who insisted he would have to be baptized again. He resisted on the basis that he had obeyed the Lord. Most of the members were ready to accept him, but two or three became very belligerent, and to avoid further friction he finally consented to be immersed. In later years he always said, "I was baptized twice. The first time was to obey Jesus Christ, the second time to placate and appease the Church of Christ."

Almost single-handedly he changed the village of Cantwell.

He visited every house in town, including the one occupied by the saloon-keeper and his fashionable wife. He invited everyone to gather in his front yard each evening to hear the Bible explained. It was somewhere to go and relieve the tedium and the people came. Many of them carried hickory splint-bottom chairs on which to sit. Others sat on the ground or leaned on the picket fence. With a kerosene lantern hanging on the porch post and casting its sickly gleam upon the printed page, while moths and other insects flitted about, L. E. read and expounded. He was one with his audience. Many of them had known him from the time he was a lad. He went down into the mines with them everyday. He had helped them all with any task that was too great for them. Now he shared with them every night what he learned during the day.

When his shift underground was finished he took time to talk with men and women about their souls before he slept. He baptized his brothers and their wives. He baptized his two sisters. The day he baptized "Blind Emmy," his cousin who had been born sightless, the whole community walked down to the creek for the occasion. When the poor blind woman was brought up from the water she raised her hands toward heaven and began to shout for joy. Caught up in the emotional excitement of the moment they led her up the road toward the village, shouting as she went. Some tried to quiet her, thinking she was "going out of her mind." But it was as if she had not heard them. Other women began to weep, and men began to cry out to God to have mercy upon them. Years later, when I led "Blind Emmy" from door to door to sell "products" she told me that she saw Jesus "as plain as day." I wondered how one who had never seen the form of a man and had never even seen her own face in a mirror, could see Jesus. But I didn't say anything or ask any questions. I am glad now I did not.

An electrifying current swept over the community with the exception of one home— ours! Being a Lutheran, my mother could not attend the studies in the front-yard up the street. She would like to have gone because she loved people and the socialization before and after the study would have meant a lot to her. Women used such occasions to trade seeds for flowers that others admired, or to tell what they were eating out of their gardens, and all of this would have meant much to mother. But it would also have caused her to "go back on her raising" and she couldn't do that.

When my father went and sat outside the circle of light across the dusty street, he returned home aggravated and angry. He told my mother that his favorite brother had somehow allowed bats to occupy his belfry and to observe it was a crying shame that an otherwise good man would permit himself to be ruined by religion and waste time in which he could be doing something useful for people, by standing on his front porch talking like an idiot.

Years later when we were all one in Christ, mother told me that she knew even then that L. E. was having an effect on my father. He became too angry and fumed around too much. Moreover, he poured a pipe full of tobacco out of the Bull Durham sack, lighted it, took one draw on it, and then absent-mindedly knocked it out against the heel of his hand. That had never happened before. My father became short-tempered and snapped at my mother when she spoke to him. He had never done that before either. The Spirit was moving in for the kill!

1. Early Years

The Day My Father Was Baptized

Contents

It was early evening and the sun was only beginning to slant toward the west when my father came out of our little house to sit down on the top step and smoke his pipe. My brother and I sat down on the bottom step on opposite sides so each of us could lean against his legs. This was almost a ritual. Miners who worked the day shift always ate an early supper and then sat out in the front yard to relax and try to cool off before time to go to bed and get some rest as a preparation for going underground the next morning. In the curious jargon of the miners, who had their own word for everything, this was called "hog-eying" but I do not know why.

I only recall that my brother and I were always glad when our father came out to "hog-eye" and it made us feel proud to sit down and lean against him. Miners did not tell people they loved them, but our father did not need to do that. It would have seemed a little silly to say something you already knew. While we were sitting there, not saying anything, but just glad to be together, our uncle L. E. came by and stopped at the front gate. We all liked him a lot! He never became angry and he knew how to treat folks. He even talked to us boys as if we were grown-up men. That is why we felt kind of sad inside that he had "gone nuts over religion" and started "going to church every time someone jerked the bell-rope" as our father said.

We knew he was on his way to another meeting in Flat River and that he would climb the huge chat dump and cross the high railroad trestle which had been haunted ever since a miner slipped from it one night and was killed when he landed on the rocks below. Some of our neighbors heard his ghost shriek as it was falling again on dark nights. Uncle L. E. leaned on the gate and talked a little about veins and stopes and levels and other underground stuff, and then said, "Well, I'd better be shoving off. I dare you to come and go along with me."

The two of us on the bottom step looked at each other and grinned. We knew what our father would say even though we hated to see him cut our favorite uncle down. We couldn't believe what happened. Our father knocked his pipe out against the edge of the top step. He got up and we thought maybe he was going to fight our uncle. But he said, "I never took a dare in my life, and by God, I don't intend to take one now. Wait till I get my hat." We watched the two of them walk off together toward the chat dump and we were hurt and angry. We felt betrayed and sold out. Tears came to my eyes. I hated religion which broke up good times that were quiet and peaceful and which took a father away from his boys.

The next evening we were just playing around in the yard waiting for our father to come out and "hog-eye" so we could sit beside him and lean against him. But he didn't come out very soon and when he did he had his hat on. We watched with foreboding as L. E. came again. We walked to the gate with our father. He patted both of us on the head. We could feel the roughness of his palm with the hard callouses from the pick and shovel. I watched until the two of them climbed the chat dump where they were momentarily silhouetted against the evening sky and then they disappeared from sight. I ran blubbering to the backyard. I jerked a bean-pole out of the garden and began to savagely beat the rear wall of the summer-kitchen. The neighbor kids were on their knees looking through the fence. One of them yelled, "Whatcha doin'?" I acted as if I did not hear. I wanted to die.

It was about a week later, and we were sitting at the supper table when my father said to my mother, "Annie, I am going to be baptized." My mother did not become angry. She spoke softly but firmly, "I knew you would be, but please do not ask me to go and see it. And don't ever ask me to change from what I grew up in. Never!" My father said, "I'll take the boys to see it." Mother replied, "I can't keep you from doing that, but don't forget you signed your word to rear them in the Lutheran Church, and please remember what you've said about this religion that L. E. has talked you into."

It was about a mile over to the company pond and when we got there on Sunday afternoon a crowd of strange people had already gathered and were waiting. They stood around talking until one of the men took out his watch, looked at it, and then held up his hand to get attention. He began to speak about how my father had repented of his sins. I didn't like that because I did not know my father had any sins. The man continued that he had made the good confession and was going to be buried in baptism. I didn't like the word "buried" either, because when people were buried you didn't see them again. The crowd began to sing a song called "Happy Day" and my father walked out into the water with a man. When they got to the right place they stopped, the man raised his hand and said something and then buried my father out of sight. It was years later I realized that I never again saw the father who was buried.

All of the Cantwell people who had gone to the pond walked back with us, and they all talked to my father whose wet clothes clung to him as he walked. We turned in at our gate and my father went in and changed into a dry outfit. When he came into our other room, he lifted the lid on the cookstove and threw his pipe into the glowing embers. He threw his plug of chewing tobacco and his sack of chewing tobacco and his sack of Bull Durham into the trash sack by the woodbox. One of his nephews dropped by and my father gave him his fiddle together with an extra supply of resin for the bow. "I'll not be needing it again," he said. Two days later when he gave away his treasured Marlin shotgun, my mother became convinced he had lost his mind.

On Monday evening my brother and I were out in the yard again. We did not know if our father would come out or not. Our fears were relieved, for he came and sat down on the top step. We sat down on the lower one as usual. He did not have his pipe but he had a book which L. E. had given him. "Boys," he said, "this is a Bible and it is the word of God. God lives up in heaven and he loves us, and because he does, he gave us this book to tell us how he wants us to live. I don't know much about it yet but I intend to learn what's in it, and I want you to know also. I'm going to read it out loud and that way we will all learn."

We leaned against him and listened as he read. He took it slowly, like one treading unfamiliar ground and that was good. After awhile he closed the book and said, "That's enough for this evening." He began to ask us simple questions about what he had read and when we knew an answer he patted us on the head and made us feel good. I knew then that my fears had been premature. I still had my father and this was the best way to "hog-eye" in the world, with someone you loved reading to you. I wished that our mother could share with us but she couldn't. She said she didn't trust the Bible written in English, and she wished we could understand it in German like Herr Luther had fixed it up. When she talked about other men she called them "Mister" but she always spoke of her favorite hero as "Herr Luther."

Almost every day L. E. stopped by and he and my father talked about the Bible and turned to it to read things they had found in it. My brother was too young to care, but I lay on the grass between them when they brought their chairs out under the cherry tree and listened to every word. They were always explaining to one another what they thought something meant and you could tell they loved it. I loved it too, although I didn't know all it was saying. And every day our father read to us. God came to mean about everything to us and nothing else really mattered.

L. E. and my father wanted to start a church in our village. They said it was too far for everyone to walk to Flat River. They decided to start meeting in a grove of trees, and they made seats which were just planks laid across two-by-fours. The two men went to every house and invited everyone to come for the first Sunday. I had never really been to a church because my father had promised before I was born that I would be raised in the Lutheran church. But now he said to my mother, "I'd like to take the boys with me when Sunday rolls around." We added our pleas and mother said, "All right, go on. It isn't really a church anyhow when a bunch of people meet in the woods."

It was hot and dry and dusty when Sunday morning came, but when we got to the grove it was cool in the shade. The Ketchersides whom L. E. had baptized were all there. Some others he had baptized were there also. The songbooks which had been loaned by Flat River were passed out to the grown folks, but L. E. said, "Give the boys books also." It made us feel big to have our own books with the name Voices for Jesus on the front. A man had come from Flat River with the books to lead the singing and when he had finished, my father read a chapter and then prayed. L. E. gave a little talk, my father following by telling about a verse he had read and what he thought God was saying in it.

An old man got up to "wait on the table" but he started to cry and couldn't say anything, so L. E. got up and said the tears were nothing to be ashamed of for the old man had been baptized when he was a boy but had not seen the table of the Lord set for years. He called on my aunt to give thanks and she prayed better than any of them. Later, my father told me it was because she was in practice, that she had prayed every day for him for ten years. Before we finished we all got up and walked to the table and put money on the white cloth. My brother and I marched up with the others and put the pennies on the table which our father had passed on to us. I looked longingly at mine lying there by the dimes and the one quarter. I wished I could have kept it and gone with it to the company store but there was no way I could do it.

After everyone had shaken hands and hugged one another and cried and laughed we all went home with grandfather and grandmother. My father let us walk with them while he went home to help our mother carry the baby. I heard one of the men say that my grandfather was in "hog heaven" because so much company was going to his place. He loved company. While the women were busy in the kitchen the men sat out on the front porch which was shaded by a clematis vine filled with flowers. They talked about getting a place to meet before the rains set in. L. E. was an excellent carpenter and he suggested buying an old saloon building, cutting it in two, and moving it to a lot in the village and joining it together again. No one had ever seen this done, but he was convincing. They agreed to borrow the hundred dollars for purchase of the saloon. L. E. said that we would give those who came a different sort of drink than they had ever been served across the bar.

1. Early Years

Life In Our First Meetinghouse

Contents

It makes a difference when a congregation gets a meetinghouse of its own. There are some things about it that are good, and there are others that are not. The plan to purchase the old saloon building and move it to a new location worked like a charm. Even though it was before the days of chain saws, the men cut it in two and then fitted it back together on the lot which was a few hundred feet from the location of the Baptist building. To make it look more like a "church building," a bell-tower was erected on the front which never housed a bell. It was a luxury which could not be afforded.

The very first meeting in the new location was noticeably different. It was more formal and "churchy." We had been meeting in the grove on good days, and in the little living-room in our grandfather's home on cold and rainy days. The grove was the best place. Sometimes while we were singing grandfather's favorite song, "My latest sun is sinking fast, my race is nearly run," you could look up at the fleecy white clouds and imagine that they were "the angel band" ready to bear you away on their snowy wings to your immortal home. Occasionally, one of the dogs would chase a squirrel right down among the benches and up a hickory tree behind the Lord's Table. There is only one other thing on earth that can equal a dog in enlivening an open air meeting, and that is a three foot blacksnake.

Even on bad days it always was interesting. The children sat on the old rag carpet which "Aunt Peggy" had made on a loom. If they got tired they could stretch out and take a nap and no one cared. Aunt Peggy was a half-Cherokee Indian who had befriended our grandmother when she was an orphan girl and later on came to live with my grandparents. The deep wrinkles in her brown face bore mute testimony to a life of toil and privation. Aunt Peggy didn't "go to church" but when the church came to her on rainy days she did not budge from her splint-bottom chair in front of the fireplace. She smoked a little clay pipe "during meeting" the same as at any other time, and it was interesting to see her make a "V" out of her fingers and put them to her mouth and spit. She never missed, and if a stray fly was unfortunate enough to walk into range along the hearth, she neatly picked him off with an amber jet, regardless of what the worshipers around her were doing at the moment. I remember that during prayer we children always kept one eye closed for God's sake, and the other one open and focused on Aunt Peggy who seemed almost as old and even more interesting to us than God at the time.

When we moved into the "church building" we children felt "boxed in" and things might have seemed very dry if it had not been for our grandfather who sometimes enlivened the scene because he was so deadly serious about everything that pertained to God. He had been crippled by a premature blast underground which had injured his spine when rocks rained down upon him, and although he surprised the company doctors after they had predicted his death, he was doomed to walk quite stooped and bent over the remainder of his life. The company gave him token employment in the warehouse where one of his tasks was to reduce the rodent population. On Wednesday he moved sacks of cattle feed and boxes of other commodities all day long and killed whatever rats he could with a long stick.

The old man was dog-tired when he came to meeting and almost as soon as he sat down in the corner of the front seat he fell into a deep sleep. It was while our uncle L. E. was on the platform that grandfather suddenly jumped to his feet and began poking under the seats and flailing about with his cane while shouting, "Get him! Get him! There he goes! Hit him! Hit him!" Uncle L. E. called out to him but he did not hear. He was having a "rat-killing" good time in his sleep and took a healthy swipe at our bare feet which we hastily drew up in the seat. After my father had captured him and shaken him back to the world of reality and sat him down in his accustomed place, the proceedings seemed quite dull by comparison and we watched him anxiously, hoping he would fall asleep again. But he did not and the fun was over for that night.

Even when he was awake our grandfather often got things gloriously mixed up or said them backwards. It was the idea of L. E. that the whole congregation should be taught the whole word, and to achieve this objective he would read and explain a chapter while the audience followed along with open Bibles. Of course our grandfather could not read, but he always listened intently with his hand cupped behind his ear. Once when the subject matter was Judges 15, which records how Samson slew a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, L. E. finished the text and asked that the books be closed while he questioned the hearers. When he got to my grandfather, he asked, "Pap, can you tell me how Samson slew the thousand men?" The old man was happy that he knew the answer. "He hit 'em over the ass with a jawbone, son, yes sir, that's the way he killed the whole passel of 'em," was the reply.

I could write all day and not exhaust the fascinating things that took place in this little gathering of humble and sincere people, but I must not tarry that long. Even the lives of us children were changed by the religious emphasis which now involved us seven days a week. We turned from playing house or store to "playing church." Each morning we saved the left-over biscuits which were generally thrown over the fence to the pig, and these, together with a glass of water formed the emblems of our memorial service. The grape arbor was our "church house" and the congregation consisted of my younger brother and sister, two dolls (one of which was losing sawdust from a gaping wound in the lower abdomen), and myself. Our pup came to the first service, lying on the ground with his head between his paws, and seemingly enjoying it. But after we baptized him in the galvanized tub under the rain spout he forsook the church and returned to the world. Our father told us not to feel badly about it because the Bible said, "Without are dogs."

Our meetings were held every thirty minutes and began with snatches of songs sung from imaginary books and led by my little brother. Sometimes he forgot the words and would have to improvise but that did not matter. We made a joyful noise unto the Lord. I was the preacher and I laid it on loud and heavy with such phrases as I could recall, and when I ran out of the remembered phrases, pounding the box in front of me and exhorting the two dolls to repent and be baptized. Regardless of their repentance, they were baptized several times daily, while we stood around the tub and sang, "O happy day that fixed my choice." The neighbor children next door watched through the fence, feeling left out and not knowing what we were doing. With their father in the "state pen" they had never seen a religious gathering.

The acquisition of "our own place of worship" as folks phrased it, made it possible for us to have "protracted meetings," and start seriously to separate the chaff from the grain in the village, so that the chaff could be burned with unquenchable fire, while we stood by and watched from the golden portals. The first "evangelist" I ever heard was Daniel Sommer. He was booked for a meeting at Flat River and the brethren there "loaned him" to Cantwell to help our little group "get started off on the right foot." He was an imposing figure, sixty-five years old, and priding himself upon his physical strength and endurance. He wore a knee-length double-breasted alpaca clerical-style coat, and when he took his stand on the platform he thrust his right foot forward and placed his hand in the front of his coat in a Napoleonic pose and his voice boomed out with authority.

Although I was but a mere lad when I first heard him I can recall lying on the grass under the shade of a tree and listening to him as he talked to men during the daytime. He felt he had saved the church from complete apostasy by reading his composition "An Address and Declaration" at Sand Creek, a rural congregation near Windsor, Illinois. In it he called for withdrawal from those who endorsed and condoned the church holding festivals to raise money, select choirs to do the singing, man-made societies for missionary work, and the one-man imported preacher-pastor system. He could quote from memory his closing sentence, "If they do not turn away from such abominations, we can not and will not regard them as brethren."

The church had split before I came along and instrumental music had received the blame since it was visible to the eye. Now, Brother Sommer was preparing to "arraign the new digressives" on a hundred items. The "new digressives" were those who opposed instrumental music and missionary societies but who were "aping the sects" by creating a salaried ministry, or hireling pastor system. Brother Sommer envisioned the "so-called Christian colleges" as posing the greatest threat to the simple faith. He referred to them as "preacher factories" and warned that they would some day control the church through their alumni groups. One of his favorite words was "arraign" and he seldom finished an article in opposition to someone without formally "arraigning" him for a long list of items.

I suspect it gave us an ego trip to have someone come from as far away as Indiana to speak for us. In a day when a lot of people had never even been to the county seat, Indiana seemed as far away as the North Pole. When you added to it the fact that the speaker had been to college and was the author of several books as well as being an editor of a religious journal, it was enough to make your head swim. Even the Baptists couldn't top that so they stayed away from our meetings as we did from theirs. They stayed away because they couldn't stand the truth; we stayed away because we couldn't stand to hear error advocated.

The second preacher who came was William Grant Roberts. He had studied to be a debater and had gained a reputation as a "bold challenger of the sects" and as being "rough on rats." Sectarians and rats were in the same category. In every public discourse, Brother Roberts debated with an imaginary adversary, carrying both sides of the controversy. He never lost such a discussion. Secure in the truth and standing firm on the rock he constantly rebuked denominational pastors who were not present for "spewing out their flopdoodle gush" as he referred to false doctrine.

He specialized in debating Mormons and Baptists, but took on anyone, sometimes having to study up to see what some group believed after having signed a proposition. If anyone asked him if he was hesitant about mixing with a formidable opponent, he assured them he would "tack his hide on the barn door with the bloody side out." His debate in Flat River with a Methodist preacher by the name of Mothershead was characterized by such sharpness and sarcasm, that a complete generation had to pass before the hostility was alleviated. We won the debate and lost the world!

1. Early Years

Critical Times During World War I

Contents

The little congregation made its greatest progress under the efforts of the men who constituted it. No other argument for the power of the gospel was as strong as that of the lives of men who had been completely transformed. Rude miners, listening to a man imported from afar to convert them, had little hope of ever becoming like such a well-dressed professional who harangued them nightly, but they could identify with those who daily descended into the shaft on the same cage with them. So effective did L. E. become that when he was assigned a new partner on his drill the rest of the miners said, "Well there goes another future member of the Campbellites." And they were more often correct than not.

L. E. and my father were not content to keep the gospel in our village. They thought it should be sounded out and not sounded in. They lived for the study of the Word and wherever they could band together a few saints in some backwoods schoolhouse they "set them to keeping house for the Lord." On Sunday one of them would go and instruct the people and I can recall that, as a lad of less than seven years, I walked six miles with my father to a schoolhouse out in the timber, and I walked back home again in the hot afternoon sun. I was so tired I fell asleep on the floor just inside the front door and never knew who transferred me to the pallet on which we children slept in the summertime.

It appeared that God was smiling upon the little group when catastrophe struck for us, and the whole course of life was suddenly and rudely changed. We had moved out of the shack in which I was born, into a four-room house closer to the company store. My father, in a moment of reckless abandon, had made an offer of six hundred dollars for the house, and his bid was accepted. My mother was unquestionably proud of it. She moved in, with the fond hope of sometime purchasing a Congoleum floor covering for our living-room, and by dint of saving and hoarding nickels and dimes she was able to accumulate the six dollars required in a few months. When the rug was unrolled, smelling new and fresh like linseed oil, we were not allowed to walk across it, but had to step carefully around and walk on that portion of the floor which was not covered.

My father had always been troubled with a cough. Sometimes at night he would have to get up and sit in a chair, but no one thought much about it for all of the miners, with few exceptions, coughed hard and long. But when my father could no longer get his rest, regardless of the shift he worked, my mother persuaded him to go see Dr. McClellan. He was reluctant to do so, thinking it was both foolish and an unnecessary expense. But he finally consented to go and when he returned home we knew something was seriously wrong. Our mother went about her work crying, and we could hear her talk to my father about "making a move." Years later I learned that our family physician had diagnosed "Miner's consumption," since no one used "silicosis" in those days. My father was told that his only chance to survive was to get out of mines and go to a colder climate.

It must have been a frightening experience since there were now six children and one of them a babe in arms. Somehow they broke the news to us and it seemed incredible. My father had written to the *Apostolic Review, edited by Daniel Sommer, and had stated in its columns the need to make a change. He expressed a desire to locate where there was a "loyal congregation" in which he could assist by taking his turn in teaching and doing personal work. He received a reply from Marshalltown, Iowa and after several letters were exchanged it was decided we should go there. The congregation offered to help my father find a job and a house in which to live.

Only one who lived in a tightly-knit village at the beginning of the twentieth century can understand the unforgettable shock created when a family was forced to leave for another area. In our present mobile society it is absolutely impossible to portray.

For days before we left, relatives and friends gathered to help pack and weep, and generally get in the way. The women clung to our mother and tears flowed freely as they wailed and expressed the thought they would never meet again.

Mother took all six of us on the train to see her immediate family and our grandfather Hansen met us at McBride's Station with the big wagon drawn by a span of skittish mules. It was great fun sitting on the old quilt placed over the bed of straw in the back and riding the six miles to the farm. Our grandmother, who was very heavy, came waddling out of the house, speaking German with such rapidity that even our mother could not keep up. She had cooked every Danish and German recipe she had ever known and we ate to repletion. I drew the biscuit with the fly in it. There were no screens for the doors and windows and I never recall eating at that grandmother's home without having a fly in one of the biscuits.

All the folk from the transplanted old world colony came to bid us farewell. My mother was always one of their favorites. Grandfather, who was a great wine maker, freely handed around samples of his handiwork and as the night wore on and tongues became more lubricated it sounded like a wedding celebration in a Bavarian bierstube. The next day we left, but as we looked back we could see all the members of the family standing on the front porch and waving.

When we left the village of Cantwell it was as if someone had died. We went on the local train to Saint Louis where we changed to the Wabash line at Union Station. I had never seen such a throng as filled this great structure and how our parents managed to get six wide-eyed children through the shoving mob I shall never know. As we passed through the great midway, a newsboy was standing at the top of the stairs hawking his papers. I have never forgotten the words he was yelling, "Saint Louis Globe-Democrat, telling of the allies' great victory in France!" The British troops under Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig had made a breakthrough.

I must spare you further details of the journey, vivid as they are to me. One of the leaders, S. M. Brees, met us at the Marshalltown station in a huge Velie touring car and took us to the home of another elder, Alexander Campbell Blake, with whose family we were to lodge until our furniture arrived by train and could be unpacked. The people were all good to us, but we were out of place, like strangers in a strange land. Even the polite formality seemed cold to us. We were hill-folk, villagers and country people, wholly unsuited to a city existence in the north. We were glad when we could move into the humble place we had rented on the outskirts of the city.

There were some things we had never had before, such as electric lights, running water in the house, and a bathroom. At first it seemed awkward and inappropriate to have "a privy" inside the same house in which you lived, but we soon became accustomed to it and were especially thankful for it on days when the rain came down in torrents or an Iowa blizzard swept across the land. I suspect that my parents sensed from the start that it was an untimely move, but it was too late to do anything about it then. We were broke, and we suffered as only the poor can suffer during wartime.

Our father secured employment scraping or fleshing hides at the H. Willard Son and Company tannery. It was a dirty, stinking job and his cough was intensified by the dampness of the place and the vats in which he had to labor. Crippled though he was, he took a job with a moving and storage firm and stuck with it through a cold winter. We could barely make ends meet. The wartime economy had driven sugar up to the incredible level of twenty-five cents per pound. Flour was rationed and government stamps issued for other commodities. And, right in the midst of our other woes, the influenza pandemic struck us all down. Each day the paper told us of hundreds of deaths. In many areas there was no one strong enough to dig graves and the corpses accumulated. We were sure that some of us would die but we survived, although we were so weak and anemic we could hardly stand.

Through it all we never failed to study the Word daily and to cling to our faith in God as our only hope. My father attended every meeting of the saints, taking the two of us boys with him when we were able to walk the long distance on the crunchy snow. There was never a meeting that prayers were not offered for the war to cease and our men to return home. On every side people could be heard referring to the Kaiser as "the antichrist." It was freely predicted that these were the last days and that World War I was the battle of Armageddon. It was believed that the conflict would be terminated with the coming of Jesus. I shall never forget the celebration of the signing of the Armistice on November 11, 1918, four years, three months and fourteen days after Austria-Hungary began it all by a declaration of war upon Serbia. In those four years there were a total of 37,494,186 casualties, men killed, wounded and missing.

I was ten years old when it ended, and already it had been decided we could not make it in the city. For a year we had survived on an unvarying diet of pork neckbones and potatoes, with only an occasional dish of kraut to relieve the monotony. It was all we could afford. We would have to admit defeat and go to a smaller town.

It was not all a loss, for in Marshalltown I was introduced to the first Carnegie Library I had ever seen. I read a book per day and sometimes more. A free library opened up for me a great new world in which I stuffed my mind like a hungry urchin would his stomach at a picnic.

We moved to Gilman City, a little north Missouri town, where the only dwelling we could rent was an abandoned railroad section house. When we moved in, the weeds were higher than the windows and our first task was to clean the debris and trash out of the house and cut the high growth in the yard. The place never really became fit for human habitation and was so close to the railway tracks that the trains at night sounded as if they were coming through the side of the building. The house was infested with rats and the yard with snakes. The job my father expected did not materialize and the help we received from congregations which he was invited to visit on the weekends was not sufficient to sustain us.

Once again, we took up our trek, seeking for a solution to the rugged problem of life. This time we settled in Chillicothe, Missouri. There are two things which stand out in my mind. One is the gathering of coal which fell off railroad cars as they swayed along the tracks. Our success meant the difference between being cold or warm in the old rattletrap house. We did not have the money for fuel. Another, is the fact that the congregation, which was in trouble when we went, divided soon afterwards. A little group of us met in an old upstairs room above a store. Division brought sadness and disillusionment. A number of people simply dropped out.

1. Early Years

Meetin' House Religion

Contents

It has long been a thesis of mine that those who are not formally educated tend to preserve the wisdom gained by experience in easily-remembered proverbs. When any situation arises which demands comment, one of these capsules can be prescribed, and it will quickly put life into proper perspective. Our mother, having grown up in an immigrant colony, had a "saying" for every behavioral problem. She even made us clean up food on our plates by quoting, "Willful waste makes woeful want."

Sometimes her proverbs were contradictory, a fact which did not trouble her in the least. If someone we knew moved around from pillar to post and did not hold a job she was ready with "A rolling stone gathers no moss." But if another was too content to toil away interminably at the same ill-paying task she nailed him with, "A setting hen grows no feathers." In spite of our poverty and the difficulty of survival she maintained our morale and boosted her own hope by constant repetition of the old cliche, "It's a long road that has no turn in it." We had been on the road of life going from bad to worse long enough. So a slight bend in the road came in sight.

Our father, who had tried everything that was honest to eke out a living in Chillicothe, including becoming a "Watkin's man," selling household products, had meanwhile been helping rural and village congregations everywhere within range. He received a letter from Pike County, Illinois, asking him to come and conduct a couple of brief meetings and, imbued with a desire to preach the gospel, he went, after arranging with a good storekeeper to supply our needs "on time." We received enthusiastic letters from him. The meetings were going well. He was baptizing a number of people. He wanted us to see the area.

That is how we happened to move into the rural area in Illinois, called Old Pearl, where I was privileged to attend a one-room country school for a few months. It must have been a growing settlement at one time, but when the railroad went through almost three miles away, a new Pearl sprang up on the Illinois River, and the old one was stopped "dead in its tracks." We bought a ten acre orchard and our place was in full view of the schoolhouse and the "church building." The two of them stood side by side. In every direction, along roads which were dusty in dry weather and "shoemouth deep" in rainy weather, stretched larger farms. The pastures were watered by gently-flowing creeks and the timbered portions were the shelters for every kind of native wild animals.

It was evident, from the very outset, that we were "back home" again. The friendly, helpful and humble people were our kind of folk. In an earlier day, this broad sweep of prairie leading toward the steep bluffs which stood like a frowning fortress above the Illinois River bottom-land, had been inhabited by sturdy Anglo-Saxons with names like Willard, Jackson, Johnson and Calvin, and others betokening the trades of original ancestors, such as Miller, Wheeler, Draper and Waggoner. Generally hard-working, frugal and neighborly they received us with open arms. At the very outset, they had a homemade ice cream party for us to which they brought not only well-filled freezers, but all kinds of food staples— sugar, flour, home-canned vegetables and fruits, smokehouse hams and bacon. We had never seen such a supply of food, and when they all left our mother cried unashamedly, while the rest of us stood and looked at the huge stockpile while still shivering from the ice cream with which they had regaled us.

Every school district in the area had a "Church of Christ." A few congregations met in the local schoolhouse, but most of them had erected plain structures in which to meet. Older preachers like "Uncle Henry Maynard" and "Uncle George Williams" had taken the plea that one could be a "Christian only" into the region round about, until there was a group of saints meeting about every three to five miles in every direction. Many of the people did not know there was any other kind of "a church." They supposed that all who were not unbelievers "spoke where the Bible spoke and remained silent where the Bible was silent." There was no apparent rivalry. When one congregation had a "big meeting" all attended it and the house was filled to overflowing, many of the men having to remain out in the yard and listen to the message through the open windows.

No congregation had a "hired preacher." The term "local minister" was not in their vocabulary. The "one-man imported pastor system" was regarded as an innovation. It was a departure from the simplicity of the faith. It was not according to the ancient order. Each congregation had elders and no one was appointed to this function who was not "apt to teach." These men were not ambitious for power or glory. They shared the public edification with any man who was gifted at all. Each Lord's day, as Sunday was invariably designated, after the study of the lesson, one of the elders would say, "Is there any brother who has a word of exhortation? If so, an opportunity will now be given for it." Sometimes three men would speak briefly in turn. If a visiting brother was present he was specifically invited to speak. If no one arose to speak one of the elders was prepared to teach and admonish.

As I look back upon those days there comes to my mind the mental image of toil-worn men sitting on the front porch at dusk, reading the sacred volume. I recall being in homes on cold wintry days where men who had spent hours feeding and doing the chores, now sat down close to the heating-stove to study the Bible, until the warmth stole over the bodies and lulled them to sleep while the book slid gently to the floor. Since I had been completely through the Bible at least twice, when some remote point was "brought up in the meeting" the teacher might refer it to me. Frequently I knew the answer. This did two things. It drew the commendation of the older folk and strengthened the resolution of the males who were my age to beat me up, the age-old and effective recourse of country boys to a "smart city kid."

A passage from the Roman letter keeps coming to my mind. "I myself am satisfied about you, my brethren, that you yourselves are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, and able to instruct one another." I think that may describe the way we were. No one threw his weight around. The brethren were tolerant of one another. When old "Pappy Davis" decided it was not "scriptural" to stand for prayer, no one was upset if he kneeled while we stood. When he was called upon to lead in prayer, the one who was presiding asked us all to kneel.

There was a cooperative spirit. The sisters took a month each in preparing the loaf for the Lord's Supper, and shared their recipe for making unleavened bread. We used two glasses to pass the fruit of the vine, and during a protracted meeting when a lot of visitors were present we added two more. Near the close of the service, while a hymn was being sung, everyone marched up and "laid by in store" by putting his money on the white linen cloth on the table. Before returning to their seats they shook hands with everyone on the front seat. There was a lack of pride and affection which contributed to the idea that it was a family reunion of the saints of God.

Because we had moved in the middle of the term I finished the year in the little schoolhouse where eight grades were crowded together in one room. There was a "recitation bench" in front and the teacher called each class to come in turn and occupy that seat while its members recited whatever lesson was scheduled. By the time one reached the eighth grade he had heard every textbook reviewed eight times. Although I was destined to attend but a few months, that little school, taught by Lee Carter Maynard, made an indelible impression upon my mind.

Two significant things happened soon after we moved into the new community. The first was that my mother began to attend the meetings of the congregation. I am sure she had been lonely, but here she was accepted, and the genuine concern of the other women made her want to be with them. She told us it represented no change upon her part and that she simply went to be with the rest of the family, but she was talking to herself as much as to us.

The second thing was my decision one Sunday to be baptized into Christ. I was sitting in my accustomed place with the other boys of the community. Nothing unusual was occurring. The songs were not more exciting. The short talk by one of the elders was a routine one. But there came to me, out of nowhere a feeling of deep depression and remorse that I had not audibly confessed before men my faith in Jesus. Suddenly I knew that he had not just died for sin, but for my sins. There was a tugging at my inward being to enroll in His service. It was as if I were receiving a clear summons to follow His leading.

After the meeting was over I hurried away home. I did not want to talk to anyone. I felt miserable. I could not eat luncheon and as soon as I could steal away I went to one of my favorite spots for meditating, under the shade of one of the apple trees in a remote corner of the orchard. All afternoon I sat there, inwardly presenting the consequences of acceptance or rejection. It was as if two forces inside me were locked in violent struggle. Two voices were calling out of the depths. Finally, I surrendered to the urging of the Spirit, and at once felt an inner peace and quiet I had never before known. It was as if a heavy rock had been lifted off my being. That night, unaware that I was bare foot and dressed in bib overalls, I confessed to the little group of humble farm-folk that I believed with all my heart that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God.

One week from that time, on a sun-drenched Sunday afternoon, we gathered at the old swimming-hole in the creek which flowed through John Willard's pasture. The cows which were lying in the shade of the sycamore trees continued to chew their cuds placidly, undisturbed by this unusual intrusion. The little group of onlookers who had assembled sang the words "Shall we gather at the river?" One of the elders, a neighbor whom all of us loved, Jesse Jackson, led me into the stream with the silvery minnows darting this way and that, and immersed me into that glorious relationship involving the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

My mother was there, and I suspect her mind went back to the time when she dressed my baby form in the long white christening-dress and carried me so far to have me christened by the Missouri Synod Lutheran clergyman. But she merely wiped away her tears, and hugged my wet body without saying anything. We climbed into the big wagon in which we were to ride back home, and my wet clothing felt good as the sun's rays beat down upon us. But it was the cool, refreshing feeling inside of me which meant the most. What a thrill to be one spirit with the Lord!

1. Early Years

My Days As A Boy Preacher

Contents

My surrender to the claims of Jesus over my life launched me almost at once into a round of new experiences. On the Sunday following my baptism I publicly read the scripture lesson which was a regular feature of our assembly. A week later I led in public prayer. The autumn "protracted meeting" was conducted by J. C. Bunn, an esteemed evangelist who was born in our general region and who was in demand among the congregations. On the final night of his series he announced that I would speak one month from that night. Apparently he had consulted with the elders but the announcement came as a complete surprise to me.

By this time I had graduated from the rural school and was attending classes in town, a distance of some three miles. I was barely twelve years of age. Since I knew of no effective way of getting out of speaking I decided to use the theme "Counting the Cost" and after outlining what I wanted to say I began rehearsing on my walk through the woods and fields each morning and evening as I went to school and returned home. Interest began to grow as word was noised abroad and on the Sunday evening I was to speak the house was completely crowded out and many had to remain outside and listen through the open windows.

When I ascended the platform, dressed in knee trousers, I was so short my head could hardly be seen above the reading stand by the seated audience. One rural wag told me later the only way he knew I was back there was by seeing my hair moving back and forth above the stand. He said it was standing on end. I was afraid of but one thing, that I might run out of material and have to dismiss the audience prematurely. There was no danger! I spoke almost an hour, and later when one farmer was asked what he thought about my preaching he said, "It is the most exhausting experience I have ever had. You can't sleep worth shucks while he is talking and you don't get home in time to catch up on it before morning."

As soon as I had finished, an elder from the Green Pond congregation came up and asked me if I would speak there the following Sunday, and another from Bee Creek arranged for me to speak there two weeks from that date. Soon I was busy every Sunday of each month, and people came from far and near to see a "boy preacher" with the same curiosity which would have attracted them to a carnival sideshow to see a two-headed calf.

One week my father was conducting a series of meetings in a rural location far out in the bottom area of the snake-infested region close to the Mississippi River. Word was conveyed that the humble farm-folk wanted to close with a basket dinner followed with an afternoon meeting with both my father and myself as speakers. It was the first time my father had heard me make a public address and it was a blessing indeed for me to be thus associated with him, knowing as I did the zeal he had for Christ and the sacrifices he had made for the cause which he loved more than life.

One afternoon when I arrived home from school, I found my mother sitting on the front porch visiting with Sister Schlieper, whose husband was an elder of the congregation at Bee Creek. Anna Schlieper was a remarkable person. Her father, Klaus Martens, a carpenter in Germany, brought his family to America when Anna was five years of age. The immigrants settled in a region known as Mozier Hollow, in Illinois. Nominally members of the Lutheran Church in Germany, they did not actively identify with any religious group in the new world. In the little colony of people whose roots still reached back to "The Fatherland" Anna married Edward Schlieper and they began their home under extremely modest circumstances.

"Uncle Tom" Roady, a plain country-type preacher came into "the Hollow" to conduct a series of meetings, and because every such gathering was a social event, the Schliepers went. Although the preacher was far from being a "ball of fire" the simple message made an impression upon the shrewd mind of Anna Schlieper and she and her husband were immersed in the nearby stream. The wife immediately began to plunge into the revelation of God, and although her husband was not as interested as herself, she bombarded him with her findings until he became an apt student of the Word. By the time we moved to Illinois the entire Schlieper family was in the faith and pillars in both the community and the little congregation which met in a building occupying a plot of ground carved out of their farm.

I shall always believe it was an act of divine providence which caused us to move to that region of Illinois. No one else on earth was as well adapted to reach my mother as Anna Schlieper. Two days after the latter had read to her from the German Translation of Martin Luther, I was summoned to the classroom of the high school principal, G. B. Garrison, who informed me that my mother was to be baptized at two o'clock that afternoon and I was free to attend if I wished. I walked the more than two miles out the railroad track to the bridge over the creek and turned up the country road to the "baptizing hole." I was alternately weeping and praying as I went. In my childish inexperience I had no vocabulary with which to express my profound gratitude unto God. I still do not.

After my mother had been immersed, and we returned home so she could change from her wet garments, I wanted to tell her how much I rejoiced inwardly, but all I could get out was a stammering "Mom, I'm glad!" Both of us started crying and continued until it seemed silly to go on, and then we started laughing, almost hysterically. After that we both understood and did not need to talk about it any more. Our family was one in Christ Jesus. When my grandfather heard about it, he revised his will without my mother's knowledge. He never wrote to us again and when his will was read after his death, my mother's name was not even mentioned. She had been a favorite child, loving and obedient, but once she obeyed the call of Jesus it was as if she had never been born. The sectarian spirit crushed out parental affection as it destroys all love and makes those who would kill you think they are doing God a service.

Occasionally I am asked by those who have created institutional handmaidens to suckle, rear and train the children of God, how we made out before men created these special agencies and auxiliary bodies as functional nursemaids. The answer is simple. Each congregation was regarded as a school of Christ and a college of the Bible. All of the soldiers were given the same identical training. All were taught the use of the various portions of the sword. No one was sent as a recruit to an "officer's training school" to come back and wield the weapon and wear the shield for the whole company. Benjamin Franklin had taught the brethren to "teach the whole truth to the whole church and those with leadership ability will rise to the top as cream rises on the milk."

Intensive studies of the Bible were conducted in many congregations during the winter. Brethren within driving distance attended with eagerness. Classes were held morning, afternoon and night. Training was afforded boys and young men in the public presentation of the Word. Stiff tests were given to see if the message was getting through. These studies often lasted for weeks and provided a welcome respite in long winter months. Brethren who were apt to teach were in constant demand.

In this number was A. M. Morris, whose studies at Hale, Missouri, and Winfield, Kansas, are still mentioned by old-timers. Brother Morris wrote the books Prophecies Unveiled and *Reason and Revelation. They were widely read in all religious circles. Once when he was on a train, William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic candidate for president came through the coaches meeting and shaking hands with the passengers. When he learned the identity of Morris he publicly introduced him as the man whose books had taught him more about the Bible than any other volumes he had read. He urged the passengers to secure a copy of Reason and Revelation and read about it.

Daniel Sommer, J. C. Bunn, Stephen and Silas Settle, and D. Austen Sommer were all recognized as teachers. The latter, like his father, produced a number of books, among them one called "How to Read the Bible for Pleasure and Profit." It was cleverly done and he used this as a guide in his four-week study which I attended at night the winter after I was baptized. He was not as adept in teaching as some of the others, but one does not criticize the serving when he is starving for the food.

I learned a great deal, as a mere lad, sitting with older farm-folk who marked and underlined the Bibles so they could recall the things they had learned. They were often slow readers and had to point to each word in turn. Sometimes they mistook the meaning of a passage as did the dear old sister who was reading the passage which declares that "Jacob stole away from Laban unawares," and read it with emphasis, "And Jacob stole away from Laban in his underwear." But I doubt there has ever been a substitute quite as effective as the training of the whole community of saints to function by the use of every gift. As Peter put it, "Each one should use whatever spiritual gift he has received to serve others, faithfully administering God's grace in its various forms."

As the months went by I was called upon to go farther and farther from home to speak at congregations, some of which I had scarcely heard about. Each Saturday I would walk to town and board the train for some destination where I was scheduled to address the brethren on Saturday night and Sunday morning, returning home again on Sunday evening. Frequently, after taking my ticket, a conductor would come back and question me to see if I was running away from home. On occasion a brother would come to meet me at the railway station and return home without me, telling his wife that no one got off the train but a little boy and he did not see "hide or hair" of anyone who even looked like a preacher.

Our uncle, L. E. Ketcherside, arranged for me to come and speak there each night during the Christmas vacation. I stayed in his home and we talked long and often about the cause we loved. He was a master at relating his experiences and also at personal work. We developed a closeness which was never strained through the years. Several decades later he died of a massive brain hemorrhage as he was going from door to door distributing faith-building material he had printed on his trusty mimeograph the day before. As I spoke words of tribute in his honor at the funeral service my mind drifted back to the wintry nights when the two of us walked through the crunching snow at Centralia.

I recalled that the speaker's stand was so high that I had to stand on a box to see the audience. There were not more than thirty persons present but it was a great meeting because I was with those whom I loved.

2. Marriage and Evangelism

Married and Broke!

Contents

By the time my thirteenth birthday arrived and summer vacation had rolled around I was scheduled for meetings in three states. This meant I would be away from home until school started again. I had already baptized several persons, most of them my age. A number of others who had "come forward" were immersed by elders who were afraid that, because of my size, I might drown them in the process, or vice versa. At least two of the meetings were in tents. This was before the time of amplifiers and loud-speakers so I had to develop my voice range which was not easy for one my age. Meetings were held all seven nights of the week and often three times on Sunday. There was not much time for respite.

It was not all serious business, and years later, older brethren would recount to my embarrassment, how, when I was preaching in a country schoolhouse or other rural setting, I would be out playing leapfrog or marbles with other boys of my age, and they would have to come out and tell me I had better stop and wash up at the pump because it was time for the meeting to begin. Since many of my engagements were in farming communities or small villages, and I stayed in a different home every night, sleeping under all sorts of conditions and eating all kinds of food, I received training which stood me in good stead later as I traveled in other parts of the world.

It would be interesting to me, but boring to you, if I were to recount the meetings in which I engaged for the next two or three years, so I will resist the urge to pursue that course. There are some places which return vividly to mind. Among them is Bonne Terre, Missouri, which took me back to within six miles of my birthplace. Here, where the remnants of the Cantwell congregation were to be found, I stayed in the home of my paternal grandparents while speaking each night to a capacity crowd. Often the building could not contain the listeners. Seventeen persons were immersed, some of whom still live and are active in the work of the Lord. The spiritual enthusiasm in the town was at a high pitch and the saints were blessed.

Another place I especially remember was a rural congregation called Walnut Hill, south of Springfield, Missouri, located near Battlefield, so designated because of the fierce Civil War battle in which the famous General Nathaniel Lyons, of the Union forces, was mortally wounded. It was not historical lore which impressed the place upon my mind, but the fact that the group of saints there purchased for me my first suit with long trousers. When I went in to Springfield with one of the elders, Brother Bussard, he sprang a complete surprise on me by taking me to a clothing store on South Campbell Street where he outfitted me in a suit with a vest. The price was fifteen dollars and there was no sales tax.

Then, with two more years of high school before me, my father decided to move to Topeka, Kansas. An elderly gentleman, Peter Griggs, offered him a contract to manage Mount Auburn Cemetery, and he found the lure of a regular income irresistible. He called me by long distance telephone and I went to Topeka where I met him and exhausted my little bank account by making a down payment on an old house outside the city limits which I thought of as "that tumble-down shack in Athlone." It had no indoor plumbing and was in a state of decrepitude. It was all we could afford. When my mother saw it she said, "Poor people have poor ways," and set about trying to make it more livable. My father had great plans for developing it when we got on our feet. We never got there and the "dream castle" never emerged. He spent every spare minute preaching and settling squabbles at places which did not reimburse him enough to pay the grocery bill.

When I started to Highland Park High School I was in a different world than I had been in while attending the little two-teacher high school in Pearl, Illinois. But there was no speech department and when I took it upon myself to enroll in the National Oratorical Contest I had to do all of the work on the speech myself. In the elimination contest I was obviously at a disadvantage and did not even win an alternate position. First place was captured by George Chumos of Topeka High School, the fluent son of a Greek immigrant. When I learned that he had been coached by Miss Carmi Wolfe, head of the Speech Department, I enrolled in Topeka High School where I had to pay my own tuition.

The following year under the expert tutelage of Miss Wolfe, I captured the city contest, the state contest, the regional contest, and lost out in the one which would have sent me to Washington to compete in the finals, held in the House of Representatives. When I graduated from high school I went to Topeka Business College on a scholarship. I studied banking and accounting and ended up taking a position with the Columbian Title and Trust Company, as a researcher for abstracts. I spent my noon hours poring over the old Indian treaties and government land grants. But after less than six months had passed, the call of the whitened fields became so great, I could not resist. I resigned my position, much against the will of the company officials and returned to traveling as an evangelist.

God was gracious unto me and my efforts were crowned with what "our brotherhood" regarded as success. There were "additions" in every meeting. New congregations were being started and when divisions occurred, as they frequently did, we were able to consolidate "the faithful ones" who "came out from among them" to preserve the doctrine in its purity.

I was nineteen years old when I went back to Flat River, Missouri, for what turned out to be one of the most eventful meetings of my life. Every evening when the bell sent its mellow tones out across this mining town the people began to surge toward the building. It was literally "standing room only" every night. I stayed with an uncle in Bonne Terre, about seven miles away but I was in Flat River daily, visiting the members and doing personal work. My song leader was Arvel Watts, one of the best I had ever known, but the greatest thing going for him, as I soon discovered, was that he was the older brother of Nellie Watts. I had always liked girls, and even at my tender age had imagined I was in love with a number of them. But that was before I saw Nell, a raven-haired brown-eyed beauty, whose simple charm swept me off my feet and left my mind reeling.

J. W. Watts, whose first initials stood for John Wesley, was reared in a home of "shouting Methodists," as was his wife. But when he heard Daniel Sommer preach he was baptized into Christ at once and was already a member at Flat River when my father obeyed the gospel. By the time I grew up and returned to Flat River for the meeting, he and Arvel each owned a store, and Nell was working as a clerk in her father's place of business. There were six children in the Watts family, as there were in my own father's family, and the home was one of genuine Christian commitment, under the direction of a stern but just father whose word was law, and who tolerated no "monkey business."

It was Nell's mother, I think, who first suspicioned that I was ending up at the store every day just before noon, not so much because I was interested in food, but to see her daughter. When she mentioned her feelings to Nell's father he said it was silly, and that in spite of the fact I wasn't yet dry behind the ears, I had too much sense to marry at my age. Meanwhile I could see no indication that I was making any headway, and the meeting was fast drawing to a conclusion. One of Nell's sisters did not help my state of depression by informing me that Nell had long ago announced that she would never marry a preacher or a traveling salesman.

It was on the final afternoon of the meeting that Nell's older sister and her fiance suggested that they would take me back to Bonne Terre after the meeting. He was the local Oldsmobile dealer and drove a new coupe with a rumble seat. As Nell and I rode along in it I extracted from her a promise that she would write to me if I wrote to her. She said she would answer any letters she received. That's where she made her mistake.

I wrote every day. Some days I wrote twice. Four more months went by and I found a few days in which I would not be preaching. I arranged a date in advance and during those few days we agreed that we would marry. I do not think I ever made a formal proposal. We simply seemed to take it for granted that we would marry. I went on my way rejoicing but now sent every cent I could spare to Nell who placed it in a special account so that we could purchase a car and later our furniture. A few months later I returned so we could make final arrangements. I had been writing every day and printing a little sixteen page quarterly dedicated just to her, but now the days seemed to creep by.

Finally, the time came to get the license and make the final preparations, and on Sunday afternoon, we were married in the living-room of the Watts' home, with my uncle, L. E. Ketcherside, officiating. It was a very simple ceremony, lasting but a few minutes. There were no special decorations. We left immediately enroute to Topeka, Kansas, where my folks lived. On the way we stopped overnight at Nevada, Missouri, where we resolved to make our home.

After a few days in Topeka, we started for California, where I was scheduled for three meetings. There were no motels and most of the roads were unpaved. We expected to camp along the way and had a tent and all of the equipment with us. But the second night out, at North Platte, Nebraska, I became violently ill and developed a high fever. The next morning I drove as far as the little town of Sutherland, a distance of twenty miles, and it became apparent I could go no farther. We drove down the dusty main street until we saw the sign on a dingy little building, "Frank Shambaugh, M.D., Physician and Surgeon." Dr. Shambaugh examined me and diagnosed my condition as appendicitis. He suggested that we get a room in the little unprepossessing two-story hotel, and he would pack me in ice in the hope that the inflammation would subside and I could return home for surgery.

After seven days in the little hotel it was obvious there was no improvement and something would have to be done at once. In a private home converted into a three-room hospital I underwent surgery on Sunday afternoon. I was frightfully nauseated from the ether. Each morning Nell came to remain with me through the day. Each morning she went back to the hotel room by herself. When I became able to drive we took a test run out through the country and the next day started for Topeka. We were financially broke. Our last cent was gone. We were in debt and I was too weak to work. But we were both alive and we were together.

A short time later we rented our first place, a little three-room meagerly furnished apartment in an old house at Nevada, Missouri. Here the members took us to their hearts and we found real joy in sharing our lives together. The congregation continued their plan of mutual ministry, for they had never hired a preacher. The elders and other brethren of ability edified the saints. I simply took my turn with them, but it was not necessary that I be present on Sunday. I was free to go out and take the message to others.

2. Marriage and Evangelism

And Baby Makes Three

Contents

I have been casting about for the right word to describe our relationship with the community centered around Nevada, and I have decided upon the term "idyllic." When you look it up in your dictionary you will see at once why I selected it. If you will permit me to backtrack a little, I should like to tell you we moved there on November 7, 1928. After we had remained at my father's home until I recovered strength following my surgery, we returned to Nell's home, so she could vote for a president the first time. The election was on November 6.

The choice was not an agonizing one. She voted for Herbert Hoover. His opponent was Al Smith, four times governor of New York. As if that were not enough to condemn him in the eyes of midwesterners he was also a Catholic and a "wet" during the days of prohibition. Moreover, he wore a brown derby, and the thought of someone in the White House with that kind of hat seemed ridiculous. So Nell voted for Hoover. I was not quite old enough to vote. The Republicans campaigned on their record of increasing prosperity under the Harding and Coolidge administrations. They promised to end poverty and make possible "a chicken in every pot, a car in every garage." None of us realized we were facing a depression in which every car would go to pot and most of us would be raising chickens in the garage.

Nevada is the county seat of Vernon county, Missouri. We moved there because it was about halfway between our parental homes. When we did the rural flavor was still quite pronounced. Both the Missouri Pacific and the Missouri-Kansas-Texas railways ran trains though the town so that it was linked with every part of the United States by connecting lines in great industrial centers. But Nevada was still a country town. Saturday was the big day of the week. Farmers with produce to sell parked around the courthouse square and dispensed their wares from the backs of their vehicles. There were still hitching racks for those who drove teams.

Sidewalks were crowded with people who visited all day, going home only in time to do the chores in the evening. Harmless gossip flowed freely and tidbits of news were exchanged. When two persons met the general form of greeting was, "Have you heard?" and the newcomer was given the latest news. It was a day when one could speak on the courthouse lawn and be assured of a crowd eager for something to provide a diversion from whittling and spitting tobacco juice at a mark on the ground.

The small congregation meeting in the plain little white frame structure on North Main Street was composed primarily of farmers with a sprinkling of railroad employees. It was under the care of three elders— Brethren Kryselmier, Billings and Journey. The first was a retired "hog-head" as everyone called a railroad engineer, the second was a dairyman, and the third a farmer. They did not "hire" me to move to the town to work with the church. They were surprised when I told them I was coming to their town, a decision I reached while holding a meeting for the congregation the year before. I suspected at the time they were glad to hear it, but they did not make a great fuss over the announcement.

No congregation among us had "a minister." I was regarded as an evangelist. There was a clear understanding that the primary task of an evangelist was to proclaim the good tidings to those who had never obeyed the gospel. When a congregation was planted, the evangelist remained to train and prepare his converts until men with the qualifications for bishops arose among them. We were imbued with the idea enunciated by Benjamin Franklin, the gospel preacher, who said, "Feed the whole church the whole word, and leadership will rise among the members as cream rises upon the milk." When men exhibited the qualifications required of bishops they were elected by the multitude of the saints and ordained by the evangelist.

At this juncture his work was terminated as he commended the congregation and the elders "to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." The evangelist was then ready to move on or to band together another group in the locality and duplicate the process. The idea of hiring out to preach the gospel to a congregation of saints with bishops at so much per week, no more entered our minds than it did those of the believers in the days of the apostles. Such terms as hiring or firing preachers, contracts, vacation stipulations, were as foreign to our spiritual vocabulary as they were to the new covenant scriptures.

When an evangelist was a member of a local body of disciples, he held no office or priority in that congregation. As a member he took his turn in edifying and exhorting, but a great deal of the time he was laboring with new or weak places which needed his talents and advice. It seemed silly to concentrate the strongest talent in a place which needed it least. In war the greatest firepower is directed to the weakest spots. During the first winter I was in Nevada I spoke about once every six weeks. At other times I sat with Nell and listened to the other brethren admonish us. But I was making personal calls in every part of the country. I mapped out areas and visited the farm homes of all who lived within the perimeter. I talked to them about the Lord and began to hold Bible studies in rural meetinghouses, grange halls and schoolbuildings at night. Frequently I was invited by the schoolteacher to come and speak to the children during the day. I came to know hundreds of people.

In the town I secured permission to speak one day per week to the crew working in the roundhouse of the Missouri Pacific Railway. While they were eating lunch together I spoke to those who were willing to come. It soon became so much a part of their life that I broke up the card games on the day I was there. I spoke frequently at the chapel for the mental patients in the State Hospital north of town. Soon I was becoming a kind of regular fixture at the noon luncheon clubs of the Rotarians, Kiwanians and Lions. When a speaker cancelled out on them they called me. The railroad men elected me chaplain of the combined Boosters Clubs of the Joplin and White River Divisions of the Missouri Pacific.

As a result of these contacts I was immersing men and women in ponds, lakes, rivers, and even stock tanks in feedlots. So many railroaders became Christians that on Sunday "the caller" could come and hand in a list of workmen needed on an emergency train and we could make up his crew of engineers, firemen, brakemen and conductors, from the congregation. We even had the Railway Express representatives. I was thrilled with life, filled with zest, and ready to believe that we could take the world for Christ.

Then, during the sixth month of our marriage, Nell discovered she was pregnant. I was still soaring on imaginary wings at the thought of being a husband, and now a new dimension was to be added. I would be a father. It was all kind of mind-boggling to realize that at my age I was going to be entrusted with rearing a future president of the United States. I was overwhelmed with the thought that we would have a baby of our very own. As the weeks passed into months and Nell's body began to swell with the new life within, she became as beautiful to me as she appeared grotesque and ungainly to herself. I shall never forget the night I placed my hand against her abdomen and felt the fetal heartbeat of our joint production.

We knew we could not continue another winter in an apartment so cold that ice froze at night in the bucket of water in the kitchen. And then, just as if an unseen hand was guiding our destiny, a small five-room house became vacant directly across the street from the meetinghouse. We rented it and moved in. There was nothing good or fancy about it. Our furniture was not adequate for it, but this did not affect us. The folk in the congregation were good to us and the baby shower provided the needs of one about whom we had dreamed but had not yet seen.

There was no hospital in the city so we made arrangements for the delivery at home, following instructions of the dignified and elderly Dr. Love, who seemed to be altogether too calm for such a momentous task. It was early in the morning of September 18, 1929, when Nell prodded me awake to tell me that the hour was approaching. I could not find the light switch in the dark and fell over everything in two rooms trying to get to the telephone. When I finally got the doctor awake to give him the news of the century, he told me he would get dressed and be along as soon as he fixed himself a cup of coffee. I could not understand how anyone could stop to drink a cup of coffee while facing the most momentous event of his whole career. I was walking the floor, trying to remember what I had read in doctor books about delivering babies when he knocked on the door.

He was as much a master of delivering young husbands of their fears as he was in delivering young wives of their babies. He told me he would need some things done and issued some orders for me to prepare this and that. While I was bustling about doing it he sat down in our only comfortable chair and took a nap. It was only after it was all over and he had gone that I realized he had asked me to do things which he never referred to or asked about again.

We had arranged for our aged sister in Christ, Mrs. Richard F. Edwards, to come and help us with the baby. She was a precious and gentle soul who had borne a number of children of her own, and had assisted with the birth of many more. She was present soon after the doctor arrived, and proceeding efficiently in spite of my getting in her way. She was helping Dr. Love in the actual delivery when, all of a sudden, he said, "Well, well, it's a fine big boy." It was, too, because the scales registered nine-and-a-half pounds.

Nell seemed to take it fine, but I was completely worn out from the ordeal. I shall never forget the sense of well-being which was mine when they laid Gerald Bernard in my arms for the first time. Nell selected the name, choosing it because we could not think of anyone in either of our families who ever bore such a name. I do not recall that anyone has ever called him Gerald since that morning. Somehow he became tagged with "Jerry" and that is what it has been ever since. A completely new phase of life had begun for us. I found myself humming a snatch of the song made famous by "Little Jack Little" a famous radio performer of the time, " . . . the baby makes three, we're happy in my blue heaven."

When I had recovered sufficiently to walk to town I went to the office of Dr. Love and told him I had come to pay my bill. He got out his account book and said, "Let me see. I examined your wife four times here in the office during her pregnancy, and then came to the house and delivered the baby, and have made two trips back since to check on things. I'm afraid I shall have to charge you thirty dollars in all, but if you think that is too much I can take the baby in on it."

I have known a lot of experiences in life. Some of them have been tragic. Others were joyful. But for sheer pleasure mingled with constant concern there is nothing equal to rearing a baby. Every degree of fever arouses grave apprehension. Every little cry at night is heard and brings you from a snug bed to tramp across a cold linoleum. In reality, babies are tyrants. They are utterly and wholly selfish. It is better to realize this and be truthful about it. They scream until they grow livid in the face and quickly change to gurgles of contentment as soon as you pick them up and start talking softly in the special vernacular of baby-talk which they love. If you do not pick one of them up soon enough he shifts into the tactic of holding his breath. You become frantic. The fact is that no baby ever died from holding his breath. He always catches it just in time to go on living and employ the same ruse next time.

Babies belch in your face and burp down your back just when you are preparing to leave for a special meeting and haven't time to change suits, if you are fortunate enough to have another one. You arrive smelling like the custodian in the sour cream division of the local dairy. Babies sleep all morning and arouse only to mess up their diapers just when you have poured the coffee and sat down to luncheon. The timing of a baby is uncanny. He can be trusted implicitly to disrupt any plan and wreak havoc on any schedule. And he is worth every minute of it!

His first attempt at crawling, the first time he yanks the table cloth off and sits amidst the wreckage gaily flailing away at it and scattering gravy with both hands, the first stumbling step, the first bumbling word, all of these are mileposts in a career, the topic of telephone calls with which to bore patient listeners, the subject of letters with which to thrill the hearts of distant grandparents. Regardless of one's educational attainments, he will learn more about life by living with a baby than by sitting in ivy-covered towers of scholasticism listening to bearded professors.

But the world has to go on even if you have a baby. No moratorium is declared on the making of history while you play with your offspring. Six days after Jerry was born Lieutenant Jimmie Doolittle made the first all-instrument plane flight. A new era was ushered in. One month later the stock market crashed. Millions of shares were dumped. Billions of dollars were lost. On October 29 panic selling increased. The ticker tape was almost three hours behind. Thousands of investors saw their fortunes completely wiped out. Some of them jumped from office windows to shatter their bodies on the concrete far below. Men who were wealthy a few days before blew their brains out rather than face life as paupers. Fear and foreboding gripped the country.

Men began to speak of national bankruptcy. It was as if some evil genius had suddenly taken control. The feeling of ominous threat was heightened when a strange fire broke out in the Executive Office building in Washington, D.C., on Christmas Eve. We were tottering on the brink of "The Great Depression."

2. Marriage and Evangelism

Ford Country

Contents

This year of 1930 will be long remembered by those who are old enough to remember it. It was a time of disaster. A great drought lay like a pall over the Ohio and Mississippi River areas. Food resources were depleted, and unemployment and disease took a frightful toll. The census taken during the year determined that a population of 123,202,624 occupied the then forty-eight states, and by autumn President Hoover reluctantly had to admit there were 4,500,000 unemployed. Within a year the amount doubled.

On December 11, the largest bank failure in the United States occurred when the Bank of the United States closed down in New York City, leaving almost a half million depositors stranded. A few days later The Chelsea Bank and Trust Company failed to open the doors of its six outlets and in rapid succession twenty-eight banks in the south and midwest went under. In the next twelve months there were 2,294 bank closings.

To add to the nation's woes in 1930, great fires broke out in various places. One such holocaust at the Ohio State Prison in Columbus resulted in the death of 318 convicts. The state capitol of Bismarck, North Dakota, went up in flames and the loss was estimated to exceed a million dollars. In spite of all this, those who lived the simple life in rural areas seemed to suffer least. Always cooperative and willing to share, they accepted the situation with a cheerful calm which belied the fright stories in the newspapers. The little congregation at Nevada continued to grow in members added, as well as in grace and knowledge of the truth. As one brother said, "You don't notice a depression if you've never known anything with which to contrast it."

When our baby was about six months old we began a tour which enabled me to conduct meetings previously arranged in four states. He proved to be a good traveler, sleeping much of the way, lulled into slumber by the motion of the automobile. At Topeka, Kansas, we stayed with my folk and during the meeting each night the principal question was who would get to hold the baby. This was the age of "protracted meetings" in Churches of Christ. They were called that in order to distinguish them from "revivals." This was a sectarian term which no self-respecting preacher among us would use. The meeting in Topeka drew capacity crowds, a not too difficult thing because of the limited seating space.

After some tearful farewells, we went next to Marshalltown, Iowa, where I had lived briefly as a boy. Once again we were blessed with good audiences although our cause had never particularly prospered in the area. It was a pleasure to see once more a number of those whom we met when we moved to the area from the little Ozark mining town years before.

The next stop was at River Rouge, the home of the great Ford automobile plant in the Detroit, Michigan area. Already Henry Ford was a legendary character, although he would live for seventeen more years. In 1893, after spending all of his leisure time in experimentation, he built his first automobile in a carriage shed. In 1903 he founded the Ford Motor Company. During the year of my birth he began production of the "Model T." It was so popular it became the butt of jokes by stage comedians and everyone passed along the latest one accompanied by loud guffaws.

Someone in a crowd would say, "There was this preacher who drove a Model T, and got stuck in the mud on his way to church. He pried it out with a rail from a nearby fence, but when he got up to preach, mad and muddy, he began by saying, 'Anyone who drives a Model T, will probably go to hell.' In the back of the house a man stood up and said, 'Amen!' The preacher said, 'How come you said Amen when I predicted anyone who drives a Ford will go to hell?' The man replied, 'Because if she gets you there, she will bring you back.' " Fords were always spoken of in the feminine gender. It was rumored that this was because they were so difficult to get started. Some said it was because you had to pet them to keep them working. They were familiarly called "Tin Lizzies."

In 1927, the "Model T" was discontinued and replaced by the "Model A." By the time it was produced, Ford had turned out fifteen million cars, all the same color. His motto was, "Select any color you want, provided it is black." We went to Detroit because originally the congregation of River Rouge was primarily composed of people from Flat River and the rest of the Missouri Lead Belt. In 1914, Ford raised the wages of assembly line workers from $2.50 to $5.00 per day. The general consensus of opinions was that he had gone crazy and would ruin the country, since no man alive was worth $5.00 per day. People flocked to Detroit from every section of the country. Congregations were depleted elsewhere, while those who went to work for Ford formed congregations of folk "down home" to relieve their loneliness in a strange environment composed of different ethnic groups.

We stayed with Charles and Leray Stewart, because Leray and her sister Opal were part of the group of young people at Flat River with which Nell had been associated. It was a great time to be alive and we became endeared to this generous young Christian couple who took us in. As I write this, they are still living near Ludington, Michigan, where Charles has been an elder for many years at the second oldest congregation in Michigan, in a rural setting nestled amidst the great cherry orchards which make that section famous.

The River Rouge meetinghouse was filled every night. There were probably as many who came to see Nell as to hear me. Homesickness for southern Missouri was written upon many faces. Everyone was asking about relatives. It was like "old home week." One night when the place was so crowded that chairs filled the aisles, the Bruce family came over from Windsor, Ontario, just across the Detroit River in Canada. Adam and Peggy Bruce had immigrated from the Slamannan District, a colliery region in Scotland made famous through the preaching of the gospel by James Anderson. With them was a younger brother of Adam, George Bruce, who had just arrived from Scotland and who spoke with a brogue so thick you could "slice it with a knife."

They insisted that Nell and I come and spend the day with them as they had an urgent matter which they wanted to discuss. We settled upon a day and drove across the beautiful new Ambassador Bridge, which spanned the Detroit River. It had been open but a few months, the ribbon having been cut on November 11, 1929. It was 1850 feet long and 47 feet wide and had cost $20,000,000. We had never seen anything like it. In Windsor, which gave us the feeling of being "strangers in a strange land" we had difficulty in finding the hospitable home of the Bruces.

Although more than forty-six years have passed as I write this, I can still remember our luncheon, as if it were yesterday. Peggy Bruce was an excellent cook and she had prepared a Scotch meat pie. No one can bake such a pie as those from "the land of the thistle" and it was delicious. We topped it off with cantaloupe a la mode, and since we had never seen this combination before it was a gustatory delight.

As soon as we had finished eating, Adam and George

Bruce and I went out on the front porch and sat down to talk about the cause we loved. It was not always easy to unravel their Scots dialect, but my ears became more accustomed to it as we conversed. I learned about the congregations in the Slamannan District which lies between Edinburgh and Glasgow. They told of the drift of city churches into new ways and new thought patterns which were too liberal for many of the brethren. I learned about Walter Crosthwaite who resisted the inroads of modernism and called for the brethren to stand for the old paths. Certain congregations had declared themselves as opposed to any further erosion of the faith. They had come to be known as "the Old Paths brethren." There was a fairly well drawn line between themselves and congregations affiliated with the British Association of Churches of Christ.

It was the feeling of the Bruces that I should visit Scotland and help to strengthen the brethren. They felt that my position on "mutual edification" as opposed to the congregational importation of a preacher to act as a "one-man pastor" at a stipulated fee would establish a rapport with the brethren in Great Britain where the practice of "mutual ministry" was regarded as the scriptural way. I think my age may have had something to do with the proposal. They undoubtedly felt that one who was young would be able to adjust and adapt to the congregations in "Auld Scotia." George Bruce declared he had never heard anyone preach with the power I manifested. I had just passed my twenty-second birthday.

We drove back to Detroit to the little frame house of the Stewarts with its three large windows in the living room and its lattice-work concealing the area under the front porch (our way of identifying the place) and as we rode along we talked about George Bruce's intention of putting the wheels in motion in his native land. He did as he promised but none of us knew that before our plans could be carried out the Second World War would burst upon the world and we would sail upon the Queen Elizabeth on her first trip as a passenger-carrying vessel after having been used to transport troops, some of whom would never return. I would be thirty-nine years old, and Jerry, now nestled in his mother's arms would be eighteen years of age.

We can never assess, at the time, the purpose of God which brings about what appears to be a chance meeting. But as I look back upon it, I realize that had I not met George Bruce during the few weeks of his sojourn with his brother, I would never have gone to Scotland, England, or North Ireland. If I had never gone I would not be writing this account at all. I would have continued to be a narrow factional leader, debating my brethren and arrogantly defending division among the saints as the only means of achieving doctrinal purity. My life would have been a journey of frustration instead of a pilgrimage of joy.

The meeting at River Rouge closed on an exultant note, the house jammed with listeners. We drove from Detroit to Flat River, Missouri, where my next meeting was scheduled. On the way we learned that Jack Sharkey had lost his heavyweight championship to the German, Max Schmeling, by fouling him in the fourth round. When the pictures of the fight were given a re-run the year following it was found there had been no foul. But it was too late!

The meeting at Flat River began on a happy note. The building in which my father had first heard the gospel and stepped forward to pledge his allegiance to Christ was filled from the first meeting. Nell's brother Arvel was the song leader. He was one of the best with whom I have ever worked. Enthusiasm grew with every session and actually turned into spiritual excitement. Every evening people could be seen walking in small groups toward the meetinghouse, converging upon it from all directions. Sometimes it was almost filled before the first bell was rung thirty minutes prior to the time scheduled to begin. When the final bell was tolled to indicate the service was starting the space inside was all taken and people were outside looking in through the open windows and door.

A number were baptized into Christ and some of them were my kinsmen after the flesh. The interest was heightened by the fact we had just come from Detroit to which the "economic exodus" had taken so many from the Lead Belt. Now their loved ones "down home" swarmed around us wanting to know if we had seen this one or that one. The meeting was greatly aided by the presence of saints from Bonne Terre where I had conducted such a successful effort while still a "boy preacher." Among the elders from Bonne Terre were Henry and Cornelius Mabery, pioneers of the faith in the area around Mine La Motte before moving to Bonne Terre. Always active in the service of the Master, they grounded their families in the faith until now a fourth generation is carrying the banner which they unfurled among the ranks of unbelievers.

Before we returned to Nevada I conducted a series of meetings for the little band meeting at Crystal City, Missouri. My uncle, L. E. Ketcherside, had done personal work, going from door-to-door in Crystal City and the twin-city of Festus, until he succeeded in banding together a little group to "keep house for the Lord." It was not an easy task. Crystal City was named after the huge glass factory, located there because of the abundance of raw material used in the manufacture of plate glass. The work had attracted many immigrants from Southern Europe who were willing to work in the heat cast off by the huge furnaces. Many of the older ones were members of the Roman Catholic or Orthodox Churches and could hardly understand English when they were sober, which was not often.

Festus was originally a settlement known for its saloons and the prostitution which flourished in conjunction with its liquor dispensaries. The town was called "Tanglefoot" because of the unsteady gait of its citizens when full of cheap booze. As a better element moved in it was thought that such a name would only perpetuate the disreputable character of the place. The people met together to select a new name under which they could be incorporated, and it was unanimously decided they would have a man open the Bible and the first proper name which caught his eye would become the official designation. The book fell open to Acts 25:1, "Now when Festus was come into the province . . . " It is a good thing it did not flip open to Isaiah 8:1, or Tanglefoot would have become Maher-shalal-hash-baz. With its zip code it would have been hard to get on an envelope.

In spite of the hardships which he faced, and which never really discouraged or daunted him, my uncle kept on until he had a congregation meeting. He taught them until they were able to take care of themselves. None of them were educated but they had a zeal for the Word, imbued by their mentor. Charles Simms became a leader and a preacher of the Truth, and other humble brethren could speak effectively to the edification of the saints. I held my meeting in a house erected by my uncle on the rear of the lot owned by one of his sisters, for he could not only plant a congregation, he could also do carpentry work as few others I have seen. When the meeting was over we drove back to Nevada after an absence of more than three months.

2. Marriage and Evangelism

The Glory of Mutton Hollow

Contents

Upon our return after more than three months of absence we found the congregation of saints at Nevada in an excellent state. Under the guidance of the bishops, and with the cooperation of the other brethren, the morale was high and the size of the audiences remained at such an excellent level there was serious talk of erecting a new meetinghouse. In every congregation of that day, almost fifty years ago, especially those with a rural constituency, there were always brethren who had scruples and qualms about certain things. However, at Nevada, the others did not try to press an opposing view but graciously accommodated themselves so they would not "set at naught a brother" and thus peace was maintained.

It was decided to bring a luncheon one Sunday and spread tables in the rear of the meetinghouse at noon so all could eat together and be present for an afternoon session in which to discuss the subject of erecting a new house. One brother objected on the ground that his conscience would not allow him to eat in "the Lord's house" or in a place secured with "the Lord's money." No one argued with him about the fact the Lord's house consisted of living stones and not of concrete and boards. In deference to his conscience they rented a hall for the meal and everyone was happy. Two years later, the weak brother had become strong enough to outgrow his scruple on the matter and we could eat together in the basement without objection.

The word for scruple is from the Latin scrupulus, and refers to "a little pebble in the shoe." Such a foreign object pains no one but the wearer of the shoe and those who do not feel the twinge must slow down until the weak brother can walk with them. Eventually, he may recognize that the pebble is not an essential part of the shoe and remove it to his comfort and the quickened pace of himself and others. The fact that we walk in the Spirit does not mean we all have the same gait. We should neither drive our brothers away nor run off from them. It is the stronger who must slow down for the weak cannot walk any faster until they also become strong.

It was decided we would wreck the old meetinghouse and salvage any material possible and erect the new one ourselves, since we had several brethren who could oversee the construction. The sisters would take turns providing food for the workers at noon. There was a sufficiently large crew the day we started so that we wrecked the old building and stacked the material in one day. When we began the new one, several men from the community with carpentry skills volunteered their labor. Some of them were immersed into Christ before the new structure was completed.

Only one incident marred the proceeding. When the framework was up some of the brethren sitting around eating their luncheon suggested we should take out insurance upon it to cover the cost of construction in case of wind, fire or other damage. One brother hooted at the idea and protested emphatically. He declared that it was the Lord's work and the Lord would protect it. He insisted that nothing adverse would happen either to the structure or to anyone working on it, and to take out insurance would be to show a lack of faith in God. He said, "It would be a shame to insure the Lord's property with unbelievers." Three days later he fell off of a scaffold and broke his arm. We took him to an "unbelieving doctor" to set the bones.

Although the new auditorium seated more than twice as many as the former structure it was filled to capacity the very first Sunday night. It had been so long since a religious group had outgrown their structure that people flocked in to see what was happening. In spite of our narrowness and provincialism, or perhaps because of it, the number of the disciples grew.

One of my favorite areas in "God's vineyard" was the Missouri Ozarks in the region around Springfield and south to the Arkansas line. I held my first meeting in "the Queen City of the Ozarks" when I was a mere lad. It was in a tent on North National Boulevard. After thus being introduced to the region I began to conduct meetings in rural areas off the beaten track. At Walnut Hill the community gave us an excellent hearing and I liked the place because after the evening services we could turn the dogs loose in the timber along the James River and go coon hunting the rest of the night. Here I also got my first taste of fox hunting.

It was during one of my visits to Springfield that brethren from Nixa, a village some twelve miles south, came to interview me to hold a three week gospel meeting for them. When I began on the third Sunday in September I inaugurated a custom that became an annual affair and continued until I had held thirteen meetings, baptizing some two hundred persons. In this little community of about three hundred population there were three or four religious edifices, but the largest was owned by the Church of Christ.

There were three elders— John Bennett, Otis Stine and Jonas Parsons. The first-named had been a rural schoolteacher until retirement. Then he became president of the local bank and general advisor to the community. Since I stayed in his home during many of these meetings I became well acquainted with him and met scores of people who came to him to help them draw up legal documents and even to write letters for them, since some of them were virtually uneducated and could not "put their thoughts down on paper." The congregation was given prestige by the number of people who studied the Word every day and became proficient in it. A wealth of talent was developed and the congregation grew strong under the guidance of their shepherds.

Every year during our annual meeting I was invited to speak in a number of high schools in the area. I recall that a few of them had makeshift buildings and inadequate classroom facilities, but the concern of the teachers and their dedication to their profession made up for the physical lack. Some high school students were from such poverty-stricken homes they came to school barefoot, bringing lunch pails or sacks containing cold biscuits and sorghum molasses. No days were ever wasted during my three week preaching stints for people arranged meetings and announced them by word of mouth so that I spoke from the porches of country stores or at sawmills and grist mills where native people gathered. The men chewed tobacco and listened with gravity while the women held the children and heard me gladly.

When such meetings were not possible all of us gathered at the home where I was to eat the noonday meal, the women bringing food to spread together, and while there were no formal meetings we sat and talked together well into the afternoon. These were times of simple enjoyment where hearts were cemented together by the love of God and all of us grew in knowledge of the Book as we discussed controverted passages. They were especially profitable to me because of the simple unadorned lives of the people enriched by their constant contact with the divine revelation. Some years I stayed in a different home every night of the three weeks, and often I have blown out the kerosene lamp and tumbled into a bed where the tick was filled with straw or corn shucks, and slept like a log because of physical exhaustion.

The baptizing was done in the beautiful crystal-clear James River. One Sunday afternoon a huge audience gathered on the gravel bar to see twenty-three persons immersed into the relationship involved in the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Often baptism was performed at night. Cars would be driven to the spot and parked so their lights could be focused on the river. Fish could be seen swimming in the depths. Night birds blended their plaintive calls with the songs of the believers.

Not all such gatherings were as peaceful as this. A year before Nell and I were married, I pitched a tent near Bull Creek and stayed a week by myself. I had been in the "Shepherd of the Hills" country, made famous by Harold Bell Wright, even prior to this, when I was seventeen. This was before the days of the tourist invasion and the only way to travel the region was in an old taxi driven by Mrs. Pearl Spurlock who lived in Branson and made daily trips through the area to accommodate people who stopped over between trains. Most of the roads were merely gravel-strewn trails and the sites featured by Wright were still existent.

Mutton Hollow was an unspoiled wilderness, and one could view its glory from Sammy Lane's Lookout. Preachin' Bill's barn stood to indicate where his log cabin had been and one could walk up "the trail nobody knows how old" to the cabin of Uncle Matt and Aunt Mollie. Uncle Ike, the postmaster at the crossroads, was still living, a bearded patriarch with a Harvard degree who chose to live in solitude but who was anxious enough to visit with me when I met him. The country got into my blood and I decided to go back and camp by myself away from any habitation, and think things out. I selected the right place. Every day I could see the blue haze dropping down on faraway hills and every evening while sitting by the campfire I could hear the eerie hoot of owls and the lonely cry of the whippoorwills.

I saw but two persons in the whole week. A couple of moonshiners came to investigate and assure themselves I was not a revenue agent searching for their stills. They cautioned me not to go up the hollow across the creek from my tent and ask questions afterward. When they learned I was a preacher they immediately proposed that I speak at the schoolhouse on Friday night since the community "hadn't heard no preachin' since God knowed when." They offered to "norate it around" so I consented.

I didn't realize that such occasions were usually used as an excuse for resumption of feuds although I noticed when the hour drew near for the meeting to begin a lot of the men were talking a little too loudly and the smell of liquid corn pervaded the air. The women and children went inside and so did a few of the men. The rest lounged around outside and their voices could be heard as I announced the first song. Since few knew it and there were no books, I sang but one verse. It was just as I was preparing to read an introductory chapter that someone outside called through an open window to a man inside, using an unmentionable epithet, and daring him to come outside. Without hesitation the one who was challenged climbed up on the seat and dived through the open window, knocking the prop out as he went.

In a matter of seconds the place was in an uproar with everyone pressing toward the door. Outside the drunken frenzied mob was already engaged in a free-swinging melee. It was not necessary to choose up sides. Everyone knew what side he was on when he arrived. Rocks flew freely. The moonlight glinted off the sharp blades of Barlow knives. When two sheriff's deputies arrived, those who could not walk were loaded into cars and taken to Branson to be sewed up.

Later I became good friends with some of the "feuders" who had served terms in the state penitentiary. One in particular was a mere lad when he and his father lay flat on their stomachs at the edge of their woods, resting rifles upon the fence rails to shoot down a neighbor and his two sons working in the field. They did it to fulfill a "blood oath" laid upon them by the boy's grandfather while he was dying from a gunshot wound. When I met the one-time boy he had "done his time" and had been released. He had married a girl from the hills and they welcomed me to their home. I baptized the whole family as well as some members of the opposite clan. When I was preaching anywhere within forty miles the former "sworn enemies" came together to hear me, bringing as many of their neighbors as they could get on the truck.

The year of 1931 was memorable in our lives for several reasons. For one thing, Nell again became pregnant and suffered a lot from nausea and discomfort during the summer months. We were fortunate that we had been virtually adopted by George and Minnie Kryselmier who not only came to get Jerry often because they adored him, but also had us at their house for meals with great regularity when George was home from a trip on the Missouri Pacific which he served as an engineer. Minnie was a superb cook with an old-fashioned flair and we would visit at the table for a long time unless there was a special radio program on WLS "the Prairie Farmer Station" in Chicago. Since we were too poor to own a radio ourselves, any specially announced program was an excuse to visit the Kryselmiers, who generally honored the arrangement by inviting us to eat with them. We never rejected the invitation.

It was in 1931 we bought our first house. A rather lovely six-room bungalow with a large porch in front became vacant and was offered for sale at $3,100.00 I had never been on a salary and never charged for my services. I simply took what the brethren gave me as I have continued to do through the years. At the time I was averaging about $25.00 per week and we had another baby on the way. But we wanted a place of our own, so we borrowed $300 for the initial payment from Nell's brother Arvel, and began the monthly payments which we continued more than ten years. Nell and I were both troubled about being in debt. To this day we dislike owing anyone anything "but to love one another" and we sense a real relief when a bill is paid.

It was early in the morning of December 10, 1931, that Nell awakened to tell me she had felt her first pains. At this time I had developed a better "husband image" and proceeded with arrangements with more method and less excitement than when Jerry was born twenty-seven months previously. I summoned Dr. Stanley Love, son of the man who delivered Jerry, and he arrived with greater alacrity than did his father. It was a good thing he did because Nell was in labor but little more than an hour when our baby girl joined the family circle to be given the previously agreed upon name of Sharon Sue. She weighed ten pounds, and Sister Edwards, who again helped us in this critical time, commented upon what a well-formed and happy baby she was right from the start.

Jerry suffered no emotional trauma because a new life had come to share the attention of his parents. We had carefully prepared him in advance until he experienced the same joyful anticipation as ourselves. When Sue was awake he would stand by her little bed and try to get her to smile at him. It was no great task as she was ready to do so with the least personal attention. Life again became a smoothly functioning routine for all of us except that Nell once more had to include the daily bathing of and attention to a chubby little cherubic being.

2. Marriage and Evangelism

The Party and Its Ringleaders

Contents

I sometimes wish I could omit this chapter but to do so would leave a void and create a distorted picture. I will deal with a division and my part in it, although division in the family of God has come to be so abhorrent to me I would like to forget my own unfortunate participation in it. In order to explain what happened I must give you a great deal of background. I do so with the realization it may not make sense to you. If you are patient enough to read it, however, you may be enabled to envision the role of personalities and their political maneuverings in the frightfully-divided Churches of Christ.

Although I did not realize it at the time I was baptized, this historical movement was already fractured into fragments because of the legalistic concept which had captured the minds of its adherents. Divisions do not happen. They are caused. Parties form around men who promote the separation and insist upon the segregation of their adherents. In the movement growing out of the ideal of restoration as enunciated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, most of the divisions centered around men of prominence. In almost every instance they were editors of journals. They could use their journals as propaganda media and the United States mails as a distribution method. No party could long endure without an editor and a "loyal paper."

Isaac Errett wielded influence through Christian Standard.

David Lipscomb edited Gospel Advocate. Austin McGary edited Firm Foundation. Daniel Sommer edited American Christian Review. The name of this paper was changed at various times to Octographic Review, Apostolic Review, and back again to American Christian Review. It was into the segment of "the disciple brotherhood" represented by the Apostolic Review I was introduced when baptized. At the time I did not know there were others. I supposed, in my childhood idealism, that all Christians were together, united in a common bond of faith, and that wherever you saw a meetinghouse with "Church of Christ" over the door you would find a welcome and a hand of fellowship to cheer you.

Daniel Sommer was a unique personality. Born of German immigrant parents, on January 11, 1850, he lived for ninety years, and formed a human bridge between the early restoration pioneers and my own time. He was contemporary with Alexander Campbell for sixteen years, and entered Bethany College four years after the death of its founder. A rather slow, but methodical student, he resolved to master the content of divine revelation and to proclaim it "without fear or favor." He viewed the spirit of departure from the original design of the scriptures as a sad and doleful commentary on the influence of pride and ambition among the disciples of Christ and began to raise his voice against the innovations he felt would make impossible the "return to the primitive order of things."

By the time he was forty years of age he was wielding a trenchant pen and a vigorous voice against the employment of "unlawful methods resorted to in order to raise money for religious purposes." He decried such things as bake sales, rummage sales, plays, performances and festivals. He attacked select choirs, instrumental music, missionary societies, and the "One man imported preacher-pastor to take the oversight of the church." It was his opposition to the developing clergy system which crystallized his objection to what he referred to as "so-called Christian colleges." Since David Lipscomb College and Abilene Christian College were both liberal arts schools, teaching nine-tenths secular subjects and one-tenth Bible, he deplored the designation Christian and coined the term "religio-secular institutions" to describe them.

I have in my possession a yellowed sheet listing exactly a hundred errors of "the new digressives" as he labeled defenders of the colleges to distinguish them from the "old digressives" who endorsed instrumental music and missionary societies. But I think his main objection lay in the charge that the colleges were "preacher factories," taking "beardless youths" whose chief claim to fame was "a gift of gab" and who, after receiving a certain amount of polish and a degree, could hire themselves out by the year to minister to churches for a set fee. He believed such a system would make the churches dependent upon hirelings, and instead of developing a well-trained militia, would so weaken the saints they would have to secure mercenaries to defend themselves against assaults of the enemy.

So formidable was his attack that before 1890 it was decided to "call the hand" of "the digressives" and fling down the gauntlet. The place chosen was the Sand Creek meetinghouse, a rural setting but a few miles from Windsor, Illinois. Here each year huge audiences gathered for a homecoming. A special train ran from Chicago, picking up people enroute. Several thousand gathered for the famous weekend. On August 17, 1889 Daniel Sommer stood up to read a document he had written. He called it "An Address and Declaration" which was a take-off on "The Declaration and Address" of Thomas Campbell penned exactly eighty years before.

It was a protest against "objectionable and unauthorized things taught and practiced in many congregations." It listed four specific "corrupt practices." Instrumental music was not one of them. The thesis closed with these words: "All such that are guilty of teaching, or allowing and practicing the many innovations and corruptions to which we have referred, and after being admonished, and having had sufficient time for reflection, if they do not turn away from such abominations, that we cannot and will not regard them as brethren."

From now on the die was cast. Although the missionary society had been organized fifty years before, and instrumental music introduced forty years before, for the first time they became an open and formal test of fellowship. Representatives from five congregations affixed their signatures, not realizing that in so doing they were formulating a creed by which brotherhood was to be reckoned. A rash of court suits broke out to secure the property and in many of these Brother Sommer was called to act as a witness and testify against what he called "modern schoolmen."

Hardly had some degree of calm been restored by mutual exclusiveness, when those who deplored the use of the instrument were plunged into another bitter contest. This time the point of contention was "the religio-secular college." The Western Bible and Literary College had been planted at Odessa, Missouri and since there was strong opposition to it by many congregations in the area two debates were arranged between B. F. Rhodes and Daniel Sommer. These were held at Odessa and Hale, Missouri. As a result, J. N. Armstrong, who was president of the school, challenged Brother Sommer to a written examination of the issue.

Twenty essays were presented by each writer in a debate which began on March 15, 1907 and carried over into the year I was born. The written discussion was marked with bitterness and interspersed with accusations and counter-accusations. On page 299, Brother Sommer wrote: "About six years ago I began, with much reluctance, to oppose a certain class of colleges, for they had been projected by men whom I supposed to be my brethren. But I have tested six of them, and have proved them to be reckless of truth, on the college question, and slanderers of me personally. As a result I cannot regard them as brethren, and do not so designate them except through force of habit in form of expression."

In closing his part of the discussion, Brother Armstrong said: "He is trying to divide a people who are as nearly one in doctrine as it is possible for true, loyal hearts to be; a people who are one on every question of religion save in their misunderstandings of the teachings of Christ. . . . Could he do it, brother Sommer would lead the Octographic Review readers, a small company compared to the great body of disciples that advocate the schools, to reject as Christians this body of disciples, notwithstanding it stands with the Octographic Review on nearly every other question discussed in the Church of God. Following such a principle every preacher in the Church would build up his individual sect."

At the time I was convinced that "the Octographic Review family" was the body of Christ to the exclusion of all others. There were real problems. Any party dominated by a strong personality, regardless of the sincerity of that person, treads a narrow line and walks on thin ice. The publishers of the Apostolic Review could wield a powerful influence on men and congregations and did so. Division is a natural result of such an arrangement. In Long Beach, California, men who were powerful preachers came under suspicion— A. M. Morris, W. P. Reedy, Ralph C. Yadon, Stephen and Silas Settle. Charges were preferred and a disgraceful scene enacted in the Long Beach meetinghouse where rival factions held meetings simultaneously and tried to "sing each other down."

The "brethren out west" as they came to be known, started their own paper, a rival journal to "the Review," and those who supported the latter regarded the other as traitors. They were referred to as "the Long Beach element" or "the Morris faction." The charge against them was that they had "gone soft on the pastor system" and were hiring preachers at a stipulated salary to take over the pulpits. Men who had been regarded as "faithful" for years were suddenly branded and no longer called for meetings.

To complicate matters further, trouble began to surface in the Sommer family, not a new thing. Because one could not get a "clergy certificate" for reduced rates on the railroads if he derived part of his income from the sale of books or from editing a paper, Daniel Sommer placed the editorship of the paper in the hands of his wife. Her name appeared appeared on the masthead for years— Mrs. K. W. Sommer, Editor. She did not take her position lightly and when her husband became involved in a church trouble in the west she cut him out of the paper and refused to print his articles. "There was no small stir," as the inspired writer would phrase it.

Even before that happened, D. Austen, a son who resented having been left off of the family editorial staff, started his own paper which he designated the *Macedonian Call. In it he frequently slated articles at the Review and when his mother died, and his two brothers and one sister (Chester, Allen and Bessie) took over, he increased his attacks. Because he was traveling much of the time as a preacher he found an opportunity to sow the seeds of doubt about the moral, spiritual and scriptural soundness of his brothers, and a great many long-time readers became suspicious. They watched the paper carefully for indications of a trend away from the traditional views. In 1932 they thought they had found such indications.

The June 21, 1932 issue carried an article simply signed "Review Publishers" and entitled "Can't We Agree on Something?" It began with the words, "To those of the Churches of Christ who desire a plan for Unity, we submit the following for your consideration." Fifteen points which had been controversial were discussed. The document proposed that colleges, orphan homes, and societies be disassociated from congregational relationships and maintained by individuals.

"The Church Contribution is not for that purpose." It suggested that the "Church Contribution" be used for "spreading the Gospel and taking care of the poor."

Each congregation would decide for itself how much preaching or mutual edification it would have. Bible classes were not to be organized into separate departments, and those who opposed them could stay away from them without censure. Actually, the statement was somewhat innocuous and tame when looked at in retrospect, but it became explosive in the atmosphere in which it was launched. No sooner did it hit the mail than D. Austen Sommer zeroed in upon it and called for all "loyalists" to rally round the flag to do or die for the cause we loved.

Although the publishers of the Review replied to the attack by saying it was simply a rough draft of suggestions intended to encourage a restudy of our divided state with a hope of alleviating it, the opposers (of whom I was one of the most vocal) labeled it a written creed. The description of it by the publishers gave us a handle and we called it "The Rough Draft" and this made it possible to identify the supporters and the denouncers of it. Daniel Sommer disclaimed any knowledge of the composition of the document but came to its defense when he became aware of the rabid opposition.

His intervention did not help. D. Austen Sommer said his father was in his dotage and had become soft on the issues because of his age. He pointed out that Alexander Campbell had done the same thing with the missionary society, but Daniel reminded everyone that when Campbell embraced the society he was the same age as D. Austen. Everywhere there were cries that the Review had betrayed the church and "let down the bars so the college preachers could come in and wreck everything, including the faith."

I was twenty-four years old when the storm broke and in my partisan enthusiasm was the one who accepted the challenge of the 82 year old Daniel to debate the issue. Fortunately, the debate did not materialize, but in our correspondence he expressed his sadness that I manifested so much zeal with so little knowledge. He also told me he had hoped his mantle would fall on my shoulders, and that he had earlier thought of Austen as his successor, but was disappointed that he had proven himself to be "a splinter off the butt-cut of humanity."

The situation of the Sommer family became more intense. All communication between D. Austen and the others broke down. Meanwhile the cry was raised among us to force every preacher to take a stand on the "Rough Draft" and to publicly declare himself. In many articles the quotation appeared, "Mark them which cause divisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which you have learned." In others we were reminded, "If any man come and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, and neither bid him Godspeed."

With such a spirit rampant among us, division became inevitable. Separation was regarded as the will of God. Maintenance of purity of doctrine by segregation from the compromisers was urged upon every side. The agitation for a mass meeting to be held in a central location to deal with the question became almost universal. There were no doubt some cool heads who cautioned care but they were in the minority and they were shouted down. We wanted action. It was time to show your colors, to put up or shut up! The day for deliberation was past. I think I was one of the ringleaders and I stayed in the thick of the fray by letters and articles. Parties must have "issues" to survive and in the absence of real ones they create their own!

2. Marriage and Evangelism

St. Louis, Here We Come!

Contents

The stage was set for a gathering of preachers and other interested persons to discuss what steps should be taken to unite our forces against the "Rough Draft." Kansas City was a central location. An invitation was extended by the elders at 26th and Spruce Streets to use their facilities. W. E. Ballenger, a widely recognized preacher and a member of the congregation presided over most of the meetings. Man after man mounted the platform to speak against "the departure from the faith" of the Review publishers.

It was generally agreed the Review was gone. The time had come to look elsewhere for "brotherhood leadership." Since the Macedonian Call was already being published and D. Austen Sommer had stood firm against his brothers we decided to back his journalistic effort. Those who continued to write for or report through the columns of the Review would be regarded as having departed from the faith. A document entitled "The Rough Draft— Its Sponsors— Also Its Outworkings— Why We Are Against It" was drawn up by D. Austen Sommer. A great many men signed it. Like John Hancock, I wrote my name big and bold. I also collaborated with Brother Sommer in drawing up another paper analyzing "the Rough Draft" and urging all who loved the Lord to lift up their voices against it.

Our action served to create another schism in an already divided movement. It also doomed the exclusivistic Sommer faction to death. Our actions were injudicious and our reactions unwarranted. I was wrong in what I did. A lot of things I wrote and said in the time of tension were absurd. I do not try to excuse them on the basis of youthful immaturity. I was sectarian in attitude and filled with pharisaic pride. I helped to create another arrogant and hostile party even though I acted in all good conscience. That I became a recognized leader in it was a tribute to my dogmatism and aggressiveness. I am ashamed of both of them. They only added to the sin.

If we had regarded the so-called "Rough Draft" as merely another newspaper article and allowed people to read it for themselves without trying to inject political prejudice into their minds it would not have caused a ripple. But when we took up our cudgels and attempted to beat brethren into submission we made a grievous error. It was a sin to call a general meeting in Kansas City for the purpose which prompted it. And it was a sin to create another party among those in the undivided Christ. That it fell my lot to become a "chief of sinners" in promoting the resultant mess is no comfort.

Legalistic sects secure no peace by division. So long as the spirit which prompted and encouraged the division remains, they only lay the groundwork for additional strife. Before it was all over Brother D. Austen Sommer, motivated by fear of the growing popularity of Mission Messenger which I published, became increasingly hostile to my work and refused to even meet with me to effect a reconciliation. When I laid my whole sectarian spirit down before the Conqueror of my person and heart, some of the brethren with whom I had long been associated as a champion, took up arms against me, regarding me as a Benedict Arnold or a Judas Iscariot. They were acting as sincerely as I had acted when I engaged in the same tactics and they were employing toward me the methods I had taught them by precept and example. One should not complain too much if he is fed from a spoon he polished himself. But there is something wrong about a system which breeds jealousy and envy instead of love, and which forces us to reject those who grow closer to Jesus, while accepting those who stagnate or wither on the vine!

Our new association flourished. Some of the most outstanding preachers of the gospel in the 1930's were a part of it. They were men who knew the Book and were powerful proclaimers of its message. There was no dearth of congregations and they were scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In Missouri alone there were 120 congregations with which we could labor. Our cause was relatively strong in Indiana, Illinois and Ohio. We were now "the faithful church" as distinguished from the "Rough Drafters." We were separated from each other by a newspaper article and the interpretation we placed upon its value. It is of such fragile cobwebs that sects are born with the strands being reinforced by human pride, fear and stubbornness.

It was during this period I was called upon to make a decision which would affect the remainder of my life. I went to St. Louis to conduct meetings for the brethren who met at 7121 Manchester Avenue. There were two meetings, each of two weeks duration. The first was in the autumn of 1934, and there was such an ingathering of souls that, after the meeting ended the brethren had to remodel the building and install a balcony to take care of the increased attendance. While I was there the leaders approached me about moving to the city which was known as "The Gateway to the West." They wanted me to labor with them by personal visitation to build up the cause. I promised to think about it but the bigness and noise of the city with its frightening influence had little appeal to me.

During the next two years the labors in Nevada and the harvest field were very satisfying and rewarding. Our children were growing and the relationship with the saints was pleasant and encouraging. In spite of this the suggestion planted by the brethren in St. Louis was beginning to appeal to my sense of purpose.

The congregation in St. Louis began with five women who had moved to the city from rural areas. The leading light was Bertha Robinson who came from north Missouri. With the help of her sister Mabel she began the work. Nell and I are agreed that, of all the people we have ever met, Bertha Robinson was the most saintly. Neither she nor her sister ever married, but both were truly wedded to the Lord and to Him gave their unstinted devotion. They did home baking for a select clientele and were famous for their cakes and cookies which graced many parties given by the socially elite.

When they moved to the city they never missed a Lord's Day of remembrance of Jesus. They set the Lord's Table in their home and were led to find three other sisters who had gone to the city and who met with them. Realizing that many would not meet in a home they decided to rent an upstairs hall on Vandeventer Avenue. They placed a modest advertisement in the classified section of the Saint Louis papers, alternating in the three news journals. Every Sunday Bertha prepared the items for the Lord's Supper and carried them on the streetcar to the meeting site. Here the five women sang hymns, prayed, studied the Word, and encouraged one another in the Lord. For weeks they petitioned God to send them a brother who could help by conducting the meetings.

The first man to attend was Edward Burtchinger, a Swiss gardener and yard man who had been brought to the United States to care for the grounds of a large estate. He was more of a problem than a help. He could not do anything in the public meetings and did not believe the women should. Bertha Robinson questioned him about every item in turn, but he could not sing, would not teach, and contributed only his presence and objections. The women, confronted with the dilemma of offending God or man, quickly reached a decision. They continued to carry on the meetings as before. Brother Burtchinger still attended.

The first real break came when Robert Morrow moved to the city from near Dixon, Missouri, having been reared in the faith in a rural congregation where all participated, he was capable of edifying and exhorting. With his advent others soon followed. The little group multiplied in number until they decided to purchase a place of their own. They soon learned of the meetinghouse at 7121 Manchester, located one block from the city limits, and with excellent trolley service from all sections of the city. This was an important consideration in a day when few families owned automobiles.

I first spoke for the brethren there when I was still a "boy preacher" and was passing through the city enroute to a meeting in the Lead Belt area. When I came back in 1934, which was eleven years later, I was 26 years old. The congregation was growing in numbers and in knowledge of the truth. There was an array of talent and I have seldom seen such a wealth of teaching and speaking ability. Robert Morrow lived next door to the meetinghouse and acted as a wise counselor. He was aided by a number of brethren who had gravitated to the city from Missouri and Illinois— Wilson, Thompson, Bilyeu, Janes, Smith, Baldwin, and many others, capable proclaimers of the Word. The greatest asset, however, was the number of young married couples, and the alert and spiritually aggressive young people, many of them still in high school.

The brethren wanted me to come for two reasons. First, they held the concept that congregations should be small and active, keeping every member occupied and busy in spiritual things. They wanted me to train every man to function in whatever capacity he could, and when the congregation attained to approximately 150 in regular attendance, take 30 or 40 and plant them as a nucleus in a new locality. They spoke of moving into the world by colonization, with the idea that the original congregation would supply the new group whatever was necessary until they could stand on their own feet.

As we discussed it, they used the illustration of a strawberry plant which puts out runners on all sides and starts new plants, until eventually a garden plot is covered and the fruit is abundant. The idea was not to erect huge material buildings, but to keep them small, and when the congregation outgrew the facilities, to plant a new one rather than to "tear down the barns and build greater." Repeatedly it was said that when bees fill a hive they swarm and the number of hives increase as a result. It was believed that so long as the brethren could maintain a family feeling, visiting one another in their homes and in hospitals, all sharing together at picnics and basket dinners, there would be less loss by attrition and desertion.

All of the men, some of whom were skilled in business and held trusted executive positions, felt that the same principles which were being used to weld together into a team the workers in industry, could be applied in modified form to build a congregation into a fighting unit in the army of the Lord. As they outlined it, my work as an evangelist, would be to go with each new group that was planted, remaining to teach and train them until they could function on their own. When bishops had been developed, selected by the saints, and ordained to function, my work in that congregation would end. I would then be free to go elsewhere and duplicate the process.

There was a general consensus that nothing could weaken a congregation quite so much as hiring a man to do the work which God ordained for all the members, and while rapid numerical growth would be experienced by such a method, it would amount to increasing the number of weak and dependent members whose trust was more in man than in God. My task would be with new congregations where I would work myself out by working others in.

Secondly, the brethren felt that my knowledge and insights, which they greatly over-estimated, should be made available on a wider scale so that young men could be imbued with a desire to take the Good News to a world of suffering mankind and could be trained for more effective service in their communities. It was proposed that I teach an annual Bible Study to which men and women might come without charge for enrollment or tuition. In connection with such a study I would teach public speaking, vocabulary expansion and word studies, employing the Bible as the only textbook.

The prospect was appealing since many congregations had young people of promise who were anxious to learn the word of God more perfectly. It appeared to be an opportunity to strengthen the future potential leadership of the churches. I had already decided I would like to have our children reared in a large city environment where they could have cultural benefits not available in a more restricted area. St. Louis was a historic spot which attracted men and women seeking jobs, from every section of the Missouri Ozarks, as well as from states like Arkansas, Kentucky and Tennessee.

What I did not realize at the time was that we were considering becoming a part of the restless current flowing from rural areas to urban centers and that we would be on the cutting-edge of a tremendous national transformation which would eventually upset and destroy many of the traditions we had cherished. It seemed wise to move because I could better promote the cause to which I was dedicated. As I talked with the brethren the question of support arose. I expressed my opposition to making a contract or having agreement on a fixed salary. I told them I was willing to come and they could provide for my needs as they saw fit. One of them said, "You make the move and we promise you we will not allow Nell and the children to starve." It was the only financial agreement we ever had.

In years to come as they attempted to give me increasing amounts I repeatedly refused them accepting only what was essential to meet our immediate needs. When they insisted on exceeding this, Nell and I simply returned it to the congregation with our thanks. I felt that if I took more than our need required, God would cease to bless us. I did not want to become a "peddler of the gospel." I wanted to share what I had to offer and I was content for the brethren to "share with him that teacheth in all good things."

I suspect now that my decision to move was a traumatic experience for Nell but if it was she kept it in her heart. We liked Nevada. We liked our simple house. We loved the people very deeply. It was heartbreaking to leave them. Many of the older ones wept, thinking they would see our faces no more. They were especially reluctant to give up Jerry and Sue and imagined all sorts of dire things which would happen to them in the city. The whole congregation felt a kind of proprietary interest in the children.

Our plans to move were complicated somewhat by the fact that I was to become involved in my first major debate. I had previously engaged in skirmishes of a local nature and had probably become too fond of this kind of thing. I had gone looking for "trouble" at tent meetings of various kinds and had gloried in the fact that sometimes the Pentecostals had threatened to call the police and have me arrested.

Now I was to meet Rue Porter, a brother of renown, especially in southern Missouri and Arkansas. He was a skillful tactician on the forensic platform. Men who knew him well and who were on his side, predicted he would skin me alive and hang my pelt on the barn door. I regarded all such prophecies as a part of the "psyching process" practiced on opponents. But since this was the beginning of numerous battles I will give a fuller account in my next chapter.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

The Debating Years Begin

Contents

The little town of Ozark is the county seat of Christian County, Missouri. It is built around the courthouse square, and is a lovely and peaceful community except when a trial of note takes place in the courtroom. Perhaps the most exciting of such events was when the leader of the "Bald Knobbers" was sentenced to death a number of years ago. Bald Knobbers were a lawless element ruling the hill country by threats and violence. They took their name from the rock-strewn treeless crests of hills where they hung their signal lanterns when getting ready for a foray. When the law finally caught up with them, the leader was sentenced to "hang by the neck until dead" and the sentence was carried out on an open scaffold erected in the courtyard. It attracted about the largest crowd ever seen in Ozark.

It was in Ozark I debated Rue Porter four nights, March 23-26, 1937. The debate resulted from a chain of circumstances. The congregation at Ozark had only one elder left, Charles F. Boyd, a respected attorney, and for a number of years the County Superintendent of Schools. In 1933, while I was in a meeting at Nixa, he arranged for me to conduct a similar meeting at Ozark the following year. As the date for the meeting was approaching he was visited by several members of the congregation who had recently moved into the area and who demanded that he cancel it. They objected that I was not a "loyal preacher," being an opponent of orphan homes and colleges created and maintained by the brethren. They did not want their names associated with that of an "anti." Brother Boyd firmly insisted he would not dispense with the meeting purely on the basis of their protests.

As time for the meeting drew near a number of them walked out and formed a rival congregation which began meeting in the Klepper Funeral Home. I conducted the meeting for which I had been scheduled, and while I was there announcements were posted about town to the effect that Rue Porter, of Neosho, Missouri would hold a meeting at the other place. Meanwhile I received a letter from Elton Abernathy who had graduated from Abilene Christian College and was associated with the Speech Department of the University of Iowa, suggesting that we discuss the whole question of "extra institutions" at Springfield, Missouri. He proposed a public debate there during the Christmas holidays of 1936.

I accepted at once and secured the promise of wholehearted cooperation from the brethren in Springfield who opposed the institutionalizing of the teaching and charitable functions of the body of Christ. While I was preparing for the encounter I received a letter from Brother Abernathy bowing out of the discussion and apologizing for even suggesting it. The brethren whom he purposed to represent had notified him they did not want these matters discussed in their area and would vigorously oppose such a debate. It was at this time word was conveyed to me that Brother Porter had publicly stated in a meeting at Ozark, held under the auspices of the brethren who were meeting in the Klepper Funeral Home, that we did not have a man among us who would dare to stand on the same platform with him and debate these matters.

I immediately wrote to him and told him I was picking up the gauntlet he had flung down and would gladly engage in a discussion with him. We agreed upon all of the details without lengthy correspondence. The Works Progress Administration had erected a lovely large Community Hall in the center of Ozark and we decided to use its spacious auditorium. There was no other place large enough to accommodate the audience. Excitement ran high and almost a thousand people crowded into the little town each night for the event.

Although I had never met Brother Porter, I knew a great deal about him and all of it was good. He was in the generation preceding mine, being twenty years older than myself. He was approaching his forty-eighth birthday, and I was less than two months away from my twenty-ninth. During the debate he constantly referred to me as "the boy." Brother Porter was one of a special class of preachers produced by the Churches of Christ in Arkansas and the Missouri Ozarks during that era. Many of these had no college training, but they knew the text of the Bible so thoroughly they could reel off whole chapters of it in one sermon, giving "book, chapter and verse" for every point of emphasis as they constantly reminded the audience.

They made great sacrifices of time and comfort, going often into remote rural areas for meetings, and being away from home for weeks on end. They held meetings in schoolhouses, brush arbors, and in the open air, as well as in little white meetinghouses. Often they were underpaid, sometimes taking a side of bacon, a gallon of sorghum molasses, or garden produce as part of their remuneration. Many of them gratified their hearers by "skinning the sects" and nothing pleased them more than to goad the Baptists into a free-for-all, and a verbal tug of war! Of course there were Baptists who loved it also, and men like Ben M. Bogard of the Landmark Missionary Baptist Church held there was no closed season on Campbellites. These country preachers on both sides were as "keen as a briar" and each one knew exactly what his opponent would say in reply to his arguments.

When Brother Porter and I met he had already engaged in twenty-five debates, all but one with Baptist preachers. He chose as his moderator, Joe Blue, another well-known hill country preacher and debater. I selected as my moderator W. G. Roberts. He was always ready to tangle with anyone in debate but specialized on Mormons. His favorite proposition was: "Resolved that Joseph Smith was a polygamist, a thief and a liar." He was ready to affirm it at the drop of a hat and if no one dropped a hat, he would throw down his own and affirm it anyhow.

My initial meeting with Brother Porter was when I shook hands with him on the platform the first night. In appearance he reminded me of Abraham Lincoln. His was the first affirmative, so he would both open and close the debate. The proposition he affirmed read: "The erection and maintenance of orphans homes, such as Tipton Orphans Home, Southern Christian Home, and others of like character, for the purpose of housing and otherwise caring for orphan children, is authorized by the New Testament scriptures." When the hour arrived to begin Brother Blue called on Brother H. H. Kiestenkamp of Rolla, Missouri to lead in prayer. Each side always called on a visitor favorable to their position. Neither side recognized an opposing preacher as worthy to talk to the Father.

After his preliminary remarks during which Brother Porter defined the terms of his proposition, he turned to the scriptures which he insisted authorized the building and maintenance of orphan homes. They were James 1:27, Ephesians 2:10, Galatians 4:18, Hebrews 13:16, and Romans 12:13. He declared that James 1:27 "will be the rallying ground and the center of the controversy, as the place around which every argument I shall make will be built. I propose to make but one argument on this entire proposition. One argument!"

My reply will be obvious to the reader, and I made it! When we are to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, Brother Porter denied that the word "go" included a missionary society. By the same kind of reasoning, when we are told to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, I denied that the word "visit" included a charitable organization or society. Moreover James 1:27 not only enjoins one to visit the fatherless but to keep himself unspotted from the world. I asked Brother Porter what kind of an organization he would recommend for the last half of the verse.

The reporter for the Springfield newspaper who covered the event did a lengthy write-up after the first night. It featured the debate on the front page with headlines and carried over to the back page in a kind of blow-by-blow account. The cartoonist who accompanied the reporter did caricatures of both debaters. As a result of the publicity the feeling was a little more intense the second night. As I pressed my respondent, Brother Blue interposed several times while I was speaking. Brother Porter and I never "lost our cool" but some in the audience were not so calm. After the discussion for that evening was ended the people refused to leave. They stood about in small groups assessing the merits of the speeches. An elder passing by one small knot of brethren, overheard one remark, "That Ketcherside ought to be taken out and tied to a tree and whipped."

On the third night it was my turn to lead out. The proposition read: "The erection and maintenance of schools or colleges, such as Abilene Christian College, David Lipscomb College, and others of like character, for the purpose of teaching the Bible and other branches of learning in connection, is contrary to the New Testament, and should be opposed as an innovation in the church." My moderator collaborated with Brother Blue in urging the hearers to leave the debating to the men on the platform and not to "get warm under the collar" as some did the night before. He called upon D. Austen Sommer to lead the prayer and then introduced me for the first affirmative.

After defining my terms in formal fashion I said, "I shall demonstrate that the Bible College is the introduction of something new into the Church of Jesus Christ and should be regarded as something not apostolic, and therefore, contrary to the New Testament Scripture." I then proceeded with a chain of scriptural passages which had about as much bearing on my theme as the ones cited by Brother Porter did on his. I reinforced my charges with quotations from Alexander Campbell, J. N. Armstrong, David Lipscomb, the Freed-Hardeman College Bulletin and the Abilene Christian College Bulletin. Some of these were a little careless and unguarded in their statements and played right into my hands. I had researched them meticulously and had them indexed like a Philadelphia lawyer.

Brother Porter was indeed a worthy respondent. He placed the questions we were discussing in the realm of opinion, saying, "These are questions of an individual nature. They are for the Christian to decide as an individual. It is a matter of opinion not a matter of law. No, sir, it isn't a matter of law." His position was that a teacher in one of the schools was simply an individual exercising his right and duty to teach the Bible as he would in the home or on the street. Brother Porter told who did not own the schools, but he never told who did.

When the fourth night of discussion was ending and time was called on Brother Porter, he said, "Thank you, ladies and gentlemen, the debate is over. May God bless every one of you. Carl, I want to shake your hand as a manifestation of my friendliness toward you. I love you, and will be your friend for as long as we live."

I replied, "Thank you! I appreciate greatly the opportunity of discussing these issues with you, and I hope the time will come when all of God's people may be one in Christ." When I said it, I knew there would never be oneness until Brother Porter and all who stood with him reached the conclusion that I was right and they were wrong, and came to do obeisance and confess their error for endorsing such things as the orphan homes and Christian colleges.

But my respect for Brother Porter, already great, increased with the passing of the years. When he grew old and was unable to continue in active labor in the vineyard because of his infirmities, an appeal for financial assistance was made to pay for his heavy doctor and hospital expenditure. Nell and I wrote him about our prayers on his behalf which were fervent and sent a check to help in his time of distress. His reply was gentle and gracious, and when I heard that he had been summoned to meet the Lord I felt a real sense of personal loss. I expect to meet him some day in a land where there will be no further challenges and fellowship will not be judged upon the basis of earthly knowledge or of human conformity.

I doubt that the debate changed many minds. People left with the same prejudices they had when they came. The same congregations remain in Ozark although four decades have come and gone and most of the principals in the original cleavage are asleep with their fathers. The division has taken on new dimensions with the passing of time. It has solidified and crystallized. There is little remembrance that the saints once ate together at a common table.

But the discussion launched me as a debater in a factional orbit. I think now that I thought more highly of myself than I ought to have thought. This feeling was no doubt enhanced by the fact that congregations with whom I had labored in Springfield, Saint Louis and Kansas City publicly challenged Brother Porter to meet me in their cities. He at first indicated he would but then declined to do so. This stimulated my unholy egotism, especially when I learned from a reliable source that several preachers told Brother Porter that if he debated the issues with me in these centers he would set the cause back fifty years.

I confess with some little regret, and even a sense of shame, that I delighted in such confrontations. I liked being the "gun-toter" for a small party and taking on the best that the big

"main-line" churches had to offer. Before I became convinced of the detrimentality of debates to the cause for which Jesus died I debated most of the recognized gladiators of that era— G. C. Brewer, G. K. Wallace, Sterl Watson, W. L. Totty, Flavil Colley, and others.

We were lawyers for the prosecution seeking to interpret as a legalistic code the revelation of God given in love. All of us, without realizing it, were casuists, justifying what we did and condemning what others did, and doing so arbitrarily. We were defending a pattern which was not there and seeking to impose a binding dogmatism which God did not impart. But we had to go through this stage. It was a part of the maturing process for a movement seeking for status in a world made up of ancient religious forms which were hallowed and respected because of their age. We could, like children, call attention to our presence by fighting one another. I suspect the world looked on with amusement at our antics. I now look at them the same way!

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

"He Being Dead, Yet Speaketh"

Contents

I am writing this chapter on the forty-eighth anniversary of our wedding. I am doing so because it is also the thirty-ninth anniversary of our arrival in Saint Louis. Nell and I had come to the city a few weeks before and rented a modest cottage on Page Avenue, and then returned to Nevada to go through the traumatic experience of closing out one phase of our earthly sojourn. By the afternoon of June 23, 1937, the moving van backed out of our graveled driveway and started the journey across the state. Soon after, we followed in our automobile, and after staying all night at a motel enroute, arrived at our new home the next morning to find the movers there awaiting our coming.

Almost immediately we were caught up in the work of the congregations. I use the word in the plural because the brethren had decided not to wait our arrival to plant another community of believers. About fifty of them banded together and purchased a modest meetinghouse at 5344 Lillian Avenue, in the northern part of the city. A great many of the most talented brethren were associated with the new effort, but there were men of promise remaining with the original congregation, some of them still quite young. The older congregation held its midweek meeting on Wednesday night and the new one on Thursday night. On each of those nights brethren from both places were together exploring the Word. On Sunday nights there was an exchange of speakers and it was as if one large family, living in two houses, met together for visitation and sharing.

The Thompson and Bilyeu families bought a sizeable acreage in the beautiful and fertile Florissant Valley, and Brother Leonard Bilyeu developed five acres as a kind of playground for the brethren. Every fourth of July, all of the brethren from congregations on both sides of the Mississippi River gathered for a day of physical relaxation and spiritual uplift, and in late autumn all returned again for a wiener roast and a time of rejoicing in the presence of one another. There was a closeness among the families such as is seldom seen, and although rigid discipline was maintained in the congregations, it was not heavy-handed and authoritarian.

I began at once a door-to-door visitation in the area adjacent to the Manchester site, and soon a number of brethren joined together to place an invitation in every home in a carefully mapped-out territory. Meanwhile the brethren in the northern part of the city were knocking on fifteen hundred doors, and when I was free I went to work with them, helping to take a religious census which became a valuable aid in our future endeavors. Both congregations began to grow numerically and the fruit of hard work and fervent prayers could be seen. I do not recall ever seeing a more makeshift baptistry than the one at Manchester Avenue. It consisted of a steel stock tank installed beneath the floor of the speaker's platform, but scores of people were immersed into Christ and no one ever made a complaint about the inconvenience.

Before the first year was ended it became apparent that we were ready for the second phase of our plan. We had two congregations functioning without a special minister and with a leadership which knew how to involve the membership in active participation. A different speaker delivered a message of edification and exhortation each Sunday morning and evening, and the classes at midweek meetings were taught by various brethren who made diligent preparation. Open expression of different views was encouraged in the studies, and although firm opinions were set forth, I do not recall any rudeness or imposition. I took my turn in speaking, but most of the time I listened and learned from clothing salesmen, production line workers, bookkeepers, night watchmen, bakers and others. All of them drew upon incidents in their own lives to illustrate the message for the rest of us and we were thus permitted to hear a great many modern parables.

It was now time for us to share our life in the Lord on a wider basis. The brethren met for several lengthy sessions to talk about and plan the approach we should take in helping to develop the talents and abilities of those who were eager to prepare themselves for greater service. At the outset it was agreed that we would not organize anything. I would simply teach the Word of God with the Bible as our only textbook. The studies would be made available to any person, regardless of age, who wanted to come. There would be no tuition or charges of any kind. We would have a six-weeks course in the winter, on the same schedule as the public schools, starting at 9:00 a.m. and closing at 4:00 p.m. Each week there would be two night sessions of two hours each. One of these would be held at 7121 Manchester Avenue, the other at 5344 Lillian Avenue. All day classes would be at the Manchester Avenue address because of the accessibility to modestly priced eating places in the area.

Members who wished to do so would open up their homes and rent sleeping quarters to students. Other students would find such facilities in private homes near the place of study. This was never a problem and as time went on many of the students made a profound spiritual impact upon the homes where they rented rooms. One day each week the sisters from each congregation would bring home-cooked food at noon and serve it in the basement to all who wished to partake. It was expected that on these two days there would be sufficient food remaining so the out-of-town students could eat again that evening. So many persons were directly involved that the congregations were alive and active and all were sharing in a great learning experience.

A good many preaching brethren attended, and a number of young men and women who had just graduated from high school came to study before entering college or university. From the outset it was agreed we would not try to develop a certain class of brethren. We were afraid this would lead to a clerical caste. We decided to abide by the dictum of Benjamin Franklin, the gospel preacher, who said, "Teach the whole Bible to the whole church, and the leadership will rise to the top as cream rises on the milk." Ten congregations in the area opened their pulpits every Sunday to men who were attending, and thus heard a different speaker every Sunday morning and night. Some of these never intended to become evangelists, but many of them did become elders at a later date.

It soon became apparent that we could extend the period of intensive study and we doubled the time to three months. We did a great many interesting things together although the class grew to approximately one hundred. Every Thanksgiving Day we studied until noon and then went to a nearby Masonic Temple where we had rented a huge dining hall for the occasion. We had a basket dinner followed by a program of edification in the afternoon at which anyone could speak briefly about what was upon his heart.

When we studied about the death of Joseph and the embalming of his body, I took the whole class for an afternoon at the beautiful art museum. I had been accorded the privilege of lecturing on Egyptology in the "mummy room" and frequently the talk on the technique of embalming, made especially vivid by the sarcophagus on display, attracted a number of tourists and visitors who thought it was a regular feature presented by museum personnel. When we reached Exodus and Leviticus, we went on Friday night at sunset to Temple Israel where we occasionally outnumbered the Jewish worshipers at the first sabbath service. I became so well acquainted with the senior rabbi, Dr. Ferdinand M. Isserman, that he frequently announced, "We have Dr. Ketcherside and numerous of his disciples with us tonight, and after the blessing of the Torah I am going to request that he come forward and bring us a greeting." I never failed to express our gratitude to the Jews present because their fathers had guarded the sacred oracles and given us the Messiah to sit upon David's throne.

Every passing month in Saint Louis brought new triumphs of the Spirit, but there was an air of foreboding over the country which aroused fear and unrest in the hearts of the people. The name of Adolf Hitler began to appear on the front page of the newspaper every day. In March 1938 the German regime annexed Austria. In September goose-stepping troops occupied the Sudetenland in Czechoslovakia. In the same month Neville Chamberlain, prime minister of Great Britain, sought to halt further inroads by signing the Munich Pact, representing a policy of abject appeasement. Hitler continued his ruthless acts of aggression and Chamberlain was forced to declare war on Germany on September 3, 1939.

Meanwhile we continued with "business as usual" in Saint Louis, although most of us realized that the United States would become actively involved. As President Roosevelt began to step up the preparedness program people began to move to the city, attracted by jobs and higher wages. The meetinghouses were filled on Sunday. The contributions grew perceptibly. Meanwhile, when Germany invaded Norway and the British forces were defeated, Chamberlain gave way to Winston Churchill, who told the British people, "I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears, and sweat."

All over the country, factories began to hum with intensified acceleration. Munitions manufacturing plants worked around the clock. Bombing planes were turned out with the precision of clockwork. Great army camps began to spring up in strategic locations, and it was at one of these posts my father became the first civilian casualty of World War Two, losing his life on October 25, 1941. He had hired on as a carpenter supervisor at the largest wage he had ever drawn in his life. He had dreams of paying off his debts in a very few weeks. For the first time in his life he would be free of the burden of owing money to others. He told my mother that as soon as he made enough the two of them would take a vacation and return to the place where she was born and lived as a girl.

He was sent to Neosho, Missouri to do construction work on Camp Crowder, but he was able to work but three days. The heavy autumn rains had fallen for days on end and the field was a quagmire. On the third day after his arrival, my father was working on a high scaffold bolting sections of a huge pre-fabricated dining-hall together near the roof. A shudder went through the structure and those who could leaped from it as it began to collapse. It drove the body of my father four feet into the earth and almost every bone was broken. He survived long enough to whisper his name and that of my mother through the bloody froth bubbling from his lips, and then the spirit fled from the crushed and broken tabernacle.

I went to Neosho to meet my mother and claim the body and we rode back to Topeka together. I think we were numbed by our loss. When the mortuary closed the night before the memorial service was to be held, I asked permission from the mortician to stay for a few minutes. He allowed me do so, and we were alone for the last time on earth— a boy and his dad. As I looked at him it seemed that he moved. It appeared that his chest raised and lowered as if he were breathing in gently the precious oxygen which we all inhale without thinking about it. But I knew it was fantasy. I would never be able to speak to him again in the flesh. He would never hear me preach again, and I would never hear the good news from his lips. I made him a promise that I would keep the faith until we met. I closed the door softly and walked out into the night.

When we arrived in Saint Louis and I examined the mail there was a postcard from my father. It was written the night before he was killed. He told me how pleased he was to be in a place where there was a congregation which he could help without taking any financial aid. He also told me that he was sorry to have to be away from home and then added a phrase which seemed almost prophetic: "Sometimes we have to be absent from each other so our joy will be greater when we meet again." I still have the card. At the time when I first saw the old familiar handwriting, I thought, "He being dead, yet speaketh!"

A short time later I wrote an article for a special issue of Macedonian Call which was devoted largely to the life and death of my father. I am taking the liberty of sharing with you the first rather lengthy paragraph:

"I stood with bowed head beside an open grave a few weeks ago. The sun had hidden her face, and a gray sky wept tears, as the chill of the autumn afternoon crept into the blood of those who stood to look down upon the mountain of flowers surrounding a simple casket. I stood with my hand upon the shoulder of one of the dearest women on earth to me— my mother, for there before us cold and rigid in death lay her husband and my father. The last song had been sung at the mortuary a short time before, and now a faithful brother in Christ was speaking his final words. Many of those who stood near were wiping away the tears which stole silently and unashamedly down their cheeks. But I could not weep for him who had gone on before. One does not weep for the hero who dies in his struggle for principle, who surrenders his armor to the only enemy strong enough to conquer him— death! I have often wondered as I stood beside other graves as the speaker, just how I would feel when I stood beside one as a mourner. I knew now, and somehow the emotion was different than I had imagined. For mingled with the indescribable pang of regret that I would never hear my dad speak again, there was an almost glorious feeling, an uplifting thought bordering on happiness, that he died triumphant, uncompromising. I knew now what Paul meant when he said, 'We sorrow not as others which have no hope.' The world is emptier today than it has ever been for me, and heaven seems strangely closer than I ever conceived it. But overcoming that feeling of personal loss is the joyful thought that the grave cannot always be victorious over our beloved dead."

My father had been doing personal work in Riverside, California, going from door to door, soon after Daniel Sommer died. He knocked on the door of one of the elders of a congregation composed chiefly of members from Texas. This man said, a little contemptuously, to my father, "I see where your leader died." Dad replied, "Yes, and if you will read a little further in the same book, you will see that he rose again."

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

Mission Messenger Begins

Contents

I am sure we made a lot of mistakes in the work in Saint Louis. Many of these were the result of attitudes. I can see now that we were quite exclusivistic, the first symptom of the sectarian spirit. It is probable that we could not have done too much to promote unity of the brethren at the time because the climate was not right. Bridges must be built from both sides of the stream. Our approach to unity was quite simple. If everyone else gave up what they thought and joined in with us we would be together. There was no other way because we were the Lord's people. Our way was "the way that is right and cannot be wrong." We were no different in this respect than other factions in the area. All of us thought that our group was the one which heaven had established and all recognized the others as apostates and teachers of heresy.

There was a constant open season on proselytizing. We rejoiced when one from another group "learned the way of truth more perfectly" and took his stand with us on "the old Jerusalem gospel," as we liked to think of our puerile system of traditions and opinions. We were all agreed upon one thing, even if we could not agree upon anything else. Instrumental music had originated with the family of Cain, was perpetuated by Satan, and was the sign and seal of spiritual departure and degradation. The Christian Churches had sold themselves to sin and when one of their members came around us we "Mistered" him while we reluctantly "Brothered" all who opposed the instruments even if we had to do it with our fingers crossed because they were "brothers in error."

It is obvious now that we had little consciousness of a vital personal relationship with the Lord. We were all affiliated with an institution whose chief men were skilled in legalistic nit-picking and who could "make out a case" for our procedural policy. Righteousness was not so much right standing with the Lord of glory, but standing right on the issues in which we gloried. We were very negative in our attitude toward the Holy Spirit and sought to confine him not so much to a compilation of printed pages, which would have been bad enough, but to our own understanding and interpretation, which was worse. This meant that if the Spirit did not work within the limits in which we worked and to which we assigned him, it was not the Holy Spirit at work at all, but Satan.

Not everything was bad, and we inaugurated some life-touching experiences. Perhaps the period from 1942 to 1947 constituted one of the busiest five years of my whole life. During that time the brethren started the third congregation. Taking about three dozen folk from Manchester Avenue who lived in the vicinity of Webster Groves, they planted them in a decrepit structure purchased from a defunct Pentecostal group. Emery Smith, who had moved to the city from Salem, Missouri, agreed to look after this group of humble people, and from the start they had "a mind to work." Brother Smith, who supported himself by hard manual toil at Missouri Bitumen Corporation, spent his spare time training, counseling and strengthening the saints. Because of their relative poverty the congregation at Manchester Avenue supplemented their contributions so they could meet their financial obligations.

Members of the other congregations went from work each evening to labor on the building. The sisters brought the evening meal and served it and there was a thirty minute prayer and praise service every evening while eating the "love snack," after which all returned to the task to continue until midnight. We grew as a spiritual temple even as the material building became more habitable. On December 18, 1946, the brethren at Manchester Avenue met to discuss the planting of the fourth congregation, and to pray for God to open up an effectual door for the fulfillment of their plans. It is interesting to recall that I was not even in the city when any of the congregations were started. All of them were started by the elders who told me about it when I returned from work elsewhere.

I developed a series of tracts to use in sowing the seed. We took advantage of the latest printing techniques, employing modern typefaces and illustrative material. We used these in "saturation bombing," marking out areas of the city in which we covered every house. Brethren carried a supply with them, distributing them at work, passing them out on streetcars and buses, putting them in letters to friends and using them wherever opportunity was presented. At Manchester Avenue a tract rack was erected close to the sidewalk and kept supplied. Other congregations in distant states learned about them and asked to purchase them, so that we began printing them in lots of 50,000 at a time. Even to this day, in out-of-the-way places I still run into stray copies of "This Way and That Way," "Daughters of the Horseleech," and "Human Ostriches." They are yellowed and faded now!

In 1943 we started a thirty minute radio program called "The Church of Christ Hour." It was aired on Sunday afternoons. Three singing groups alternated, and when I was out of the city, Hershel Ottwell directed the program and presented my talks from the script I had prepared. Hershel and I had known each other from boyhood in Pike County, Illinois. He was younger than I, but had been present when I presented my first talk at Old Pearl, where his family also attended. He was a great fellow-workman and did an excellent job on the radio. One cannot afford to make too many errors in a live presentation. I do not recall Hershel making any. The program averaged a pulling power of 400 letters per month. The greatest return for a single speech was 468 pieces of mail.

The manager wrote to inform us that the program was by far the most popular on the station. We never mentioned money and never asked for a contribution, but we received enough voluntary gifts to pay the entire cost some weeks. For a number of years after we closed the broadcasts I found individuals at various functions where I was the speaker who told me, "I used to listen to you on the radio every Sunday." At the end of each quarter my radio talks for the thirteen weeks were printed in book form. Some of the titles of these little volumes are indicative of their content, such as "The Bible versus False Theories," "Proven Proverbs," "Storm Clouds Over America," "The Sermon on the Mount," "Happy Homes," "Actions in Acts," and others like them.

It was late in 1945 I got into the publishing business in a very minor way. I brought out a rather large cloth-bound volume under the title *New Testament Questions, by E. M. Zerr. I followed this with a compilation of some of the writings of W. G. Roberts which we called *Lessons From Yesterday. In 1946 we began to plan publication of Bible Commentary by E. M. Zerr. It required a great deal of time, effort and money. Before it was completed it covered six volumes which cost a total of almost $35,000. At the outset it became apparent that Brother Zerr was not trained to write this type of material, in spite of his comprehensive knowledge of the Bible. Cleona Harvey, who was secretary to the dean of the Indiana State School of Dentistry, agreed to read and edit the entire manuscript. The arrangement did not suit Brother Zerr very well since he did not appreciate another telling him how to say what he wanted to say. But when I pointed out to him a whole lot of typographical and other errors in the first volume on which he had insisted correcting the proofs, and told him that I would not publish any further volumes without editing, he reluctantly consented.

A lot of the material was written in our home. Brother Zerr refused to work more than four hours daily on the writing. He arose before 4:00 a.m. and downed a couple of mugs of strong coffee and started promptly on the hour. When 8:00 a.m. arrived he stopped writing, even if he was in the middle of a sheet of paper. He composed at the typewriter and produced almost flawless copy insofar as margins and the number of lines were concerned. He worked six days per week and stayed with the stupendous task until he became the only man in the restoration movement to produce a commentary on the entire word of God. We brought out 3000 sets of six volumes each, which means that we sold 18,000 volumes. I coined the publicity phrase, "the commentary of the common man," after hearing Brother Zerr tell repeatedly how his cousin, Noah Smith, at Sullivan, Illinois, had said, "Now Eddie, if you do write a commentary don't wade in too deep and get over our heads. Just write it for folks like me and act as if we don't know nothin'."

Perhaps one of the most significant things I did in Saint Louis was to begin publication of a monthly journal called *Missouri Mission Messenger. It was originally intended to be a chronicle of activities and news events of our party in the state. By keeping all of the congregations informed as to what was transpiring it was hoped we might be encouraged to greater activity and service to the Master. Gradually subscriptions began to come in from other states and eventually it seemed appropriate to drop the word "Missouri" and simply call it *Mission Messenger. It was no longer a provincial publication.

At the time of its inception we had no idea that the paper would ever be sent to more than 8,000 readers, upon every continent of the globe, each month. It was only after I became convinced that what we termed "the Church of Christ" was not identical with the one body for which Jesus died, but had been fashioned into a party growing out of a historical attempt to restore the primitive order, the paper really began to be read more widely. The first article on fellowship was printed in 1957 and brought both public and private attacks from preaching brethren with whom I had labored. After the initial hue and cry, which I sought to answer in a spirit of loving concern, the paper reached out beyond our narrow and circumscribed factional limits. It was almost as if my own spiritual encounter had been timed for supplying a deep need of those who were growing tired of the party spirit with its wrangling and strife, its bitterness and hostility. But more about that later!

As mid-1946 approached, plans for my trip to Great Britain had progressed to the point that a date for going and an itinerary abroad had been worked out. Nell and I would leave Saint Louis on Tuesday, February 18, after I had finished the six-weeks annual Bible Study. It was a busy time of preparation, but then something occurred to make it busier. In late September I was visited by a large delegation of preachers from the other "Churches of Christ" in the area demanding that we debate the Bible College issue "once and for all." They were inviting Dr. G. C. Brewer of Memphis to represent their position and asked if I was afraid to meet him. I was not, and it turned out we had two debates within three weeks of each other, one in Saint Louis, the other at Freed-Hardeman College during their lectureship.

Brother Brewer submitted his affirmation which read: "The organization of schools and colleges as David Lipscomb College (Nashville, Tennessee) for the purpose of teaching the Bible and other subjects in connection, is in harmony with God's Word, and therefore scriptural." I signed it without a quibble. The debate was held in the auditorium of the Saint Louis House, the nights of December 16, 17, 18, 19. More than 600 persons attended each session. W. L. Totty moderated for Brother Brewer, E. M. Zerr for me. Presiding over all sessions was the Honorable William R. Schneider, a nationally known jurist, author of the Workmen's Compensation Law, and formerly a candidate for governor of Missouri.

It was evident our opposing brethren had made a good choice in Brother Brewer. He was distinguished in appearance, an orator of note, and a man of culture. He was a member of the faculty of Harding College and had been given his honorary degree of Doctor of Laws by the school. Many brethren sympathetic with his views flocked into Saint Louis, among them being Eugene S. Smith, publisher of Gospel Broadcast; Dr. George S. Benson, president of Harding College; A. B. Barrett, president of Florida Christian College; Frank L. Cox, of Firm Foundation; Edward J. Craddock, of Chicago; G. A. Dunn, Sr., of Dallas, Texas; and L. C. Sears, dean of Harding College.

Unfortunately, Brother Brewer jerked the rug out from under some of his supporters by taking the position that the schools were adjuncts to the church and represented the church at work. He said he had personally made pleas for their support from the treasuries of the churches, and had urged that they be put into the regular congregational budgets. A lot of brethren who were on his side of the fence told me that if what he said was correct they were more sympathetic toward my position than toward his.

Brother Brewer was so pleased with the conduct manifested in the debate, he suggested that the two of us hold a series of "Lincoln-Douglas" type debates in all of the college auditoriums. He further suggested that we begin at Freed-Hardeman, and Dean Sears invited us to hold the second at Harding College in Searcy, Arkansas. The Freed-Hardeman debate was held before an overflow crowd on January 7. We discarded the use of moderators since both of us knew we could act as gentlemen. W. L. Totty acted as timekeeper for Brother Brewer, Fred Killebrew served in the same capacity for me.

I took the position that the apostles planted a school for teaching the Bible in every city where they labored, and that Jesus Christ was the president; the apostles and evangelists were the recruiting and field agents to secure students for the institution; the elders and others under them constituted the faculty; every disciple was an enrolled student, with the only textbook being the Word of God. I asked him to find the place where any of the apostles ever created the kind of organization he was defending.

It was a great day and the two sessions were conducted in good order with great response. At the close, N. B. Hardeman arose and said that since I had now taught in Freed-Hardeman I might like a job on the faculty.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

On Board the Queen Elizabeth

Contents

In these days of almost casual tourist travel it is difficult to explain the problems incurred in going to Great Britain in the early part of 1947. We had been in close contact for three years with Albert Winstanley, an outstanding young preacher of the gospel from Lancashire, who was by this time in Newtongrange, near Edinburgh, working with the Scots brethren. He contacted the various districts and we had drawn up an itinerary which would keep me occupied almost every day while we were in Great Britain. Since the first contact with Adam and George Bruce in Windsor, Ontario, in 1929, correspondence had been exchanged with saints abroad, and now sixteen years had elapsed, and we were waiting for a frightful war to cease.

On May 7, 1945, at a ceremony in the headquarters of General Dwight Eisenhower, at Reims, General Alfred Jodl signed an unconditional surrender of Germany's armed forces to the Allies. On September 2, just four months later, General MacArthur and Admiral Nimitz accepted the formal surrender of Japan aboard the battleship Missouri in Tokyo Bay. Vast areas of the cities in England lay in ruins. The task of cleaning up the rubble and restoring order from chaos would take many months.

I contacted a steamship company representative who said there were no sailings yet and even if there were I would have to secure a priority from the State Department. The State Department informed me there was a doubt the English Government would approve travel at the time. I went to the British Consul who asked me to make application to His Majesty's Passport Approval Bureau. The bureau notified us they would grant a visa for travel in the United Kingdom. The Cunard Lines told us they had a waiting list "a mile long" when passenger traffic was resumed. We wired New York and found that the Queen Elizabeth was scheduled for her first eastward trip, after converting from a troop-carrying vessel, at the very time we wanted to go.

After our reservation was confirmed we set about getting a passport. It was not easy because of the war restrictions still in vogue and it was necessary to file three notarized letters from the Manchester Avenue congregation before we were granted permission to go. When all of the legal requirements had been met other details had to be arranged. The children were in high school but Nell's father and mother agreed to come to Saint Louis to look after them during our absence. It was not easy for them because her father was the mayor of Flat River, as well as an elder in the local congregation.

Because of severe food rationing in the United Kingdom we arranged for congregations to send food parcels to help out. Some items were in shorter supply than during the war, among them fats, sweets, fruits and soap. Regulations permitted the sending of only one parcel per week by any person or firm, and the weight of each parcel was limited to 22 pounds. We assigned various areas in Great Britain to congregations which wanted to help, and each congregation sent one parcel per week for three weeks, making a total of 66 pounds sent to each place. Manchester Avenue congregation sent to the Lancashire District; Hartford, Illinois to Birmingham; Anderson, Indiana to Belfast, North Ireland; while other brethren sent to Kirkcaldy, Glasgow, London, etc.

When it was announced publicly that I planned to make the visit to the United Kingdom at the invitation of the brethren, it apparently created consternation in the ranks of the "mainline" Churches of Christ in the United States. They resolved to thwart it at all costs. The political propaganda machines were turned on full blast. All who had any relationship with congregations in Great Britain, especially American servicemen who had been stationed there, were urged to write and insist that my visit be cancelled. It was decided that the one person best qualified to offset any influence I might exert was John Allan Hudson.

Brother Hudson, who is best known as the originator of the Old Paths Book Club, had served as the minister of Southwest Church in Los Angeles, where he assisted the George Pepperdine Foundation, but was currently with the congregation at 39th and Flora Avenues, in Kansas City. He was well-known to the British brethren because of his work in Birmingham, as well as in Australia and New Zealand. With their characteristic zeal for local autonomy, a group of preachers met together to plan the strategy for stopping my work in Britain before it began. It was decided the best way to do it would be to support a "faithful preacher" in England for a whole year, preferably Brother Hudson. His chief objective would be to keep the British brethren from hearing me. A few weeks before I left home I received this letter from a brother in Britain:

"Brother John Allan Hudson has written to say he is flying over here to be in Britain before you arrive. I thought I ought to tell you this, so that you should be prepared. Yesterday I learned that he had decided to come to Britain (supported by churches in the U.S.) for twelve months. This was to be from April onwards, but apparently, on hearing of your proposed visit, he decided to come earlier. You may draw your own conclusions from this. But I do want you to know it will in no way interfere with your visit, or upset the arrangements in hand. There is much I want to discuss with you regarding Brother Hudson's visit, and we shall be able to talk it over thoroughly while you are here."

The "Central Intelligence Agency" of the American Churches of Christ did its work well. Form letters were sent to the elders of many of the congregations where I was to speak. Later on, after Nell and I had been guests for several days in the homes of such brethren they would bring out the letters and we would read them and have a good laugh about them. They uniformly classified me as dangerous, divisive and destructive to the peace and welfare of the body of Christ. All of them made dire predictions of what would happen to the British churches as a result of my coming. One of them concluded with the frightening admonition, "You have been warned!"

Our American brethren who are accustomed to seeing elders "roll over and play dead" or "jump through a theological hoop" when certain preachers issued an ultimatum reckoned without the British brethren. They did not understand the innate sense of fairness which caused them to hear a man out before assessing him as guilty. They did not take into account the quiet stubbornness which resented interference from across the Atlantic. I am afraid some of the Scots had stereotyped Americans, perhaps from the movies, and thought they all wore wide-brimmed hats and cowboy boots, and slapped strangers between the shoulder blades and said too loudly, "How you doin' podner?"

I went one day to visit a precious aged sister who lived in a tiny stone cottage in a colliery village. She spoke with a brogue as thick as porridge. You could have sliced it with a knife. If her daughter had not been there to interpret neither of us would have known much about what the other was saying. But it was apparent she liked me from the start and I loved her and the cozy little "hoose" in which she lived. When I led a little prayer and was preparing to leave she was pleased I had not shown up wearing a big "bonnet" and "yelling like a coo-boy."

One day at Ulverston, I was sitting before the grate with Brother Walter Crosthwaite, the sage of the Old Paths movement, and one of the saintliest men I have ever met. He was preparing tea in a soot-covered kettle. Neither of us had said anything for several minutes. Then he spoke, almost as if in reverie and to himself. "All of the real problems which have plagued the churches in Britain in the past have come from America." After a pause he added, "Most of them from Texas." That day he paid me the highest compliment I received in his country. "I thank the Father for allowing Nell and you to come, and for making it possible for you to stay in our humble abode." He did not realize, in his unsurpassable humility, that to be with him was a mountain-top experience I could never forget.

Now we will get back to our trip. On Tuesday morning, February 18, a group of thirty brothers and sisters gathered with us for breakfast at the Fred Harvey Lunch Room in the Saint Louis Union Station. After we had eaten together, Nell and I bade our children and the others a rather tearful farewell, and boarded the famous Sunshine Special pulled on its eastern journey over the Pennsylvania Lines track. Twenty-four hours later, at 7:30 a.m., we arrived in New York City with thirteen hours to spend before boarding the huge ship which was scheduled to sail in the early morning hours.

Since neither of us had ever been in New York City we were like "babes in the woods," gaping and gawking at soaring skyscrapers, and "sunburning our tonsils" gazing upward in open-mouthed amazement. Fortunately, no city slicker buttonholed us to try and sell us the Brooklyn Bridge. We had heard about Automats but had never seen one, so we ate a large breakfast at one and then went on a walking tour of Rockefeller Center. From the 70th floor of the RCA Building we could see the Queen Elizabeth lying in dock at pier 90. Further on we could make out the Statue of Liberty which we would pass next morning.

At 8:30 o'clock that evening we joined the throng milling about and boarded the greatest vessel of her day. Since that type of transoceanic travel has now passed away, supplanted by air transportation, I would like to describe one of the queens. The other was the sister ship the Queen Mary. The Queen Elizabeth was rated at 83,673 gross tons, with 14 decks. The vessel was more than five city blocks long, 118 feet wide and 234 feet from keel to masthead. The total space available to passengers for deck games and strolling exceeded in area 2½ football fields. There was even a special exercise area for dogs and each day the pampered pets were brought from the ship's kennels to be paraded around.

There were three anchors, each of which weighed 16 tons, and 2,000 portholes containing 2500 square feet of glass. There were 30,000 electric lights and 4000 miles of wiring. In all there were 35 public rooms— lounges, smoking rooms, dance halls, restaurants, children's playrooms, libraries, swimming pools, gymnasia, and three theaters. One of these seated 338 persons. The area of the First Class Restaurant was 13,133 square feet. On the main deck was located the winter garden with a profusion of fresh flowers. Here the ship's orchestra played classical selections at afternoon tea and again at night. Here also one could obtain free a copy of the "Ocean Times," a newspaper published on board each night.

On "A" Deck there was a large shop retailing everything from safety pins to men's shirts. On the same level was a barber shop for men and a beauty shop for women, as well as a smoking lounge with comfortable seats for several hundred. "B" Deck contained the nursery, a tourist gymnasium, a cinema and a large library. I checked out a copy of "This Man Truman," written by an Englishman. I got back out of some of the expressions such as "biscuit-barrel politics," which is as close as the British can get to our "cracker-barrel politics." Winston Churchill was right. We are a single people separated only by a common language.

We traveled "tourist" which was cheapest. Our stateroom had a lower and upper bunk-style bed, wardrobe, dressing table, chair and wash basin with hot and cold water. The space was restricted and while one did not actually need to back out into the corridor to turn around it would have helped. It was our home for six nights, the last at the expense of Cunard Lines. We warped into the dock at Southampton promptly at 2:00 p.m. on Tuesday, February 25. Tourist passengers were to disembark at 4:00 p.m. Then it happened! After part of our luggage was already off, a dock strike was called and none of us could leave the vessel.

Passengers became infuriated. They besieged the Purser's staff. There was cursing, shoving and yelling, but all to no avail. Staterooms had to be made up with clean linens and the chefs had to serve an extra dinner and breakfast. Although we were sorry to disappoint the brethren waiting for us at Waterloo Station in London there was nothing we could do. After dinner the Winter Garden was crowded but there was no orchestra. Without asking permission I mounted the platform, took over the microphone, and called for attention. I pointed out what an extraordinary opportunity this was to become acquainted and to hold an open forum on world conditions. We had people present from many nations, we had just seen the end of a disastrous World War, and I felt we should quit talking about our own temporary inconvenience and discuss openly our divergent views of world problems.

I suggested we stay on each subject exactly one hour and allow any man or woman to speak. We discussed marriage and divorce, then family responsibility and authority, and last of all the changes taking place in moral and ethical values. I adjourned the meeting at midnight over the shouted protests of many who wanted to continue. It was interesting to see how quickly order had developed out of chaos. The meeting was made to order for me. As the self-appointed chairman I injected the teaching of the Bible into the discussion at the end of every speech. If anyone asked a question of the chair, I answered it with the words, "Of course, the Bibles says . . . ."

The next morning we abandoned ship at 9:00 o'clock, and exactly an hour later the boat train pulled out for London. Immediately evident were the signs of the bombing raids made on this great harbor city. Whole blocks were wiped out. Fire-gutted buildings were everywhere. Our train arrived in London promptly at noon. We stepped into a new world. At home we always "checked our baggage" but in London we "registered our luggage." The station was huge and there were several large restaurants. We chose one and ordered our luncheon. It consisted of pork and peas cooked together, mashed potatoes, and coffee. If that sounds like a lot of potatoes, it is because this was one of the few items not rationed.

After we had eaten we boarded a taxi and went madly dashing down the wrong side of the street toward the friendly home of Brother R. B. Scott.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

High Adventure in Great Britain

Contents

Almost every believer who knows anything about it is willing to concede that the union of forces of the restoration movement in the Unites States and the United Kingdom seems an act of providence. The work in the latter had its roots in the Scotch Baptist development. In 1833 there was a small congregation of this persuasion meeting on Windmill Street, Finsbury Square, in London. There were hardly ever any visitors, but one Lord's Day morning a young man walked in and sat down near the speaker's platform. He was Peyton C. Wyeth, an American artist enroute to Paris to perfect his talent. He was born at Claysville, fourteen miles from Bethany (then in Virginia), knew Alexander Campbell personally, and had been immersed into Christ.

While in London he had visited various places of assembly only to be disappointed. On the Saturday before the day to which we refer, he had asked God to lead him to a place where men worshiped according to the ancient order. While walking the streets on the Lord's Day morning he found the chapel on Windmill Street and entered. One of the elders was William Jones, author of the Biblical Encyclopedia of the Waldenses, and other books of religious significance. When Wyeth told the elderly man there was a great and growing movement in the new world, whose members worshiped as they had that day, Jones was astounded and almost overwhelmed with emotion.

Jones knew of Campbell only as the brilliant opponent of Robert Owen in a debate held in Cincinnati four years prior. He had no idea that Campbell was pleading for the primitive purity of the church. That afternoon in his home he had Wyeth write to Campbell, virtually dictating the letter. A lengthy correspondence was inaugurated which resulted in Jones creating the British Millennial Harbinger which reprinted so much of what Campbell was writing. Out of this grew the visits of Campbell to Scotland and England, with their overtones of gladness and sadness, about which many of us know.

That's the way it began in London and I thrill to it. But I am convinced that no one can write the history of the cause I love, as it pertains to London in this century, and ignore the sacrificial work of R. B. and Mary Scott, and the little group of saints meeting at Hope Chapel, in Prince of Wales Road. I had heard of the Scott family from American servicemen who made that home their gathering place during the war. The family consisted of our genial brother and sister and their four children, Margaret, Dorothy, Isabelle and John. In spite of the fact that Brother Scott was employed as a clerk (the British pronounce it 'clark') and had a limited income they kept "open house" for saints from all over the earth.

Our first introduction to a meeting of the disciples in Great Britain was the day we landed. It was Wednesday, and after tea in the Scott home, where we also met Leonard Channing, a tireless young student and worker for the Lord, we made our way to the little chapel, riding our first double-decker bus. The night was bitter cold. Because of a severe fuel restriction there were no street lights. It was darker than the proverbial "stack of black cats" and we had to hold hands to keep from becoming separated. The little meetinghouse, more than a century old, had been damaged in a bombing raid. No permanent repairs had been made because of priorities on building materials.

We met in a tiny vestry behind the speaker's platform.

There were just twelve of us. The gathering was quiet and solemn, with no talking or laughing. Brother Black, down from Dalmellington, Scotland, presided with the same formality as if there had been a thousand present. He began by announcing a hymn to which we turned in a little book called "Hymns for Churches of Christ" which contained 1036 hymns, all without staff or notes. Brother Black suggested the name of the tune we would employ. He then read the first stanza and then we stood and sang the hymn. I do not recall ever seeing an audience in Great Britain remain seated while singing praise to God. After a fervent prayer by Brother Scott, a brother read the first chapter of First Corinthians. Brother Black expounded upon it from notes he had previously made.

Following this I was asked to speak and was then questioned about what the brethren abroad uniformly referred to as "the American scene." Some of the questions were quite pointed. The American doughboys who had attended during the war had come from all sections of America and all segments of the restoration movement and had efficiently conveyed their own confusion to those whom they met. Some from the same town in the United States met at Hope Chapel and had never heard of each other, because of the rigid factional lines drawn at home. It took a world war to get brethren from the same village to shake hands and attend at the same place. It was very difficult for brethren in a land where there was no "color bar" to understand why there was a "white church" and a "colored church" in the same community.

When we arrived back at the Scott home we sat before the grate on this wintry night and talked for hours. It became apparent to me that it would be difficult to explain to brethren in Britain the multi-faceted complex in America known as "The Church of Christ." It also became obvious that it would be just as hard to portray the British scene to Americans. It was our mutual love for Jesus and His magnetic personality which drew us to R. B. and Mary Scott, and when we read a chapter together and kneeled to pray before the glowing hearth, before the little night remaining would give us a few hours of repose, I felt that God was with us and moving in our lives.

The next morning at 9:00 o'clock we boarded a London Northeast Railway train at King's Cross Station, bound for Edinburgh. We were told there was no guarantee of making it because of the heavy blizzard of the previous day. English trains are very different from ours. The coaches are small and passengers occupy compartments entered directly from the platform and walled off from the rest of the train. Ours had room for six but we were alone in it when we left London. At noon we unwrapped the lunch prepared for us by Mary Scott—cheese sandwiches, Sultana bread and muffins, and a bottle of black currant juice to drink. Shortly after we finished eating, three soldiers entered our compartment. Two of them were taking back the third one who had been A.W.O.L. for seven weeks.

We gave them the remainder of our luncheon which they wolfed down with profuse apologies. They had eaten nothing since the evening before. All were members of the Durham Infantry, and stationed in an aged castle in which there was no heat at all. I began talking with them about Jesus and what He had done in my life. As I continued to share my faith with them they listened intently, occasionally asking a polite question. Time flew by and when they prepared to leave us at Newcastle-on-Tyne, one lingered behind, saluted and said, "Sir, this has been the happiest afternoon I have ever spent in my life."

Soon it was getting dark and the little engine was toiling through deepening snow. Finally we realized we were in a city. There are no conductors to come through and tell you where you are. You determine that from signs on the station platform. When the train stopped I saw no sign so I raised the window and asked if we were in Waverly Station. We were!

It was Nell who first spotted Albert Winstanley in the crowd. He was holding up a copy of Scripture Standard, our previously agreed upon badge of identification. "Uncle Will" Allen was there with one of his taxis and we soon covered the twelve miles to Newtongrange where we were to get our first sight of the work of our Lord in Scotland. God richly blessed us by allowing us to stay with "Uncle John" and "Aunt Mary" Pryde. All older folk are designated as uncle and aunt by the younger ones. I became "Uncle Carl" and Nell was always "Auntie Nell" by the younger folk. The Prydes had spent a number of years in the coal fields of Illinois, not too far from Saint Louis, and they eagerly awaited our coming. We somehow think they are still waiting our coming up there where they have long since gone.

Albert and I spent the first day walking from the home of one member after another, wading through deep snow. I shall not forget the cheerful cottage of "Granny Allen" who had been a member of the local body longer than any other person, far beyond a half century. In the evening I met with the oversight of the congregation to answer their questions. They were pleased to learn there were still brethren in America who contended for mutual ministry, and the right of all brethren to use their gift of edification. They made it clear they had thought that all the American churches had been betrayed by "the spirit of the age" to adopt the "one-man system" as they referred to the hiring of someone from somewhere to come in and pastor the flock professionally. They wanted to know how congregations administered discipline, and how elders were selected and appointed. They were especially interested in whether or not we voted for officers.

On Saturday, March 1, a bus load of us journeyed to Motherwell, near Glasgow, to attend the conference of the Slamannan District churches. A number of congregations had combined their efforts, with a special Evangelistic Committee to receive and disburse funds, and to recommend the places where preachers were most needed. David Dougal, a brother of great preaching ability, was secretary of the conference over which Abe Haldane presided. It was interesting to us that when the Scots wanted to show approval they stamped with their feet rather than clapping their hands. Following tea, I was asked to speak and afterwards was questioned at length by the audience. Some of the saints were a little skeptical about anything bearing the imprint "Made in the United States" and we explored differences in our varied concepts, but in deep love and respect for each other.

There is so much to tell our story will seem unduly long, yet there is hardly any way to shorten it without doing an injustice. It was late in the evening when Nell and I trudged down the snowy streets of Motherwell to the friendly home of Willie Wardrobp. We were accompanied by his aged father, James Wardrob, almost 85, and the oldest evangelist in Scotland. He told us the history of the movement, with its hardships and trials, as vividly as if it were in "living color." That Saturday night was like a page out of "The Cotter's Saturday Night" by Scotland's favorite bard. Before we retired to our beds with their eider down comforters, our patriarchal brother summoned the family to gather in the glow of the ingle, as the fireplace was called. He opened "the big ha' Bible" and read from it with firm and unfaltering voice. All of us kneeled together and he lifted up his words of petition to "Heaven's Eternal King." I fell asleep with the words of the poem circulating through my mind:

Compared with this, how poor Religion's pride,

In all the pomp of method, and of art;

When men display to congregations wide

Devotion's every grace, except the heart!

The next morning the sun turned the snowbanks into millions of glistening diamonds for our first Lord's Day in Scotland. It was an invigorating walk between rows of ancient stone dwellings to the little meetinghouse. The procedure was so different from ours I must describe it. The table was set in the center of the speaker's stand. There was one chalice and a small loaf of leavened bread upon it. Three chairs were behind it. Promptly at the time for beginning, the aged James Wardrob, who was to preside, took the center chair. An assistant sat down on either side of him.

The president announced the opening hymn. He read the first verse with impressive voice. All of the audience then arose and sang. Then the president said, "Will some brother take us to the throne in prayer?" A volunteer in the rear of the building prayed. Another hymn was sung. A volunteer came forward to read an assigned portion of the New Testament. He was followed by another who read the Old Testament. Brother Wardrob then made an excellent talk about the meaning of the Supper. Thanks were offered and the assistants bore the loaf and cup to the audience in turn. Each person broke a bit from the loaf as it was handed to him. All drank from the one container. An offering was taken for the furtherance of the work and then a session of prayer was announced. Perhaps there were six or seven prayers in all, fervent and eloquent in their simplicity. Afterwards the president said, "We have been blessed of the Lord in having our American brother among us and I will invite him to come forward and exhort the brethren." Following my remarks there was a hymn suitable to the closing of the meeting and a benediction. It was all beautiful, impressive and touching.

Nell and I were invited for tea at the home of John Snedden. He was the youngest of the three bishops, being 83. John Anderson was 84, and James Wardrob 85. All three were together with us for tea. It was the first time I had been with three such men, all able speakers and debaters, all with a profound knowledge of the Book. John Snedden asked me if I had ever met a Campbellite. I answered in the negative. He said, "Then you have a new experience today. I am a Campbellite." He meant it. Next to Jesus of Nazareth he admired Alexander Campbell of Bethany. To prove it he pitched in and recited Campbell's "Sermon on the Law" and would have given a goodly portion of "The Christian System" from memory if they had not announced that tea was being served.

What an afternoon that was! In the evening I addressed the "gospel meeting." The saints in Scotland have a clear understanding of the difference between "the breaking of bread service" and a "gospel meeting." The first is for the family of God. Non-members are not invited. If there is to be a Sunday School for the "wee bairns" it is held in the afternoon. It is not a part of the gathering for the edification of the body. In a gospel meeting on the Lord's Day night, the message is addressed to the world. It is intended to reach the unsaved with the glad tidings of what Jesus has done for them.

After it was all over we rode the bus into Glasgow, largest city in Scotland, with Brother John Anderson. His home was to be ours for a few days as we went to other nearby areas to share with brethren. My stay with this godly man provided one of the greatest thrills of my whole life. I am indebted to him for insights which helped to change my life.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

When the Snow Fell in Scotland

Contents

Glasgow was cold and gray and dirty from soot. The stores were without heat and the girls who clerked in Woolworth's wore heavy coats. One who waited upon us wore woolen gloves. The war years had depleted supplies and a large department store such as Lewis' had little to offer. At the close of our first day in the city I spoke to the little group of saints meeting in a storefront building on Hospital Street, located in the heart of a festering and decadent slum. Their faith in such a depressive area was to me a shining beacon in a bleak world. On every side of them paganism reared its ugly head, but they were not discouraged.

The following day five of us journeyed to Pennyvenie, by way of Ayr and Dalmellington. We visited the thatched-roof cottage of Robert Burns and I had a difficult time tearing myself away from the nearby museum with its many originals of the poems which had made the bard famous. At Dalmellington we sat down to tea in the hospitable home of Edward Jess. He was one of God's noblemen. There were but twelve of us present in the little schoolhouse at Pennyvenie, on a raw, cold night, but the warmth of fellowship will never grow dim in my memory.

On Wednesday afternoon we went to Slamannan and were received into the home of Brother Wilson for tea and scones. We were talking every minute. The house was one in which Adam Bruce, whom we knew in Windsor, Canada, once lived. The village had also been the home of our beloved Harry Topping whom we knew in our own land. As darkness descended the men in our party walked down Station Road to the meetinghouse. It was a cold, crisp, snowy hike. The brother who presided over the meeting asked Albert Winstanley to sing a solo, and then requested Nell and me to sing. We used "Give Me The Bible" as our number. Later I spoke for forty minutes and then answered questions for an equal period of time.

Slamannan had been a center for the work of James Anderson, who was born near Airdrie in 1837. As a humble evangelist he had left a mark upon the whole district, planting congregations, defending the faith, and proclaiming the Word for more than half a century. John Anderson, in whose home we stayed in Glasgow was a worthy son of James Anderson, and served to tie together for us the history of the work in Scotland for a hundred years. It was a saga of labor and suffering, of smiles and tears, of sorrow mingled with hope.

When we prepared to say farewell to the Andersons they presented us with a replica of their tartan, and every time we look at it we recall the glorious fellowship with these members of a genuine clan. We went by bus to Blackburn, near Bathgate, to be received for tea into the home of John and May McCallum. After a satisfying meal of fish and chips we were off to the meetinghouse at Blackridge, where the heating pipes were frozen and we had to hold the meeting wearing heavy coats. When John McCallum arose to preside, his steaming breath ascended in a cloud. Despite the shivering experience the meeting was prolonged by questions and we left the gathering edified and strengthened, to spend the night with Joe and Agnes Kerr, who lived in a new pre-fab in Harthill.

I had written to Joe several times before we left the United States and it was a great blessing to meet him face-to-face. Agnes was a Burns enthusiast and entertained with "Tam-o-Shanter" and several other poems, all delivered in a delightful Scottish brogue. The next morning, Joe, Albert Winstanley, Nell and I took the early bus into Edinburgh so we could see a little of the city before going on to Kirkcaldy, across the Firth of Forth. We walked down Princess Street, one of the most beautiful avenues in the world, and paused to look at the remarkable memorial to Sir Walter Scott, and the statue of Livingstone, the great missionary.

We climbed the steep hill to the great castle which frowns down as a lonely sentinel from the huge rock in the very center of the city. It was like moving into a world of a thousand years ago, for some of the buildings are that old. We tore ourselves away reluctantly to descend to street level and to the railway station. Joe Kerr returned home but Albert went with us as our train crossed the great Forth Bridge, that mile-long cantilever marvel constructed by Sir John Fowler and Sir Benjamin Baker, and finished in 1890.

I was anxious to get to Kirkcaldy which the natives call Lang Toon (Long Town) because it stretches out so far along the Forth. I knew it was the home of the great Nairn Linoleum factory, and that Congoleum had originated there, but one could have guessed that from the odor of linseed oil which hung over the city. At the station we were greeted by our genial host Dave Mellis, and his son Stanley. Dave was a "Wagon Inspector" for the L.N.E.R. lines, and in his home we found a hospitality which was warm and gracious.

The American restoration movement owes more to Kirkcaldy than most of us realize. In 1763, Robert Carmichael and Archibald McLean were conversing together in Glasgow when the subject of infant baptism arose, and each revealed he had some doubts about it. They agreed to study the scriptures on the matter and by 1765 Mr. Carmichael and five others were convinced they should be immersed. There was not a single baptist in Scotland to assist them, so they wrote to the eminent

Dr. Gill in London, whom Alexander Campbell later labeled an able expositor and critic, and asked if he would come and baptize them. He wrote that his age would not permit him to make the trip, but suggested that Mr. Carmichael come to London and be immersed and then baptize the others upon his return to Scotland.

Mr. Carmichael was baptized by Dr. Gill on October 9, 1765, and immersed the other five on the day of his arrival back in Scotland. In November he baptized two more, and when Mr. McLean moved from Glasgow to join them there were nine. They banded together to observe the Lord's Supper each week and to edify one another. They were called Scotch Baptists, not because of the country, but to distinguish them from the English Baptists. The latter embraced the one-man minister plan, whereas, according to a historian who wrote in 1883, "The church in Scotland was organized on the scriptural plan of mutual ministry, and a plurality of elders."

The first baptist in Kirkcaldy was a mole-catcher. He communicated his views to a Mr. Cooper who was baptized about 1784. They began to meet together and the work grew until the congregation was set in order November 15, 1798. In 1819 two brethren, Messrs. Tosh and Arthur, whose property joined, each took a piece of his rear garden and deeded it to the congregation for a building lot, and began erection of the Rose Street meetinghouse in which I was privileged to speak. Exactly one hundred years before I spoke from the platform of this building, Alexander Campbell spoke from the same spot. When he finished the congregation resolved to no longer call themselves after an ordinance but to become Christians only. They marched outside and took down their sign and erected one which read "Christian Meetinghouse." That was the sign which I saw as I entered the building.

We had a busy time in Kirkcaldy. On Saturday, March 8, the brethren held their annual social with 183 present, representing a goodly number of congregations. The next day I spoke at "the breaking of bread service," the afternoon children's meeting for "the wee ones," and at the gospel meeting at night. The congregation had an excellent choir trained and directed by Sister Glass. They always sang at gospel meetings which also had a solo or two, in addition to the congregational singing.

On Monday we visited in the home of John and Agnes Wotherspoon in the country, before returning to town so Nell and I could speak at a meeting of the women of the congregation. The visit with the Wotherspoons impressed me greatly. They were set for the defense of the faith and knew the Word of the Lord. Their house had been built over a coal shaft originally, but had been moved. John had fixed it up himself and it was furnished with lovely antiques. There was a grandfather's clock which was huge, and there were two heavy mahogany chairs, beautifully carved, which had once been in the captain's quarters of a ship which sailed the route to India.

On Tuesday we went on a little trip which made our entire journey worthwhile. A bus from Kirkcaldy to Leven connected with the Anstruther bus which made its way through the narrow streets of villages squatting along the Firth of Forth until it came to a veritable story-book town called Pittenweem. We were met in this age-old fishing village by our brother, Neil Patterson, a leader of the little group of saints who met in the "Toon Hall" as the brethren called the Town Hall. We left the bus on a paved square in the upper part of the town. Narrow walkways bearing such picturesque names as Water Wynd, School Wynd, and Cove Wynd led from the brae down to the waterfront.

The harbor was filled with fishing boats, one of which belonged to Brother Patterson. Fishermen were working on their nets. Gulls strolled about bravely on the cobblestones just out of reach. The breakers rolling in crashed against the sea wall. We walked to the home of the Pattersons where delicious homemade shortbread topped off the tea. Neil stood in front of the cheery ingle, and in a voice made strong by long years in a small dory upon the open sea sang hymn after hymn for us. Then in the company of Jimmie Hughes we visited the home of every member and prayed in each home. In the home of Sister Strachan her aged father regaled me with stories of more than fifty years of salt water fishing for a living.

The next day was to be our last in the "Kingdom of Fife" for Kirkcaldy lies in Fifeshire. It was a memorable day since it gave me an opportunity to meet Bro. Alfred H. Odd, an aged stalwart of the faith who began publication of a monthly journal The Interpreter the year before I was born. The January 1908 issue listed 45 congregations in Scotland. At 6:00 p.m. we attended "Sunshine Corner" held every Wednesday for boys and girls, under the able direction of Sister Glass. I spoke for 20 minutes to the "wee bairns" and later to the older saints at the regular prayer meeting. It was late when we arrived at the Mellis home for fish and chips, but later yet when Walter Hoggan came in. This tall, handsome policeman was on night duty but was free to share with us. He was deeply concerned about preservation of the concept of mutual ministry and was fearful that with men coming from the states the Scotch brethren might be seduced into adoption of the one-man system. We talked until long after midnight.

The next morning a blizzard was raging. Snow was drifting and some train service was curtailed. But we said a sad farewell to those who came to see us off and boarded the train for Waverly Station in Edinburgh where we arrived at noon. The double-decker bus which took us to Newtongrange that Thursday had to plow through accumulating snow. That night Albert Winstanley and I walked two miles back to town where I addressed a meeting of the sisters. Forty of them had braved the storm. Later I walked the two miles back alone. It seemed strange indeed to be hiking along a road in Scotland by myself at night. Overcome by emotion I stopped in the middle of the road with the swirling snow shutting off vision and fervently prayed aloud for many minutes that men would come to revere the name of Jesus and that malice and hatred be driven out of our hearts so that we might love one another. Uncle John and Aunt Mary Pryde were sitting with Nell in front of a welcome fire when I banged on the knocker, and we continued to talk, unwilling to draw the curtains on this peaceful scene until the large clock struck the hour of one o'clock in the morning.

The Minister of Education in Edinburgh had sent a letter approving my visits to the Council Schools under his jurisdiction and on Friday afternoon I went to the first. The headmaster, Mr. Lamb, received me graciously, and I spent several hours talking to teachers and pupils. I could write a book about my impression of the contrast with American schools. At night I spoke to the children at "Sunshine Corner" and when we dismissed a number of boys and girls followed us to the bus stop where they formed a circle and held an open air chorus, singing lustily for twenty minutes with the snow sifting down upon us all. Pedestrians walking to their homes stopped and joined in.

On Saturday afternoon I conducted a two hour analytical study in the Philippian letter and spoke at the gospel meeting in the early evening. We lingered over the supper table at the home of Bro. George Robertson until 10:30 p.m. when Nell and I caught the last bus to Newtonloan Toll from which we walked a half-mile to Gorebridge where we were staying.

On Sunday at Newtongrange the children gathered at 10:30 a.m. for Bible Study, but the "breaking of bread service" began promptly at noon and continued until 1:30. From 3:00 to 5:00 p.m. I conducted the analytical study, and at 6:00 o'clock we began the gospel meeting. The audience was the largest in the memory of most of the brethren, and our hearts rejoiced when two precious souls resolved to put on Christ. We walked home in a driving rain which turned the snow into slush. We retired at 11:00 o'clock, the earliest we had gone to bed since leaving the States. But we were tired.

The cold rain proved Nell's undoing and she became quite ill from a heavy cold. I had to go on alone, first to Bathgate, where a goodly number of saints had assembled in an upper room. I was impressed by the depth of their spirituality, and by the hospitality in the home of Brother Fleming, a great man of God. Next I was scheduled at Wallacestone, so-called from the stone which legend says was the one upon which the Scots hero, Sir William Wallace, sat in 1298 as he watched his men engage the forces of Edward I of England, in the broad valley below. As we climbed the steep hill toward the village my brain was echoing the words of the poem I had learned in elementary school:

"Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled—

Scots, wham Bruce has often led—

Welcome to your gory bed,

Or to victorie!"

Albert Winstanley and I were entertained in the home of another Scotch hero, David Dougal. An American, an Englishman, and a Scotsman sat down to tea, one in spirit through Christ Jesus. David was sincere and studious, and an able proclaimer of the gospel, as was Albert. To be with them was for me "a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." When David arose to open the gospel meeting the house was full. We were all uplifted in heart.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

Love Feasts in England and Ireland

Contents

The largest audience to which I spoke in Scotland was at Tranent. I first arrived there on Thursday, March 20, two days prior to their annual social which had been postponed a month to enable me to be present. I stayed in the home of Brother and Sister Wilson and it was extremely interesting because they could not understand my American dialect and I could not fathom their Scotch brogue. Had it not been for their daughter Jean, who translated for us, we would have been in a real predicament. But there was one thing I understood and that was the oat cakes made by Sister Wilson. I translated them myself. An excellent audience was present for the gospel meeting the first night, and the following night the greatest number of non-members to be seen in many years attended. It was apparent that the social might set a new record.

Brother Wilson spent the entire day making arrangements for the meat pies and other foods essential to serving those who came. Although everything was strictly rationed the government allowed special concessions to churches upon application. The social was held in the Town Hall auditorium on Saturday evening. Visitors were present from most of the places where I had spoken. There were 242 for tea. Afterwards Willie Steele presided and the Motherwell and Blackridge choruses rendered special numbers. Albert Winstanley spoke for fifteen minutes and I followed for an hour. I bade farewell to many precious brothers and sisters whom I would never see again on earth.

The following morning I spoke at the Lord's Day gathering, and again in the afternoon to about 80 boys and girls. The house was almost full at night for the gospel meeting and my final message in Scotland. The next day Albert accompanied us on the seven-hour train trip to Ulverston, in Lancashire, and our first meeting with Walter Crosthwaite. The congregations which combined to support him rented "Ford Villa," the home where our aged brother and his good wife lived, and where the little band of saints met. What a blessing it was to us to stay with the Crosthwaites.

No other person I have met in my life has impressed me any more than this man. When the tide of compromise, augmented by American influence and money, began to sweep across the congregations in Great Britain many decades ago, he stood like a rock of Gibraltar. As a result his name became revered by some and despised by others. He was as unmoved by the praise of his friends as by the attack of his enemies. Now that he had grown older and was unable to travel as before, it was decided to take advantage of his scriptural knowledge, historical ability and great experience. Young men of promise were sent to live with him for many months during which they sat at his feet for training. Many of those who are active in Great Britain today can look back upon their association with this patriarch with deep appreciation for his help.

We spent hours together exploring our concepts and talking about the problems which had always troubled us as a people. The clergy system, open communion, methods of evangelism— all of these and many other things came under review. Brother Crosthwaite came to love and cherish Nell as one of his own children. One of our treasured letters from Great Britain after we arrived home came from him and mentioned "dear Nell" with special warmth. I spoke every night while in Ulverston in the little tri-cornered room which seated 34 people.

It was full every night with 18 non-members present the first night. One brother who came to share with us was Levi Clark from Barrow-in-Furness. We wrote to each other for years until his death ended our correspondence. I loved and admired him very sincerely.

Our time was not all occupied by meetings. One day we visited the famous English Lake Region. We went to the home of John Ruskin on Coniston Lake. We spent an hour at Bowness and the village church where George Washington's relatives worshiped three generations before his birth. Another day we went to the Quaker meetinghouse built by George Fox in 1688 after he had been imprisoned so many times for open expression of his opposition to war, slavery, and political and religious authority. Upstairs, over the simple meetingroom we found the plain bed and chair used by the persecuted crusader. The large Bible which he studied was upon the desk.

Nell and I had a lump in our throats as we said good-bye to Brother Crosthwaite and Sisters Wood and Ormandy at the Ulverston Railway station. I boarded the train for the Wigan District with a distinct feeling that one of the significant periods in my life had suddenly ended. At Wigan we were met by three outstanding men— Leonard Morgan, of Hindley; Carlton Melling, of Scholes; and Leonard Channing, then of London. Leonard Morgan was an owner of several shops and an elder at Hindley. We were scheduled to stay in his lovely home which was also graced by his wife, Doris, and little son John. Carlton Melling was an elder at Scholes, and employed in the public library at Wigan. He succeeded Bro. Crosthwaite as editor of Scripture Standard, the paper published by our British brethren. It is currently under the efficient editorship of James Gardiner, of Haddington, East Lothian, Scotland. Len Channing resided in London, but was engaged in a gospel mission at Scholes. He was capable, active and alert, and already several had been added to the Lord through his personal efforts at Scholes.

It had been arranged that I should meet the first night with the elders and deacons at Hindley. They were a fine group of brethren and they questioned me at length about my views of what was transpiring on "the American scene." I did not realize until later that this was one of the places to which John Allan Hudson had written warning the brethren against receiving me. Our visit turned out to be a glorious one. After seeing me, the brethren concluded they could probably handle any wild ideas I might advance, and after meeting Nell they realized that if my judgment about other things was half as good as it was in selecting a wife, England needed me. The Hindley congregation had produced three outstanding evangelists— Albert Winstanley, Frank Worgan and Tom Kemp. It was a blessing to me to be associated with them.

My first meeting in the district was at Scholes, with Leonard Channing presiding. At the close of the service two expressed their decision to obey Christ and Carlton Melling announced the fact with well-chosen words. The meeting on Sunday at Hindley was not hindered by the cold coupled with mist and rain. Leonard Morgan presided capably. The order consisted of a hymn, a prayer and another hymn. One brother then arose and read from the old covenant scriptures, and another followed with a new covenant scripture reading. The "prayers of the church" were called for and three brethren prayed in turn. Following another hymn the brethren contributed of their means. The president made an appropriate talk about the meaning of the Lord's Supper, and thanks were given for the bread and cup, and they were offered to the disciples. I was then invited to exhort the saints which I did briefly. There was no invitation given to aliens. This was a family gathering for the children of God, and not a gospel meeting. British brethren knew the difference.

At luncheon in the Morgan home we met Bro. Harold Baines from Morley, in Yorkshire, who informed us that all was in readiness for our visit to that area and promised that we would be treated to the famous "Yorkshire pudding." At 2:00 p.m. we were back at the meetinghouse. Bro. Stephen Winstanley called the youngsters together, and after several choruses, dispatched them to their classes. I spoke to a room filled with older children and their teachers. At 6:00 o'clock I addressed an excellent audience present for the gospel meeting, and at 8:00 o'clock the house was filled for the second gospel meeting. Every seat was taken.

On successive evenings I addressed goodly crowds at Albert Street church in Wigan, at Blackburn and again at Scholes. One evening we held an open air meeting in the public marketplace. Wigan is the oldest borough in Lancashire, having been charted by Henry III in 1246. A hundred years before the American Declaration of Independence was signed the city was known all over the world for its manufacture of bells and pewter.

On Thursday night the brethren in Hindley held a Farewell Rally, attended by representatives from all of the other district congregations. It was evident the Hindley congregation possessed great potential for sparking the work throughout the British Isles. The elders were men of vision, the members of the body seemed consecrated, and the future appeared bright.

If I may digress a wee bit, let me inform you that Wigan was the original home of Miles Standish. He was a resident of Duxberry, Wigan, and named his New England estate after it. It is now well-known as Duxbury, Massachusetts. His wife Rose was the first to become ill on the fateful trip on the Mayflower, and the first to die. She lies sleeping in Burying Hill, at Plymouth Rock. His subsequent infatuation for Priscilla Mullens, who married John Alden, has very little historical basis.

On Friday we flew from Ringway Airport in Manchester, to Belfast, to attend the annual conference of British congregations. Our arrival by the air terminal bus in Donegal Square was greeted by three marvelous people— Mary Hendren, Pearl Hunter and Robby Hendren. Since we were to stay in the lovely home of Sammy and Pearl Hunter, we took the tram up Ballygomartin Road, and walked up Glencairn Crescent to the house. The streets were lined with emergency bomb shelters, now being used as playgrounds by boys and girls. After tea we again walked through a lovely park to Shankill Road and then up Berlin Street to the meetinghouse, a former schoolbuilding purchased and remodeled by the brethren.

William Hendren presided over the welcome rally and, in characteristic Ulster fashion claimed that virtually all great men came from North Ireland, including 19 presidents of the United States, as well as Alexander Campbell and Saint Patrick. Speeches were made by George Hudson from Birmingham, England, and Andrew Gardiner from Glasgow, Scotland. I was also invited to speak as a representative of a former British colony which became upset over tax on tea.

On Saturday the conference business was transacted, and reports given, with Joe Hamilton presiding. In the evening William Hendren and I spoke. I was tremendously impressed with his knowledge and ability. The Lord's Day meeting began at 11:30 a.m., and made use of the talents of four English brethren— Robert McDonald, Dewsbury; George Hudson, Birmingham; Fred Hardy, Morley; and Stephen Winstanley, Hindley. George Hendren from Belfast also participated and I gave the exhortation. At the Children's Meeting at 2:30 p.m., Joe Hamilton introduced Stephen Winstanley and myself to speak after encouraging the "lads and lassies" to pay attention.

We adjourned for tea in the home of Granny Hendren, on Brussels Street, just around the corner, and at 6:00 o'clock were all back at the meetinghouse to start the open air meetings. Eighty people marched down the street singing, "Come Ye That Love the Lord!" Stops were made at four intersections with additional songs and an announcement of the meeting to follow.

The final open air presentation was directly in front of the meetinghouse. Later, as I arose to speak, the forms (benches) were filled to capacity and people were standing about the walls.

On Monday Nell and I visited the memorial to the Titanic which sank on her maiden voyage in 1912 with a loss of 832 passengers and 680 crewmen. We also went to the monument dedicated personally by General Dwight D. Eisenhower to celebrate the landing of American troops in the war so recently ended. After tea in the home of George and Rachel Hendren, I met with the oversight of the congregation consisting of Joe Hamilton, George Millar, William, Charles and George Hendren. They asked my permission for them to write the brethren in America to send me back to Belfast to help in the evangelizing of Northern Ireland. I little realized then what a change would take place in my life and thought upon my return. We held two open air meetings before the evening service and again the building was full.

The following day a chartered bus took all of the visitors for a tour of Northern Ireland, including the Giant's Causeway. We returned by way of Carrickfergus and the old castle where William of Orange landed and started the drive which made Northern Ireland a Protestant country by the decisive Battle of the Boyne, July 12, 1690. Our tour was on Junior Orangemen's Day which created enough excitement with its massive parade that the gospel meeting was not quite so well attended. It is hard to compete with the Orange Society in North Ireland.

On Wednesday night before the gospel meeting, Bro. Millar presented me with a well-preserved copy of the *Millennial Harbinger. Thursday evening the meetinghouse was again crowded out. Seven had already obeyed the gospel during our stay and enthusiasm was great. After the regular service a farewell meeting was held, which began with the serving of tea and scones. Joe Hamilton presided. Rachel Hendren was called upon to make a speech of appreciation and ended by presenting Nell with a lovely hand-embroidered Irish linen tablecloth. Bobby Hendren presented each of us a gift and then the chorus stood and sang, "Will Ye No Come Back Again?" We felt a bit flattered for this was the song the Capetown Africans sang to the king and queen as their ship sailed away from the harbor.

All of us were in tears as the meeting ended. Young and old were sobbing as if their hearts would break. We clung to each other, reluctant to accept the fact that we had to part. It was long after midnight when we said goodnight to the Hunter family and went to our bed, but we arose early next morning for breakfast, and when we arrived at the airport bus station in Donegal Square we found a company of saints awaiting us. I could name every one of them, but I must limit myself to a special tribute to Mary Hendren who, for thirty years, has faithfully written to us and kept us informed by letters, newspapers and books, of the changing fortunes of the saints in these troublous times.

When we arrived back at Ringway Air Terminal in Manchester, we soon transferred to the rail station to board the train for Morley, near the great industrial city of Leeds, in Yorkshire. The train trip through the hills was beautiful. Gray stone fences centuries old climbed up the steeps. Patches of snow lingered in the upper valleys. Rushing streams tumbled under old stone bridges. The train went through a long tunnel and emerged at Morley.

3. Debates at Home and Fellowship Abroad

More of England and then Home Again

Contents

Our stay in Yorkshire was memorable for many reasons. For one thing we were privileged to stay in the home of Fred and Hilda Hardy and their charming daughter Bessie. Bro. Hardy was a plumber and contractor and had created a lovely house called "Windyridge" out of an antique stone dwelling. I spoke five times at Morley with increasing crowds each night, and once at Ardsley and Dewsbury. The brethren seemed greatly uplifted and my own spirits soared. Bro. Hardy owned an automobile and resolved to show us as much of Yorkshire as possible, including the seven-hilled city of Morley, the home of great woolen mills.

Some areas still remain engraved in my memory. The great city of Leeds with its famous university, renowned modern hospital, the unique city hall, and the huge apartment building spread over several city blocks and erected in a perfect and unbroken circle. The quaint old city of York, looking like a throwback to the days of Charles Dickens. We visited York Minster with its crypts in the floor containing the dust of English nobility, and the days of Roman occupation in the first century. The lovely city of Harrogate, famous spa and health resort, where the crystal clear mineral waters run though the bath houses, and along the valley by the promenade where the wealthy walk.

The age-old city of Knaresborough, clinging precariously to the slopes rising above the River Nidd, and looking like an illustration from a Mother Goose book. This was the traditional home of "Mother Shipton" who was credited with prophesying the advent of automobiles, planes and other modern developments centuries ago. One day, through the kindness of Bro. Fred Sugden, who worked in a woolen mill, we were permitted to go through and observe the processing from the time the wool was received until the cloth came off in huge rolls bound for export to the United States. The week sped by all too quickly and we had to depart for Warwickshire before we were ready to go. We will never forget the Hardy, McDonald, Sugden, Sykes and Baines families, nor shall I forget Geoffrey Lodge, the astute and capable young brother who later married Bessie Hardy.

When we arrived in Birmingham, Friday, April 18, the signs of the fearful devastation wrought by Nazi bombers were everywhere evident. The Summerlane meetinghouse had been blasted into fragments one Saturday night and the brethren with whom I was to labor were using an old mess hall purchased from the government and hauled to their site. We were given hospitality in the home of Bro. Fred Day, one of the elders, and also one of the gentlest and humblest men I have ever met. Scholarly and informed, he was one of the most qualified Bible teachers with whom I have ever been associated.

On Saturday, the brethren had arranged a welcome meeting, preceded by a 4:00 o'clock tea, to which all of the congregations in the area were invited. Instead of one returning thanks when we were all seated, the brethren sang a thanksgiving hymn in unison. Bro. Earl Stuckenbruck and wife, who were enroute to Tubingen, Germany, were in Birmingham, and came out to meet me. His father was a minister of the Disciples of Christ congregation in Topeka, Kansas, where I finished high school. The Stuckenbrucks were the first Americans we had met on our tour and the "Yankee twang" with its midwestern accent sounded good to our ears.

On Saturday afternoon I was taken to the home of John McCartney, who was to be 93 years old the following Wednesday. He lived contemporary with David King, the leader of the reform movement in England for forty years. He was a boy of twelve when news reached England of the death of Alexander Campbell. I had long read his writings and it seemed like a dream that I should be in the home of this renowned scholar. He was totally blind, but his mind was clear and lucid, and as he sat with the shawl about his shoulders, talking about the Book which had been his rod and staff, it was a little like being in the presence of one of the prophets.

From the home of Bro. McCartney we went to the cemetery where the body of David King lies buried. I had already read the large book titled "Memoir of David King" by his wife Louise, and knew that the Cause had been launched in Birmingham through his efforts coupled with those of J. B. Rotherham. From a congregation of eleven members which they planted, the community of saints grew to number hundreds. In some ways David King excelled Alexander Campbell and it is a tragedy that his work is so little known in the United States. Carved upon the simple stone erected over his resting-place are these words: "rejecting all human creeds, He pleaded that the Teaching of Christ and His Apostles is the only Divinely authorized and all-sufficient Way of Salvation and basis of Christian Union. He was a good man. Mighty in the Scriptures. Ask for the Old Paths and walk therein."

Warwickshire fairly crawls with literary greatness. On our way to Leicester to speak we visited Stratford-on-Avon. The home of William Shakespeare looked just as it had been pictured in my high school English Literature textbook. I read with interest the original manuscripts of some of his plays exhibited upstairs. In an adjoining room, where he was born, many of the world's great have scratched their names in the glass of the old Tudor windowpanes. Easily identified were the autographs of William Makepeace Thackeray, Sir Walter Scott, and John Barrymore. Speaking of Scott reminds me that as we left Stratford we went to Kenilworth to visit the castle tower featured in his novel named after the town.

At Coventry we saw the frightful havoc wreaked by the German Luftwaffe. The city grew from a Benedictine monastery established in 1043 by the famous Lady Godiva and her husband. Hitler resolved to wipe it from the earth. In two months of insane bombing the center of the city was devastated and 70,000 homes were utterly destroyed or severely damaged. The 14th century St. Michael's Cathedral was blasted into oblivion except for the 303-foot steeple which remained like a lone finger pointing toward the heavens.

The little body of brethren in Leicester met in a council schoolroom. They had recently left the large congregation affiliated with the British Cooperation for conscience' sake. We had a good audience present and a grand spirit of fellowship was apparent. The following day we drove through Sherwood Forest, the one-time haunt of Robin Hood and his merry men on our way to Loughborough where I was to speak. We stayed with Basil and Elizabeth Jaynes who were tenants working on the great Sir Julian Hall estate, embracing several thousand acres. A great many German prisoners were under guard on the estate sorting and cleaning potatoes for the market. Many of them were young and looked like anything but Nazi supermen. They were forced to wear a diamond-shaped patch of another color on the back of their drab jackets and trousers to permit immediate identification and to provide against escape. They were hungry for news of what was transpiring in the world and eagerly snatched up every bit of stray newspaper, which some of them could read.

At East Kirkby, on Wednesday night, I encountered the first serious opposition I had experienced. The British brethren, with very few exceptions, are vigorously against the idea of bearing arms in time of war, under any circumstances. Some of the older ones endured imprisonment and even physical torture for their convictions during World War One. So pronounced was the feeling at East Kirkby during World War Two that it was made a test of fellowship. The brethren refused to pass the Lord's Supper to those who were in uniform. American soldiers who attended were deliberately barred from the privilege of communing in the body and blood of the Lord.

Since I regarded war as an evil, and not necessarily a sin, I had written my book Fighting Christians a number of years before. In it I took up one by one the scriptural deductions affirmed by the brethren who were opposed to war and dealt with them. Thinking to prejudice the British brethren against me before my arrival certain ones in the United States had mailed several copies of my book to what they considered strategic areas. The brethren knew I was not a political pacifist. The question period following my message was without incident, but following dismissal several of the brethren gathered around me and walled me in, demanding how I could be in the fellowship of those trained to kill. It reminded me of how things are done in the United States and turned out to be an interesting engagement with some of the most militant pacifists I have ever met. Since I made no test of fellowship out of their opinion it was not nearly so tense for me as for them. I could receive and love them without their changing. But the danger of making tests of fellowship out of personal deductions from the scriptures was borne home to me as I had never seen it before.

After a final meeting in Birmingham we returned to London to spend more than a week with the Scott family before embarking on the Queen Elizabeth for home. It was a time literally crammed with interest, but would require too much time and space to describe. On Sunday, April 27, there were 24 present for the breaking of bread in this great city of ten million souls. In the evening Bro. Scott asked me if I would be willing to engage in a question forum after the gospel meeting. Although I was surprised at the request, I agreed to do so. Later I learned that two or three in the congregation had raised objections to allowing me to speak because of my position as to bearing arms in international conflict. The forum was a good one and the contention quite sharp at times, although good order predominated. Some were more dogmatic than others and the questioners disagreed among themselves, but the session helped clear the air. I came away with a sense of deep appreciation for the brethren, even those who disagreed with me.

We sailed from Southampton on Saturday, May 3, and arrived back in St. Louis on May 10, my thirty-ninth birthday. Our eager hearts were filled to overflowing to see the children well and hearty and doing well in school. In the ensuing weeks scores of letters came from those whom we had met and as we replied to them our hearts drifted back across the ocean and in memory we lived again with those who were so dear unto us. As I write this thirty years have passed into history since we first set foot in Great Britain, but we still hear from several of those whom we met. We would like to hear from all of them.

Almost at once my services were in demand by congregations which wanted to hear of our trip and see the amateur movies we had made of the entire time. I resumed my weekly radio broadcast which had been temporarily placed in the efficient hands of Hershel Ottwell after my 171st consecutive message. Too, we had to begin distribution of the first volume of the Bible Commentary by Brother Zerr which we had published under our imprint. It sold for $4.00 per copy, bound in cloth and stamped in gold.

Our paper Mission Messenger, now almost ten years old, was full of reports of congregations being planted, new meetinghouses being erected, and people being immersed into Christ. Every issue contained letters from abroad and it seemed as if God was smiling upon the efforts of "the brotherhood." It never entered our minds that we were exclusivists forming a divisive party. We were the one body for which Jesus had died. It was a propitious season for resuming the debates with Brother Brewer who had suggested that we hold an open discussion upon every Christian college campus. Inasmuch as he was on the staff of Harding College at Searcy, Arkansas, he suggested it as the best place for our third encounter.

On October 20, 1947, I wrote this genial "brother in error" and asked him to select a date. I was ready when he was. In his reply he said: "I suppose you keep up with the papers and, if you do, you realize that there is a considerable interest now aroused over a question among ourselves. This is the old question of whether or not a church should contribute to a school. You know my position, and this is the position held by the vast majority of my brethren. However, the Bible Banner group has been seeking to destroy me for some years and they thought they would get me committed to an issue on which none of the schools or orphan homes or papers would agree with me, and then they would have me branded as a disloyal, unfair man. They have failed in this and it is about to turn the other way. The Bible Banner is about to find itself standing alone on this point except for the sympathy they get from the Sommers. They are inconsistent or they would go over to the Sommers or else drop the point they are making an ado about. Right now we have a challenge out to them and it is possible that Roy Cogdill will finally be urged to meet me in debate. If that happens, I'll have him as an opponent instead of you; and when the debate is over, you can probably take his arguments and debate with me or some other man on our side.

"At any rate, this is the status of the case now and I am not prepared to tell you that you and I can have a debate soon. If this other debate fails to develop, then we may get Harding to invite our debate and we can move it to Memphis where we will have a big auditorium. We shall have to wait, however, for a while before we pursue this matter any further. With all good wishes, I am faithfully yours, — G. C. Brewer."

I never debated Bro. Brewer again. The trouble which was fomenting in the ranks of those with whom he was directly affiliated continued to grow until eventually another major cleavage occurred and the restoration movement was disgraced by another unnecessary division. Today in some cities there are representatives of both sides meeting and challenging one another for debate. One side refers to the other as "liberals" while they think of themselves as "conservatives." The fact is that neither group is the body of Christ in its fulness and both are simply factions which cannot get along with each other.

In January of 1948 we had 85 students from ten states enrolled in the study of the Word in Saint Louis. It was a great learning experience and we explored the Bible with a keen sense of desire for knowing more about the divine revelation. For six weeks we studied every day and held three night sessions of two hours each. We drew so close together that we wept when the time came to bid one another farewell.

4. The Beginnings of Change

Life Begins at 40

Contents

Ralph Waldo Emerson wrote in his Journal in 1847: "We do not live an equal life, but one of contrasts and patchwork, now a little joy, then a sorrow, now a sin, then a generous or brave action." A calendar consists of twelve pages and every four weeks one of them is torn off and wadded up and tossed in the wastebasket. Each of these discarded pages represents a segment of existence, but what has happened to one during its tenure cannot be carelessly discarded seeing that it has been woven into the warp and woof of the pattern of memory by the slamming batten of experience on the loom of life.

Every year that passes accumulates its own assortment of pleasure and pain, of tears and laughter. The ship of life cannot sail for fifty-two weeks in perpetual sunshine. It was that way with 1948 during which I reached my fortieth birthday. The year began as usual with a packed house in Saint Louis on New Year's Eve. It was a time of spiritual enrichment, of the manifestation of a fellowship so precious that when the stroke of midnight signalled the beginning of a new year ushered in with prayer many were reluctant to leave. We clung to one another as a huddle of strangers and pilgrims in a foreign land. The songs we sang were hymns about a home none of us had ever seen, but the tolling of the bells at midnight told us that we were nearer to it than we had ever been before.

In March I went to California for a meeting of three weeks' duration in the new meetinghouse at Compton. I took advantage of the opportunity to speak two nights in Oakland where the saints met in the home of George Robinson, which was surrounded by the campus of the great university. I also spent one night each with the saints in Pomona, Riverside, and West Riverside. I was especially anxious to visit the latter place for several reasons. While there were a few others in the little group of brethren, the majority were members of the Stone and Fiscus families. The latter family had worked its way westward from Indiana, but the Stone family migrated from the Missouri Ozarks. They had purchased a small "ranch" which was well irrigated and all of the married children erected their homes in a small domain over which the aged father and mother exercised a kind of patriarchal sway. It was always a blessing to be associated with them in their kind of isolated splendor. But I was just as eager to meet the little colony of Armenian refugees, a good many of whom I had baptized on a previous visit.

During World War I the Turks, encouraged by the withdrawal of Russian troops from Armenia due to the Bolshevik Revolution, began a reign of terror in Armenia which shocked the world. Whole cities and villages were literally destroyed. The men were murdered, the women raped, and the houses reduced to smoking ruins and heaps of ashes. Before it was all over 800,000 corpses littered the land, most of them shot down or decapitated with the sword, although many perished from hunger and privation. Some of them froze to death in thickets, their bodies becoming food for wild animals.

Those who finally made their way to Riverside, California, had formerly lived in the village of Boethos, near Musa Dagh (the mount of Moses) and when word reached them of the approach of the Turks they fled to the mountains taking with them only what they could hastily tie into a bundle and carry on their backs. After many days and nights when they held the children close to their bodies to keep them from freezing, their supply of food began to run out and they were forced to become scavengers of the forest, eating bark and roots. When it appeared that all hope was gone and they were composing themselves for death they saw a French ship steaming into the disputed waters and they were rescued. In a frenzy of weeping they threw themselves onto the deck and kissed the planks in gratitude.

For some reason, during my meeting at West Riverside, a number of the Armenians began to attend. Since the older ones could not understand English, those who could asked if I would hold a special meeting with an interpreter for the elderly after the close of the regular meeting each night. Rose Philian, a devout Christian, stood by my side and interpreted. Soon several of the Armenian families expressed a desire to be baptized, but the greatest joy came when Grandfather and Grandmother Egarian reached the decision. It was these two, now grown old, who had kept the little band together and given them heart when they wanted to take their lives rather than fall into the hands of the Turks.

When the aged patriarch stood before the members of the Armenian colony and their friends, I said to Rose, "Ask him if he truly believes that Jesus is the one of whom the prophets spoke, and God's Son." In reply he faced his neighbors and spoke at some length in Armenian. I was anxious to know what he was saying, and I can remember the words of the translator as if I had heard them this morning. "He say, I believe Jesus Son of God, that born of virgin, that he die on cross for his sin, and that he buried and raised again third day. He also say Jesus is coming again, and he will see him, and Jesus will take him and he will be with Jesus." When I led the aged man into the water the interpreter stood close and told him what I said. I think I have never seen before or since such weeping for joy as when all surged forward to embrace the old brother and his companion.

It was a great experience to see the Armenian saints again and to eat shish kebab made of lamb and other ingredients. They went all out with their cuisine and I ate a lot of things I could neither spell nor describe. The one thing that really interested me was to talk with them about their traditions related to Noah's ark which had landed on a mountain not too far from where they had been born and grew up.

Some interesting things happened at Compton where I baptized twenty persons, one of whom was Robert T. Hartmann. Bob was a reporter for the Los Angeles Times who later became head of the Times bureau in Rome and finally chief of the Washington Bureau. It was here he became acquainted with Senator Gerald Ford from Michigan and when the latter became president of the United States, Bob became his favorite speechwriter. He married Roberta Sankey with whose parents I was staying in North Long Beach and I came to know him well.

When I baptized him he agreed to become a writer for Mission Messenger. His articles were both powerful and provocative. The first one titled "The Essence of Faith" appeared in the issue for May 1948. It was followed by such pieces as "Suffer Little Children" and "Words to Live By." Finally, after eight months of such varied productions it was decided he would do a regular column called "Views of the News." It began in January 1949 with a story of how Sohn Ryang Won, a Korean Christian, adopted into his family the 24-year-old Communist leader who had slain his two sons. The story went on to tell how Sohn converted the young murderer and his whole family to Christ.

For two years Brother Hartmann furnished an article each month until his promotion and transfer increased his responsibilities. His final article bore the title, "Was Peter in Rome?" I got a bang out of his articles. He had not grown up in the background of our party and he wrote what he thought with a kind of fearless disregard for criticism or consequences. He had a kind of journalistic honesty not too characteristic of a lot of the brethren.

Almost a year before I went to Compton, James Lovell, editor of West Coast Christian wrote me that, in spite of our differences, he thought I would be glad to see him at one of my meetings. We engaged in a brief period of correspondence and discussed some areas of divergency. Neither of us conceded an inch, but it was all in good humor. There was no way of making him angry. When I arrived in Southern California I called him and invited him to visit my meeting and he countered by asking me to a top-level conference at Pepperdine College. I invited J. B. Ruth, one of the elders, to accompany me. When we arrived at the Administration Building we met with Hugh Tiner, the president; Ralph Wilburn of the Bible Department; Wade Ruby of the English Department; Dean Pullias and Jimmie Lovell.

In spite of the criticism I had leveled at the school and its policies, our meeting was conducted with proper decorum. I think George Pepperdine would have approved of the nature of our confrontation. We were reared in the same partisan background and I knew him when he went to Denver from Parsons, Kansas, where I preached for several years with members of his family always in the audience.

I suggested that, in the interest of better relationships, Brother Lovell print three articles in his paper presenting my point of view, while I would present the same number of articles written by one of the faculty members in Mission Messenger. It was agreed this would be a good thing but it never came to pass. Instead, a shake-up occurred, and before too long the president, dean and head of the Bible Department were all gone. Ralph G. Wilburn, who was probably the only real theologian in the group, in the classical sense, went with the Disciples of Christ, where he began teaching at Lexington Theological Seminary. He was selected as a member of the Panel of Scholars which contributed to the restructure program of the Disciples, and gravitated to the Department of Higher Education in Chapman

College at Orange, California.

On September 5, 1948, I began a series of meetings in Windsor, Ontario, Canada, which lasted for two weeks. It was an especially pleasurable experience since most of the members were from Scotland and England and I had visited their home congregations abroad. There were two elders— Adam Bruce from the Slamannan District of Scotland, and William Horrocks from Albert Street congregation in Wigan, England. I stayed with the latter and it was an unforgettable experience. My work opened up a period of endeavors which lasted over a period of several years and resulted in some unique experiences as well as in some outstanding friendships.

One day before I went to Canada I was visited in Saint Louis by the three principal instructors of Midwestern School of Evangelism, located in Ottumwa, Iowa. Donald G. Hunt, Burton W. Barber and James McMorrow drove all the way to deliver to me a personal challenge to debate Burton Barber on the subject of instrumental music at the school. I felt no particular inclination to take time out from a busy life for such a discussion but they were insistent. Hershel Ottwell accompanied me to Ottumwa, and we debated at the school on the nights of October 11, 12, 13. On the final night, after the discussion ended, the five of us met in an upper room and prayed that God would overcome our differences and use our mistakes to His glory. The debate had been serious and pointed, but without a single untoward incident or expression of partisan hostility.

Tragedy struck for us shortly afterwards. Nell's father and mother were returning from an evening meeting at Fredericktown, Missouri, when their automobile was hit by a man who was intoxicated. Her mother was thrown from the car by the impact and her body dragged along until the car turned over. She was taken to Bonne Terre where the skill of the physicians and surgeons saved her and started her on the long, slow road to recovery. On the afternoon of December 13 she was in good spirits when a well-meaning nurse massaged her arm because of soreness. A blood clot was loosened and found its way to the heart. In a few minutes she was gone.

I was at Carrollton, Missouri, in a meeting, when Nell called me and relayed to me the sad news. As soon as I finished the meeting that night I started home. On the third day following I conducted the service of memorial before a large audience. My "second mother" was beloved by hundreds. Nell's father was mayor of the city, to which he was elected for several terms, and the family had earned the respect of the whole community. But it came home to me then what a difference there is in a home when the wife and mother is gone. The Christmas season which had always been one of joy and brightness became a kind of weary experience through which we stumbled with our eyes more often filled with tears than with stars.

In the year that was hastening to a close Brother Zerr had completed the second volume of his commentary which we published. Because we had not disposed of enough of the first one to pay for the second, the cumulative effect of the costs became too much and it appeared that we might have to delay work on the third volume until the other two were paid for. Fortunately for the cause, F. R. Bailey of Chillicothe, Missouri agreed to guarantee the cost of production to the printers so we could proceed on schedule. Eventually we brought out three thousand sets containing six books each, a total of 18,000 volumes, at a cost of about $35,000, not including packaging and postal costs. We sold all of the books.

It was during this year my book A Clean Church was published. I had been thinking about it by day and dreaming about it by night until one afternoon I could no longer stifle the urge to write. I sat down at the dining-table and started. I wrote all afternoon, all night, and until almost noon the next day, driven by an inner compulsion which would not allow me to stop. I was afraid that if I slept the fountain might be turned off and not flow again. When I arose from my chair I could hardly walk, but before me lay a stack of pages representing a complete book. I do not recall making any changes when I typed it up. I learned that brain children are like physical children. They must be conceived before they are brought to the delivery room, but once the time has come, they will be born. I suspect that having the first child is most difficult. I never again wrote another major book as I did that one.

In 1948 we also began an outreach program. Brother Leonard Bilyeu opened up his lovely home in the Florissant Valley for a weekly study of the Word. In three months 55 different persons representing all varieties of religious thought had participated. Encouraged by this I secured the conference room of the public library at Kirkwood and launched a study which was surprisingly well attended. I was not alone in this endeavor, for many brethren, old and young, were catching the vision that the post-war world was seeking for a spiritual foundation. As the year drew to a close I wrote, "The quickest way to lose your life is to try and hold it; the best way to gain your life is to lose it for Jesus' sake."

4. The Beginnings of Change

The Call of the South

Contents

The year of 1949 was an eventful one historically and personally. On January 20, Harry S. Truman from Missouri was sworn in as President, with Alben W. Barkley as his vice-president. They had been elected November 2 in a stunning upset victory over Thomas E. Dewey and Earl Warren. On April 4 the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) was sworn into being, and on April 14 the German war crimes trial was ended with the conviction of 19 of 21 former Nazi officials.

We began by dropping the word "Missouri" from the name of the paper. It had long since ceased to be merely a journal recording news from our state and henceforth would be known as Mission Messenger. We coined the slogan "The paper with a mission and a message." We signalled the change by introducing open forums upon such subjects as "The Work of Women in the Church," and "Marriage and Divorce." I published the divergent views in articles and letters exactly as they were written and without editing. It was a new day for fairness and apparently the people liked it. In ninety days we received a thousand new subscriptions. Our writers demonstrated a considerable amount of "unity in diversity," especially since most of them denied there was such a thing.

I rather suspect the year marked a new kind of "high" for our particular segment of the restoration movement. This was reflected in the attendance and enthusiasm shown in the "annual meetings" which had long been a part of our life. Some of these were anniversary gatherings marking the date the congregation had been planted. Others, such as the Labor Day meeting at Hammond, Illinois, were scheduled to take advantage of the freedom from work on holidays. There were 256 at the 39th anniversary meeting at Bonne Terre, Missouri, June 12; 330 at Hartford, Illinois, June 26; 200 at Sullivan, Illinois, July 17; 350 at Richmond, Missouri, July 24; and 452 at Hammond, Illinois, September 5. The latter embraced brethren from 51 congregations in 8 states.

A part of the attendance was due to the presence among us of Albert Winstanley from England. Albert and Jean, with their little son David, a babe in arms, arrived in New York on the liner Queen Mary, on June 20. Nell and her elder sister Nova went to New York to accompany them to Saint Louis, where the stifling heat of the midwest was almost too much for them. Although still a young man, Albert was an excellent student of God's Word, clear and lucid in his thinking, and articulate in his presentation. He visited scores of congregations with Hershel Ottwell as his guide and travel companion. They covered many states. Wherever Albert went, God used him in a marvelous manner and the six months he spent among us seemed to fly.

In September I returned to Windsor, Ontario, for a Bible Study which I taught every night with an average of more than sixty in attendance. On Sunday I spoke to the edification of the saints gathered for the breaking of the bread, and that night proclaimed the good news in the gospel meeting. It was during the study of the Word that I met William Keenan, an atheist and former Communist organizer. He came to my meeting through the influence of a former alcoholic, now a fellow-member of Alcoholics Anonymous. After three nights of attendance at my class they asked me if I could come and talk with them the following day.

I went at 9:00 a.m., and was ushered into the drab quarters, a "bachelor pad" with sparse furnishings. We sat down in the kitchen with its single naked light bulb hanging from the ceiling. There were just three battered chairs and we pulled them up to the table with its chipped enamel top. As we talked an occasional mouse made a foray across the floor to pick up a crumb, dashing back to safety when someone shuffled his feet. I watched a huge cockroach crawling around on a rickety cabinet.

When I requested the privilege to pray the two former alcoholics and I bowed our heads, while the cold autumn rain coursed its way in rivulets down the outside of the unwashed window-panes. I asked William Keenan to tell me where he was and how he had arrived there. It was like opening the flood-gates to allow a long pent-up river of feelings to surge through. He talked for three hours while drinking cup after cup of strong coffee. I sipped a little of it and it tasted like I think varnish remover might taste. At times during the narrative his nervous hands shook until he had to use both of them to lift the cup to his lips.

As a boy he was turned from the Christian faith by a preacher in the Established Church, whom he idolized, and who had formed a boys' club which was the height of his joy in the small English town where he lived. He had resolved to grow up and become a clergyman and devote his life to helping underprivileged children when he discovered that the man he revered was a homosexual and the boys' club was a cover for dealing in seduction. The night after the rector made an indecent proposal to him, he shook and cried all night. The next morning when he tried to tell his quarreling parents who were heading for a divorce they only berated and abused him verbally.

He ran off and ended up in an English city where he was taken into the home of a Communist labor infiltrator. Here he was shown kindness and love. He was treated daily to the idea that religion was a means by which the wealthy exploiters enslaved the sweating masses for their own profit. The term God became a dirty word to his mind. God was the designation of an ogre conjured up in primitive minds. When he was sent to Moscow he already hated God and regarded the Christian faith as a retreat from reality by weak persons. He was trained as an infiltrator of youth groups in the English speaking world, but after several years began to "hit the bottle." He became useless to Moscow and they kicked him out, convinced he would end up in a drunkard's grave. But he had gone to Alcoholics Anonymous and found understanding and compassion, and his friend had brought him to my meetings where we were friendly and kind to him.

What I said that night made sense if there was a God. If not, it was merely a house of straw. I had listened for three hours without interruption. At one o'clock I began the real struggle for the soul of a desperate and destitute man. The minutes ticked away while the rain lessened in force. Three more hours passed, and at four o'clock he said, "That's enough. I believe that God is, and that Jesus Christ is His Son." Just as he said it, the sun broke through for the first time that day and cast a shaft of light across the dingy table where we had been sitting for seven hours. That night I baptized him into the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

When I arrived back home in Saint Louis there was a letter written on lined notepaper asking if I would come for a series of meetings in Beech Grove, a little Arkansas village clustered around a cotton gin a few miles from Paragould. I assumed that it resulted from my reply to a letter received in March from Herbert Johnson, a humble farmer near Beech Grove. He wrote to encourage me to continue my opposition to the one-man hireling ministry system which was foisting a special clergy caste upon the congregations. I agreed to go to Beech Grove for a meeting in July 1950, if God willed.

In the December 22 issue of Gospel Advocate, John Allan Hudson unleashed a four-column blast against me in an article titled "The Divisive Leadership of W. Carl Ketcherside." In it he used such terms as "Carl's diocese" and "archbishopric." He spoke of my cantankerous spirit and referred to accusations made against me by members of the Sommer family and by Fred Fenton, who once wrote for Mission Messenger and was very complimentary of my efforts, until he dropped out to start a short-lived periodical of his own called Radiant Truth. Brother Hudson made dire predictions of my rising power and influence, and warned that if the brethren listened there would be great changes come about in the churches.

I was amazed when I read the article, not only by its appearance, but by its harsh and caustic tone. I immediately wrote B. C. Goodpasture, the editor, and asked for space to reply to the personal attack upon my motives and integrity. After a number of days had gone by I received a curt reply consisting of four lines in which Brother Goodpasture said that he did not think an article from me would contribute to the peace or well-being of the brotherhood. To this day I cannot figure why Brother Hudson reacted so bitterly in print in an attempt to destroy me unless it was because the British brethren had ignored his letters generally circulated among them urging them not to hear me. Their willingness to hear for themselves, coupled with the coming of Brother Winstanley, was probably more than our brother could take.

As the year of 1949 drew to a close we had just concluded a six-weeks Bible Study on December 6, which brought together capable students from ten states. Many of these were young, being just out of high school, but a goodly number were older men seeking to improve their knowledge so they might render better service as elders of their congregations. The study was greatly enhanced by the presence of Brother Winstanley who contributed much to our spiritual knowledge as well as to our understanding of the work of the brethren in Great Britain. Our hearts were sad as the time drew near for the departure of this little family. Nell and I were especially touched because they had made their home with us. It had been good to have a baby in the house once more.

On Saturday night, December 24, we had a farewell gathering for them. The next day, Christmas, Albert spoke in the morning for the congregation on Manchester Avenue. That night he addressed the Lillian Avenue congregation for the last time. The next day they left us but not before Albert had agreed to contribute an article each month under the heading "As Others See You." His discussion of his impressions of America and of the congregations he visited provided interesting reading for those who had come to love him for his work's sake. Long after he had gone to labor in Tunbridge Wells and Ikeston, the congregations over here continued to pray for him by name. He had drawn us close to those of like precious faith in Great Britain "whom having not seen we loved."

Early in 1950, while in Indiana, I went to the office of the American Christian Review, to discuss our differences with Allen R. Sommer, and Bessie, his sister. Our visit was amicable and gracious, despite the rifts which had occurred in the past. The same afternoon I went to Butler University for a talk with some of the faculty members. I was received in a spirit of courtesy and kindness.

Meanwhile in Arkansas the exact opposite attitude was being manifested toward the little congregation at Beech Grove. When word of the forthcoming meeting was released the machinery of opposition went into high gear. There were two congregations in Paragould, the county seat. The one at Second and Walnut had J. A. McNutt as minister, the one at Seventh and Mueller had Emmett Smith. George W. DeHoff of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, was in a meeting in Paragould when the announcement of my coming was made. He immediately launched an attack against Beech Grove from the pulpit, demanding that they cancel their arrangement with me forthwith.

When the brethren at Beech Grove declined to do this it was decided to bring in reinforcements, and a call was made to Harbert Hooker at Poplar Bluff, Missouri, who had several times held meetings at Beech Grove and was generally well liked. Brother Hooker did not even consult the brethren as to whether they wanted him to come. One of the leaders at Beech Grove found a note in his rural mailbox that Brother Hooker would speak at Beech Grove the next Sunday afternoon and wanted all the members present. It was announced on Sunday morning and all of the members went. Brother Hooker delivered a talk on supporting preachers, then asked everyone to leave except the Beech Grove members.

He told of his deep regret at learning that the brethren were making the saddest mistake of their career in bringing in the worst extremist in the whole United States. He said I was so opposed to women speaking in the church that when a woman wanted to make a confession of faith we took her out on the front porch of our meetinghouses. The brethren asked him if he would sign a statement to that effect so they could go to Saint Louis and investigate. He refused and told them he was not signing anything, but they would be sorry if they did not listen to him. He then shook the dust off his feet and departed.

Two weeks later a preacher showed up on Sunday morning and announced he had been sent to warn the brethren not to go through with their plans for me to come. He warned them I was so liberal I believed in women preachers. After the meeting they "collared him" and told him that either he or Brother Hooker was guilty of falsehood and perhaps both were. He excused himself and fled the scene, and never returned.

Sterl Watson then entered the fray by writing a booklet filled with diatribe under the silly title "Ketcherside and Killebrew Keeled." Fred Killebrew was then working with a small congregation in Senath, Missouri, after having renounced the clergy system while living in Tennessee. It was the intention of Brother Watson to wipe Fred and myself off the map with one swipe. Amazingly, Dr. James D. Bales sent out an endorsement of the book urging all to read it. Actually, it was so wild that we immediately recognized that if we could get it into the hands of brethren it would do more good than anything we could write or say.

Fred Killebrew began to advertise the books and offer them free in his meetings. It was so effective that when he went to Sterl to get a couple of hundred additional copies he refused to let him have them or to tell him where he might secure them.

4. The Beginnings of Change

Arkansas Antics

Contents

I feel certain that many of my readers will be inclined to sit in judgment upon me for spending so much time detailing events surrounding one little semi-rural congregation in Arkansas. If I need to justify my own conscience I can do so by recalling that it is in such places the Spirit always works to turn the tide of sectarianism. It cannot be done initially in large metropolitan areas where pride and tradition, those twin evils which oppose all reformation, have entrenched themselves. No one in the restoration movement of which we are heirs, who remembers Washington, Pennsylvania, or Cane Ridge, Kentucky, should ever "despise the day of small things."

The struggle of men to free themselves from the encroachment of a System seeking to destroy their freedom needs to be chronicled so that future generations basking in the warm sun of liberty will not forget the price that was paid to drive the ominous clouds away. And the names of those who warred upon one side or the other need to be engraved on the pillars of history since movements are but men in action. Before I went to Beech Grove, Arkansas, there had gradually developed a kind of super-church mentality which tended to elevate to dominance large congregations whose preachers and elders were promoters and who could control rural congregations and use them as feeder units to enhance their own image.

One of the congregations in Paragould had actually proposed to all of the rural and village churches in the county that they send their finances in to it, and allow them to arrange for a stable of preachers who could be assigned to various places and paid for from the central fund. The argument was used that since the Paragould congregation had elders and many of the smaller places did not, these elders could oversee the preachers and assure that country congregations would hear "better preaching." It is to the eternal credit of the rural congregations that they rejected this blatant attempt to take over their rights and violate their autonomy.

But what a proposed centralized presbytery could not accomplish was then attempted through "area preacher meetings." In such monthly gatherings needs were discussed, plans were devised, and machinery set up to accomplish what a professional clergy wanted to see done. Smaller congregations without preachers on their payroll had no representation. They did not know of the plans until they were already being carried out and they received a letter or visit from someone asking them to send finances to help "bear the burden." Such little places had to submit or be ostracized and castigated for refusal to cooperate in "the work of the Lord."

When W. L. Otty, who lived in Indianapolis, Indiana, heard that I was going to Beech Grove he fired off a letter to the church in Paragould to tell them how to handle the matter. He advised his brethren to assault the ramparts and go in a body to Beech Grove each night. As soon as I finished my message they were to arise and take over and hold another meeting in which they could defeat anything I said. He also recommended that the Paragould brethren publicly withdraw from the two brethren at Beech Grove who had first suggested to the congregation to have me come. By some quirk of the mail service his letter was delivered to the church in Beech Grove instead of to the one in Paragould. One of the brothers whose exclusion was recommended stood up and read it publicly to the saints.

In desperation, the preachers published a notice in Firm Foundation at Austin, Texas, under the heading "Ketcherside Invades the South." It called upon all preachers and members everywhere not to give aid or comfort to the brethren at Beech Grove until they repented of the grievous sin of inviting me to speak to them and renounced me and what I advocated. It was signed by J. A. McNutt and Emmet Smith, among others.

As soon as the notice appeared preachers began to enter the fray. Some called long distance. Others drove to Beech Grove. All frantically urged the brethren to cancel the work before it was too late. Sinclair Slatton, Joe Blue, George DeHoff, G. C. Brewer, W. Curtis Porter, and James D. Bales, were but a few of those who injected themselves into the business of the congregation and vainly tried their hand. The more pressure that was brought to bear from the outside the more determined did the little group become not to be shoved around.

It was about this time I began receiving crank letters from some of the brethren in Paragould. A few of them contained overt threats and implied I might even suffer bodily injury. One said if I did not cancel the meeting and hurry up about it a group of men from all over that section would meet me as "a welcoming committee" and make it so hot for me I would wish I had never come. I sent the letters to the brethren at Beech Grove who called me by telephone to say that it was they who invited me to come and only they had the right to invite me not to come. They told me to come on and pay no attention to letters from the congregations at Paragould or Commissary.

On Saturday, July 15, I went to Beech Grove with Allen Phillips and his good family. They had lived in the vicinity of Lafe, Arkansas, for a number of years and knew most of the saints at Beech Grove. They took their vacation to go with me to help in the meeting and they were a real strength and blessing. I went to the home of Herbert and Ruby Johnson where I was to stay. I have never found the hospitality which they extended to me surpassed. I had not been there an hour until brothers and sisters began to drive in from all around. None of them had ever seen me and they had come to "size me up." They were sincere, humble and unpretentious. It was easy for me to love them every one.

We began the next day under auspicious circumstances. There was a large crowd in the morning and at night the building was filled. The attention was perfect in spite of the heat. On the final night the audience overflowed the building and many could not get in. Everyone came except the preachers. They were conspicuous by their very absence. Always before they rallied to a "big meeting" and were on the front seats. Now they had resolved to lie low and allow me to hold the meeting and after it had all "blown over" they would move back in and straighten the congregation out. When I announced that I would return in six months and conduct a study of the Word for two weeks, open to all in the area, it began to dawn upon them that a boycott would no more serve their purpose than open attack.

The day our meeting began the church in Paragould started one with E. R. Harper, of Abilene, Texas. It was calculated to keep their members away. On the first Sunday morning Brother Harper went on the air and made an attack upon Beech Grove and upon me personally. The next day three of us went in to the station, met with the manager, and requested time in which to reply. It was granted us at the regular station rate. We announced it well in advance and publicized it in the Paragould paper. It is possible we may have had the largest listening audience in the history of the station. We were particularly fortunate in that our program was aired just after the noon news broadcast.

During the week letters were mailed to every boxholder on the rural routes near Beech Grove. They were signed by the elders and preachers at Paragould and demanded that I debate W. L. Totty or Sterl Watson. I read one of the letters from the pulpit and over the radio station and stated I had already debated both men publicly and did not consider either of them a representative man on the issues at hand. I countered by offering to meet either N. B. Hardeman, G. C. Brewer, or George Benson, as top men in the college ranks. But the meeting closed without a debate being arranged. In spite of the tension I immersed four souls in the nearby drainage ditch. Two more made public acknowledgment of wrongs and asked to be restored to the active service of the Lord.

When the time came for me to leave, all of us realized that we had simply gone through the first skirmish and the real battle lay ahead. Men like James King, Avery Cunninghan, and Herbert Johnson had been tested by fire for a year. They were ably assisted by a number of others, among whom special mention should be given to Louis Kappelman, Ellis Hots and Franklin Cunningham. Not a person left the congregation, even under pressure from relatives in Paragould. Every time I thought of the brethren as I made my way back to Saint Louis a phrase from Emerson kept ringing in my mind, "Here once the embattled farmers stood, and fired the shot heard round the world."

In August I went to Midland, Texas for a Bible Study which was held in a room at the Air Terminal where so many men had received their flight training during the war. The parachute jumping platforms and the dummy bombs were still in evidence. Our meetings were in Building T-284, which was formerly used for storing ammunition. Here where men had been taught to kill we sought to teach others how to live. From Texas I returned to Windsor, Ontario, where our series was blessed of God and several were immersed into Christ. The congregation was growing in grace and knowledge as well as in number, under the guidance of Adam Bruce and William Horrocks as shepherds. But now there were consecrated younger men such as William Brown and Robert Liles who were developing rapidly.

When I returned from Canada there was a letter urgently requesting me to come to Belfast, North Ireland. I postponed a reply for a few days in order to give thought to all the ramifications involved since I was leading a busy life. While I hesitated another letter arrived pleading that I come. I finally consented to go in February after the annual Saint Louis study and the follow-up meeting at Beech Grove. Our daughter, Sharon Sue, who had recently finished high school and was attending the Gradwohl School of Laboratory Technique agreed to edit the paper during our absence. Jerry would look after the mailing and Nell would continue to take care of the subscription and address files.

Arvel Watts, Ellis Crum and Bob Duncan taught special subjects during the Saint Louis study which reached its conclusion on December 15. Students were in attendance from Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, Colorado and Pennsylvania. We were particularly blessed in having with us two capable black brethren— Leroy Durley and William Baker.

I arrived back in Beech Grove on January 7, prepared to begin our two weeks of study the next day. The opposition had been busy during the interim. The latest prepared "bomb" was a tract by J. A. McNutt attacking O. C. Dobbs, Sr., of Birmingham, Alabama, and me. I had never met Brother Dobbs but had heard a great deal about him. He was in the first graduating class of the original Alabama Christian College when G. A. Dunn was president. He came away from the school convinced that the gravest threat to the primitive order of things was the growth of the one-man preacher-pastor system.

Brother Dobbs developed a hernia and in order to contain or control it, cut a piece of material from an old automobile tire, out of which he fashioned a truss. The hernia corrected itself with this assistance. This led him to experiment until he invented trusses for various types of hernia after which he created the Dobbs Truss Company to market his product. Since this was prior to the time when surgery was used for the condition, the company soon became international in scope with representatives in the major cities of the world. During the years when the business flourished Brother Dobbs became quite well-to-do. With characteristic enthusiasm he plunged into the fight against the "growing pastor system."

When he learned of the growing storm at Beech Grove he mailed the brethren a bundle of his booklets which they passed out with considerable eagerness. This injected a new political angle into the fracas. It had been previously hinted that I was leading a "Yankee invasion" into one of the strongholds of the "Old South" and bringing in northern doctrine. It was purposely made to appear that I was a "religious carpetbagger." But O. C. Dobbs was from Birmingham, only a little way from where Jefferson Davis had been named President of "The Confederate States of America." He spoke with a southern accent and even wrote with one.

Brother McNutt knew he had to act quickly. He printed a book for general distribution in the area under the heading "Pastoring and Evangelizing." While a lot of it was devoted to trying to patch up what Brother Harper had said and my reply to him on the radio, quite a lot of space was devoted also to Brother Dobbs. He was accused of being one-sided, biased and prejudicial, and also of being "beside himself." Coming from the source it did, Brother Dobbs felt highly complimented and fired off a letter inviting Brother McNutt to a written debate which he would print at his expense.

All of this had kept the interest from waning and when I came for the Bible Study excellent audiences gathered every afternoon and night. We did not dwell on the troublesome issues but concentrated on teaching the Word. One afternoon the class was visited by Brother McNutt and the elders from Paragould. Sterl Watson had been imported from Saint Louis to bolster the cause. As soon as I had finished the lesson he arose and demanded that I debate either Rue Porter, W. Curtis Porter, or G. K. Wallace. I agreed to meet either one or all of them. They asked me to write out propositions and submit them. I did so that week. But they could not agree upon them and the attempt fell flat.

One thing that gave me a great deal of hope was the eagerness of the people to know the Word. At each session we had folk from the community who were not members of the Church of Christ. The leaven of peace seemed to be working and I left feeling that good was being done in spite of outside agitation. Arrangements had been made that when I returned from Ireland I would hold another meeting, if the Lord willed. It was a great prospect!

4. The Beginnings of Change

Irish Stew

Contents

There was more than one reason why the brethren in Belfast felt that I could serve the cause we loved by coming to North Ireland. For one thing there had been some upsetting things happen during a recent mission conducted by C. E. McGaughey. Brother McGaughey had attempted to persuade those who had previously been immersed upon their faith in Jesus, in various groups, to be baptized again at his hands. The office-bearers of the congregation forbade him to "un-Christianize" those who had lived for Christ for years in order to "re-Christianize" them through his offices.

Brother McGaughey was quite adamant and when he influenced a few members of the Irish Baptist movement to cast their lot with the brethren he insisted that he was going to baptize them "for the remission of sins." The leaders argued that when one is immersed in order to obey God and upon his firm conviction that Jesus was the Messiah and God's Son it was for the remission of sins whether the believers knew it at the time or not. Forgiveness of sins was the design of God for those who were immersed in conformity with His will and not the design of man for being immersed. It was their contention that to immerse those who had previously been immersed, just to make them members of "the Church of Christ" was sectarian in nature and would be what American Baptists had always practiced.

The Irish brethren also resented the padding of reports in American journals of the number of baptisms abroad when, as they said, most of the people had been children of God for years before being taught the way of truth more perfectly and made into statistics by American preachers. The issue came to a head one night when Brother McGaughey had convinced some they should make their calling "safe" by submitting to baptism again. When he announced this at the close of the meeting the elders arose and turned the service over to another brother while they held a conference with the preacher in a rear room. An hour passed by while the congregation sang and praised God, but when another hour was well on its way and the participants in the discussion had not reappeared, the audience was dismissed. The contention behind the scenes continued as the Irish brethren fought to keep from becoming a foreign auxiliary to an American religious movement. Unalterable in their position against re-immersion, the mission of Brother McGaughey ended, but not until some unrest had been created among the saints.

It was felt that if I came to engage in a positive effort it would be a settling influence and have a quieting effect upon the disciples. Too, it was proposed that I do a good deal of evangelistic work, proclaiming the Good News in street meetings and visiting industrial plants for noon meetings with the workers. The brethren were already in the process of leading an effort in a new housing development which had grown up in the suburbs after the Nazi bombers had wrecked a great deal of the city and literally gutted some sections of it.

We had our final prayer together as a family around the breakfast table on February 8, before Jerry, dressed in his air force uniform, had to leave for work with his fellow airmen. He was twenty-one years old and six feet tall. At nine o'clock, in Union Station, I said goodbye to Nell, Sharon Sue, and a little girl from Honduras who was living with us. As the gate closed behind me and I boarded the train there was a lump in my throat and a prayer in my heart. Two days later I went aboard the S.S. America, the largest and fastest passenger ship ever built in our country. Promptly at noon the gangplank was lifted and we edged away from the pier.

Both of my travel companions in the tourist stateroom to which I was assigned were Catholic men, but poles apart in life. One was an illiterate seaman off the streets of Cork who had sailed the seven seas. He knew every major port on the face of the earth. When I first saw him he was lying in a stupor in one of the top bunks, sleeping off a hard drinking spree which had lasted two days and nights. The other was a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago, a graduate of Illinois University and Notre Dame, and an authority in the history and language of the Celts. A more divergent trio to occupy a single room could not have been selected by a computer with an electrical short in its mechanism. We were together for five days and nights, and if I learned nothing else I found out that Catholics are not all cut from the same pattern. It was a good lesson for one who had grown up stereotyping them as we did about every other group.

I had engaged in many interesting spiritual conversations with scores of folk before we anchored off Cobh early in the morning of February 16. Ireland-bound passengers disembarked here and were taken to shore in a lighter and transported to Cork by ship's train. I had a half day to explore this ancient city which began with a religious settlement in 622 A.D. I already knew from my study of history that it fell to Oliver Cromwell during the English Civil War and I wanted to see as much of it as possible. I walked at a rapid pace all morning from one point to another and it was a relief when, at 1:15 p.m. I boarded the crack train "The Enterprise," and settled down for the almost seven hours of travel to Belfast.

I shall never forget that when I stepped from the train in the huge station I heard voices raised in song. Almost the entire congregation was present and the waves of music reverberated through the corridors, "For Christ and the church let our voices ring." It was long after midnight when I retired to my room at 8 Sunninghill Garden, in the hospitable home of William and Margaret Hendren and their good family.

We lost no time getting into the work. The next evening was a welcome meeting with tea being served at the humble meetinghouse on Berlin Street. A beautiful table was set on the speaker's platform where I was to sit with the five men in the oversight— Brethren Hamilton, Millar, George, Charles and William Hendren. A well-arranged program continued until time to hurry to the nearest stop to catch the double-decker bus to the Cavehill area where I lodged. During the evening a program of events was outlined to occupy every night of the more than three months I would be in Belfast.

On each Lord's Day morning we would meet at 11:30 for the breaking of bread. The edification talk at these meetings would be delivered by a member of the congregation. At 3:00 p.m. I would teach the children of the community, and at 4:00 p.m. have a class of young men and women. Following that we would hold three or four street meetings at strategic corners and return for the gospel meeting at 7:00 p.m. On Monday nights we would have a meeting for singing and praise led by George Hendren. On Tuesday nights I would teach the neighborhood children (there were more than a hundred at the first session). On Wednesday nights there would be a gospel meeting, on Thursday evening a meeting for prayer and devotion in a home, and on Friday night a study in depth which I would lead.

During my stay we would also arrange for two weeks of gospel proclamation which would be especially publicized in the area. I wish that I might take you on a day-by-day trip with us and let you share every exciting minute, but space will not permit. Each new day brought its own thrill of being and at night we usually gathered in the little home of "Granny Hendren" who lived with her daughters Edith and Mary close to the meetingplace. Here we recounted the events of the day and talked and prayed together until time for the last bus to run.

On March 6, I was invited by Mr. Oliver, assistant supervisor of the government press bureau, to attend a sitting of the Parliament, with eleven other observers. After being conducted to my seat in the beautiful Senate room by an usher in full dress, I was treated to a scene of almost medieval dignity and pageantry. The Speaker, who sat upon a throne-like chair on a raised dais, wore an imposing robe and a powdered wig which fell in waves to his shoulders. The Clerk of the Senate, who sat before him, had a shorter wig, with marcelled waves and two tiny tails tied with ribbons and hanging down his back.

It was my good fortune to be present in a session in which cabinet ministers were being seriously questioned as to their action. I was especially interested in the Minister of Agriculture who was charged with supervising rationing. All of us were limited to four ounces of red meat per week. The cooking fat ration amounted to two ounces, and we were allowed two eggs per week. This could be supplemented by horse, whale or beaver meat, which were not limited when available. A black market had developed in pork ribs, knees and bones, which the Secretary affirmed was being carried on from England in spite of the efforts of the secret service of Her Majesty's government.

It was when the Minister of Home Affairs was put on the grill that things really "got cracking." Ireland seemed to have more than her share of gypsies who roamed the countryside in their gaily-colored horse-drawn caravans. Parliament had ordered that some method be devised and steps taken to ensure a suitable education for the children of gypsies and other vagrants. Included in the directive was religious training. The Ministry might as well have ordered to contrive a means of educating the winds that blew across the landscape, or the waves of the sea. Gypsy children were as elusive as little wild animals.

During this discussion which became heated I heard some of the most penetrating satire and biting sarcasm delivered under cover of urbane politeness. I could catch a glimpse of the deep hostility which has long since burst its bonds in what is now referred to in Ireland as "the troubles." Some of the members of Parliament represented a Catholic constituency. They raised pointed questions as to the kind of religious teaching to be bestowed by law upon gypsy children. I trust I am not prejudiced but I want to testify that the Protestants who sat on the benches were among the most capable and quick-witted men I have ever heard. Their sharp repartee was something else!

The next day, Mr. McIvor, the efficient headmaster of Mount Collyer School, invited me to spend the entire day, or as much time as I could spare, at the public school which he supervised. I had already spent two hours with him, exploring the difference in educational concepts and goals in our two countries. Mount Collyer was a new adventure in schooling for the more than 800 youngsters in attendance. School began each morning with prayer, scripture readings from the Old and New Testaments, and a brief devotional talk.

The law requires that there be five classes in religion each week for public school students. I was permitted to examine the course of study which had to be non-sectarian in content and presentation. It was very comprehensive of the narrative portions of the Old and New Testaments through the book of Acts. The discipline was both rigid and remarkable. When the headmaster and I visited certain rooms every pupil arose and stood at respectful attention until he told them to be seated. When we left a room the student nearest the door arose and opened it, remaining at attention to close it after we had gone.

I stayed for lunch and would not have missed the experience. Most of the children went home for their noon meal but about 200 stayed. Luncheon was prepared in a central kitchen and conveyed by special vans to each school. The day I was present the supervisor of all lunch rooms in city schools was present and graciously answered all of my questions. The 200 children filed in and quietly took their places at the tables. It was unbelievably quiet. A teacher gave the signal and all bowed their heads and returned thanks in unison, then quietly arose and passed by where the food was being dipped up by student helpers. The menu was Irish stew, mashed potatoes and cake with pudding sauce over it. Milk was provided at each plate. The cost of the meal was six cents in American monetary value. The day I attended more than 30 children were fed free because of poverty-stricken conditions in their homes.

The next day I was invited to speak to a group of men at the shipyards, the largest such yards in the world. I was taken on an inspection tour where I saw three huge aircraft carriers were in the process of construction as well as numerous other vessels. One of these was a mammoth oil tanker for Norway. Another was a whaling ship to be fully equipped to process every ounce of the huge catches. Daily religious meetings were held in the Plumbing Department and here I was greeted by more than 250 men. A loudspeaker system had been set up for our use so that all might hear. Sandy and Nat Cooper, who had accompanied me, sang a hymn at the beginning and end of the thirty minute period, and after the message had been given we passed out more than 200 tracts to the workmen going back to their appointed stations.

My life was enriched when Albert Winstanley came over from England to work with me for four days. We shared together in the children's meeting, where he was especially adept, and in the gospel meeting where we took turns announcing the blessed facts about the divine breakthrough of the flesh curtain by God's Son. Together we went to a lecture on "The Seven Seals" by a recognized leader of the British-Israel theory and remained to question some of the more rabid followers of the view. But, best of all were the street meetings, four of which we held one afternoon in company with Nat

Cooper, a young man of promise. We gathered some 80 boys and girls and led them down the street, singing at the top of their voices. We stopped at street corners where everyone who passed by halted and gave us audience and we took turns preaching the kingdom of God and the way of the cross.

Time was passing rapidly and the days were filled with all kinds of intriguing things. There were visits to linen mills, to manufacturing concerns, to public parks, and other places where opportunities were presented to witness of the grace of God. We were seeing precious souls added to the one body each week. Some of these came in response to public declaration of God's love, others after I had conversed and prayed with them privately. The saints were rejoicing in the confessions of faith made in our meetings and all of us were made aware of the power of the Word and the moving of the Spirit in the hearts of men. The old, old story was still new and vital!

4. The Beginnings of Change

The Knock at the Door

Contents

I come now to the place where I must recount a life-changing experience which was destined to completely re-orient the whole philosophy of my relationship to the kingdom of heaven. I apologize to my readers for the time to be spent in narrative, seeing that nothing is ordinarily quite so boring as listening to another recount what happened to him. I must preface what I shall say with the statement that I am a pragmatist, and not a mystic, by nature, although all of us are combinations of both. I suspect that every wholehearted follower of Jesus is confronted sooner or later with a sense of a great gulf which exists between what he believes and what he really is. For some, the confrontation with the Living Lord is gradual and almost academic. For others it may come as a flash of light in a crisis situation. That the latter should have been my lot is as unexplainable to me as it will be to those of you who now read about it.

It occurred on the afternoon of March 27, 1951. I know where it took place and I know the moment it took place. I am convinced now that if I had never left America it would not have happened at all. Before I went to Ireland I conveyed to the brethren there my hope of visiting the little village of Ahorey, and the meetinghouse in which Thomas Campbell had ministered. William Hendren and Joe Hamilton made contact with Mr. T. S. Hoey, secretary of the little Presbyterian congregation, and he graciously suggested that we conduct a service in the quaint little place. Arrangements were made for Easter Monday, which is a "bank holiday" upon which all business places are closed and workers are free.

Sixty-five of us met at the little Berlin Street meetinghouse early in the morning of a dark and dreary day with the rain pouring down. After a time of prayer we boarded the two chartered buses and set out upon our trip. Fortunately, by the time we reached Ahorey, the rain had ceased. The little village where Alexander Campbell spent his early boyhood was small indeed. Only three Irish farm cottages could be seen. One of them was used as a post office. The meetinghouse sat back in a yard which could have been the setting for Gray's Elegy. We made our way along the path which was flanked by the moss-covered grave markers to the door of the lovely little building where we were warmly greeted by the Presbyterian welcoming committee.

In the entrance hall was a bronze plaque of Thomas Campbell inscribed with the words Prophet of Union. He was the second pastor of the congregation, assuming his charge in 1798. When we entered the place of meeting its quaintness and old-worldliness struck our attention. It was lighted with paraffin lamps. The pews had to be entered through little gates which had first to be unlocked. When the brethren had filed in and our Presbyterian hosts were seated, I unlocked the door leading to the speaker's platform and took my place behind the stand containing the same large pulpit Bible from which Mr. Campbell had often read.

The audience stood and sang "The Lord's My Shepherd" to the haunting melody of the tune Crimond. William Hendren led a prayer for the unity of all believers in the Lord Jesus. I turned to Ephesians 2 and read the chapter. I was moved to speak, as never before, on verse 14. "For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." I must have spoken more to myself than to the others, because all the rest of the day the expression "He is our peace" kept rising to the surface of my consciousness, to be repeated silently.

We were taken on a tour of the manse which had been completely refurbished in anticipation of the coming of the new pastor a fortnight hence. Then a gentle elderly woman who lived in a low whitewashed cottage with a thatched roof, sent word asking if the American visitor would grace her humble abode for tea. Five of us readily accepted her invitation and sat down for a country repast in a dark little room where chunks of peat glowed in the tiny fireplace. Legend had it that when the Campbells resided in the manse, Alexander often stopped at this ancient cottage while returning from Armagh, which was about four miles distant.

We went to Armagh, which dates its existence from 300 B.C., and to the great library established by Primate Robinson in 1771. We walked across the city to the observatory, founded on "The Hill of Honey" in 1790, to be greeted by the present director, Dr. E. M. Lindsay, of Harvard fame, and now recognized in astronomical circles throughout the world. Dr. E. J. Opik, driven from his home in Estonia by the Soviet invasion, explained to us at length his research into the nature of solar eclipses. We ended our visit in the area by exploring Saint Patrick's Cathedral, more than six centuries old, and now the headquarters for the Anglican Church in North Ireland.

As we boarded the buses for the return to Belfast the weather became nasty and bad, and soon the rain turned to snow which took the form of a sweeping blizzard by the time we reached the city streets. Because of the long and tiresome journey of the day, those with whom I lodged went on home, while I lingered with the George Hendren family for tea before the cheerful fireplace. Later, when I stepped out into the night to begin the more than two mile walk, I was engulfed in swirling snow. I had to make my way from one faint street light to another as I trudged along through five inches of accumulated snow.

I have never experienced a greater sense of loneliness. It was as if I was walking through a universe devoid of all life but my own. The only sound to be heard in a great city was that of my shoes crunching the snow beneath them. The activities of the day came surging back into my mind and mingled with the reveries were the images of the noble souls who dared, in the midst of division, to dream of a united church. I thought again of the text which came to me as I read the Word, and of how it had also stirred the mind of a Presbyterian minister in such a rustic setting. I recalled the message I had recorded in the home of Mr. Hoey to be played at the next meeting of the Synod in Belfast. In that talk I urged that if they had others of the caliber of Mr. Campbell, that they send them to American shores to encourage unity among the frightfully-divided heirs of the movement launched by their gentle minister of yesteryear.

I was smitten with the hypocrisy of a plea for a humble peasantry to provide another apostle for oneness while I was among them as a factional representative. It came home to me with force that I had never really labored for the unity of all who believed in Jesus. I had actually, in mistaken zeal, contributed to the fragmentation of the very movement which Thomas Campbell had launched with such high hopes and great promise. Instead of furthering the noble "project to unite the Christians in all of the sects," I had absorbed and sometimes even gloried in a sectarian spirit.

As I stumbled along through the deepening snow, alone in a foreign city, I found myself weeping and praying and making promises to God of what I would do if my life was spared through His grace. The word grace came like a ray of hope and I rolled it on my tongue like a juicy morsel. What I needed to make life worth living, to overcome my frustration, to rise above the futility of my own efforts was grace. In all of my forty-three years no other thought had ever struck me with such force.

In my darkened room I lay awake all night wrestling with my own thoughts. The hours dragged on in the velvety blackness as I went back over every step of the day before. When dawn came I was empty, drained and helpless. Every dream of my life had vanished. Every ship of hope I had launched lay in broken pieces upon the rocks of my own past. I went downstairs to gaze out upon a world of diamond-flecked whiteness but even its scintillating beauty impressed me but a fleeting second.

I sat down before the little hearth with its one lump of coal (the last one of our ration) and picked up the Bible. My eyes were dim from weeping and from staring into darkness through a sleepless night. Without design I began reading with verse one of Revelation. I became aware that thoughts were leaping from the pages which I had read so often and taking lodgment in my benumbed brain. It was fascinating to have words come alive and to see their souls separate from the characters which the typesetter had given them as bodies, and free themselves from the prison of print to take up abode in my mind.

I read until I came to the letter addressed to the community of the reconciled ones at Laodicea. I could identify with it as representative of our movement. We thought of ourselves as rich and increased with goods, and needing nothing. I remembered the oft-repeated question, "What is there left to restore?" or, sometimes, "What do we need that we do not have?" But I could also realize that we were poor, and wretched, and blind, and naked, as God saw us. I read on and came to realize what was meant by the gold tried in the fire which could be purchased only at the divine currency exchange by those willing to pay the staggering price. At last I knew what was meant by the white raiment which covers the nakedness of congregations which parade unashamedly, unaware that their garments of fig leaves and their masks are transparent, and they are wearing see-through apparel while the world looks and laughs. For the first time I also knew what was meant by the ointment which restores sight to eyes that are blinded by cataracts of pride, ambition and sectarian prestige.

And then I saw the answer to all of my longings, all of my loneliness, all of my lovelessness to others, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." I had never once invited Jesus to come in. True, I had never asked Him to stay out, but I had never shared with Him the kind of intimacy He had promised, the warm glow of companionship at the supper table, the convivial atmosphere in which friends talk and laugh and joke together, and let themselves go in the firm trust that they perfectly understand one another.

I had come to Jesus thirty years before, and then some, but it is one thing to come to Jesus at His invitation, and a wholly different thing to have Jesus come in to you at your invitation. I came to Him out of a state of alienation, like a refugee fished out of the muck and mire who needs to be cleaned up in the bath of regeneration and given an abiding place. But the statement to the Laodiceans was not made to those outside. It was made to those inside. It was Jesus who was outside. Regardless of the state of the things in the congregation with which one was identified, that one could have a royal guest sitting at his supper table and gracing his abode with His presence.

He did not need to leave where he was. He did not need to look for another "church." In the midst of poverty of spirit, wretchedness, misery, blindness and shameless nudity, he could be filled with joy unspeakable and full of glory. I had never really experienced that kind of joy. In fact, nothing had ever happened to me that I could not describe and glibly enough at that. I had been dubious of anyone who had been too happy. It did not seem right for a Christian who ought to be "walking on eggshells" for fear there was a minute law he might have overlooked and which would bring the wrath of God down upon his unsuspecting skull like the pagan temple which killed blind Samson while the idolators were laughing at him.

Now I was being tendered an offer of genuine, thrilling, life-changing association which could have been mine all along if I had not wandered in the fog boiling up from the dank and boggy marshes of legalism and tradition. All I had to do was to hear a voice and open the door. That was it. There was no other condition, no regimen of penance, no burden of regret about yesterday. There was no high-pressure selling, no arm-twisting. Loneliness would leave through the same door by which He entered, exactly as light must dispel darkness.

I heard his knock! I heard His voice! I am not talking about audible impressions or things like sound waves or reverberation. It was too deep "for sound or foam" as the poet said. So I arose and put on my overcoat and the borrowed overshoes which had been loaned to me by a kind brother, and walked the two blocks over to where the double-decker bus stopped to pick up riders bound for the heart of the city. I swung off of the platform at Shankill Road and walked up to the little meetinghouse on Berlin Street. Inside it was dark and filled with cold which caught warm breath and sent it swirling upward like a cloud.

I sat down in a pew selected at random and counted the cost of what I was about to do. I realized that I had been tracked down and brought to bay by "the hound of heaven." It must have been an hour I sat there with the cold seeking the openings in the fibers of my clothing. At last I kneeled down and spoke, perhaps audibly, "This is it! I have come to the end of the road and I'm opening the door! Come in!" Immediately He did exactly what He promised He would do, and I knew it! There were no hot flashes, no hair standing on end, no goose-pimples, no spinal chills, no "speaking in tongues." There was none of that!

But there was the indescribable feeling of the rightness of all things, the possession of a peace which transcended human rationality and understanding. I knew a part of me had died and that part would never be resurrected. It had been replaced with a new "me" who was not all of my own creation. I was different and I knew that I was different. I also knew I would never be the same again. Never, regardless of what happened. And then there was that joy! Perhaps the most powerful thought which gripped me was that I had no further enemies among the brethren. They were all children of God! We had a common Father. It struck me like a flash that I could never again hate those whom He loved.

As J. B. Phillips put it, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." It was months before I learned that the love of God had been poured out in my heart by the Holy Spirit He had given me (Romans 5:5).

4. The Beginnings of Change

Life in the Spirit

Contents

In these days I am often asked in public how I explain the traumatic experience which I described in the previous chapter. It is not a satisfactory reply to say that I do not explain it, but simply recount it. Our brethren have been conditioned to think there must be a specific explanation for everything. The explanation must harmonize with and conform to our traditional thought-patterns or be summarily rejected or laughed out of court. I know how they feel for I once felt exactly the same way. Nothing can possibly happen beyond our power of comprehension. If we could not explain it, it obviously did not happen. One who said it did was either deceived or a deceiver.

I am grateful that God's grace has made it possible for me to outgrow that kind of arrogance. Now I can be like the man who was healed by Jesus after having been blind from birth. He was subjected to the third-degree and given a Star-chamber grilling by the local Pharisees who would rather have him blind than healed by someone as unorthodox as Jesus. He was ignorant about a lot of things as they related to the "how." But he said, "One thing I do know: I was blind and now I see." That was not enough for the Pharisees, so they threw him out of the local congregation, which is "par for the course" when there are Pharisees around. Jesus heard about it and looked him up, realizing that He was closer to the one on the outside than to those on the inside.

At first I said nothing to anyone about the soul-satisfying entrance of Jesus and the inward supper-sharing experience every day. I just continued to feast with Him and He with me, rejoicing in the Spirit. You must remember that I grew up among good brethren who prayed out of a sense of duty. It was a command, a legal requirement, an act of worship. You had to go through the act to be safe. If you neglected it God would clobber you. We did not so much pray as we "said prayers." I do not think we expected anything to happen, and it generally did not. If it did we regarded it as a fortunate accident.

As time went on and I was driven by the Spirit within to make myself vulnerable by going among those from whom I had been isolated, the fruits of the Spirit were beginning to be detected in my advocacy of love, joy and peace, as opposed to accusation, challenge and debate. At first no one thought it was real. They freely predicted it would not last and that I would eventually return to sanity and be as mean as I was before. But since I had spent some time in "Arabia" before I returned to "Jerusalem," by the time I began to write on my growing conviction as to the fellowship of the reconciliation, a new wave was beginning to sweep across the religious strand. Eventually it would affect both the Catholic and Protestant establishments and wash over into every segment of the restoration movement.

It ushered in what came to be known as the "charismatic age" although this was a serious misnomer. The more profound student of the new covenant scriptures will at once recognize there can be no charismatic age, for the simple reason that there has never been a non-charismatic age. The work of God has always been made possible by the gifts of God. The Spirit is no less powerful and no more inactive in one century than another. He does not activate in spasms nor motivate in spurts. He has always been the life of the body and will be while the Son sits at the right hand of the Father.

But a lot of branches which had become lifeless and devoid of fruit were led by cultural conditions (I think) to open up their hearts to the will of God for the first time, and as a result of fervent entreaty, were filled with the Spirit. They mistook this filling with the baptism of the Holy Spirit and were ecstatic over the boldness and inner might which became theirs. As a result, when I was asked what had brought about my change of attitude, and I reluctantly described what had transpired, I was repeatedly interrogated as to whether I had received "the baptism of the Holy Spirit."

The answer is simple. I did not. I consider the baptism of the Holy Spirit a one-time experience to bring the body into union, as I regard baptism in water a one-time experience to bring me into union with the body. Before the one body existed, mankind was divided into two great classes. One of these was nigh, the other was far off. One was called the circumcision, the other the uncircumcision. On Pentecost, the representatives of the Jewish nation received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. At the home of Cornelius, several years later, the representatives of the Gentile nations received the "like gift" as did the Jews at the beginning. Jesus became the peace who made both one. He reconciled both unto God in one body by the cross. Both then had access by one Spirit unto the Father.

The baptism of the Holy Spirit is never mentioned again in the word of God. It was unrepeatable because it was unnecessary. The good news was to the Jew first and also to the Greek. After it was established that both must enter into the new relationship and be justified by faith, there was no further need to exhibit the baptism. I reject, as untenable for me, the interpretation of I Corinthians 12:13 which makes this equivalent to what occurred in Jerusalem and Caesarea. Before me, as I write, lies a copy of the Pentecostal Evangel. It contains an article by G. Raymond Carlson, Assistant General Superintendent of the Assemblies of God. The title is "The Charismatic Movement Today."

The article contains many good things. It is extremely well written. But it uses the term "Baptized in the Holy Spirit" more times in three pages than it is mentioned in all of the letters to the individuals and saints, as written by the holy apostles. It also makes repeated reference to "the Pentecostal experience." With all due respect to our friends who differ with me, there is no such thing. Pentecost marked the birthday of the earthly phase of the kingdom of God. There can be but one birthday, although there may be many anniversaries to remember or celebrate it. The writer should probably call his "a Corinthian experience," since those who claim the experience distinguish what happened on Pentecost from what happened at Corinth. I do not personally recognize the difference. But I can readily understand why one would not want to be too closely identified with Corinth.

I am quite convinced that the Holy Spirit has dwelt in me since the day I validated my faith in Jesus by being baptized into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. He was God's gift to me according to His promise when I was granted the forgiveness of my sins and was justified by His grace. The Holy Spirit is the present possession of every child of God in this whole wide world. But I was ignorant that He was my Comforter, my Advocate, my Helper. At first I was taught that the Spirit was the Word. We confused Him with the Bible which tells us about Him, because of an unfortunate and tragic misunderstanding of John 6:63. When gradually forced to relinquish that mistaken notion we drove Him into a corner, bounded by the first century and the lifetime of the apostles, and sheared Him of all power in the present.

Driven to the wall by my own weakness and unbrotherly attitude, when I opened the door of my heart to invite Jesus to come in, the Spirit was freed from the bondage and limitations of my own littleness and unworthiness, to pour out the love of God in my heart. I no longer had to try and "finish by my own power" what had begun by the Spirit (Galatians 3:3). Having said this, I want to clarify my position with reference to those brethren who claim "the baptism of the Holy Spirit." I am not upset by their descriptive terminology even though I think they are mistaken.

It seems to me that many of them confuse the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the filling of the Holy Spirit. There is a real and valid difference between the two. I'm not certain that those within the scriptural context prayed for the baptism of the Holy Spirit, although the filling of the Spirit is connected with prayer and manifests itself in a sense of boldness in speaking God's message, as in Acts 4:31. The baptism of the Holy Spirit was to create a new body; the filling of the Holy Spirit is to renew the members of the body. The experience of the Spirit is more important than what one calls it, just as any deed is more important than its designation. One who is not free to make mistakes is not free to make anything else. So I do not propose to engage in strife about words. Regardless of how one labels what happened to him to produce a closer walk with God I am thrilled that it happened. The result is a blessing and I rejoice in that.

In my case the happening drove me to more than six years of prayerful, and sometimes tearful, re-examination of my whole religious philosophy. I was forced into painful introspection and meditation. It was agonizing to have my idols torn from their pedestals. I came to realize that I had been wrong all of my life in my usage of the scriptures to condone and defend our divisions. When the true meaning and significance of the fellowship began to enter into my consciousness, it was as if a huge burden had been lifted. But that did not come until weary years had passed, and meanwhile I was still abroad. Worse yet, I must return to America and face brethren who had experienced no change. The more charitable of them would come to think I had lost my mind. Many of the others would conclude that I had denied the faith and was worse than an infidel. I would see the day in which I was misrepresented, lied about, and actually hated because of His name's sake!

On the evening of March 30 I left Belfast for a brief interlude in England. Taking the cross-channel steamer for Heysham at night, the next morning I caught the train to Ulverston where I found Brother Walter Crosthwaite waiting. In two months he would celebrate the sixtieth anniversary of his first public message in defense of the gospel. I found him still busy teaching the Word, corresponding with the saints, and editing Scripture Standard. The five days and nights spent in the home of this godly patriarch of the faith will linger in my memory as one of the most fruitful periods of my earthly sojourn.

We sat before the little grate fire and talked for hours. Never a moment of it was wasted upon trivia, but the subtle humor and tremendous fund of anecdotes and reminiscences of an old soldier who bore the scars of spiritual conflict made the hours pass all too rapidly. It was hard to tear myself away to mount the stairs to the little triangular bedroom where I slept, and after a few hours' repose I arose eagerly to go downstairs and resume our conversation. I am sure that these few days with a veteran in the service were desperately needed to enable me to withstand in the trying years in which I would face growing opposition while trying to divest myself of the party spirit. The morning I left Brother Crosthwaite walked with me to the station. As we clasped hands, both of us knew we would never talk again on earth. I wiped the tears away as I boarded the train.

Albert Winstanley and Will Hurcombe were waiting on the platform as the train pulled into Wigan, and they conducted me to the hospitable home of Leonard and Doris Morgan where Nell and I had stayed four years before. I spoke at a different place each night— Scholes, Argyle Street at Hindley, Blackburn, Ince, Albert Street in Wigan— and souls were added to the Lord. Each day Albert and I went from house to house, exhorting the saints, pleading with the unsaved, and comforting the afflicted. Through the mists of the years I can still see the faces of the brethren— Stephen Winstanley, Leonard Morgan, Carlton Melling, Harry Wilson, John Pritt, and a host of others. Many have departed to be with the Lord, but as I write this, some are still camped on this side of Jordan waiting to enter the promised land.

My arrival back in Belfast on April 12 was propitious. The Evening Telegraph announced a baccalaureate address for the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary to be delivered to the graduates on April 12, by Dr. James Campbell, M.A., of Larne. The subject of the discourse was to be "Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs." The paid advertisement said the speakers would also discuss the reason for the church's opposition to the use of instrumental music in public praise. I went early and found myself in the company of aged professors from the school, most of them in clerical garb. For almost thirty minutes I was privileged to converse with the instructors in Hebrew, Greek, Homiletics and Church History. Not one was less than seventy years of age and all were richly endowed with scholastic degrees.

The moderator introduced me to the graduates. I was much impressed with one who had prepared himself to go as a missionary to Syria. I met Dr. Campbell before he spoke and he insisted that I address the assembly briefly following his formal speech. Our meeting created a contact which we kept alive for five years through exchange of letters.

The text of his speech was Colossians 3:15-17. He contended against the use of uninspired songs as expression of public worship, equating hymns and spiritual songs as descriptive of certain types of psalms found in the old covenant scriptures. In his outspoken opposition to the use of instrumental music he declared that it was never really introduced until the 13th century, and then by an apostate church. He asserted that the only acceptable instrument for offering praise was the human heart indwelt by the Spirit of God, and said that every reformer worthy of the title had always seen the need of removing the organ and other human instruments as an indication of the serious attempt to return to the ancient order.

In the closing moments of his speech, the learned Presbyterian decried the use of choirs, solos, and quartets in the praise service. He asserted that public praise in the time of the apostles was always congregational. It was always rendered to God and never used to entertain men. In a rather impassioned peroration he besought the graduates going forth into the world to resist the tug of the spirit of this age and seek to imitate the holy apostles rather than the unholy world about them.

He was dressed in somber garb with a long black clerical coat and with knee breeches fastened with silver buckles. His feet were clad in gaiters common to clergymen in the land. As I sat and listened it was not difficult to imagine that Thomas Campbell had returned after all these years, again to address the Belfast Synod, as he was wont to do in days of yore.

4. The Beginnings of Change

The Land of the Thistle

Contents

On May 10, 1951, I celebrated my forty-third birthday, far from home and in a foreign land. In honor of the occasion we broke open some of the food parcels from home and served a little dinner for the saints in Belfast. Two days later I began my journey by train to Southern Ireland where I was to meet Nell who was coming over on the America. I was especially pleased that my itinerary called for me to spend a night and the greater part of a day in Dublin. I chose as my overnight abode the Four Courts Hotel on the River Liffey.

Four centuries ago it was known as Angel Inn, and became the home of Jonathan Swift, the author of Gulliver's Travels. A clever and brilliant satirist, he punched holes in the political and religious pretensions of his day. In 1713 he was appointed dean of Saint Patrick's Cathedral, but with the fall of the Tory Administration a year later his political career ended, and he retired to Angel Inn where he died in 1745. When the inn was remodeled, the decorator made lavish use of mirrors and statuary, so that one feels he is staying in a museum.

The original floor of wide boards fastened with wooden dowels has been left throughout, so that one can literally walk where the author of Tale of a Tub trod. There is, among the public rooms, a spacious lounge and writing room with a huge open-grate fireplace. Since I always seem to get more from my reading when I am in the proper atmosphere, I settled down in a leather chair in this room, resolved to read some of the poetry by Swift which I had never taken time to read. It was an evening well-spent. I shall always remember scanning the poem "A Description of a City Shower" while the face of its author stared out at me from its frame.

I cannot forbear saying a little about Dublin, the capital of the Irish Free State. It is a city famous for its educational and cultural background. When I became acquainted with the works of Richard Chenevix Trench, and especially his volume On the Study of Words, I learned that he had been Archbishop of Dublin. This motivated me to learn all I could about the city and especially the Protestant influence within it. I remember having been impressed with the fact that the Alexandrian geographer, Ptolemy, who lived about 150 A.D., had mentioned the original settlement which grew into Dublin.

As I walked the streets I felt like Paul did at Athens when he saw the city wholly given over to idolatry. Images for worship were everywhere. Candle factories were prominent, manufacturing tapers to be lighted before saintly statuary. Clerical garb was everywhere manifest as priests and nuns walked the streets. Advertisements of pilgrimages to Rome and Lourdes appeared on bulletin boards and in shop windows. I read through the long list of obituaries to see if one Protestant was listed. Apparently the Protestants are extremely healthy. I found not one name. That thousands of Irish had gone to America was evidenced by the number of death notices containing the words: "American papers please copy."

On May 13, I went to Cork, a train ride of 165 miles to the southwest of Dublin. In the knowledge that I might never be there again I walked as rapidly as possible to cover important areas in this city of more than 80,000. Cork is the home of two cathedrals, one Roman Catholic, the other Anglican. Both are called St. Finbar, after the name of the founder of the city in 622

A.D. It was late when I got to Cobh, and the Hotel Commodore where I was to spend the night.

I arose early the next morning to go to the dock. The America had anchored about four miles offshore before daybreak, and passengers who were to be taken off on the tender were given an early breakfast. I saw Nell as she stepped off the lighter and soon she saw me and waved. But we could not be together until she had cleared customs. What a blessing it was to hold her in my arms again after an absence of months. We had much to talk about on the long train journey to Belfast. When we arrived at the station we heard the beautiful strains of "The Lord's My Shepherd" being sung to the tune Crimond. The whole congregation was there and their singing stopped even the train crews who paused to listen to every word.

We had one more week in Belfast and our hearts were torn that the time of our departure was so close. The final days created a kaleidoscope of memories. Each day the members vied with each other to show us something of interest. Each night I spoke to a gathering of the saints. A visit to a large linen factory, a trip to the magnificent City Hall, crowned by a view of the private office of the Lord Mayor, through the courtesy of his secretary, a final tour of inland Ireland, a day at Bangor by the seaside, and then the final night and the farewell tea at the meetinghouse.

The chorus sang beautifully. Different brethren made brief talks. We wept unashamedly. We clung to one another, reluctant to take leave. The congregation gave us a lovely picture of the Mountains of Mourne, personally autographed by the painter. Nell received numerous gifts of linen and some of the sisters presented her with treasured heirlooms and keepsakes, out of hearts filled with generosity.

The next evening we had our final tea at the hospitable home of William and Margaret Hendren, and then drove to the docks where we were to board The Royal Ulsterman for the cross-channel trip. Almost the whole congregation was at the dock, and as the ship drifted slowly away from the wharf and out into the darkness, we could hear the strains of "God Be With You Till We Meet Again." A feeling gripped our hearts that we would never again see these precious ones upon this earth.

I have never forgotten Belfast. I can still envision the children swinging on ropes attached to the street lamps. I can still see the women on their knees scrubbing the sidewalks in front of their homes with reddened hands. I remember the groups harmonizing in song on the street corners at night, the women draped with thick shawls or blankets to shelter them from the cold as they walked to unheated shops, the many pushcarts on the street, the window washers carrying their ladders and buckets. I shared the agony and the ecstasy of a people who had just come through a devastating war and had triumphed and I left a little bit of myself in Ireland.

We were met at the dock in Glasgow by John and Mary McCallum and spent the day resting in their home while catching up on letter writing. It is a good thing we found this little time for relaxation because I was getting ready to go into a hectic schedule without realizing it. The next afternoon we left for Tranent, where I had spent my time exhorting the saints of the Slamannan District, in my final meeting in Scotland four years before. We stopped enroute at the home of Joe and Agnes Kerr where we were to stay all night. They had moved from Harthill to Prestonpans since our visit.

The place was rife with history. The house where the Kerrs lived was on the banks of Red Burn which flowed red with blood on September 21, 1745 when the Jacobite forces led by Charles Edward Stuart known as the "Young Pretender" or "Bonnie Prince Charlie" defeated the British under Sir John Cope. The monument to the victory of the wild tartan-clad clansmen still stands on the field in Prestonpans. It marks the high tide of the rally of the Stuarts before their forces were completely routed at Culloden Moor in April, 1746, and Charles Edward became a hunted fugitive.

Just as interesting to me was what had happened here in 1590 when witchcraft became an organized institution. A number of persons who claimed to have seen and conversed with the devil, and who had entered into a compact with him, began to exercise a great deal of influence. Superstition ran riot. Special meetings were held at night in the church building at Old Berwick, and graves were opened by these progenitors of modern spiritualism who collected human skulls and bones to use in their incantations. Some there were who predicted that Satan was preparing to capture the world and this would be his headquarters and the place of his throne.

King James, who became a specialist in witch-hunting, and who defied the curses pronounced upon him, effectively put an end to the ambition of the witches. He had his soldiers gather up a group of them and ordered that they be publicly strangled and their bodies burned. Some of their more ardent followers declared secretly that no fire would be able to burn them. Not only did their bodies burn, but their leader, Dr. Fian, was executed at Castle Hill in Edinburgh on December 26, 1591. This halted the immediate outbreak of superstition, but that it did not completely crush it is evidenced by the fact that the last person to be executed as a witch in England was in 1716, while the last one in Scotland died in 1722.

Fifty Bible teachers from the Slamannan District gathered at Lochside Chapel, which I remembered so well, on this Saturday afternoon, for a discussion of means and methods of improving their efforts. The meeting was ably presided over by John Steel, an art instructor at Airdrie Academy. We sang a hymn, had a prayer, and then sat down together for tea. I recalled that it had been said that Gabriel would have to be careful about when he sounded his trumpet, for if it was at teatime, no Scotsman would show up. After tea, I spoke briefly and then opened the meeting for questions.

Before we realized it three hours had slipped away. Afterwards a number of folk gathered at the Kerr home and entertained us with Scottish ballads and songs of the Jacobites, as the defenders of the house of Stuart were called. I have never again heard "By Yon Bonnie Banks and By Yon Bonnie Braes" done as effectively as that night. And when I hear "Will Ye No Come Back Again?" my mind reverts to that Saturday night in May. It was an unforgettable time of love and fellowship and genial good-feeling.

The next morning Joe and I walked the three miles to Tranent where I was to teach for more than an hour in a gathering of the saints who came early. It was a refreshing walk along a road in Scotland, past the monument to the battle, and with the town always in sight. The "breaking of bread service" as our brethren designate it, began at 11:30 a.m. and continued until 1:00 p.m. I spoke again to the edification of those present, and then Nell and I went to the nearby home of Sister Wilson, and her daughter Jean, for a quick luncheon. In the interval between my trips to Scotland Brother Wilson had departed to be with Jesus. I missed him greatly. Sister Wilson remembered my taste for Scotch oatcakes and had laid in a goodly supply.

I spoke to different groups at 2:00 p.m., 3:00 p.m., and 4:00 p.m., and at the gospel meeting at 6:00 p.m. This was not enough and after I had finished the brethren convened again to hear me for another hour. All of us were tired after we felt our way back through 32 miles of pea soup fog to the McCallum home. It was 1:00 a.m. when we finally retired. Before I could go to sleep I thought back over the entire day. I had a good feeling about the cause at Tranent. A number of younger brethren were identified with the work. The possibilities for growth seemed great. The brethren were firmly grounded in the concept of "mutual ministry" and the utilization of all the gifts.

We had one more week remaining in the "land of the thistle." If I were to tell you all that happened this literary effort would be expanded far beyond its worth. There were scenic tours to Loch Lomond along roads lined with colorful rhododendron, while snow-capped Ben Lomond towered high in the distance; to Gareloch, the salt water lake off the Clyde, which was filled with the ships of the famed British Navy; to the mighty Forth Bridge, an engineering wonder; and to the renowned Castle Hill in Edinburgh where kilted sentries paced back and forth.

But even more interesting was the return to congregations we had previously visited and to the homes of saints we had seen four years ago. There was the meeting in Glasgow, the one in Motherwell, where David Dougal had labored with diligence and effectiveness for two months. Then on to Slamannan which gave its name to the district. We went into the homes of folk I had met in Canada. One was the home of a sister whom I had immersed during one of the meetings when she had come over to visit in Windsor, Ontario. It was a rich experience to see her now in her native land.

One day I discovered a huge bookstore on Charles IV Bridge in Edinburgh. It was a half-block long and stocked only used religious volumes, thousands upon thousands of them. I went up one aisle and down another, reading titles and viewing works I had heard about for years and had never seen. I was like a country lad turned loose in a city candy store. I stayed all day until there was just time to go to historic Wallacestone for the evening meeting, after tea in the gracious home of David Dougal.

Our last week in Scotland was spent at Kirkcaldy. I have previously mentioned this as the place where Alexander Campbell had spoken a century before my first visit. Kirkcaldy was the birthplace of Adam Smith, who wrote *The Wealth of Nations. He was greatly influenced by his close association with David Hume, and I have often wondered what Alexander Campbell had to say about Smith and Hume while he was in Kirkcaldy. He was familiar with both and expressed opposition to Hume's theory about the rights of man.

Nell and I stayed again in the hospitable home of the Mellises. On Saturday evening a welcome tea had been arranged at the meetingplace on Rose Street, and brethren came from Dunfermline, Leven, Pittenweem, and other towns in "the kingdom of Fife," as well as from the region across the Firth of Forth. The program was excellent. The hymns of praise lifted our spirits. So did the meat pies and biscuits (cookies) which we ate while talking as rapidly as we could about our marvelous relationship in our precious Lord. It was a season of refreshing from His very presence.

Our final day in "auld Scotia" was the Lord's Day. It is etched into my memory. I spoke at "the breaking of the bread" and remained to talk to the lads and lasses in the Sunday School in the afternoon. When we came out the rain was pounding the pavement. At the end of the street the sea was breaking against the wall with resounding slaps as the spume and spray leaped high. It was still raining hard at the time for the evening meeting but the house was filled. Some of the older men wore kilts of lovely plaid.

At the close of my talk three precious souls announced their desire to put on Christ in baptism. It was a time of rejoicing with tears of gladness. We said good-bye to one another, and walked out into the rainy night. All of us were aware that we would meet again some day where the light of the sun was not needed and the storm clouds would never rise.

4. The Beginnings of Change

Back Home from England

Contents

On May 28 we arrived in Yorkshire, the largest county in Great Britain. It was once the foremost manufacturing center of the world. We went to Leeds, which is famous for being in the midst of the textile industry. Fred and Hilda Hardy met us, and took us to the home of their son-in-law, Geoffrey Lodge. Almost every home in England has a name and Geoffrey and Bessie called theirs Maranatha. It was a constant reminder of the fact that the Lord is coming.

The next day two carloads of us drove through the beautiful Wharfe River Valley to the lonely Ilkley Moors. We left our cars and tramped through the wild gorse and bracken covered country. It is a land of grouse shooting. We heard the call of the curlews and saw the shaggy sheep which pasture on this awe-inspiring stretch of deserted country. As I looked back upon it from the car window my mind was full of "Wuthering Heights," by Emily Bronte, written about these same moors.

That night I spoke at Morley to a crowd which filled the little place of meeting. Geoffrey Lodge presided. We engaged in discussion with the Nazarene and Pentecostal folk who attended until we were late for dinner at the Thomasson home. After the dishes had been cleared away, we got our Bibles and talked about the Word until midnight. It came to me that this could be the strength of the Cause all over the earth, for little groups to meet in homes and discuss frankly and without formality the truth from heaven.

The following day we drove to Knaresborough where a ruined castle looks down from the height where it has stood a thousand years. It was market day and this quaint town which looked like an illustration from a book of Mother Goose rhymes was crowded with stands and temporary little shops set up. We wandered through narrow winding streets and alleys, flanked by age-old buildings with slate roofs. Far below flowed the picturesque river. That evening found us at East Ardsley where I spoke at a gospel meeting presided over by Brother E. Worth. It was Memorial Day at home but no one knew that in England.

The next morning we departed for Tunbridge Wells, in Kent, the garden spot of southeastern England, bordering on the English Channel. The white cliffs of Dover have made it justly famous. The congregation was small and had an inadequate and poorly-situated meetingplace. It had been plagued by internal troubles, but under the guidance of Albert Winstanley and Ralph Limb had overcome them. I was in a ten-day series of meetings, during which Nell and I made our abode in the hospitable home of a beloved sister, Gertrude Hill. One man was restored, and one immersed. He was the thirtieth person I had baptized into Christ since crossing the ocean.

On the morning of June 13 we bade farewell to the saints in England. We boarded an early train for London, where we spent the day at the World's Fair which was then in progress. That evening we caught the boat train to Harwich, where we embarked on a steamer which landed us at Hook of Holland the next morning. We began a tour of historical sights in Holland, Belgium and France. It was an impressive time but I shall mercifully spare you the details.

We went aboard the great ship which was to bear us back home at Le Havre, and arrived in New York on the last day of June. On our train trip back home I stopped at New Castle, Indiana, where a four-day mass meeting was starting which brought hundreds together from California to Pennsylvania. On the first night Adam Bruce and William Horrocks from Canada spoke. On Tuesday night I addressed a packed auditorium on "The Name of the Church." I took the position that the body of Christ was given no title, and did not need a distinctive name since it had no rivals. To name it was to denominate it, and thus to separate the family of God. This was my first attempt to state convictions which were beginning to form. Fortunately no one seemed to know what I was saying and those who mentioned it thought it was great. It was only later, after I became convinced from reading Alexander Campbell that I came to the conclusion that even the term "church" was a misnomer.

Three days after I arrived home in Saint Louis, Brother J. H. Mabery of Bonne Terre, Missouri left this world to be with Jesus. Fred Killebrew and I spoke words of comfort to the huge audience which had gathered in his honor. He had proclaimed the Word all during his long employment as the chief electrician for Saint Joseph Lead Company. Many men who had been assigned to work under him had been led to Christ. He had started several congregations of believers and we had worked together in weak places with full understanding and appreciation of one another. It was a grievous loss to me.

When the time came to return to Beech Grove, Arkansas, Darrell Bolin went with me. He spoke at Beech Grove and Evening Star. The attempted boycott was completely broken. Brethren came from nearly all congregations. Emotions were running high. One morning we received word to appear at the meetinghouse. When we arrived there were ten men there, including several elders and deacons from Paragould. Present also were Franklin Puckett and G. K. Wallace. When we entered the building and were seated, Brother Wallace took the floor and announced it was time to call my hand and he was there to do it.

He presented propositions he had drawn up on the preacher-pastor system and colleges. With a flourish he threw them down on the table and demanded that we put up or shut up. I waited for a minute while the awed silence seemed like an eternity. I slowly arose and walked to the pulpit. Looking the brethren in the face I said I would accept the offer to debate and the propositions as drawn. I proposed that we include a discussion of the scripturality of an evangelist looking after and exercising oversight of a congregation he had planted until elders could be developed and ordained. I felt this needed some clarification. Brother Wallace in a meeting at Paragould which was held to stop my inroads into the southland had misrepresented my position on the question. It was agreed to include it.

We decided to not have moderators but to allow each man to be responsible for his own conduct. Each of us was to choose a timekeeper. I agreed to meet Brother Wallace anytime, and his supporters selected the week containing the Fourth of July the following year. We announced the debate that night. The interest in it was intense, and many regretted that it was so far in the future. As one old brother put it, "We are ready to see the fur fly now and it looks like the best thing to do would be to put the two of you up on the stand and let you go at one another!"

I was really too busy to think much of the debate or to make preparation for it. On August 7 I began a one-week study at Farmington, Missouri, during which one was immersed. On September 9 Ellis Crum and I entered into a series of meetings at Independence, Missouri, and it was at Eureka congregation, a fine rural group near Meadville, Missouri, close to the home of General John J. Pershing at Laclede. On October 7 I began at Nixa, Missouri, in the Ozarks, the scene of so many meetings in my earlier days. James Baysinger led the singing and did a marvelous job. We immersed 22 in the three meetings.

The fall and winter months were filled with activity. Three things stand out in my mind as I review events. First, the amount of training of men in various congregations. The Saint Louis Bible Study began November 5 with students from many states. E. M. Zerr came for three lectures on Prophecy. But there were special studies and training classes all over the United States. Brethren were being developed to edify, to do personal work, and to share the Good News.

Second, the continuing contact by mail with the saints in Great Britain. There were letters and articles from England, Scotland and Ireland. Many of these were from humble saints who had come to love Nell and me. They wrote about their families and what was happening in their congregations. We answered them all immediately. They sent calendars and shortbread and other things at Christmas. It was several years before the correspondence dropped away and finally slowed down to a trickle. Death was taking its toll of those who had met us. It meant much to hear from these precious ones.

Third, the intensification of feeling in the southland because of the coming debate. Brethren in many congregations who had entertained grave doubts about the rise of the clergy system began to surface. As they did so, local preachers felt forced to speak in defense of their position publicly. This only served to increase suspicion that something was wrong. But it gave the Baptist Church a respite from attack. Since I was regarded as the greatest enemy to the church in this generation, my name began to be heard with increasing frequency in sermons. It appeared in bulletins, in tracts, on the radio, and even in public advertisements in newspapers as brethren sought to stifle and kill my influence before people had even heard me.

H. F. Sharp of Blytheville, Arkansas, took up the cudgel with an article in the October issue of *Gospel Guardian. He titled it, "Reckless Reporting by the Saint Louis Pope." In it he called me, among other things, a heretic, a troublemaker, and a pope. He accused me of malicious falsehood, divisive teaching, damnable heresy, and preaching filth. All of this was because of my conviction relative to the ministry of all the saints and the priesthood of all believers. Our brother only served to inflame the issue and to encourage others who had never met me to inveigh against me.

For weeks I became the subject of radio programs in Arkansas, Kentucky and South Missouri. Those who spoke against me had never met me. They had never read a word I had written. They operated purely on hearsay. Some of them were contradictory. But they sought to prejudice the minds of men against me. The preachers all expected to attend the debate but they did not want the "common people" to come. It was alleged that I could make black appear to be white, that I was a master brainwasher, and that what I said should go in one ear and out the other. It did not work as intended because many of those who heard resolved to come and listen to me out of curiosity.

At the time I had not yet formulated my present conviction that public debating of issues among brethren achieves but little lasting good. It would be several years before I would become bold and brave enough to hang up my verbal gloves and announce that my participation in such partisan encounters belonged to my days of spiritual immaturity. At the time I liked to debate. I liked the exchange of wit and repartee. I gloried in being chosen as a champion. I rejoiced in and responded to the audience reaction.

I made my preparation with full conviction that I was battling for the truth. I still believe that. I am not sure I was as prayerful as I ought to have been. I may have relied too much upon my own ability and knowledge. But I realized it was a battle to the death. One of the combatants was wrong, and one of us would lay his life on the line spiritually.

4. The Beginnings of Change

The Cow Pasture Debate

Contents

My first discussion with Brother G. K. Wallace has been referred to as "The Cow Pasture Debate." There was no place in the area large enough to accommodate the expected crowds, so brethren secured a huge tent and pitched it in a large field five miles north of Paragould. Hundreds of people came from many states. Hotels and motels for miles around were filled to capacity. The debate began on June 30 and closed July 4. J. A. McNutt was selected as timekeeper for Brother Wallace. My uncle, L. E. Ketcherside, operated in the same capacity for me.

The first two nights Brother Wallace affirmed, "The employment of a preacher to preach for the congregation as now practiced by the church of Christ, at 2nd and Walnut Streets, in Paragould, Ark., is scriptural." The third night I affirmed, "The New Testament authorizes an evangelist to exercise authority in a congregation which he has planted until men are qualified and appointed as bishops." On the fourth night, Brother Wallace affirmed, "The organization, by Christians, of schools such as Freed-Hardeman College is in harmony with the New Testament scriptures." On the last night I affirmed that it was contrary to the New Testament scriptures.

It is not my intention to review the substance of the debate. It was put into print and can be read in its entirety. Brother Wallace was a worthy opponent. A typical "Church of Christ" debater, he was constantly watching for a chance at the jugular. He knew all of the debater's tactics, was witty and sharp and one did not dare to let down his guard. I think his weakest moments came in his dealing with the difference between preaching and teaching and gospel and doctrine. He read the wrong definitions from both Thayer's Lexicon and Webster's Dictionary.

There were scores of preachers present, many representing both positions. A few did not have clearcut ideas about either. Each afternoon public meetings were held at Beech Grove. In these any brother could say anything upon his heart by way of strength and edification. It was decided that no discussion of or reference to the debate would be made in these meetings. It was probably the greatest array of public talent ever assembled at Beech Grove. Every meeting was stimulating and uplifting.

The debates drew people from the area who came as Puritans would attend a bear-baiting, or those south of the border would go to a cock-fight. Not too many of them understood the issues but they liked the excitement. This was evidenced when men gathered in country stores like the one at Hooker's Switch. The question of the debate came up as they sat talking on the front porch, and one old resident said, "Well, for my money, that Baptist from Saint Louis is giving that Campbellite about all he needs."

One of the greatest blessings which came to me during the debate was to meet Leroy Garrett. Students from David Lipscomb College called him in Dallas after the first night of debate, urging him to come. He deeply impressed me when I first shook hands with him. We held much in common but we also differed in our concepts regarding many items. We had been reared in different areas. I did not know the brethren with whom he had worked. He did not know the ones with whom I had labored. But both of us knew Jesus, and because of Him we wanted to know each other better.

It was only a short time later when he called me from Winfield, Alabama, where he was in a tent meeting. I went down to spend several days with him in the small hotel. There, in the presence of three David Lipscomb College students, we explored the points upon which we differed for three whole days. We began talking early in the morning and continued until late at night, merely taking time out to go to the tent for meeting. The people in the community did not know what was taking place as we sought to understand one another and the Word of God. Later we set up meetings in homes in Dallas, and then decided to widen the scope and invite all to participate. These were some of the most profitable and soul-searching experiences of my life.

Two weeks after the debate I returned to Beech Grove for two weeks. Each afternoon we held a two-hour session of Bible study. It was open, free and positive. It was generally agreed the debate had helped our cause. People from many other congregations came to hear and be blessed. An instructor from Harding College came to lead the singing. Brethren from various parties came and went away without rancor. The little congregation now had a reputation all over the United Sates. It had refused to roll over and play dead!

Before I leave the debate I must tell you of what happened to our antagonists later on. G. K. Wallace who was a Bible teacher at Florida College left the school and turned against it. Franklin Puckett who came with him to issue the challenge split with Brother Wallace and died on the other side of a rift which knew no reconciliation. The two congregations in Paragould whose preachers signed the article in Firm Foundation sounding the alarm that I had invaded the south, fell out with one another. My uncle and I attended a debate between them at 2nd and Walnut. The alienation exists to this day. Many of the preachers who attended the debate have since become involved in another schism and are attacking each other.

I am not glad these things happened. They are a built-in part of the System. There will be trouble in every congregation eventually. There will be new divisions in every generation. All of the programs, all of the excitement, all of the hullabaloo, will not prevent it. Legalism leads to division. It can lead nowhere else for men in the flesh. So long as men substitute love of law for the law of love trouble is waiting in the wings. It will come in on cue. Church of Christism is like any other "ism."

Four days after the debate finished, Brother D. Austen Sommer died of a heart attack as he sat in his home in Indianapolis, Indiana. He was born in Kelton, Pennsylvania, on March 28, 1878, and was 74 years of age. His departure brought home to me the fact that the generation of those who had influenced my younger years in the faith was retreating into the shadows. The Sommer family, which once exercised such an influence in the northern states was disappearing. Composed of men who knew the Book but who were jealous of each other, they had fragmented both their family and congregations throughout the land. Yet it was sad for me to see them die disillusioned and forlorn.

In October, 1952, Brother Garrett launched a monthly journal called *Bible Talk. In his initial editorial he wrote: "We feel that institutionalism and professionalism are teammates in that inauspicious game of apostasy into which they have enticed the church." He proposed to expose them for what they were, while at the same time dealing with worldliness, health habits, use of leisure time, the Christian home and worship. It was quite a sizable order for a paper.

The first issue bore a picture of the youthful-looking editor and Ansel Chandler of Tyler, Texas, wrote that he was a graduate of Freed-Hardeman College, Abilene Christian College, Southern Methodist University, Princeton University and Harvard University. Bible Talk was the forerunner for Restoration Review and did much to define issues confronting a great segment of the restoration movement sparked by the Campbells and their contemporaries.

The 1953 Mission Messenger featured a series of articles by Albert E. Winstanley, on various topics. At the same time I started one on "The Elders of the Church." There were twelve articles about the bishops dealing with an in-depth study of their qualifications, selection and appointment. The January issue carried a picture and an account of the golden wedding anniversary of Brother and Sister W. E. Ballenger. He had begun preaching two years after I was born and had planted new congregations all over the central states. Meticulous in dress and with shoes shined like a mirror, he had endeared himself to rural and village people because of his genial attitude. Some of them said he could walk through mud and none of it would dare rub off on him.

In February I went to Valdosta, Georgia at the invitation of brethren who had attended the debate. My mission was to visit and talk with preachers and others in the area. It was the first time I had been that far south, but I knew that Valdosta was the home of Jessie F. Love who had visited us in Missouri shortly after my father was immersed into Christ. He was a curiosity in our village with his broad southern dialect. I located his wife who was still living in Valdosta.

I talked with Joe Goodspeed, minister at Remerton, and Evans McMullen who was laboring at Hahira. Both were graduates of Florida Christian College. Other brethren came from Florida, Alabama and other parts of Georgia to converse with me. We met in a home and talked until midnight every day.

On January 24, J. A. Freed died at Topeka, Kansas, at the age of 77 years. The day of his death was also that of his 49th wedding anniversary. He had been a friend of our family for many years and was a relative of the brother Freed who founded the college at Henderson, Tennessee. J. A. Freed had proclaimed the gospel for a half century, and was well known.

On February 20 I began a series of Bible studies in the American Legion hall in Paragould, Arkansas, despite a good deal of opposition. I was on the radio daily discussing trends in the religious world. The result was that our crowds were good, reaching a total of 150 in many sessions. In the April issue of our paper I announced that I was scheduled for studies in Texas, Tennessee, and Georgia during that year. The increasing number of calls made it impossible to continue the Saint Louis studies. We cancelled them after fifteen years of continuous teaching.

During the Arkansas debate, Sterl Watson, who was preaching for the West End Church of Christ in Saint Louis, arose and issued a challenge for me to debate Brother Wallace on the same issues in Saint Louis. Being satisfied with the Arkansas encounter, I saw little use of a repetition of the debate. But before Brother Watson left Arkansas for Saint Louis he announced that he was coming to the city to run me out of it, so when he repeated the challenge to the congregation at Manchester Avenue there was little we could do except to agree to another debate.

Each congregation appointed a committee to work out the details and it was agreed that I would debate Brother Wallace in Carpenter's Hall October 26-30. It was decided that the debate would again be printed and thus four of my discussions would be in book form.

5. The Change Continues

The Stormy Fifties

Contents

Anyone who reads the history for 1953, of the particular restoration attempt to which we are heirs, will surely recognize that this year represented a peak in the battle between those who advocated a mutual ministry of all the saints and those who defended a professional ministerial caste. Although the central issue was the rise of a clergy system, there was always in the background the question concerning the right of disciples of the Master to create and endow human organizations to develop a special class of men who hire themselves out to congregations on a contractual basis to feed them.

It was a year of high tension manifested in public debates. We were attacked in articles in papers from whose columns we were barred and in which we could make no defense. Walter Henderson, at 2nd and Walnut, in Paragould, Arkansas, kept up a running fire against me in his little weekly paper called *Pause, Ponder and Profit. Guy N. Woods devoted an article to me in *Gospel Advocate. G. C. Brewer, who was as dignified in error as when he held the truth, stooped a little from his high plane and let loose a barrage in the same paper. He was perturbed because I held a meeting in Rutherford County, Tennessee, without consulting with George W. DeHoff of Murfreesboro and clearing it with him. I wrote a reply but Brother B. C. Goodpasture returned it with a note that my writings could not be published in his journal.

Glenn L. Wallace made a vitriolic attack on Leroy Garrett in the April 30 issue of Gospel Guardian. Rex A. Turner wrote an "Open Letter to Leroy Garrett" which was published on the editorial page of Gospel Advocate, for February 12. His opening sentence read: "Now that some of the details of certain maneuvers are in, the evidence points to the fact that you are definitely opening up a front for W. Carl Ketcherside and Sommerism here in the South." Leroy filed a reply. After a month went by he wrote to Brother Goodpasture and asked him why it had not appeared. In a letter which Leroy published, Brother Goodpasture ignored the question of the personal attack published in his own paper. But the Gospel Advocate had an editorial in the March 19 issue which said: "We do not feel that we are obliged to furnish a medium for radicals and hobbyists to ventilate their hobbies, nor are we obligated to become an agency for the dissemination of error. It is not our remotest intention to give brotherhood publicity to every hobbyrider and his fancies."

Brother J. W. Roberts, of Abilene Christian College, entered the arena through the pages of Firm Foundation. He was disturbed by Leroy's "peculiar ideas," and said, "Brother Leroy's ability and training deserve better things than the use to which he is putting them." Leroy pointed out that the Greek scholars, both Christian and otherwise, agreed with his position.

All of these men who took up the cudgel were eminent in "Church of Christ" circles. The fact that they felt pressured into writing against us, and even had to misrepresent our position, gave us the courage to press on. This was an indication that what was said was being read, that people were being made to question some of the entrenched practices. Although these men had been very active in debating with Baptists, Methodists and others, now they were being forced to defend what they had. For the first time in their history it was being demanded that they "preach what they practiced."

April 14-17 found Leroy Garrett and Floyd I. Stanley in a debate in Cowden Junior High School auditorium in Midland, Texas. The proposition was: "The Scriptures teach that a congregation of the Church of Christ with elders may employ a gospel preacher to serve as the minister of the congregation at a regular salary." Brother Stanley was the minister of the Southside Church of Christ in Midland. Reports from those in attendance universally mention his sarcasm and abusiveness, and Brother Garrett's calm and dignified demeanor.

On June 30-July 2, L. E. Ketcherside of Peoria, Illinois, debated Obert Henderson, of Walnut Ridge, Arkansas, at Peoria. The propositions dealt with the organization of Christian colleges and the work of evangelists. Those favoring the views of Brother Henderson absented themselves from the debate. He could not get one of the brethren to even come and keep time for him. I moderated and kept time for both men. The debate was very gentlemanly. Brother Henderson proved himself to be a person of real Christian character and demeanor. Later I became better acquainted with him and we enjoyed a real sense of fellowship in the Spirit.

My second debate with Brother G. K. Wallace was held in Saint Louis, November 26-30. It attracted hundreds from fifteen states and Canada. In addition to the debate two sessions were held daily at the Manchester Avenue meetinghouse. Those who presided over these sessions by invitation of the elders were L. E. Ketcherside, Peoria, Ill.; Vernon W. Hurst, Bristol, W. Va.; Hershel Ottwell, Hartford, Ill.; and Fred Killebrew, Senath, Mo. Brethren from everywhere were free to speak. They considered such questions as: What sectarian tendencies among us need to be eliminated? What scriptures are commonly misapplied? What are the bases for fellowship and disfellowship? What factors are essential to a complete restoration of the primitive order? These sessions were highly practical and free from controversy.

The debate itself was one of the most interesting in which I have been involved. Brother Wallace had argued himself into a dilemma. In Arkansas he contended vociferously there was no difference between preaching and teaching and between gospel and doctrine. He was on record as being opposed to any human organization to preach the gospel such as the missionary society. It was easy to prove from Florida Christian College bulletins that it was a human institution and that it existed to teach doctrine set forth in the new covenant scriptures. Brother Wallace was thus caught participating in and defending the scripturality of a human institution to preach the gospel.

He either had to take the position there was a difference between preaching and teaching and between gospel and doctrine, or else withdraw his opposition to the missionary society, as a human institution to preach the gospel. Later I learned from brethren who were present in the daily conclaves in which they sought to patch up the matter for Brother Wallace that the preachers knew they were hard hit. Their consolation lay in the fact that if Brother Wallace spoke forcefully and loud and hit his chart with the pointer the brethren might overlook the corner into which he had driven himself. He did both but it did not work!

As soon as that debate ended I had to start preparing for another. It was with Flavil L. Colley and was held in Beckley Theater at Dallas, Texas, December 1-4. It was limited to the scripturality of hiring a minister of a congregation having elders "as generally practiced among the churches of Christ in Dallas." Attendance was excellent and behavior above reproach. The debate was put into print and can be read in those libraries which have preserved such accounts of what transpired.

Before we close the account of debates we need to mention two more, which were held in 1954. One was conducted in Ivanhoe Temple, Kansas City, Missouri. It featured Leroy Garrett and Bill J. Humble. Pat Hardeman was the moderator for Brother Humble. Carroll Wrinkle served in the same capacity for Brother Garrett. To me, one of the outstanding things about this debate, which drew large audiences of eager listeners, was the question about the content of the gospel, whether the gospel was designed to be preached to the saved. Can the saved be evangelized? Despite the careless writings on this theme, it is ignorance with regard to it which underlies so many grave problems in the whole world of believers in Jesus as God's Son. It is the foundation of many of our own tragic and disappointing deviations from the divine purpose. The rise and development of a special clergy, the multiplication of divisive parties, the whole question of fellowship are all linked to it.

Brother Garrett debated George W. DeHoff at Nashville, Tennessee, June 1-4. The debate was conducted in a large tent pitched on Caldwell Lane, not far from David Lipscomb College. Pat Hardeman moderated for Brother DeHoff. Henry Clay Grayson moderated for Brother Garrett. From his very first speech Brother DeHoff seemed intent upon turning the debate into a burlesque. He dealt in personalities and it was obvious he was out to destroy anyone who opposed his practice. After the debate Pat Hardeman sought me out to tell me that the two of us would have to meet in a debate on the issues to end all debates. The time never came.

We were engaged in other things besides debating. In January of 1954, Leroy and I attended the David Lipscomb College Lectureship at Nashville. It was my pleasure to spend several hours with the venerable James A. Allen, editor of *The Apostolic Times. He was seventy years old but his memory had not dimmed. He gave me a great many insights into the causes of modern defections within the church. I could see that a great many problems stemmed from the ambitions for leadership of men who allowed pride to rule their lives.

Leroy and I went to visit Brother B. C. Goodpasture in his office, and later in his home. Everything was cordial. We presented to him a proposal for a panel discussion by representative men dealing with principles and not personalities. He could not see the wisdom of it and preferred going on as we had with him printing but one side of an issue. The lectureship turned out to be a mediocre presentation.

The following month Nell and I attended the lectureship at Florida Christian College at Temple Terrace, near Tampa. The theme was "Persistent Problems in Preaching." Featured were men such as Basil Overton, J. A. McNutt, G. K. Wallace and Pat Hardeman. One night after the session a man stopped Nell and me just outside the tent. Within a few minutes about a hundred men were gathered around us. They began bombarding me with questions from every side with all of them talking at once. Franklin Puckett mounted a chair and began to quiz me while many others were talking at the top of their voices.

I told them I would talk to anyone whom they chose but would not become a part of such a hullabaloo as they were engaging in. Since Brother Puckett already had "the chair," they nominated him. We talked about two hours and no one left. Occasionally someone would yell out a question and had to be reminded of the agreement. I left about midnight feeling good. Some of those who had started out so bravely were silenced.

We were in Birmingham, where we spent three days in the home of O. C. Dobbs, Sr. I visited a number of people including John T. Lewis. We had a long discussion about the clergy system and our brother attended one night when I spoke. Brother Dobbs took the floor after I had finished and proposed an open forum on the issues in Birmingham. Brother Lewis opposed it strongly. He felt that he could speak for the congregations in Birmingham.

The year of 1954 drew to a close with a great deal of excitement prevailing. The status quo had been disturbed and men hardly knew what to do!

5. The Change Continues

Years of Change

Contents

The time has come to try and describe the four most formative years of my life. They were years of change, of study, deep meditation and fervent prayer. They were years of fear mingled with faith. In them I came closer to God than I had ever drawn before. Actually, this period had begun on that Easter Monday in 1951 when I spoke at the little village of Ahorey, in North Ireland, at invitation of the Presbyterian leaders. I stood on the platform where Thomas Campbell had ministered before coming to America.

However, I returned to the United States to engage in debates with brethren. The heady excitement of combat in the forensic arena made it impossible for me to study deeply or to think clearly about the will of God for my future life. But between the years of 1953 and 1957 a great transformation took place.

Out of it came my article "That They All May Be One" in the January issue of Mission Messenger for 1957, and the even more trenchant "Thoughts on Fellowship" in January 1958. These were the initial public presentations of the thoughts which had begun to lodge in my heart. They represented my crossing of the Rubicon, the burning of my bridges behind me. They were the first guns fired in my commitment to an unrelenting war against sectarianism, and especially against my own.

During those years I learned the stern discipline of research and study. I read every word of the five volume Lard's Quarterly, the seven volume Christian Baptist, and as many bound volumes of the Millennial Harbinger as were available to me. It became apparent to me that we had departed so far from the original spirit and intent of the restoration ideal that it was a travesty upon justice to claim that we were the same movement. It soon became obvious to me that no splinter of the movement was the one holy, catholic and apostolic church of God upon earth, and that all of our fragmented groups taken together did not constitute the body of Christ in its fullness.

I was able to distinguish between the body as a divine organism conceived in the mind of God, and movements within it launched by the thinking of men like Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Campbell or Stone. It became apparent that the first great error of the heirs of the reformers was the equating of the movement with the Lord's church, thereby adding another religious party or sect to the already overburdened landscape. I became convinced that we had not achieved the original purpose of uniting the Christians in all the sects. The magnificent myth which had driven us on relentlessly to war against all sectarianism but our own was the fantasy that we were exclusively the body of Christ upon earth. It was a solemn thought to me that I had brothers and sisters meeting behind other signboards, and that we were saved by a Savior and not by a signboard. My growing conviction led to the article "The Sheep on the Hills." I could see that God's flock was scattered and not yet gathered.

I was led to investigate within their context every scripture I had ever employed to justify division among the saints of God. It was a frightening experience. As I read Amos 3:3; 6:5; Romans 16:17; I Corinthians 1:10; II Thessalonians 3:6, and other such passages and saw how we had wrested them, I began to wonder if I had ever been right upon anything. One after another my usage of such passages was taken from me. I began to mistrust my judgment. I was driven to my knees and sought the understanding of God's will with tears. I wept much to realize that at the very time when I thought I was serving Him I was actually dividing His children by my interpretations. It was several years before I wrote the first edition of my book "The Twisted Scriptures" but all of the time the Spirit of God was illuminating me as I surrendered more and more to His claims. I was driven to Him by loneliness for in those days there was no one else to whom I could talk.

It was a difficult thing to overcome pride and ambition. I had been for so long a recognized leader of a faction in the religious complex that I sought for some way to hold on to my past and maintain integrity with the present. One day, after months of introspection I sat down at my desk and wrote, "I have been in the wrong about fellowship all my life. Today I renounce that wrong. I will no longer try to make my increasing knowledge consistent with my past teaching. That teaching was in error." I recall as if it were yesterday how I felt when I read what I had written. It was as if fetters had been struck from my mind. New insights began to flood my soul so fast I could hardly write them down. It was as if a dam had broken inside me. I have never felt quite so clean and pure as I did that day.

People began to write and tell me I had changed. To them that was the unpardonable sin. They equated our past position with the will of God and to leave our feeble human thought and go on to greater heights was forsaking the truth. They would quote for me things I had written in the past and ask me if I still believed them. To all of them I wrote, "You are right, I have changed, and as I learn new truths I will change again. I have signed my declaration of independence from all of the errors of the past, and I shall pray that God will open up your heart to renounce yours as I have mine."

I resolved that I would never again debate publicly with any brother. I would never again represent any party, sect or schism. I would never again allow myself to be selected and thrust forward by the partisans of any school of thought to defend their opinions and deductions. I would stand or fall to my own master and I would allow all others to do the same. It came as a great relief to realize that never again would I have to spend weeks trying to figure out what an opponent might say and how I would parry his thrust. Since the moment I made my promise to the Father that I would never again debate, I have become increasingly convinced of the folly of attempting to arrive at truth or alleviate division by such a ridiculous procedure. If a community is not divided before a debate it will always be after one is held. The very psychology of our modern debating is divisive.

As I studied the past it became evident that men like myself who had learned new truths always made two errors. The result was an intensification of the sectarian spirit. In the first place, they left where they were and went with those who had taught them the new truth. This took the new truth out of the place where it was most sadly needed and put it in a place where it was already present. I resolved not to go anywhere but to stay where I was, regardless of what happened. If I could not serve God among those whom I knew best I would not be liable to do so among others.

Secondly, those who learned new truths usually tried to bind them upon others. In their joy at learning something meaningful to them they wanted to press it on everyone whom they met. Their new brainchild meant so much to them they wanted everyone else to become pregnant immediately. This always caused cleavages in the body. I resolved to share my ideas but never to allow them to become dogmas. I was resolute in my determination never to form a clique or club. As I wrote in my paper, I refused to be bought off or scared off and expected to remain where I was for the duration.

I urged all others to stay where they were until driven out.

It appeared to me that the way to unite was to unite. The way to halt division was to stop dividing. It seemed sensible that if everyone remained where he was this would preclude the formation of new parties, and while this would not lessen the number it would freeze them at the present level. It was my conviction that time would heal many of the breaches and bridge many of the chasms. In any event, the formation of new parties or sects, or the changing from one party to another would not achieve the purpose of God. To shift from one party to another does not eliminate problems. It only subjects one to new and unfamiliar problems with which he is not by experience qualified to deal.

I did not feel it was proper for me to continue without informing the brethren with whom I was laboring of my radical change of thought. The elders agreed to set up six two-hour periods on successive Saturday evenings and invite all who wished to come. I was to speak an hour and then answer questions from the audience for an hour. The meetings were well-attended and orderly, although somewhat tense. I loved and respected all of the brethren. I knew how they felt. I had taught them what they believed and had led them in its implementation. Now I was occupying the same speaker's platform to tell them I had been wrong.

I discussed with them the name of the church and told them it had no official title. The primitive ekklesia represented the called-out ones and they were known, not by a title, but by their love for one another. They were identified by where they met, and we should name the place so we could find them geographically, but not name the church to distinguish it from other believers, for that meant to denominate it.

I dealt with the "five steps of salvation" and showed that we were not saved by climbing a little ladder into the kingdom. Rather we were drawn up by an "escalator." We simply took the step of faith and the grace of God, as an unseen power drew us up into repentance and immersion into the precious Lord. It was His power and not ours which accomplished His purpose and we never left the faith we had in the beginning to go on to the next step.

I discussed the nature of worship and showed the folly of "five acts of worship" when everything that one did on earth under the sovereignty of Jesus was an expression of worship. Under Jesus there are no holy places, holy days or holy things, but only a holy people. I discussed the nature and composition of the one body and showed that it was composed of every person on earth who had answered the call of God. We should not ask people, "Which church are you a member of?" because there is only one. There never has been another and never will be. Our purpose should be to receive all whom God receives and as He received them.

I showed the differences between the gospel and the doctrine. The gospel consists of seven historical facts. The testimony to these must be believed. The doctrine consists of a course of instruction. It refers to that which is taught. It requires understanding and rationalization. We are saved by faith, not by how much we learn and know, but by whom we know. It was also pointed out that God probably did not respect any of our lines of demarcation and division because He did not create them. We like them because they gave us a sense of security, but it was a false security based upon human opinion.

We did not lose a person. I am working today with the same congregations with which I have always worked. And I am welcome in hundreds more. Through the grace of God, with few exceptions, the places where I had worked outgrew their narrow and inclusive views in the Saint Louis area, and are as comforting to me as I try to be to them as we grow older in years and in the faith.

5. The Change Continues

What Happens When You Change

Contents

I have often been asked about the effect of my changing convictions upon the party of which I had been one of the leaders. That, of course, is always the crux of any change. In the Saint Louis area where brethren could question me personally and where they could observe the life of Nell and myself, all of us continued to grow together in love. It was not quite so tranquil in other parts of the country. As I began to expose my changing views there was first astonishment and then resentment.

I had been a leader in opposition to the "Rough Draft" as presented by Chester and Allen Sommer in Indianapolis, Indiana. I had worked with their brother, D. Austen Sommer, in salvaging a "faithful church." Later when problems arose with the latter I had again been a leader in what we called "preserving the faith." Now I was saying the faith revealed in the Book was greater than, and not even related to our petty problems. Indeed, I was beginning to intimate that it was not only supremely above the Sommer movement, but the whole Campbell movement. The body of Christ as viewed by God was infinitely superior to all of our hassles and wrangles about means, methods and machinery. I suggested that He might not have been with us in any of our debates and controversies.

At first the opposition was an undercurrent. I would hear rumors of speeches delivered in various places opposing my concept of fellowship. Occasionally someone would write me that his congregation had received a warning against me. I was no longer sound in the faith. It was suggested that I might be losing my mind and that much learning had made me mad. I was not invited to speak at a few gatherings where I had once been welcomed. As the spirit of opposition gradually began to crystallize and to surface in order to protect itself, it became centered in three men among the older brethren— E. M. Zerr, Roy Loney and C. R. Turner.

Brother Loney was a good writer but was completely deaf. His speaking was greatly affected by his condition, and he was very difficult to understand. He had been alienated from his family and isolated from the brethren for some years because of his involvement in local church troubles. I went to Colorado and offered him the opportunity to write for Mission Messenger. He readily accepted. However, he had grown up in an age of preacher rivalry and church trouble, and was happiest when engaged in a running feud by mail. My changing views presented him another opportunity. He wrote letters to brethren whom he deemed weak in Saint Louis and sought to woo them into allowing him to come and start a "faithful church" and gather the dissidents together. They brought the letters to me and we ignored them.

Brother Turner's influence was limited and hurt by his own judgment. Possessed of an inflexible spirit, and being radical by nature, he felt called upon to try and drive brethren to see things as he did. Wherever he went he assailed "the new doctrine on fellowship." He was especially embittered by my emphasis on love as the solution of all of our problems and ridiculed it publicly whenever he could.

Brother Zerr was possessed of the greatest knowledge of the Book of any man among us. Every year, after his wife died, Nell and I had him come and stay with us for at least two weeks at Christmas time. He liked our children and enjoyed the spirit of gaiety which they created when they came home. I had edited and published his large book New Testament Questions and had also brought out the six volume commentary which he wrote. We were close to each other and I arranged for him to speak in congregations in the Saint Louis area.

He was a columnist for our little journal, writing a monthly article, "Word Studies in the Bible." He was adept at this kind of thing and had his articles in on time every month. As I began to air my developing views he became uncomfortable at appearing in the same paper with me. More and more it was apparent in his column that he was attempting to shore up our traditional partisan position. This was evident in his column for March 1958 when he wrote on the words "Heresy and Faction." The same issue carried two articles of mine. One was titled "The Party Spirit." Some have said it was the most keenly analytical article I have ever written. The other article was another installment of "Thoughts on Fellowship."

It was this series which Brother Zerr could not allow to go unchallenged. He wrote me that he could not continue to write for the paper unless he was permitted to write about my fallacies. I replied that I would welcome anything he said which would point out my error, and nothing he wrote would keep me from loving him. Accordingly, he announced his intention of dealing with my views in the August issue of 1958 in an article entitled "Preface." The intensity of his feeling was shown by his concluding words, "I am not vain enough to think I can 'stem the flood' of this disastrous movement. But I know that I can clear my conscience by raising my voice and hand against another incipient gash in the body of Christ."

In an editorial note I said, "We cherish the right for Brother Zerr to differ with our views, and we will provide him the same opportunity to be heard as we ask for ourselves. He may set forth any view he holds in this paper. . . . The fact that our brother, or any other brother, disagrees with us will make no difference in our treatment of him. We will demonstrate one time in history that there is room in the fellowship of God for brethren to differ in love."

It was obvious that I now faced the first real test of my view that love was the ultimate dynamic which could maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. For the first time I was committed to a wholly new approach to dealing with those who differed with me. I examined my own heart and found out that I was not shamming it. I loved these brethren in spite of their human weaknesses and mine. I resolved not to hurt their influence nor put a stumblingblock in their way. I would simply be true to Jesus. I would correct any mistakes which they sustained by evidence and apologize for any wrong.

I published all that Brother Zerr wrote. I replied as gently as possible. The result was that brethren had both sides of the controversial thinking before them in the same issue of the paper. I felt deeply that the things I was writing would some day be generally accepted. I was content to plant and water. I would "learn to labor and to wait," and allow time, the great arbiter, to validate what I was saying. As for the present I must be true to increasing knowledge regardless of consequences.

We escaped without a formal split, for which I have ever been thankful. It is true that some brethren with whom I had labored branded me a Benedict Arnold. Of course they knew little about what I was doing and nothing about Benedict Arnold. In private letters I have seen since, I was referred to as a traitor. None of these things moved me nor did I count my life dear unto myself. I knew the brethren did not realize the scope of what I was saying and they were angry, thinking I had left them. Actually I did not leave anyone. My only sin was the receiving of all God's children as my brothers. I did not consider that loving others more meant that I loved those with whom I had been associated any less. I moved out of the stagnant pool of backwater into the mainstream of God's mercy and love.

In these days I am constantly running into good brothers and sisters whom I knew in olden days. They would have nothing to do with me then. But many of them have now become less sure that they have a perfect understanding of all truth. They have seen their children and grandchildren drift away from the cold, calculating legalism which we then equated with the will of God. It has shaken them. They have mellowed and become more open. Some of them are now members of groups about which they condemned me when I suggested there might be Christians among them.

I have learned one thing which has proven valuable for me. When problems arise, if one can avoid saying too much about them in their initial stages he will not have so much to retract later on. Human pride often interferes with our acknowledgment of wrong and congregations which choose sides actually create the "sides" by their choosing. All matters are better when handled with cool heads and warm hearts than with hotheads and cold hearts.

On Labor Day weekend in 1958 occurred a meeting of great significance. It was held in the little city of Nowata, Oklahoma, and was arranged by my brother Paul who presided over it. Hundreds of brethren gathered from several states. It was a rich time in sharing. Featured was a discussion of instrumental music in relation to fellowship. Participants were Seth Wilson, Don DeWelt, Leroy Garrett and myself. The format proved to be excellent. There were three sessions of two hours each.

5. The Change Continues

Lava From Above

Contents

It was John Milton who called death "the golden key that opens the palace of eternity." As I think of 1959-60 I am impressed with how often that key opened the palace door for older persons whom I loved. Then I recall that I was fifty-two years of age and those of the preceding generation were ripe for the reaper's scythe. It is not in a morbid spirit but simply to keep the record straight that I mention a few of those whom "the great leveler" called home to be with Christ in this brief period.

There was John Egarian, who died at Riverside, California, at the age of 94. He was born in Betios, Syria, 14 miles from Antioch, on February 22, 1865. He learned to speak Armenian, Turkish and Arabian, but English was too much for him. He became skilled in silkworm culture, and was a consultant on silk production and manufacture while mayor of his city for many years. I baptized him and his good wife, with several others in the Armenian colony in 1939. He was 74 at the time and we had to speak through an interpreter.

On March 14, A. E. McClaflin, an elder at Bicknell, Indiana, died of a heart attack. I had stayed in his home many times, and the hours were spent in discussion of the word. His wife, Bessie, was a talented writer. For years she did a column for the Apostolic Review called "Leaves from a Rose Retreat," as their lovely home was called. Upon two occasions we had stayed up all night long talking about the Bible.

On June 16, J. W. Watts, Nell's father died. I was very close to him. Born in the Ozark hills he had grown up with little formal schooling. He came to the mining area when it was rough and tough. He was baptized by Daniel Sommer and was thoroughly committed to Christ. Twice he had been elected mayor of the city of Flat River. He was universally respected through the area for his commonsense, fairness and justice. I conducted his funeral service before one of the largest audiences ever to attend such an event. That day we learned what it meant to sorrow not as others which have no hope.

Brother E. M. Zerr was seriously injured near Martinsville, Indiana, October 29. He had celebrated his 82nd birthday two weeks before. He drove his car on to the highway directly in the path of one that was coming. He lingered four months in a coma, never regaining consciousness. He died on February 22, 1960. During his lifetime he conducted 75 protracted studies of the Bible in depth. For years he was the query editor for the *Apostolic Review. He was the only man in the restoration movement who had produced a commentary on the entire Bible. A great deal of it was written in our home. I had gone to see him a few months before his accident. He was very cold and formal toward me. He thought I had "left the faith" because I insisted that God's people were still scattered throughout the sectarian world.

On the same day Brother Zerr died, a mutual friend of ours, James Vermillion, departed this life in Riverside, California. I first met him in Springfield, Missouri, when I arrived there at the age of fourteen to hold a tent meeting on north National Boulevard. I stayed in his home and played with the boys. In later years he got a thrill out of telling how he would have to come out and tell me it was time to come in and get washed up for the meeting.

On January 4, A. W. Harvey, died in Bloomington, Indiana, as the result of a stroke. He had been a friend of the Sommer family for years, although he was not that close to D. Austen Sommer, whom he regarded as extreme. He was widely known because of his authorship of a booklet called "Bible Colleges."

On February 6, Robert Brumback died of a cardiac condition, in Phoenix, Arizona, where he had gone upon the recommendation of his physician. He was author of two books which I published. One was "History of the Church Through the Ages." I proofread the 430 pages three times before publication. The other book was "Where Jesus Walked." It was the story of Brother Brumback's trip to the holy land.

On March 17, Dewey Copeland died of a heart attack at Valdosta, Georgia. I met him first at the debate with G. K. Wallace, near Paragould, eight years before. During the interval I had been in his home many times. He and his wife and daughter had made a trip with Nell and me to Banff and Lake Louise in Canada, returning by way of Yellowstone Park and the Black Hills. It seemed incredible that he was gone. Jim Mabery and I went by train to Georgia to conduct the funeral service. It was a vast crowd we addressed.

On July 5, W. Curtis Porter died in a Memphis hospital. He had known that he possessed a rare and incurable blood disease since 1942. When he first learned of the proposal of the brethren at Beech Grove to have me come to Arkansas, he bitterly opposed it. He spoke against me publicly and wrote letters trying to get the brethren to cancel my coming. He was the first one I met in my debate with Brother Wallace. Later, the two congregations in Paragould which opposed me so bitterly fell out among themselves. Brother Porter debated Guy N. Woods on institutionalism. It was while sitting in the audience listening to these two "pros" seeking to cut each other down that it dawned upon me how childish were the issues we were debating. I went to see Brother Porter at his home a few months before his final hospitalization. He was courteous and kind. He told me that after seeing some of the actions of the brethren he was inclined to be more favorable to me than to them.

The saddest loss of all was that of my mother. She suffered a massive cerebral hemorrhage at Topeka, Kansas, on Lord's Day morning, August 21. She was 77 years old. All the way from Saint Louis to Topeka I caught myself thinking of bygone days. I recalled how, when we were little, Mom used to sing us Danish lullabies as she rocked us. I remembered teaching her to read English. And I lived again the days of poverty. Her children had been her whole life.

She had known hardship, toil and pain, but now it was all over. Gone were the lonely nights when my father was away preaching and she was home worrying about sick children. My brother Paul and I conducted the memorial service. When I said the final benediction and turned away from the grave where her body would return to dust beside that of my father to whom she had always been true, I suddenly realized that our children had no grandparents left.

Not everything was death, of course. There was renewed life on many fronts. Brother Garrett and I continued our Saturday sessions in Hartford, Illinois. We met one Saturday per month for six consecutive months in the fall and winter. The subjects were weighty but timely. Each of us spoke an hour in the morning. At noon the sisters served an excellent meal and we all ate together. In the afternoon we took questions from the audience for two hours. We did not always agree but we loved one another and all of us learned. Out of these meetings grew the Hartford Forum, now the Saint Louis Forum. It has been one of the greatest influences in creating respect across party lines.

It was early in 1959 that we set up luncheon meetings at a restaurant in Springfield, Illinois, once per month. We met to discuss the implementation of God's will. The first one found 35 brethren from Churches of Christ and Christian Churches together. Brother Garrett presided. The theme was "How Can We Work Together For the Cause of Christ?" We met as friends and not as enemies. The next month more than 40 were present. It was a kind of daring experiment in those days. Now it is routine in our area.

In the March issue of the American Christian Review appeared an article over my signature entitled "A Statement of Fact." It was an apology for my actions in elevating "the Rough Draft," written in 1932, to a test of fellowship. I had reached the conclusion there was but one creed, the Lord Jesus Christ. To elevate an editorial statement of opinion into a test of union or communion was as absurd as it was wrong. I was particularly disturbed by the fact that we had summoned brethren from various sections of the country to a meeting in Kansas City, to take a stand on the issue. Such mass pressure seemed to me in retrospect to be sectarian. It smacked too much of church councils in history, all of which ended up producing a new creed.

I began the series of articles on "Covenants of God." I had become convinced that God had revealed Himself as a covenant-making God. He made covenants with Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Later He made a covenant with Israel at Mount Sinai. They broke His covenant and He promised to make a new one. In it the motives and rules of action would be engraved upon the hearts of men. It became obvious that we were no longer under a written code. The new testament was not composed of twenty-seven books. The new covenant was a person. The apostolic epistles were not a code of jurisprudence. They were a collection of love letters written to believers in Jesus who were having difficulty imitating the Master.

My whole life was altered. Always before I had been laying down the law instead of living up to love. I had become a good lawyer and a poor lover. Now passages seemed to leap from the pages into my heart. "The law was a custodian to bring us to Christ, but after faith is come, we are no longer under a custodian." Later this became the basis of my book "The Death of the Custodian." Now I had to wrestle with the fact that faith had come. We were no longer under a written code. Everything took on a new perspective. I began to understand the grace of God. I began to see that love was the fulfillment of law. And I began to walk in the Spirit.

I doubt that any other concept I have ever had since I accepted the invitation of Jesus and opened the door to my heart to let Him come in and sup with me, has had the profound effect upon me that the thought of a personal covenant with God has had. The church, redemption, reconciliation, worship, and all other facets of the life of faith took on new depths. Above all else it placed scripture in a completely new and proper context. It became a loving guideline along the road of life.

I began to read the Bible with new eyes. I began to meditate upon it with a new heart. What a blessing it was to realize that the verbal revelation of God was suspended from love for God and one's fellows. "On these two hang the law and the prophets." I could see that what we called the church was simply the called and gathered. It was a universal community of the reconciled. It was the kingdom of heaven doing the will of God on earth as it is in heaven.

It was still several years before I fully realized that the kingdom was alive and energetic. It was flowing relentlessly like lava from above. There had been no previous trough constructed. Its form was determined by the contour of the terrain. It was mind-boggling for a former legalist to realize the pattern was not determined by a book containing a written code but by the world itself. The kingdom must be flexible enough to move upon that world. The means, machinery and modes of service were dictated by raw human needs.

5. The Change Continues

The Cutting Edge

Contents

The advent of 1961 brought with it what might be the highest level yet attained in the discussion of fellowship. Of course, as we later honed our thinking, we were able to present the cutting-edge of it more fully. But I was writing on the theme with a great deal of power and brethren were anxious to hear of it. It was evident that it was an idea whose time had come. It was now ten years since I had my spiritual encounter in Ireland, and I had returned home to investigate the revelation of God's divine purpose in my life with fresh insights.

I was booked for meetings from coast to coast. In everyone of these I invited questions from the audience. So new was what was being said that the queries were many. This proved to be the most interesting and exciting part of the studies. As an illustration I will refer to a meeting in Sullivan, Indiana. The restoration movement there was fractured into four separate groups. I was invited by the smallest. The little building had standing-room only on Saturday night and on Sunday afternoon we moved to the Four-H Club building where there were 42 congregations and 14 preachers in attendance. And this was in the dead of winter, on January 14 and 15.

During the next two years I crossed and recrossed the country. The Missouri Christian Lectureship, a powerful forum in earlier days, was revived by Grayson Ensign, president of Moberly Christian College. I spoke on "The Ground of Christian Fellowship." The speech has since appeared in a book and has been reproduced in a couple of booklets. It represented my most complete treatise on the subject up to that time.

Of special significance was an invitation to come to Louisville. It was issued by two congregations but was held at the Kentucky Avenue Church building. It was my first appearance among brethren of the pre-millennial persuasion. Brother E. L. Jorgenson was still alive and it was my pleasure to meet him and come to know him. The pre-millennial brethren had always been known for their freedom and openness toward others. I was well received and mutual love bridged any difference that existed. Later that year I went to Southeastern Christian College at Winchester, Kentucky, and spoke to the student body and friends of the college who came. We had a beautiful relationship and I returned to the college upon other occasions in the future.

As a result of these encounters I was invited to come to Shawnee Church in Louisville, where I held a meeting later in the year. Willis Allen was the minister and he proved to be a fine man and a great brother in the Lord. Through these contacts I came into contact with the brethren at Portland School and with those who carried on The Word and the Work. I became quite convinced that they had been misrepresented and unmercifully ill-treated by preachers of the dissenting view.

Not everything was rosy, however. It was during this year that Brother Roy Loney launched a new little journal called The Gospel Message. It was intended to provide a medium for those who thought I had departed from the faith. It did not create a new party but served to perpetuate an old one. Brother Loney had been invited to speak in Saint Louis in years gone by and he did his best to divide the brethren in Saint Louis and to gain a foothold. He wrote to a number of the brethren making false accusations and insinuations, but the letters were generally handed to me and his efforts came to naught. The brethren who wrote to him were sympathetic because of his deafness and he took their sympathy for this to be sympathy with his divisive attitude. It was not.

One thing of especial interest that occurred during this time was arranged by Jim Mabery. He was a great brother and ardent for the work of Christ. Brethren arranged to celebrate my fortieth anniversary of preaching the Word with a "This Is Your Life" presentation at Green Parrot Inn, in Saint Louis County. Old friends attended I had not seen for years. A special recording for the session was sent by Brother Winstanley and some of the saints in Great Britain. Our children and their companions sang special numbers. There were several hundred present for the event and it was a thrilling experience master-minded by a professional. Anything Jim arranged was sure to be a success, and he had working with him his good wife, Ina Lee.

During the year word was received of the death of Walter Crosthwaite in Great Britain, on May 23. He passed across the Jordan at Ulverston, in Lancashire, and with his going I lost a precious friend and sensed the closing of an era. His noble stand for the purity of the gospel had earned for him the burning hatred of some, but the warm friendship of others. I cherish the memory of the time spent in his cheerful little home more than anything else which happened on my journey to England.

He was unshakable in his convictions and those who grew up at his feet were fortunate indeed. He spanned the time when the church was beginning to go off the deep end over the compromise with "liberal theology" and saw it become affiliated with the World Council. He was the leader of the Old Paths Brethren who resisted the drift of the tide. God needed such a man for such a time and raised him up. He and Levi Clark had a profound impression upon my life. I will never forget my association with them.

During the year I also went to Lakewood, California, for a meeting with the congregation there, which was ably shepherded by Bro. Bill Jessup. Lakewood was established by Ernest Beam, a pioneer in the attempt to unite the forces of the restoration movement. In my ignorance and the party spirit I had opposed his effort. He was hounded and harassed by men infinitely smaller than himself during his life and probably died of a broken heart, feeling that his efforts were a failure. They were not, of course, for the planting of the seeds of freedom is never a loss.

I studied his work intensely when I began to realize the merit of it and came to the conclusion he had made two mistakes in his method of going about it. I resolved to avoid those mistakes. Our meeting lasted five nights from October 16-20. More than 400 attended every meeting, crowding the little building to standing-room only. Every evening we had prayers for unity in a little room just off the patio. Some evenings the room was virtually full. The Vernon Brothers sang for the meeting. It was my first occasion to meet them. Harold Clark led the congregational singing. A busload of fifty came from Pepperdine College every night. The question periods each day were very lively. Some questions were earnest attempts to find a solution. Some preachers asked things only to disrupt. But God was with me and I found a ready answer for all.

It was about this time that Reuel Lemmons unleashed an attack upon me in the Firm Foundation. An excellent editorial writer and a man of tremendous ability, generally when he assailed a person in print, which he did very rarely, that person curled up and played dead. It is an outstanding phenomenon of the restoration movement how much power is centered in editors. A withering blast from one of them and you have had it. Brother Lemmons entitled his editorial in which he named me several times, "Blind in One Eye."

This time it did not work. It seemed rather to publicize my effort to bring sanity to a body intent upon consuming itself. Thousands heard of me who did not know me before. I received scores of letters, many of them from Texas. It was apparent that many people were fed up with the sterile "status quo" and the establishment for which Brother Lemmons was one of the chief spokesmen. There was a grassroots yearning to become free from the domination of a self-imposed clergy group. An articulate coterie of brilliant young people was beginning to form which would make itself heard and felt.

The work was given impetus by a "Concourse Toward Unity" held at Denver, Colorado, July 1-7, which was attended by 500 people from 21 states, Mexico and the Philippines, to discuss the problems we faced in order to be united. M. F. Cottrell was one of the speakers. He fired the audience with new hope. Man after man spoke on the subject in a dynamic way. When it became apparent that there was a unity of purpose one of the congregations sent for C. E. McGaughey to come. He made a stereotyped speech demanding unity upon matters of opinion and stating there could be no unity without conformity. When he finished he knew that he had made a miserable failure.

Brother Cottrell and I invited him to have lunch with us. He reluctantly accepted. Brother Cottrell told him that he needed to come into the twentieth century and get off his hobby horse. Brother McGaughey said he intended to ride the horse right up to the gates of heaven. Brother Cottrell told him that if he did a voice from inside would tell him to tie his horse outside and come on in. There would be no hobbies in heaven. Conditions were changing when brethren from every segment of the movement could share together in love as they were doing there.

It was this year I was first invited to come to camp at Macrorie, Saskatchewan. Paul Tromburg was laboring at Outlook and I had visited the work there. At the time the men met in the daytime, but the evening meetings were open to the sisters. The camp has since changed and is now a Family Camp with more than 200 registered. Back in those days it was heavily weighted with people from the non-instrument Churches of Christ, but it now involves about half of those who use the instrument and the other half of those who do not. It is sponsored by a congregation which has no instrument but does not make a test of fellowship out of it. The question is never mentioned by any speaker and causes no problem. It is a tremendous annual affair which brings together in a primitive setting brethren from almost every province in Canada, as well as from several states. I have returned almost every two years since that time and have seen great strides in our reception of one another in Christ. The interesting thing now is to see people from various other backgrounds coming and being treated with love.

On September 17-21 I was invited to Rosemead, California, for a fellowship forum by Robert E. Hanson. The house was packed every night. One evening two carloads of brethren drove in. They sat together around Glenn Wallace. When I had finished my speech, Brother Wallace arose and said I had insulted the Lord's church of which he was a member and he demanded an opportunity to reply. It shocked the audience. They could not think of anything I had said which could be so interpreted. I arose slowly, walked to the speaker's stand and looked at Brother Wallace for a long time with a smile upon my face. You could have heard a pin drop. I told him that if he felt offended he should be given an opportunity to reply, and that next afternoon he could do so for fifteen minutes.

The building was crowded to capacity the next day. I introduced Glenn and told the audience he had a few things to say. He put on quite a show, pounding the organ with his fist and declaring it was the real problem. When he finished his harangue, I simply ignored him, and arose and quietly said, "It is now time for questions from the audience. Who will be first, please?" Brother Wallace bounced out of his seat and asked if I was going to answer him. I said, "No, I do not find anything which requires an answer, so we will proceed according to our regular format."

He and the seven others who came with him stalked out, murmuring something under their breath as they went. We proceeded with the meeting.

5. The Change Continues

A Letter From Abilene

Contents

It must have been about 1963 that Mission Messenger began to be influential internationally. Included in reports to be found in the paper for that year are some from Australia, Canada, Okinawa, England, The Netherlands, Chile, Scotland, Thailand, Denmark and Finland. It was great to receive letters and subscriptions from such far-away places, but this eventually proved our undoing. Nell was taking care of all the wrapping and bundling of the papers, as well as looking after the subscription list. Some people moved so frequently that it actually amounted to us sending the paper to them and paying them for reading it.

Eventually the paper was going to more than 8200 homes on every continent. We had to stop. Nell was actually working for twelve hours some days. After giving notice of intent for three years we reached the end of our row on December 1, 1975. Although we ceased publication then we still receive a great many subscriptions. Persons who have never heard of us before, will read an old paper and send in a dollar asking to be put on the list. We claim to be the only publishers who ever discontinued because they were too successful.

It was on January 31, 1963, that J. D. Thomas of Abilene Christian College published in Gospel Advocate, an article entitled "Brother Ketcherside's New Fallacy." It was full of such manifest error that I wrote B. C. Goodpasture asking for space in which to reply. He would not grant it. So I wrote to Brother Thomas and made an offer for fair examination of my ideas at Abilene. I wrote as follows:

"Since I am sure that you believe in the right of sincere brethren to present their appeal in love, to be heard, can it be arranged that I come to Abilene for three sessions of two hours each, for public examination of my thesis? If so, I suggest that in the first two sessions I present objectively my position as to unity of the believers for one hour, and then submit to an hour of public questioning by a panel composed of three brethren, yourself being one and the other two being men of your selection. I further suggest that in the third session, after presentation of my views, I submit to questions (either oral or written) from the entire audience, yourself acting as chairman of that meeting.

"It would be understood that neither yourself nor Abilene Christian College concurred in or endorsed my views, but simply that as free men we met in interest of truth. I pledge upon my honor, that I will conduct myself with gentlemanly courtesy to all of the brethren, and if I cannot lessen areas of conflict I will not widen them."

At the time I had confidence that I might be invited to Abilene on the above fair and equitable terms, so that the perceptive students could hear and then reach their own conclusions. My hopes were dashed when, on February 9, I received the following curt note from Brother Thomas:

"Dear Brother Ketcherside: In reply to your recent letter inquiring about a public discussion of your present views, I wish to state that, for good and sufficient reasons, I would not be interested in trying to have such a discussion. Sincerely yours, *J. D. Thomas."

I kept on trying, thinking that conditions might have changed. Every year I published my offer to come to any college among us and subject my views to the scrutiny of faculty members. I then saw a letter written to the president of Abilene Christian, by Norman Parks, and after reading the reply to it I gave up on ever receiving a fair hearing before the student body. It was obvious that the administration and the doctors were fearful of what might happen. They could attack my views at will and refuse me the opportunity of being heard in an equitable exchange.

This was the year in which I was first asked to speak at the North American Christian Convention. It was held at the Long Beach Convention Center. I was appalled to see the sectarian attitude so rampant in one meeting. Fortunately, the brethren have "cleaned up their act" since that time, but the demonstration they put on in that meeting was one of the most childish and blatant exhibitions of party spirit I had ever seen exhibited. My speech was delivered on the evening of June 27, and it had an electrifying effect. It was the first time a non-instrument brother had spoken and it received the first standing ovation ever accorded up to that time.

Since that time, Leonard Wymore has tried to feature one or more men from the non-instrument segment. Bill Banowsky, Norvel Young, Marvin Phillips, Ira North, Leroy Garrett, and others have spoken and been well received. I substituted once for Joe Barnett from Lubbock, whose secretary telephoned the night before his appearance and said he was sick. The meeting is the largest and best attended of any within the restoration movement. I have addressed the saints three times and thoroughly enjoyed it. It is strictly a preaching convention. No business is transacted. No resolutions are drawn up. The brethren believe in the autonomy of the local church. It is a great big get-together of people from all over who meet and enjoy one another's company. Leonard Wymore is one of God's noblemen.

During the year I spoke at numerous colleges, among which were Manhattan Christian, Manhattan, Kansas; Nebraska Christian, Norfolk, Nebraska; Puget Sound College of the Bible, Seattle, Washington; Johnson Bible College, Kimberlin Heights, Tennessee; and Minnesota Bible College, then in Minneapolis, but since moved to Rochester. In every one of those I found students who were eager to hear the message of peace on earth to men of good will.

There were two opportunities afforded to really cross over lines. In Nebraska I was invited to Dana College, on March 22. It is a liberal arts school under supervision of the Augustana Lutheran Conference, and a great many of the students were Scandinavian by birth. It was interesting to me to see the ritual in chapel. It was much like that to which I was accustomed in my earlier days in the Missouri Synod. After speaking to the students publicly I went down to the lounge and conversed with them privately and in small groups for another hour. I found them turned off by the liturgy.

The other occasion was on October 27 when I went to Kendallville, Indiana, to deliver a Reformation Day address. It came three days before the anniversary of Martin Luther's nailing of the 95 theses against the church door in Wittenberg. We had a joint meeting of all the Protestant Churches and I spoke on "Heretics and Heroes." I made the point that a heretic is a hero ahead of his time. All a heretic has to do is to be dead a hundred years and he will become a hero. One generation hurls stones at a heretic, which the next generation picks up and makes a monument from them.

Everything that has been gained in religion has been gained by those accused of being heretics. Luther, Huss, Zwingli, Calvin and Wesley, were all branded as such by their contemporaries. It is often easier to label one a heretic than it is to deal with what he is saying. Luther faced an Establishment which was well entrenched. The Elector of Saxony said, "I am not at all surprised that it has made so much noise; for he has committed two unpardonable crimes; he has attacked the pope's tiara, and the monks' bellies."

I pointed to the need of another reformation with Luther's words: "I will say what I mean, boldly and briefly; the Church needs reformation. And this cannot be the work either of a single man, as the pope, or of many men, as the cardinals and councils; but it must be that of the whole world, or rather it is a work that belongs to God alone. As for the time in which such a reformation should begin he alone knows who has created all time. The dike is broken, and it is no longer in our power to restrain the impetuous and overwhelming billows."

It was during this time that Martin M. Mitchum, who was an elder in the Christian Church at Rolla, Missouri, and a man with great insight, decided to take definite steps to do something tangible about the unity of believers. He invited Don DeWelt, Howard Short, and me to engage in public dialogue on fellowship. Don was from Ozark Bible College. Howard was editor of The Christian, now called The Disciple. This was before restructure had taken place among the Disciples of Christ, and we had a meaningful discussion. Each of us spoke fifteen minutes and then sat down together to field questions from the audience. All three of us came away with a greater feeling of respect for each other.

I have often wondered since what would have happened if such discussions could have continued among top-level men. Would it have made a difference? Was the sectarian spirit so engrained and crystallized that we would have to go on to the bitter end? Or do things have to work out of their own accord and in the good time of God, as Luther indicated? We talked about these and many other things as we drove back to Saint Louis that night.

But one of the outstanding gatherings was at Wynnewood

Chapel in Dallas, Texas. It was held June 30-July 7. Speakers and teachers were Darrell Bolin, Leroy Garrett, and myself. This launched a series of meetings which were held annually. Sometimes there were two meetings per year. They were notable for their openness and for their freedom of spirit. As time went on, brethren from every background were given an opportunity to speak. Brother Degroot and Ralph Graham from the Disciples of Christ, Jack Holt from the anti-cooperation wing, Ervin Waters from the one-cup brethren. We invited brethren from every segment and they came. One day Pat Hardeman came and asked a lot of insistent questions. He was with Florida College at the time. We were surprised a little later to learn that he had gone with the Universalist Church. Sometimes things warmed up quite a bit as brethren brought with them some of their clan. They came to listen to their man and as soon as he had finished they walked out.

J. D. Phillips joined with us in teaching and it was great to share with him. He was editor of "The Truth." His knowledge of restoration history was amazing and we were greatly blessed by the anecdotes which he told. Bill Thurman taught one year and gave fresh insights into the Word. There was nothing static about the meetings. They changed from year to year as the personnel of the congregation changed. There was much to learn in the exchange of ideas. Looking back on things I can see that these meetings were within the will of God. They were a part of our struggle for the meaningful life. The influence of Leroy, calm and unruffled, was a real part of the gatherings.

In December I finished a reprint of articles by Reuel Lemmons and my reply to the same. I said: "Better days are ahead for all of us. There are signs everywhere that attitudes are changing. Brethren are becoming more bold in their declarations against orthodoxy and legalism. Of course we anticipate further areas of personal attack and boycott, but this is a small price to pay for freedom in Christ Jesus. Be sure that we shall not allow ourselves to become embittered or cease to love. Our hope of sharing with Jesus over there depends upon our exhibiting love to all of the brethren over here."

That year, the Hartford Forum featured talks by Russell Boatman on "The Basis of Authority"; Harold Key on "Fellowship and Endorsement"; Roy Key on "Legalism and Faith"; Grayson Ensign on "Is Unity Possible in Diversity?" and by Leroy Garrett on "The Vocabulary of the Holy Spirit." I spoke on "The Relationship of Immersion to Fellowship." A great time was had by all.

5. The Change Continues

Our Enduring Heritage

Contents

Henry David Thoreau wrote, "Only that traveling is good which reveals to me the value of things at home, and enables me to enjoy them better." It was in 1964 we built our new house, and moved into it shortly before Thanksgiving Day. It was five minutes from the air terminal and Nell could drop me off there, and come and get me on my return without ever going to the public parking lot. The house was designed to enable us to handle the paper and my books, and proved to be ideal for our need.

And we needed something to make travel more convenient. During the year, among many other places I spoke at Milligan College; at the Bond County Fellowship Meeting at Mulberry Grove, Illinois; at the alumni meeting at Lincoln Christian College; at the Southern Illinois Christian Convention; at Roanoke Bible College in Elizabeth City, North Carolina; at the Tri-State Fellowship in Weirton, W. Va.; at the Statewide Fellowship Meeting in Boise, Idaho; at the Statewide Rally at Little Rock, Arkansas; at Ozark Bible College, Joplin, Missouri; at the Arizona Christian Convention, at Phoenix; and at Oregon State Christian Convention, at Turner, Oregon. This was but a little of my travels during the year.

In the meeting at Milligan College, I first came in contact with Dr. Robert Burns, and liked him from the start. I had corresponded with him many times but it was a great privilege to know him personally. At the time he was minister for the great Peachtree Christian Church in Atlanta and a genial gentleman.

Present with us also was Dr. James DeForest Murch, of Silver Springs, Maryland. He knew the history of the restoration movement like few others I have ever met. He had just edited a history of it called Christians Only. He had always been intensely interested in unity as evident in the Witty-Murch discussions. He was a co-founder of the National Association of Evangelicals, and editor of their journal United Evangelical Action. He was founder and president of the National Sunday School Association, the National Association of Religious Broadcasters, and the Evangelical Press Association. He was also managing editor of Christianity Today. He was author and composer of the song "I'll Put Jesus First In My Life." We began a great fellowship which lasted until his death, and the times he spent in our home meant much to me.

On March 4, 1964, Harvey Bream and I met in a 3½ hour public conference with Dr. Clyde Funkhouser, District Superintendent of the Methodist Church, at Fairfield, Illinois. The subject was "Current Views on Christian Unity." Harvey was editor of The Restoration Herald but has since become president of Cincinnati Bible College. The encounter was great and confirmed me in the belief that we needed to cross over lines for dialogue.

It was about this time I formulated a policy with reference to other journals. I was under attack from some of them in every issue. I was being called a heretic, a Judas Iscariot, a Benedict Arnold, a compromiser, and a liberal. It was not popular in those days to affirm that every child of God in the world was your brother. So I simply resolved to mention the various papers and urge my readers to send for a copy and read what was being said about me for themselves. It proved to be a good method of dealing with the situation and I pursued it as long as I continued to publish. It was about this time someone sent me a little motto which read: "Love Your Enemies, It Drives Them Nuts."

During this year Leroy Garrett made a monthly out of his paper which had previously been edited as a quarterly. This gave him the opportunity to write articles which were geared more closely to the times. The result was a great increase in the number of subscriptions. The paper has been a monthly ever since and has accomplished profound good. Leroy has never been free from attack, much of it unprincipled, but his patience and tolerance have turned this to great growth. By this means much has been accomplished to the glory of our Lord.

The following year, 1965, brought three things to pass which were of note in my life. First, I was invited to speak at the World Convention of Churches of Christ, in San Juan, Puerto Rico. The World Convention was begun by Jesse M. Bader to provide a chance for the various restoration groups to meet together and listen to one another. The first one was held in Washington, D.C., in October, 1930. There were more than 9,000 present.

I was the first participant from the non-instrument group who had ever been present. When I arrived in San Juan, there were 6000 people present from 32 countries. The evening meetings were held at Herman Bithorn Stadium on the outskirts of town. Buses were used to transport people to the place and back to the hotels. The address of welcome was made by Florentino Santana, who was president. I was on the speaker's stand with Ray Blampied, president of the college at Dunedin in New Zealand, who was to be the first speaker. Brother Blampied's speech was characteristic of those who take a liberal theological approach to the sacred scriptures. It was apparent that many of the common folk did not like it very much.

Mine was entitled "Our Enduring Heritage" and my closing paragraph said, "Our enduring heritage! My entertainment in infancy, my instruction in youth, my inspiration in manhood, my invigoration in approaching age, my illumination on the coming journey through the valley of shadows! Oh, may I never forget it, but love it, revere it, and through it be faithful unto Him whose word it is. And amidst the clamor of disputed claims, the shouts of sharply separated scientific scholars, and the propositions of antagonistic professors and pundits, may I never forget that it is better to know the Rock of Ages than to know the age of the rocks."

I was hardly prepared for what transpired. People from the Congo, from South America, and from Australia, pressed around me to shake my hand. They were thrilled to hear someone defend the Word as inspired of God and revealed from heaven. After my speech I was sought out by various ones who wanted to discuss the bearing of my remarks upon their national life and conduct. I began correspondence with some of them, and we continued to write to each other for years. It was as if God had arranged everything to His glory.

The next speaker after I finished was George R. Davis of National City Christian Church in Washington, D.C. He spent his entire time defending the president, Lyndon Johnson, who was a member of his congregation. The contrast in speeches was so great that a lot of brethren from other parts of the world were turned off. One of them said to me, "We came thousands of miles to hear about the Savior, and it is a new wrinkle to learn that his last name is Johnson."

The second thing which meant a lot to me was the study in depth conducted at Highland Church in Louisville, August 2-6. It was strangely successful, bringing together brethren from 12 states, 4 continents, and 6 segments of the restoration movement. Brethren affiliated with congregations which held the premillennial view were always intensely interested in souls. They had gone to the remotest parts of the earth with the message of life and had labored under great difficulties to tell the story of the cross. It was a blessing to have some of them in our audience.

The third thing which affected me was the cessation of the *American Christian Review, after 110 years. This truly marked the end of an era. It did not make the impact it would have made if it had stopped a few years before. For a long time it had been simply picking up and reprinting older articles and it was no longer geared to the times. It had outlived its usefulness and was ready to die. But it brought a touch of nostalgia to me. It was the first religious paper I had ever seen. When I was a mere lad it came to our home. I used to lie flat of my stomach on the floor and read every word of it.

Brother Daniel Sommer was born of German immigrant parents in 1850. After a boyhood of poverty and hardship, he enrolled in Bethany College when he was nineteen years of age. On January 28, 1873 he married Katherine Way, daughter of Francis Way, an elderly Quaker. In 1886 he purchased the American Christian Review which had been started and printed by Benjamin Franklin, until his death near Anderson, Indiana, in the autumn of 1878. Brother Sommer changed its name to *Octographic Review, in honor of the eight writers of the new covenant scriptures. A great many of his humbler readers did not understand the meaning of the word "Octographic" so by the time I arrived on the scene it was changed again to *Apostolic Review. Eventually, it was returned to its original title.

It was W. T. Moore who said, "The restoration movement does not have bishops— it has editors." For years our fate as a people was wrapped up with the *Apostolic Review. Indianapolis was regarded as our headquarters, although anyone of us would have been quick to affirm that we had no earthly headquarters, but heaven was our home. Brother Sommer was a commanding figure. What he said was accepted as "law and gospel." When he read the Sand Creek Address and Declaration, and issued the ultimatum that those who persisted in the unscriptural clergy system, and in worldly ways of raising money for the support of the gospel, would no longer be regarded as brethren— that did it!

The fate of the Sommer family was our fate. When Sister Sommer became editor she debarred Daniel from writing and would not publish his material. Upon her death the editorship went to Chester and Bessie. D. Austen, who thought he should have been chosen, broke with them and started his own paper. It now became fashionable to speak with disrespect of the Review and with pride of the Macedonian Call. But editors have "feet of clay" and it was not long until D. Austen proved to be untrustworthy, as we saw it.

I am glad to be delivered from the unholy mess we created by our strife. But I want to see others also made free— free to love, to receive and to welcome all who are in Christ Jesus. Better times could come immediately if all of the papers among us would begin to urge upon us community instead of conformity. We will never see everything alike. If we did it would be but a short time until we differed about something else. What gain will come from calling for division where God has commanded peace?

Certainly, it would require an about-face. But what have we gained by pursuing the direction we have been going? Have we united the Christians in all of the sects? Have we brought peace to a body troubled with fighting? Is the heartache and bitterness, the hostility and hatred, to be our heritage to the bitter end? Will we continue to strike down every man who pleads with us to turn away the sword from shedding the blood of a brother?

Do not most of our divisions represent our faith in opinions rather than in Jesus? Do they not exemplify our trust in our own infallibility? Do not the words of Oliver Cromwell apply to us today, "I beseech you, brethren, in the name of God, to consider that you may be mistaken." Are not there thousands upon earth who love Him as sincerely as we do, who revere His word and seek to follow in His path? What do we gain by giving them a shove instead of a helping hand? Shall we continue to shake our fist, rather than to wave our hand at a passing pilgrim?

Editors have gained too much power among us. They dominate our thinking. They determine our stand upon issues. They domineer in the realm of faith. And they make us pay for it. Let us choose wisely whom we shall follow.

5. The Change Continues

Reviewing Our Heritage

Contents

The year of 1966 was destined to be one of violence at home and abroad. We were still entangled in war in Vietnam which was taking such a toll in lives and finance. And right in the middle of the year police in Chicago discovered the bodies of eight student nurses brutally murdered in the townhouse they shared. Fear gripped the hearts of those within the "Windy City" until police apprehended Richard Speck, an ex-convict, and charged him with the killings. Two weeks later, Charles J. Whitman, an architectural student at the University of Texas, climbed into a tower and killed 15 persons and wounded 31 others before he was himself killed.

On March 16, astronauts Neil A. Armstrong and David R. Scott made the first of five successful two-man Gemini spacecraft dockings, linking up with an Agena Target vehicle. On June 7, James Meredith, whose enrollment at the University of Mississippi in 1962 touched off massive riots, was shot from ambush on the second day of a projected hike of 260 miles from Memphis, Tennessee, to Jackson, Mississippi, to encourage Negroes to vote. Once again we demonstrated how great our technological skills were for handling acute problems of space, and how far behind we were in handling the agonizing problems of human behavior on earth.

The year was noteworthy in the restoration movement circles of which we were a part also. March 4 marked exactly a hundred years from the death of Alexander Campbell. I went back and read once again the touching story of his dying as written by Dr. Robert Richardson, who preached the funeral discourse in God's Acre, at Bethany, before hundreds from all walks of life who came to honor the memory of this great man.

On September 1, the 150th anniversary of his "Sermon on the Law" was celebrated. It was this noble defense of the Good News from heaven given before the Redstone Baptist Association in 1816, which aroused so much hostility and created such animosity toward Campbell. He was ahead of his time. Today his message would hardly create a ripple on the surface of the muddled theological waters, but when delivered it cut right to the heart of things. It seems peculiar that the creeds of men are no longer the great issue among believers in Christ.

We had a gathering at Bethany during the year. It featured men and women from all of the major divisions of the movement. All of us stayed in the dormitory which gave us an opportunity to talk together between sessions. We also ate in the cafeteria and shared insights as we ate. Our discussions were held in Richardson Memorial Lecture Hall, and were generally very gracious. Brother Cawyer, an elder from Abilene, Texas, and a man I had known since childhood, tried to start an argument over music and kindred matters but served only to let off some of his own steam. No one was there to debate. During the sessions I heard Dr. Perry Epler Gresham deliver one of the finest speeches about Campbell that I have ever heard. He was an orator of the old school, and a real patron of a lost art.

On Sunday we held our meeting in the old brick meetinghouse which has been preserved, although only used upon occasions like this. We sat in the straight-backed seats and sang only hymns that dated back more than a century. We had no instrument. A sister had prepared a loaf as it used to be done, and we used the two silver chalices from which to drink the fruit of the vine. They had been used by the congregation in its earlier days, and were brought from the Campbell museum for the occasion. It was easy to envision the saints of old gathering in their simplicity and humility, with the freed slaves sitting on the back rows.

It was the same house in which the venerable Thomas Campbell had given his farewell address on June 1, 1851, at the age of 88 years. With his hearing greatly impaired and totally blind, he had to be transported to the place on a horse-drawn sled, prepared for the occasion. His text was Matthew 22:37-40. I was chosen together with Seth Wilson of Ozark Bible College to do the preaching. I was pleased to address such a select group upon the Lord's table as a symbol of our unity. We parted at the door after having demonstrated the power of the Good News to unite the hearts of those who truly love Him.

During the year it was my privilege to address the Seventh Consultation on Internal Unity of the Christian Churches held at Enid, Oklahoma. Men from the Independent Christian Churches and Disciples of Christ periodically met to discuss their division and determine what grounds there might be for resumption of a working relationship. I was invited as a kind of "neutral" to serve as a Biblical lecturer at each session. It was there I first presented the thinking which later found its way into print as "The Death of the Custodian— the case of the missing tutor."

I postulated that our relationship with heaven was covenental, and that it was by grace and not by law. We must choose between love of law or the law of love, and the choice must be individual. It was in this series I first coined a number of phrases which I have since employed, such as "legalism has made us good lawyers, but God designed us to be great lovers." The series was well-received but it became apparent that the brethren were far apart theologically. But it served to convince me of one great thing which has proven to be invaluable to me.

Unity will never become a kind of organizational get-together. In the final analysis it is personal.

On June 15, I brought out the first edition of the book Voices of Concern, edited by Robert Meyers, at the time a minister for the Riverside Church of Christ, and a professor of English at Friends University, in Wichita. Bob was eminently qualified for the work of bringing out such a volume. He had been chewed up by the brotherhood "meat grinder" and thrown to the lions at Harding, much to the discomfiture of the lions. He graduated summa cum laude from Abilene Christian College, received an M.A. from the University of Oklahoma, and a Ph.D. from Washington University. He took special courses at Oxford University and at Salisbury, in England.

The book featured one chapter each from seventeen outstanding men and women who were or had been affiliated with the Church of Christ. It was written in compassion and with a tinge of sorrow that it had to be produced by these people at all. In a well-phrased preface the editor wrote, "Their hope was that this book would so alter conditions that no other volume of this kind would ever need to be written." Almost from its inception it came under attack and was subjected to bitter criticism. It could not be ignored. The writers were not ignorant, but were among the most brilliant thinkers produced within the Churches of Christ in this generation.

Not everything written about it was bad. It was reviewed in numerous periodicals, many of them outside the Church of Christ. Their favorable reports caused it to be widely read. It represented a complete reversal of policy and a new approach to journalism among Churches of Christ. We were attacked because we had disclosed sad and sordid things which had always been swept under the "brotherhood rug." For years the references to it in "Church of Christ journals" were all of vinegar mixed with gall. But "the cat was out of the sack" and there was no way now to capture the feline quietly. It is interesting that, after the book went out of print, we still received many calls for it. Even now, after fourteen years, people write us wanting to know where they can obtain a copy, and offering premium prices for it.

Meanwhile I was busy traveling. I conducted a Forum on Fellowship at Lancaster, California; and a Conference on Evangelism at San Jose Bible College. I spoke at the State Christian Convention at Clovis, New Mexico; at the Mid-State Christian Men's Preaching Rally, at Mt. Zion, Ill.; at the Christian Student Fellowship, at Lexington, Kentucky; at the Christian Evangelistic Society Convention, at Pittsburgh, Penn.; at the Commencement and Preachers' Institute at Alberta Christian College, in Canada; at Kingdom Builders' Fellowship at Sumner, Illinois; at the School of Ministry, Milligan College, Tennessee; at the Blue Ridge Clinic, Hillsvale, Virginia; at Mountain States Christian Men's Retreat, Bluefield, West Virginia; and at the College-Career conference in Southern California.

These were but a few of the places to which I went during the year. I was also editing the paper, bringing out books, and doing a full service effort in Saint Louis. Everywhere I went I took the message that all of us could be one in Christ, and none of us give up any truth he had ever held. I defined fellowship as the sharing of a common life— eternal life. Many were not ready for it. Brethren were afraid of it. They had lived so long behind the walls of their self-imposed exiles that they felt protected and shaded. The elders of the Chestnut Drive Church of Christ in Doraville, Georgia issued a "white paper" in opposition to the things "Mr. Ketcherside" said in the fellowship in Atlanta. I was not recognized as a brother by these unfortunate persons. I mentioned it without rancor in Mission Messenger and urged everyone to write for a copy and read carefully the negative opinions it expressed. It was obvious that in Church of Christ circles fellowship was conditioned upon what you were against, rather than who you were for.

I was not deterred by the attacks upon me, either made clandestinely or openly. When I first sat down several years before and worked out the strategy for my attack upon the sectarian spirit, I recognized that it would be unsuccessful if I allowed myself to become ruffled or lost my ability to show love for those who counted themselves to be my enemies. I resolved to remain calm and cool under fire. Regardless of the misrepresentations of my position I must never stoop to the employment of such methods. It has paid off to be fair, just and equitable.

The Hartford (Illinois) Forum, held in December of 1966, was on the theme "The Holy Spirit in Our Lives Today." It brought together men from the Disciples of Christ, Christian Churches, and three different segments of the Church of Christ brotherhood. Some were charismatic while others were opposed to it. There was not one untoward moment. We came together as brethren and left with the feeling heightened above what it was when we came.

When Roy Key, of Ames, Iowa delivered his gracious message on "The Holy Spirit and Our Prayer Life" he touched a responsive chord in every heart. Bro. Key grew up in the Churches of Christ. All of his family were still members of it. But he was so abused and mistreated by brethren that he was literally driven out. During his address he told the touching story of Roland Hayes, the talented black singer who sang before the crowned heads of Europe, but who later returned to the old plantation where his mother had been a slave. There was hardly a dry eye in the house as Roy painted the picture of his confrontation with the old master and mistress and the forgiveness he felt in his heart. It was a great meeting, a good one, and it made all of us regret when it was over and we had to return home to the division that existed.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

From Lubbock to Kimberlin Heights

Contents

It would serve no good purpose to pass by the year 1966, without detailing one special event which had great significance. It was the fiftieth anniversary of the First Christian Church in Lubbock, Texas, and I was invited by the genial Dr. Dudley Strain, to speak at the banquet honoring the event. Upon my arrival in Lubbock I found that Broadway Church of Christ was but a short distance down the street and that Batsell Barrett Baxter was in a meeting there, with special noonday services. I resolved to attend.

We went early and I met Bill Banowsky, who was minister, and also Jim Bevis, who was on the staff. I was amazed to see about 450 present at midday. After Bro. Baxter had finished, Bro. Banowsky arose and said he could not introduce all of the many visitors who were present, but there was one who was giving such a fresh and wholesome outlook to the churches, that he wanted all to come and meet him, for the day was coming when men would say, "We had a prophet among us and knew it not." He then asked me to stand and be identified. He also announced that he had called Dr. Strain and had reserved a table for Church of Christ folk, and he intended to hear me at the Christian Church that evening.

During the afternoon I met with more than a dozen preachers of the Christian Church— Disciples of Christ, discussing what course would be pursued by those who loved the Lord in our day. I was appalled to see how the so-called social gospel had eroded their minds and how little of the sacred scripture they really knew. After the banquet I learned that Dr. Kline Nall, head of the English Department at Texas State University, had arranged for a wide open meeting on the subject of fellowship. It was attended by a number of Disciples of Christ ministers, together with representatives of seven different Churches of Christ. There were about ninety present. I spoke about ten minutes and then opened it for questions. To give everyone a fair opportunity for questioning, I limited the number of questions to three from one person each round.

Brother Banowsky was present and listened carefully but asked no questions. Brother Baxter quietly asked a few during the course of the evening. But Brother Thomas B. Warren set out to trap me and throw the thing into confusion. On his last question he asked a number of them, each one with a design in mind. It was easy to detect his purpose and I "headed him off at the pass." It was that evening, during the three hours "among the doctors" that I became convinced that the position I held on fellowship was unassailable and invincible, and that all the objectors could do was to quibble and cavil. I also left feeling that some of those present were in actual sympathy with my position but could not say so openly. It was a refreshing experience and made me more glad than ever that I was free in Christ.

On February 23, 24 I went to Columbia, Missouri, seat of our state university, to speak three times at a fellowship forum at Westside Christian Church, and to address those who attended the banquet for the college-university class, which was under the sponsorship of Dr. James Ferneau. It was while I was there that I became convinced that the battle for the minds of men would be fought out on the university level. It became obvious that our real enemy was humanism and secularism. I returned home to begin a study of these, and to gird myself for the future combat. It was suddenly borne home to me that we are not in the arena with ignorant anti-intellectuals any more, but with sophisticated rebels in an "age of doubt" and some of these are razor sharp.

On March 6, I began with Riverside congregation in Wichita. It was only by God's providence that I should be there. It had been the congregation where G. K. Wallace, had held forth for so long. Sister Wallace, the wife from whom he divorced, was still there. When I debated with Brother Wallace, in Arkansas, a number of years before, no one would have dared to predict that I would preach there. The people were great Christians, above the average intellectually. They were nervous and upset by the continuous attacks made upon them by other Churches of Christ in the area. They were under a constant barrage.

Bro. Robert Meyers was preaching for them, and I was with him and his great family a lot. Bob was not a traditional Church of Christ preacher, nor a preacher of Church of Christ traditions. This disturbed a few in the congregation, who not only wanted to hear the same things said, but in the same words they were accustomed to hear. I received Bob because of his deep faith in Christ, and admired his superb scholarship, although I was probably a trial to him by my lack of it. I returned for another meeting later and I suspect some good was done. Eventually Bob changed to teaching at Wichita State from Friends University, and became preaching minister at the Congregational Church in the city. I have often longed to see him again.

I would not want to be critical, nor "hurl the cynic's ban," but it seems to me that we are unable to make room under the umbrella of God's love for those who challenge us to think beyond ourselves. We are uncomfortable with men who want to scale the peaks, and dwell among the clouds. Our God is a "God of the valleys" and we prefer to dwell there "in peace and quiet" like the inhabitants of Laish who "had no dealings with other people." The demand for parrots has produced a lot of "chickens" among us. It is only when we learn to make allowance for one another in love that we will have arrived.

If you recall, 1967 was in the thick of the counter rebellion which originated primarily at Berkeley, but could have burst out anywhere. The Haight-Ashbury district in San Francisco was composed of the flotsam and jetsam of our culture which was blown up by the westerly winds. The "flower children" were doing their thing. Nudity was being flaunted. The sex-revolution was at its height. Drug abuse was fast becoming a way of life. Young people were blowing their minds as frequently as they once blew their noses. It was at this very time that Gene Rogers and Loran Biggs, ministers, brought me to Gardena, California, to spend the entire Easter break working with the young people of the area.

The arrangements were ideal. Buses brought 152 high school kids in every morning. They were alone with me for two hours. Then the church furnished them luncheon. Closed circuit television allowed the parents to see me and hear my answers to the questions, but not see the children. Their questions were terrific. They covered the whole range from the nature of religion to sexuality. I was training them to be not only aggressively pure but to wage war against the whole mixed-up social order. I wanted them to become "commandos for Christ." Those who were in high school were not there merely to study algebra and science. They were dropped behind the lines to wage a warfare. They were secret agents for the greatest kingdom ever founded. Their task was not to run from evil but to infiltrate the ranks of those who were engaged in it and take them captives for Christ. It seemed to work. In the afternoon I met with 60 college people, and at night spoke to an average of 330 adults. It seemed to me that we were privileged to give Satan a real blow and drive back the forces of darkness.

March 30 found me at the Southern Christian Convention in Kingsport, Tennessee. Present also to speak was George Gurganus, at the time with the Harding Graduate School in Memphis. He was there because of his great knowledge of missions. It gave me a chance to observe how men from the non-instrument ranks reacted around other brethren. They were not free and comfortable. I found that they simply spoke and retired from the scene. They did what they came to do and that was it. Most of them, at the outset of their speeches, disavowed the idea that their speeches implied fellowship. It was evident they were "covering their tracks" if they were questioned by some of the more radical brethren back home. There was no warm fraternization, except in the case of Bill Banowsky and Norvel Young, who seemed to appreciate being invited by the North American Christian Convention and generally appeared to have a good time. Bill Banowsky especially treated the folk like brethren.

April 10-14 I conducted a five night study on the Holy Spirit at Fort Wayne, Indiana. My good friend, Bill Lower, was minister. He has since removed to Denver, Colorado where he has done a remarkable job. The Charismatic movement was just beginning to gain momentum. Demos Shakarian and Dennis Bennett were still unfamiliar names to a lot of folk in the restoration movement. I chose to make my teaching positive, rather than negative, and to tell what the Holy Spirit does for us, rather than what He does not do for anyone.

The lessons were well received, and I kept polishing them up for a presentation elsewhere. Eventually they became the basis for two of my books One Great Chapter and *Heaven Help Us. The first constituted a verse-by-verse study of Romans, chapter 8, in which Paul seems to rise to new heights in telling of God's great provision in Christ. I used a great number of the questions I received in my talks on the subject as groundwork for the material in the books, which could well have been designated a kind of "brotherhood project." I was a little astounded to find out how little most of the brethren knew about "Our Little Helper."

It was during this year I spoke at the homecoming at Johnson Bible College, where anything can happen, and something usually does. It was a rare privilege for me to be on Kimberlin Heights, where Ashley S. Johnson, through sheer drive made his dream take reality. It was here he began The School of Evangelists in 1893. Always known as "the father of the poor young preacher" he threw the doors of his school open to any young man of purpose in the mountains who was willing "to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Everyone was expected to work in those days, on the farm, in the dairy, or in the kitchen. Students arose at 4:30 a.m., and found the president already up and praying.

Of course things have changed in our day, but there still hangs over the lovely campus which has displaced the rude one of an earlier day, enough of the spirit of its founder to sanctify many of the students and to give them some of the courage of him who, like Napoleon, refused to recognize that there was such a word as "impossible." It was a really great thing to be there where so many of his books had been written. I had read all of them.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

"One Faith, 10,000 Opinions"

Contents

There were two events which I attended in 1966 which were outstanding because of their nostalgic value. The first one sought to recapture for our day the spirit of Cane Ridge where it all began. It was the Second Annual Brush Arbor Meeting, near Fairfield, North Carolina, held on June 24. When I arrived the day before I found a number of men presiding over the roasting pits on which lay four hogs and and a whole beef. The men were under the direction of a chef who told them when to replenish the fire under the spits and grills. They worked all night long preparing for the next day.

People came early to allow time for visiting. They parked in a huge field, directed by several men into the long rows of vehicles. Everything was very systematic and orderly. By the time for the morning meeting there were about three thousand present. The license plates bore the names of a number of states. The pulpit was erected out in the open and had a canopy of brush over it. It was a haunting reminder of the old days. I recalled the times I had spoken in a brush arbor in the Missouri Ozarks in my younger days. After I had spoken in the morning meeting, the people lined up in six rows to be served with meat and slaw. The food was great and the fellowship was wonderful. Nothing was lacking.

The other event was The Cumberland Christian Camp

Meeting, held out in a state park near Corbin, Kentucky. The town itself was renowned as the home of Colonel Sanders, of Kentucky Fried Chicken fame. One could see the restaurant where he had gone bankrupt, with nothing left but a recipe and a vision. These he had parlayed into a fortune. The colonel was immersed while still a boy and had been a member of several Christian Churches.

The camp meeting was held under a huge tent. A number of brethren pitched tents around it and stayed for the entire thing, including the chicken barbecue prepared by men of the Corbin area the last evening. It was my privilege to stay with Fred Waggoner, whom I had known in Logan, Ohio, and several other places. Like me, he was pretty much of a "homespun" preacher who operated a grocery store at Grayson where we first became acquainted. He would tackle anything, whether qualified or not, and generally was successful. We had a great time together and the meetings were tremendous.

From the pulpit one could look out to where the blue haze dropped down on distant hills. The cool crisp mountain air in the morning was invigorating. It was easy to imagine the wagon trains of yesteryear snaking through the Cumberland Gap. Kentucky was destined to play a prominent part in the restoration ideal. It was at Cane Ridge that it began, and at Lexington that the forces of Stone and Campbell met together and became one. It was at the outset of the meeting which consummated this union that John Smith said, "While there is but one faith, there may be ten thousand opinions; and hence, if Christians are ever to agree, they must be one in faith, and not in opinion."

I went to Macrorie, Saskatchewan, for the camp meeting in which I taught. There were 150 enrolled. This gathering was sponsored by the congregation at Outlook, a little group of hardy souls, numbering about 25 in those days. The camp was located in a shady valley which cut like a gash through the wheat fields of the almost boundless prairie. The people who attended pitched their tents, or pulled their campers into little cleared spots in the underbrush. I slept in the back of a converted schoolbus. It was a tremendous time of fellowship and Bible teaching. The camp has contributed much to the alleviation of suspicion and distrust. Although the congregation does not use instrumental music it has consistently refused to make a test of it and has used preachers who favor it. The result is that sharing has been encouraged and needs have been met in a very real way. Much of this is directly attributable to the Banting and Tweedie families who have worked together amicably for years, and whose good judgment and commonsense have become noteworthy.

On September 1, 2, I was the speaker at Pearson's Mill Christian Assembly near Converse, Indiana. The camp director is Rod Cameron, a man of many talents, and a great friend of mine. A descendant of the Scottish clan Cameron, Rod was fortunate enough to marry Beverly who has stood by him through thick and thin. That has taken some doing because it was often thicker than it was thin. Early on he became a ventriloquist, and he and his dummy are well known. He went to Africa in 1958, shortly after the erection of the gigantic Kariba Dam on the Zambezi River in Rhodesia. They cut a track of almost eleven miles through the heavy brush, and for several months slept under the bed of their Chevrolet Power Wagon. Their first kitchen was a tarpaulin stretched over a rope, their first storage room was a shelter made with reeds. Their water supply was eight miles away.

Rod nearly drove the "witch doctors" up a tree with his ventriloquism. They did not know what to make of Gabby. Few people really do. There were few things the witch doctors could do that Rod could not do better. But I had to leave to begin preparation for the delivery of the speeches in the Roy B. Shaw Memorial Lectureship, held annually at San Jose Bible College. The school has a great history of promoting unity. It was while Bill Jessup, that wonderful man of God, was president of the college, that Ernest Beam began to make overtures of oneness. Brother Jessup brought him into the Bay Area for a joint meeting of brethren. It was shot down by anti-instrumental brethren who attended for that purpose. It ended in a shouting match which was disorderly. Challenges were waved about for debates. But times have changed, and there were brethren present from all segments of the church to hear me. Al Tiffin, the president, had contributed well to the ongoing dreams of his predecessors.

It was about this time that the magazine Mission began. The first edition carried articles by Abraham J. Malherbe, Roy Bowen Ward, Thomas H. Olbricht, Donald McGaughey, Wesley C. Reagan, and Juan A. Monroy. The journal began as a kind of sophisticated medium to relate to the modern world in which we live. It proposed to give good thinkers a chance to be heard in a way they could not in the ordinary publications. From the first it had to be subsidized by its trustees. It faced opposition, both overt and covert, because it did not hesitate to milk sacred cows, which previously had been used only for worship. It is a matter of deep shame that Abilene Christian College exercised censorship over those on its staff who wrote for it, and brought pressure upon them to quit.

It was during 1966 that Norman Waters, a Tutor at Fitzwilliam College, at the University of Cambridge, in England, passed away. He was the first president of the Alexander Campbell Society. This was a coalition of persons in various colleges and universities in Great Britain who had banded themselves together to preserve the heritage and influence of the reformer. He was succeeded by Peter D. Archer, of Glasgow, and Philip Brooks became the secretary of the society.

The last named and I began a correspondence which lasted over a period of several years. From him I obtained a list of the members and their addresses. It was interesting to note that they came from every college and university in the entire United Kingdom. I became an associate member and enjoyed the exchanges with some of the most brilliant young minds I have ever known.

Some fine things happened to people whom I knew and loved during 1967, things which caused me to rejoice in their behalf. Bert Ellis wrote from Pusan, Korea, about discovery of a grassroots movement of concerned Christians who could see the folly of denominationalism. Mont Smith reported from Kiramu, Ethiopia, that 87 native people attended meetings in his livingroom in one week. Dr. Robert Walker and his wife Phyllis were being used of God at Hippo Valley Christian Hospital, in Rhodesia. William Hendren, Belfast, North Ireland, with whom I had made my home, was elected a Fellow of the Royal Microscopic Society. John L. Morrison received his Ph.D. from Stanford. The subject of his thesis was "Alexander Campbell and Moral Education."

Henry Boren, of the History Department at the University of South Carolina received a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, which would enable him to live in Rome for a year and work on a numismatic project. Thomas Langford accepted a fellowship for a year of work at the United States Office of Education, in Washington, D.C. Boyd L. Lammiman was selected as the new president of Alberta Christian College in Calgary. He is still there. A. V. Mansur brought out a new book under the title "Let My People Go." Gordon Souder, who was living at Burnaby, British Columbia, finished a second semester of Russian language study at Simon Fraser University and was laboring with Russian-speaking Christians in the area.

Bob Duncan was granted a sabbatical leave from his position at Illinois State University to do research in California. Barry Willbanks was awarded an Honor Scholarship at Harvard Theological Seminary for topflight scholastic work.

The Dallas Times Herald featured a three-column spread on the work of Leroy Garrett in the field of Christian unity. Brother Garrett expressed himself as being extremely optimistic for the future. Mike Wood was given a scholarship for research at Emory University. All of this seems so very long ago. I cite these instances to show how active God is in human affairs. He is continually bestowing gifts, blessing all of us, calling all of us to greater heights of service. It is no wonder that I bow in humblest adoration and daily give thanks for His marvelous grace.

Of course, during the year He called a lot of brethren to be with Him. He allowed them to graduate ahead of the regular class, and receive their diplomas before the rest of us were called. Among these were James Pierce, a wonderful brother in Des Moines, Iowa; Bonds Stocks, former administrative assistant to Rep. John Rankin, of Mississippi; Cleo Mabery, Flat River, Missouri, whom I immersed when both of us were fifteen years of age; Vearla Foltz, Chillicothe, Missouri, a retired rural mail carrier, whose home had often been mine; James A. Allen, Nashville, Tennessee, long time editor of the Apostolic Times. Bro. Allen was set against the rise of the clergy system, which he could see invading the churches. He was handicapped in his opposition by location and circumstances. Paul Mackey, Burbank, California, an excellent journalist, finally succumbed to cancer after a long battle. He was only 33 years of age.

As I look in retrospect upon the death of these and others whom I knew I wonder what changes would have occurred if they had lived. What kind of an impact would they have made upon the world? Then I am encouraged to press on without delay, knowing that I shall join them on the other side. It is a wonderful thought that those whom we knew over here we shall see over there where all conflicts have ceased and all strife is past.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Recovery of Something Old

Contents

It is amazing how the history of the "kingdom of God" is interwoven with and affected by the things which transpire in the kingdoms of men. Although we have no continuing city here, we have to live in a lot of them which are not going to continue, and in which rot and decay have already set in. We may be strangers and pilgrims, but we are also sojourners in a land that is not ours. Whatever happens politically, economically, or socially affects us all. Candidates for glory die in times of epidemics and plagues as do the rankest unbelievers. All of us alike live in an atmosphere that has been colored by guilt and sin.

In March of 1968 President Johnson shook the nation by announcing that he could not enter the race for another term. That "waved the flag" which made it possible for everyone to get into the race. It was won by Richard Nixon who received 43.4 percent of the popular vote to 42.7 by Hubert Humphrey. A surprising 13.5 percent went to George Wallace. The stage was thus set for the traumatic and as yet unexplained condition which later transpired and took the name of Watergate.

On April 4, Martin Luther King was shot to death on the balcony of a motel in Memphis, where he had gone to assist in a strike by black sanitation workers. On June 7 James Earl Ray was arrested in London and charged with the wanton murder.

Frustration, disappointment, and depression gripped the black community and expressed itself in looting and violence. Then, as if a frightful and malign influence was manipulating the nation, Robert Kennedy was shot on June 6 in Los Angeles. It cast a pall over a peaceful populace who had rejected forceful overthrow of the existing order as a rational alternative to the ballot box.

During the year, death claimed one of the greatest examples of triumph over handicaps in our nation. At the age of 87, in Westport, Connecticut, Helen Keller gave up the struggle to maintain a life which had been marked by privation and suffering. At the age of nineteen months she became blind, deaf and mute. Under the careful and gentle tutelage of Anne Sullivan Macy she quickly learned to read and in 1900 she was able to enter Radcliffe College. She graduated with honors in 1904. Later she lectured throughout the world, visiting wounded veterans and giving them hope and infusing them with courage.

In spite of the frightful murders, the looting, and the rapine which ripped our nation apart, the year ended on a note of real faith. Nell and I were in the home of Jerry, our son, and with his family on Christmas Eve when it happened. Three astronauts aboard Apollo 8 had orbited the moon several times. They were the first human beings to view the far side of the moon. Suddenly one of them began to read from the sacred scriptures. Man's voice came from the greatest distance it had ever come with the age-old truth. It seemed that everything was all right again.

It was about this time that I had matured to the place where I had learned to trust in God fully and completely. I began to realize that He knew the end from the beginning, and could call the things that be not as though they were. He holds the whole world in His hand. This made two changes in my life. First of all, I prayed before arriving at a place that God would take the whole thing under His providence and bring together those who needed me most and let me relate to them for the mutual upbuilding of both of us. Since that time I have never been uptight about crowds. I have spoken to those who were present with equal fervor, whether there were six or six thousand, and have praised His name for what He did.

Second, I began to pray that He would open up for me great doors and effectual, although the adversaries were many. I realize that He never had a less qualified person through whom to work. The only thing I had going for me was an intense desire to see His will accomplished, and a fervent love for people. My educational attainments were as nothing and I cast what little I did have to the dogs. I had no degrees and had never been to college. But I resolved to go wherever the opportunity was afforded and to do my best. That prayer opened up for me chances which were tremendous and for which I am humbly grateful and profoundly thankful.

On February 13 I went to Milligan College to deliver an address at the Welshimer Memorial Lectureship. Brother P. H. Welshimer was in Canton, Ohio when a great revival was held by Billy Sunday. He followed up on those who made a profession, baptizing hundreds into Christ. He began the largest adult Bible Class in the nation at the time. A Welshimer Room is contained in the beautiful library which bears his name at Milligan, and every year a lectureship is held in his honor. My theme was "The Cross and the Growth of the Church."

That night I was scheduled to speak at Erwin, Tennessee, as one of five speakers brought in by a joint rally of Protestant Churches, each year, to demonstrate that, in spite of their differences, Jesus Christ is Lord. It afforded an opportunity for those with varied doctrinal biases to meet others in the community. That afternoon I was interviewed over radio. I then spoke to more than 700 persons gathered in the building of the First Baptist Church, following which I held a dialogue session with the Protestant clergy of the area. I came away convinced that these men were greatly responsible for the perpetuation of feuds and divisions.

The next morning I spoke to more than a thousand students in the local high school. At noon I broadcast a sermon from the pulpit of the First Christian Church. As I prepared to fly out of the area that afternoon, I looked back upon my stay of one and a half days, and thought of the bases I had touched. It was apparent that God was opening doors, for by no stretch of the imagination could I conceive of myself arranging all of these things. But it was merely beginning.

A little more than two weeks later, on March 3-7 found me at Langley Air Force Base for a Religious Emphasis Week. It was arranged by George C. Fisher, Wing Chaplain of the 450th Air Base Command. Brother Fisher was up for retirement soon and wanted to leave a heritage to the men. I was met at the air terminal by a Filipino soldier in a limousine. He was to be my orderly while on base and took me to a luxury apartment which was to be my home. It was stocked with all kinds of liquor when I arrived and with the same amount when I left.

The next morning, which was Sunday, I was to speak in three Protestant Chapels, one immediately after the other. My car was awaiting when I finished at one to hustle me over to the next one. I was saddened by the fact that I could not talk directly to the men, shake hands with them, and share with them. That evening I spoke to the Protestant men of the base at the fourth chapel, following a barbecue. I answered questions from the audience. They were a different kind of questions than one hears in civilian life.

There followed in succession in coming days a meeting with the Junior Youth Group, a bunch of young people, some of whose fathers were flying the skies over Vietnam, and a dinner with a High School Group, during which I fielded their questions and learned a lot about their hangups. I ate at the Officers' Club, and often had early breakfast with men dressed in their flying suits who could be in the air in the next hour with the Far East as their destination. We explored the question of war and its moral force.

One of the most interesting meetings was an address to the 316th Field Maintenance Squadron. Colonel Barner, a bluff Roman Catholic, issued a commander's call, which meant that the men in the squadron had to attend or be in the hospital. It was a captive audience. Many were resentful, a few of them openly hostile. In the group were hard-bitten men from the streets of Brooklyn and New York City, farm boys from the wheatfields of Kansas, and sun-tanned lads from ranches in Texas and Arizona. That day I received a lesson in how to weld an army of trained men together out of raw recruits from every walk of life. I began on time and ended on time. There was no dragging of feet in the military.

The last day there were two addresses. One was to the Protestant Women of the base. They were joined by busloads of women from two nearby bases. It was for the women I felt the greatest compassion. They were separated from their men for weeks on end and never knew how they would return, if they did. Life for these women was a cycle of worry and fear. There was the daily dread of the knock on the door to reveal the loss of a loved one on some foreign soil. In the evening we closed with a grand finale, a meeting for everyone. During the time I was on the base I prayed more than I had for a long time. It was easy to sense the loneliness of those I met, people who could establish no routine, who had no certain home.

I went almost immediately to Santa Clara, California, to speak at the Sunday school convention. It consisted of more than 600 superintendents and teachers, representing every evangelical church in the great valley, except the Church of Christ. It was held in Calvary Baptist Church, and I stayed in the "prophet's chamber" of the church. This was a lovely two-room apartment upstairs. It was well-stocked with food of every kind, so that one could fix his own meals and even entertain visitors if he liked.

The congregation had started seven years before with twenty-one members meeting in a home. The Sunday following the convention, the goal was 1400. They had registered 1380 the Sunday before. I did not get to talk to the two ministers. They were not there. They were out making calls the entire time. Another spent his time in the hospitals. But I talked to other members of the staff about the phenomenal growth. They attributed it to two things— the people found their needs supplied and the fellowship. The motto of the church was "Where you are a stranger only once, and then only for a few minutes." In addition to speaking each night I also taught two workshops.

But the thing that gave me the greatest satisfaction was an invitation to address the evangelical preachers of the area at a noon luncheon. There were almost 300 present. The president of the group was a Baptist. The man who introduced me was a member of the Salvation Army. It was just the kind of group I had been looking for to try out a new approach to restoration. I spoke on "Renewal through Recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power." As I spoke I noticed the men taking envelopes from their pockets and hastily jotting down notes. Little did they realize that they were being treated to Thomas Campbell's Declaration and Address, presented in the light of contemporary needs.

I pointed out that renewal was not the creation of something new, but the recovery of something old. We had surrendered a lot of provinces which had to be recaptured. To do this demanded a strategy for world conquest. As I offered them such a strategy, they seemed deeply grateful.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Drama at Harvard

Contents

In 1958, Erskine Caldwell wrote in the July issue of Atlantic Monthly these words: "I think you must remember that a writer is a simple-minded person to begin with and go on that basis. He's not a great mind. He's not a great thinker, he's not a great philosopher, he's a story-teller." I take a lot of comfort from that observation and rather suspect I am a living example of it, although not too well. If one had to be a great philosopher, this story would wither on the vine.

I began the year of 1969 with a trip to Miami, Florida, where my good brother, Robert Shaw, was ministering to the First Christian Church. It was a Disciples of Christ congregation located squarely in the downtown area. The building was a huge and imposing structure. In former days it had been filled to capacity in the fall and winter. The preacher in those days had specialized and speculated on prophetic interpretation and "snow-birds" from the north filled the place. There were almost as many on Sunday night as on Sunday morning. Many of the wealthy and sophisticated northerners came to know each other and looked forward to seeing each other at the church when the first flakes began to fly in Michigan and Ohio.

But the scene had changed. Cubans had flocked into Florida and settled in the city center. The old stores moved out and Spanish-speaking people surrounded the church location.

Many of the new arrivals were Catholic. Many others had no religious affiliation at all. The audience got down to about 250. They made a little huddle in the midst of the great structure designed to seat fifteen hundred. They talked with nostalgia about the great days of yesteryear and dreamed rosy dreams of the past. Some of them were still possessed of courage. They wanted to relate to their changing world.

I held sessions every night during which I sought to speak with encouragement and "strengthen the things which remained." The church was suffering with internal pressures. The question of restructure troubled them. Brother Shaw was a conservative in the truest sense. Each morning I held a meeting during which I sought to answer the questions of those who were present. Men came from the Independent Christian Churches and from non-instrument Churches of Christ. Some of the questions were particularly touchy.

I recommended that all those who wanted to maintain the faith as it was once delivered exchange addresses and start a little paper to be circulated among all, keeping each other informed as to their plans. I suggested at a Minister's Breakfast that there were surely some areas in which all who loved Jesus could work together. I further suggested that the preachers of all groups meet and eat together each month and discuss the mutual problems in such a great national "playground." I was speaker at a luncheon at the Exchange Club one day. I spoke of the need of the recapture of a moral dynamic for America. It was pleasing to see the response.

The following month I was back in Central Florida for the Annual Spring Spiritual Clinic which was held on successive nights in Orlando, Cocoa and Daytona. As my policy was, following my speech in each of these places, I invited questions from the audience. As was generally the case this proved to be the most interesting feature of all. Some of those in the audience had evidently been saving up their questions and finally found a chance to use them.

I next went to the School of Christian Living in Louisville, Kentucky. Each night the chief of police and I addressed the audience upon the spiritual and ethical phases of the Christian walk. During the five days I was there I spoke 17 times. I addressed Circle-K at Kentucky Southern College, spoke to 1100 students at Seneca High School; to the entire student body at Old Kentucky Home High School, in Bardstown; and to the Junior High School at Boston. It was a real pleasure to share with these young people, some of whom were very brilliant and perceptive, and give them hope. It must be remembered that the Vietnam War was still going on, the draft was a way of life for young men, and there was a genuine struggle in their emerging consciousness as to what was right and what was wrong.

I addressed a noon luncheon of the Kiwanis Club at the Executive Inn, and spoke to the faculty and students at the College of the Scriptures. This was a black school primarily operated to train preachers of the good news. I met and shared with them. During the time I was in Louisville I was on a one hour open line program over WFIA. The listeners zero in on anyone who tries to answer their questions. I enjoyed the give-and-take of it.

I rode one night with the police. I reported at headquarters and was assigned to a squad car until midnight. Then we returned to headquarters and I rode with two other men until 3:00 a.m. It was astonishing the different kinds of calls that were received. I was allowed to go in with the police. We refereed family fights, picked up sodden drunks, investigated a robbery, and broke up a gang fight at an all-night eatery. I came to have a tremendous respect for the "men in blue." All with whom I rode were young and a part of "the new breed" who deserve a lot of credit.

March 26-28 found me at Scottsbluff, Nebraska, at Platte

Valley Christian College, where I spoke five times. The audience came from long distances and people were present from Colorado, Wyoming and Nebraska. While I was there I granted an interview over the radio at Station KOLY, and another over television KSTF-TV. In addition to this I held a dialogue session at Nebraska Western College. Many of the students were from farms and ranches in the area. I found them alive to what was happening in the world but generally more conservative than their counterparts back east.

On the last day of my stay there, news was flashed over the wires, of the death of Dwight David Eisenhower, at the age of 78. He returned from the European theater of war as a hero to become the 34th president of the United States. The nation mourned his passing and Nell and I went to see the train bearing his body back to Abilene as it came through our city. It was swathed in black bunting. Ike was buried close to his simple old-fashioned childhood home. His mother had been a Bible-reading woman who was opposed to all armed conflict. Her son had planned D-Day with its frightful toll of life.

It was about this time I received a call from Dr. Krister Stendahl, inviting me to Harvard University to deliver an address before the Divinity School on the theme "Toward A Conservative Ecumenism." I accepted and on April 7 appeared in Braun Room at the school where the lecture was to be given. I was to speak for thirty minutes, to be followed by three reactors to my speech. Then I would have fifteen minutes to reply, following which the audience would question me for thirty minutes. The only catch was that the audience did not want to stop when the hour was up.

The three reactors were all men of stature and prominence in the theological world. Dr. Stendahl, who was first, was Dean of the Divinity School and a recognized leader in the World Council of Churches. He had, but a short time before, delivered a position paper at the convention in Uppsala, Sweden. Dr.

William Robert Hutchison was Professor of the History of Religion in America. He was born near Washington, Pennsylvania, where Thomas Campbell lived and wrote "The Declaration and Address." Dr. Hutchison knew the restoration movement topside and bottom. Starting out life as a Presbyterian, he had since become a Quaker, a position which he found more comfortable because of the historic emphasis for peace. The third reactor was James Valentine Fisher, a Ph.D. candidate, and a brilliant student. He was the son of Chaplain Fisher who had arranged for me to be at Langley Air Force Base.

I began with a definition of ecumenism which lifted it out of the political wrangle in which it had become engaged, and separated it from the various theological interpretations placed upon it. I then showed the extent, nature, place and purpose of the unity we seek. I affirmed that under the prayer of Jesus, whom I recognized as Lord, we were obligated to seek the unity of all those who believe in him through the apostolic testimony. Therefore, any attempt at a confederation of so-called world religions was not only foreign to the design of heaven but would do despite to the divine purpose and plan "which was to unite all things in one, in Christ Jesus."

Dr. Stendahl commended my distinction between kerygma and *didache, and pointed out the initial message to the world was referred to as the gospel, or good news, as distinguished from the doctrine, in which all of us are obligated to grow as a natural effect of our acceptance of the message concerning Jesus. His prime objection was a fear that, in our attempt to get rid of traditional forms and fixtures, we would be ensnared into the common trap of devising other structures which would enslave men more than those from which we had escaped. Dr. Hutchison traced the course of the restoration movement and its multitudinous divisions, ticking them off on his fingers, and expressed the maxim that "by their fruits ye shall know them." He felt that the only thing he could expect was more division, and not more unity. He thought it was like inviting a fox into a chicken house to unite the chickens. He might accomplish his purpose but Dr. Hutchison did not relish the idea of how and where it would be done.

Dr. Fisher objected that too little had been said about the pneuma, or Spirit, as the uniting power. My reply to all of this was that the men had preconceived what they thought I would say and had already formed their reactions before hearing it. Consequently, they had to give their speeches whether they were appropriate or not. I had not appeared as a defender of the restoration movement, and had not even mentioned it. I was there as an apologist for a conservative ecumenism and wherever it took me I was willing to go regardless of my past, just as Dr. Hutchison was no longer a Presbyterian.

Present for the confrontation was the Secretary of the Archdiocese of Boston. I met her before the encounter and she told me that the archdiocesan council was greatly concerned with modern trends and had sent her to glean what I had to say about a more conservative ecumenism. She took copious notes while I was speaking and again when I answered questions. It would have been interesting to know what transpired when she reported back to the council.

The Boston Globe had a reporter present also and the write-up in the paper next morning was quite lengthy and gave a lot of coverage. It was made to appear as a debate between Dr. Stendahl and myself, an idea I had earnestly sought to avoid. The report pretty well ignored what the other speakers had said, primarily because, as I suspect, the reporter did not know what they were talking about.

The student body was composed of some fine dedicated students who regarded the Bible as the norm. I could strengthen them. But it was the day of revolt and some who were present challenged everything held sacred in the past. They worshipped at the shrine of the god of the Now and paid homage to every freakish idea that was deemed to be new. I felt a real sense of compassion for churches which would be saddled with these restless young swaggering bullies.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Still More Drama at Harvard

Contents

Our last episode found me at Harvard, and a more unlikely or less qualified individual had probably never graced the premises there in the long history of the Divinity School which was set up in 1816. Nevertheless, Dr. Joseph Fletcher who had written the controversial book "Situation Ethics" heard that I was there and sent me an invitation to join him in his class on "Verbal Tools in Situation Ethics," at the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge.

I confess that I went with a warped preconceived idea of the kind of person who would produce such a liberal theological volume as he had turned out, and which was sparking all kinds of attack from the religious community. I fully expected to find a gay young "swinger" of about thirty-five years of age, with long hair and a beard, dressed in hippie garb, smoking a pipe, and wisecracking his way through class at every turn. You can imagine my surprise when I found a grandfatherly type, clean-shaven with a short haircut, and wearing a conventional suit of rather somber gray. The truth is that he was attired much more conventionally than I was.

The class consisted mostly of students for the Episcopal clergy, and it was obvious from looking at them, what a wide degree of variance that hoary fellowship tolerated. I had "cut my eye teeth" on the works of men from the Episcopalian clergy system— Alan Cole, John R. W. Stott, Michael Green, and J. I. Packer, all of whom were part of the "Evangelical Fellowship of the Anglican Communion." Their knowledge of and emphasis upon the word of God was a far cry from some of the wild ideas of these young men. I was thrilled to be among them and to affirm my faith not only in the need for a revelation but in the revelation given to meet that need.

Dr. Fletcher proved to be both modest and gracious. He introduced me to the class of about forty and invited me to participate during the two-hour session. He asked me for my definition of agape, which he laughingly suggested might need to be defined for modern secular man. He defined it simply as "active concern" for others. We discussed the implications of it, and talked about the seeming difference between Paul's theology and that of our Lord. He was quite convinced that, in going to the Greek world, Paul placed certain elements in the message that Jesus never intended. I was quite convinced of the opposite. It made for an interesting exchange. I remained behind with the students to talk and answer questions after he had left the room. It was a morning well-spent.

That evening a group of students under the banner of the Students for a Democratic Society, all slanted toward Marxism, occupied the University Hall and ejected the deans and administrators, and locked them out of their offices. They rifled drawers and files, and obtained some secret and classified materials and documents which began to appear in Old Mole, the appropriately named underground newspaper. The Harvard authorities tried to negotiate with them all next day to get them to abandon the building. The students were adamant and flushed with a sense of victory, and they had no success. They filed a list of grievances which they sent to Dr. Nathan Pusey, president of the institution.

Between three and four o'clock the next morning several hundred police moved in and stormed the place. They used only such force as was necessary, but they dragged the students bouncing down the stairs, cursing and screaming obscenities, and herded them into buses commandeered as "paddy wagons" and hauled them off to various and sundry jails. Just as they hoped it would, their forcible arrest created a real furor at the school and almost the entire student body rebelled. It was apparent that they had been looking for an incident which would spark an uproar.

I sat in on a meeting of the faculty and students of the divinity school, called to determine the policy they should pursue and the direction they should take. Richard Niebuhr presided as a representative of the administration. Harvey Cox was present as a kind of strolling ambassador and mediator. The student president was a radical revolutionary. He was dressed in a bizarre costume which made him look as if he had just drifted in from a reservation. He had a necklace of bear claws around his neck and a ring in one ear. One student suggested it should have been in his nose. He was thoroughly committed to overthrow the existing order. When the shouting subsided he made the proposal that they seize the Divinity School, Andover Hall and the World Religion Center, and hold them "till hell freezes over" or student rights were recognized. Another took the floor and said he was glad to learn that he believed in hell, because he had been denying its existence up until now. Finally enough quiet was obtained to take a vote. The more conservative element won by such an overwhelming majority that the leader and a smaller group of cohorts stamped out of the hall.

Harvard Yard was filled with milling students. There were a lot of young agitators present who were not students and had no connection with the school. Communist slogans and literature were everywhere. Most of it seemed to favor Castro and Chairman Mao. It must have been already printed and rushed in on heels of the revolt. "The Albatross," a hard rock band, set up on the steps of Memorial Church and banged and howled, adding to the general din and confusion. Shortly after noon Dr.

Pusey appeared. He walked through the milling crowd like the children of Israel did through the Red Sea. He paid no attention to the jeers and catcalls, and to the occasional obscenities. He was as cool as a cucumber. And that coolness won the battle. In a few days the condition had subsided and gradually things returned to normal.

I conducted small group meetings in various homes and estates while in the area. On Monday night I was at the Wellington home in Mattapan; on Tuesday night in the Edmonds home in Billerica; on Wednesday night in the Van Voorhis home in Bedford, and on Thursday in the Hill home in Medfield. In everyone of these people prominent in various circles met for discussion of the word of God and their lives. On Friday morning I met with a gathering of ladies at the Kaplan home in Bedford. At this I spoke about our great hope through the resurrection of Jesus. On Friday night some 200 people gathered for a farewell meeting in the auditorium of Bedford High School. It was a great time of rejoicing in the Lord.

On July 19 the papers heralded the death of Mary Jo Kopechne. She was in an automobile which went off a bridge on Chappaquiddick Island, Massachusetts. The circumstances of her death were very suspicious and it seemed that a blanket was thrown over the investigation. It has dogged the steps of Senator Edward Kennedy ever since, and will undoubtedly play a part in the future of any bid he may make for the presidency. There are too many unexplained aspects of it to sweep under the rug.

On July 20, 21 Neil Armstrong stepped from the lunar module Eagle to become the first man to walk on the surface of the moon. We hurried home to watch it on television. As I sat in our living room and beheld those first "bunny-hops" I was seized with a feeling that things would never be the same. We were entering another stage of man's existence. It would be like the Stone Age, the Iron Age, the Machine Age. The Space Age marked another milestone in human progress. It would require a "new man for our time" as Elton Trueblood came to put it.

On July 3-5, 1969, Nell and I went to West Islip, New York, for the Fourth Annual Unity Forum. West Islip was a dream that did not really become an actuality. It began as an Exodus movement. A number of Texas people were transferred at the same time to the northeast where they expected to become the nucleus of a thriving congregation and the seedbed from which to start others all over the New England States. It ended in disillusionment. The people were no different in the new location than they had been in Texas, and in some cases, that was not good. But the unity meeting was great.

It brought together Dwain Evans, Leroy Garrett, Robert Fife, Robert Shaw, J. Harold Thomas, Floyd Rose, Arthur W. Boone and me. Floyd Rose, an outstanding black brother from Toledo, Ohio finally stole the show. He told about his work as a mere boy with Marshall Keeble, and how they were not allowed to stay in the homes of white brethren in the meetings. He talked about a rope through the middle aisle to separate the two races and told how a black preacher took the confession of the blacks who came down, and a white preacher did the same for the whites. Half of the audience was weeping unashamedly when he finished. It was clear to see that Churches of Christ had a miserable record to answer for on their treatment of the race question. Nell and I went to New York City with Don Haymes and his dear wife and saw the frightful conditions under which they labored for the Lord.

It was about this time a new little magazine was launched which was to have an effect far beyond its size. It was called Integrity. The editor was Hoy Ledbetter, a tremendous and capable brother. He was also fearless as one needs to be who undertakes such a work of faith in spite of the opposition of the entrenched forces of the establishment. The first issue contained articles by Dean Thoroman, John Smith, David Elkins, and Frank Rester. The paper drew fire from its very beginning because it dealt with subjects which had always been concealed by the church, but it has survived to this day.

I had gone for "Inspiration Week" to Northwest Christian College at Eugene, Oregon. As soon as my plane landed I was whisked away to a student lounging place called Carriage Trade Coffee House where I was due to be on a call-in program on the radio any time. I went to the college and had lunch with the football team and found that four of them had been meeting every night for prayer. They agreed to set up a meeting for me with the student body of the University of Oregon next evening when I finished speaking for the Christian College. About 325 persons assembled and sat on the floor when I walked into the great Sigma Chi lounge. I began by divesting myself of any sectarian label and appeared before them as simply one of the fellowship of the unashamed. As I talked and answered questions an emotional wave swept over these young people, some of whom had been guilty of gross sins. It continued far into the night on the outside of the building, with weeping and prayers.

It was August 19-21 when I went to the Rocky Mountain Men's Roundup which was held at Como, Colorado, far up in the mountains. It was at Rocking-R ranch and 300 men were present. Most of them stayed over and slept in the bunks at the camp. Present with me were James DeForest Murch who deplored camping out and did not stay to the close, and Don DeWelt who did like it. The latter had been on a mission to Australia, and was on his way home. The slides he brought with him added much to the meeting. I spoke on fellowship each morning and night and the men ate it up. In spite of incessant rain which made it unseasonably chilly we had a great time and a beautiful meeting.

It seems as if the Spirit of the Lord is more apparent in some gatherings than in others. I can testify to His presence in the meeting with these men, many of whom came from ranches and farms. They truly loved the Lord.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

"How Did Jesus Get in Here?"

Contents

The year of 1970 dawned with the war in Vietnam still draped like an albatross around the neck of the nation. The potential for violent protest hovered like a malign stormcloud over the land. No one knew where it would touch the land next with its bombing and murder. The decennial census revealed some strange things. We had passed the two hundred million mark for the first time. The figure was 203,235,298. One-tenth of our citizenry was now over 65. Three-fourths of them were urban dwellers. One eighth were nonwhite. California had overtaken New York as the most populous state. The tide of immigration had shifted from eastern to western flow.

On February 25, a branch of the Bank of America went up in flames as a result of an antiwar protest at the University of California in Santa Barbara. It seemed that the licking tongues of flame were reaching out to consume our way of life. President Nixon announced his intention of withdrawing an additional 150,000 troops from the stinking cesspool of Vietnam the next year. Then on April 29 the war was escalated when the U.S. and Vietnamese forces began a major invasion of Cambodia.

This triggered massive protests across the land. At Kent State University in Ohio, national guardsmen opened fire upon students protesting the war. Four were killed. Many more were injured. It never was successfully proved that any of those killed were in active protest. The incident triggered rebellion throughout the land. Frustrated young people reacted, often in blind rage. By my birthday, on May 10, a student strike center at Brandeis University, announced that 450 institutions of higher learning had been closed down or were experiencing student antiwar strikes.

One of the places where unrest was surfacing was Illinois State University at Bloomington. At the very height of the ferment, the Christian forces on campus decided to inject the philosophy of the Prince of Peace into an ugly situation. InterVarsity, Christian Collegians, Campus Crusade, the Navigators, and Baptist Student Union, temporarily transcended their various methods of procedure, and invited me to come for a happening which was simply called "The Way." It was a happy designation. It was publicized by posters on the campus and in the daily newspaper.

The leaders were sharp enough to realize that unless there was a direct confrontation between the forces of belief and unbelief, between the followers of Jesus and those of the pagans, the meeting would avail nothing. There had to be the actual clash of verbal swords in face-to-face combat. They arranged for that, although, as it turned out, there were unexpected elements which could not be foreseen or provided in advance. These only served to heighten the tension and suspense.

I arrived on the scene the afternoon previous, just in time to see four hundred students wearing black armbands, in honor of their fallen comrades at Kent State, marching to the cemetery in a "Death Walk." Not a word was spoken as they walked along. Blacks, whites, Orientals, they trudged along the sidewalk, with only the shuffle of their feet marking their progress. In the cemetery they sat in silence with bowed heads, among the stones and granite markers, and then marched back. That night they slept on the ground in the quadrangle in what was advertised as a "sleep out for peace."

At 9:00 a.m., the following morning, I spoke to the combined forces of Christian students in Adlai Stevenson Memorial Hall on "How Did Jesus Get in Here?" I pointed out that he entered the earth, cradled in the womb of a woman, and He entered Jerusalem on the back of a donkey, to be acclaimed king. But he entered Illinois State in our hearts. He would be as effective as we allowed Him to be. He would be as bold, as brave, and as courageous as we were. And I pointed out that although the apostles were unskilled and unlearned, their opponents "took note of them that they had been with Jesus." After answering questions for two hours from a hall that was filled to capacity, I went to the cafeteria in the Girls Dorm, where we continued to talk about the things of the Spirit with some thirty Christian young women.

At 1:00 p.m. I was scheduled to meet in open dialogue three professors who were agnostics. It was to be a clearcut encounter with raw doubt and blatant unbelief. The lounge was filled with every kind of student. Included were several black activists. There was a Buddhist present. These hardly knew what to do or how to react toward me when I extended my hand and welcomed them. They were afraid of losing ground if they exhibited any kind of fraternity with "whitey." I had nothing to lose and everything to gain. My theme was "The Transforming Dynamic." I affirmed the intrusion of God into our universe on a revelational and personal plane. I knew where that revelation was found and I knew the person. I pointed out that Jesus was the only revolutionary who changed the world without burning it down.

Dr. Joel Vernon was the first reactor. He had been the son of a Baptist minister but had sold out on his faith. In a speech larded with profanity and four letter words, and obscenities, he branded the new covenant scriptures as a compilation of "myths and damned fairy tales" written to frighten the gullible out of their wits. He was in the Department of Political Science.

He was followed by Dr. Joseph Grabill, of the Department of History. He charged Christianity with creating a coverup to evade reality by the use of traditional words. The last was the eminent Dr. Martin McGuire of the Department of Anthropology. He asserted there was only one brotherhood of the flesh created over millions of years of developmental progress in kinship with animal life.

There was a deep silence as I rose for my ten minute summation and reply. To lessen the feeling I called the men by their first names. I was older by far than they. But all seemed to sense that it was now or never, the battle lines had been drawn. The time for a showdown had arrived. I pointed out that profanity was not proof and expletive was not explanation. It is generally employed by those who face something with which they cannot cope on rational grounds. I said Joel had started rebelling as a child according to his own testimony, and he was still at it in the same way. I urged him to grow up and face the issue, and not try to smother his inability to do so under the cover of swearing. Surely in his studies of political science he should have developed an adequate vocabulary. I pointed out that while he had made a blanket statement that the word of God consisted of "damned fairy tales" he had not given us a single one of them.

Joseph Grabill needed to realize that words which had been tested and tried were not merely traditional terms but were as modern as the morning newspaper. I mentioned that in his speech he assumed to speak only in traditional words for there were no others by which he could convey his meaning. Tradition means "handed over, or handed down," and anything from the past had to be described in such terms. There was no better word to describe our problem than sin, and no better one to portray our condition than lost. It was the "lostness of man" which resulted in his loneliness, alienation and depression. Man had cut himself loose from his roots. He was forming a cut flower civilization. It looked good but it was not alive.

I expressed my appreciation for the scholarship of Martin McGuire who had gone to almost incredible lengths to achieve his doctorate in anthropology. But I pointed out that the "brotherhood of the flesh" of which he spoke originated in the jungle and was fast taking us "back home." It was based upon the "law of fang and claw." It worshipped the idea of "the survival of the fittest." It glorified the concept that "to the victor belongs the spoils." The only real brotherhood worth having was that which originated from a relationship to the same Father, the Creator of us all. In it we could constitute a family of peace and tranquility.

While I was answering the professors, a young black Muslim arose and stepped forward, taking his position directly in front of me. He demanded to be heard in the name of Allah. It was evident to see that he craved attention. He grasped at the chance of using our meeting to secure it. I smiling said, "Although I do not see your name on the program, you go ahead and I'll listen, since it is obvious that if I go ahead, you will not, and I want you to hear what I am saying." He let loose a tirade against Jesus as a white man's God, used by the western culture to enslave his ancestors. He accused white slavers of being rapists and filled with brutality.

When he ceased speaking, I replied softly. I kept my eye fixed firmly upon him during the entire incident, never allowing it to waver from him for a minute. He became uncomfortable at my gaze and his own eyes shifted from side to side. I told him that he was speaking of a different Jesus than the one I was defending. My Jesus was color blind. I pointed out that he was always interested in the poor and depressed. He would not exploit anyone. He branded people like the traders in human lives as hypocrites. No one ever raped another by following Jesus but by departing from his teaching. Jesus was an advocate of the philosophy of "the second mile" lifestyle. Indeed, it was Jesus dwelling in me that made it possible for me to love him. Muttering that he did not want my love, he turned and left the room.

After this interruption I finished my answer to the reactors and closed with prayer for them. It appeared that I had been in control of the situation throughout, although there was a time or two when it approached the explosive point. But love had won the day. Later that evening I addressed a student rally which was held in Wesley Foundation headquarters. I spoke on the theme "How to Really Get in the Way." I answered questions for another hour, and we explored the Christian attitude toward sex, war, social reform, and other pertinent themes. It was my suggestion that the Christians take over the quadrangle for a full day, and make it an arena in which they took on all comers. They could challenge the neo-paganism openly and it was better to fall in battle than to be nibbled to death by mice.

When I finished at ten o'clock it represented a full day of direct encounter and dialogue. For thirteen hours I had been on the firing line testing the sword of the Spirit against the best the enemy had to offer. I was tired but keyed up for anything. I flew back to Saint Louis that night, and virtually the whole distance I prayed for those I had met. It had been a fruitful day.

I would not have you think that all of 1970 was like the encounter I have just described. There were moments of tranquil meditation and joy. There were times when I could draw a little apart from the multitude and refresh myself by study and meditation. I availed myself of every such moment. But generally there was activity of some kind and I traveled from one end of the country to another preaching the gospel of peace without compromise and emphasizing the hope which makes that gospel "good news." In fact, one of the great things that happened during the year occurred in February. It was notable because of things which transpired which were not on the program. But I will have to tell you about it in the next installment.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

The Dawn of the 1970's

Contents

One of the great regions of our land is that which has been designated Appalachia. It is ill-defined and no one can tell where it begins or ends, or where its boundaries are. It was fortunate in being settled by a people who were often poor but proud, and who were adept in adjusting themselves to wringing a living from the impoverished hill land in which their little farms were snuggled. These settlers were independent, resenting intrusion from the outside and keeping alive their traditions regardless of cost.

One of these was the Appalachian Preaching Mission. All of the evangelical congregations in and around Johnson City, Tennessee, join together for a week of proclamation once per year. That is, all but the Church of Christ. Services are held at noon in a downtown theater, and at night in the field house of East Tennessee State College. Businesses and industries close down at noon to give their employees an opportunity to attend the meetings. A different person presides each day, including the mayor, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, the president of the college, the head coach of football, etc. Ushers are drawn from various civic groups. One day the Lions Club, the next the police and firemen, the next the Rotary Club. It is a unique situation providing an opportunity for a united effort in proclaiming a common belief in Jesus Christ in spite of differences in dogma and doctrine.

In 1970 I was selected to be the noonday speaker. I delivered five addresses. There were 450 present for each of these. At night, Dr. Walter Judd, Kenneth Chafin, John Anderson, C. M. Ward, and Wayne Smith spoke in turn. It was the kind of thing which could happen only in this area of rugged individualism. I was invited by the president of the college to sit in a meeting of the entire faculty group and make suggestions as to how to deal with the problem of student rebellion. I was amazed to see the deep spiritual commitment of many of the faculty. The meeting began with prayer which I was asked to direct.

One day I was being interviewed over the local television station when the show was caught by the football coach. He called the studio and arranged to pick me up when I went off the air. I went to the school where the football players were in session. He introduced me and I spoke to them for fifteen minutes, witnessing to them what Jesus had done in my life. I then took their questions. I went to dinner with two students who wanted to talk with me. One was a lad who was a half-Jewish kid. He wanted to know how he could obtain what I seemed to have, an unflappable ability to face whatever garbage life flung in my direction with a smile. He confessed to me that he had tried sex, done the sex bit, and was now trying to find his identity and the answers to life by being into the contemplative, meditative, esoteric Far-East religions. I told him that he could stare at his navel until the sun went down and never find anything revealed except a thread or a raveling, but if he saw Jesus as I did, he would have to get up off his haunches, put his clothes on and start marching. He would have to be a part of the personal answer to the world's woes and problems.

One week later I was at a convocation of college and career young people at French Lick, Indiana. It was held in the great resort hotel which was built in the days when this was one of the outstanding spas in the United States. The wealthy came in their private railroad cars to take the baths. Although the luxury had somewhat faded since it had become a convention hotel, it was still fancier than anything most of us had ever seen. We ate together, talked together, and prayed together. Our lives were refreshed by men of stature who had prepared well. I was resource man in the scriptures. On Sunday morning we partook of the Lord's Supper at our respective tables. Each little group of twelve participated as they wished. There were 644 enrolled for the affair. It was the largest group which had ever attended this annual event, sponsored by Christians Unlimited. One of the highlights for me was to see Jim Bevis, who came to stay with me during the sessions. The one time I had seen him before he was a minister of education at Broadview Church in Lubbock. Bill Banowsky was the minister.

I went next to Santa Ana, California, and the First Christian Church, a beautiful structure, presided over by Gerald S. Bash and James Stock. My theme was "A New Look at the Book of Acts." But it was the "extra meetings" in which I found the greatest enjoyment. Most of these were set up by "Skip" Stock, a restless bundle of energy who was always looking for new worlds to conquer. We went directly from my plane to a beautiful restaurant for a private meeting with a brilliant attorney who was a skeptic at the time. It was while discussing with him that I first affirmed that the source of all authority could not be limited by the authority which proceeded from him, and that we cannot bind God by the commands which he gave to bind us, realizing that He is sovereign. I made use of the fact that Jesus said that all authority was given to him in heaven and on earth, but Paul declared that God excepted Himself from that authority.

Each night after meeting those who wished to do so retired to the beautiful lounge which was on the grounds, and I answered questions until 10:30 o'clock. The time was never long enough. A tragic thing had recently occurred. Pat and Shirley Boone and their lovely daughters had lately been excluded from the fellowship of their congregation because of their growing conviction that the Holy Spirit worked in our generation as he did in the primitive church. The elders of the Church of Christ in Santa Ana had commissioned their preacher to go and try to restore Pat and Shirley "to the fold." During the process he also "received the baptism of the Holy Spirit," according to his testimony, so he was also excluded. He attended several of my meetings. All of this was fresh on the minds of the people and most of the questions dealt with that subject.

One morning just as we were preparing to open with a prayer a two-hour session for questioning, nine preachers from the Churches of Christ filed in and lined up on the back seat. They were as solemn as a convention of undertakers. It was evident that they had come for a shootout at the old corral. It began immediately. The first one led off with a question intended to trip me up. But I saw through the ruse and answered it. The second followed to take advantage of the first. I fielded every ball that was thrown. For some reason I never felt more at ease. I have never been more comfortable. It was obvious the preachers were losing ground and they became more sarcastic and bitter as the tide of battle flowed against them. Finally, one of them gave the others a signal a few minutes before closing time and they all arose and filed out. I invited them to remain for refreshments but they ignored me. When they had gone someone in the audience let out a loud "Whew!"

Three days later I was on the beautiful coast of Oregon at Newport. Robert Church was the minister. The little city was noted for its ocean fishing and surfing. The congregation had experienced serious trials and a great deal of internal strife in the past but all was peaceable at the time. We had a varied audience for both morning and evening meetings. The local Lutheran minister, the Assembly of God preacher, two Catholic priests, a nun, and several others came regularly. It was at Newport I first met Stanley McDaniel. He was a college professor in northern California. Later he did his doctoral thesis on my life and preaching at Indiana University. It was also a real blessing to meet the family of my aged brother George Hendrix. A number of them came and took over a small motel and stayed for the entire study. Brother Hendrix was an old-time pioneer schoolteacher. He knew Daniel Sommer, A. M. Morris, and S. O. Pool, names from my own distant past.

One visit I made probably deserves mention. It was to the Abilene Christian College Lectureship. Brother Garrett and I were together. I was invited to speak one night at Southwest Park Christian Church, by Alvin Houser, who was serving as minister. The place was filled almost thirty minutes before the time appointed. A goodly number of professors from the school, together with several visiting speakers, joined with a large delegation of students who were present. I spoke on "Solving Problems of Long Division" and threw it open to the audience for questions. There was not a single untoward minute. On my return I stopped off in Arlington for an address at the Holiday Inn. There were representatives from 17 congregations in attendance, and most were friendly.

It was a notable event for me when I was invited to address the Prairie Young Peoples Association meeting held at Missoula, Montana. This outstanding group celebrated its golden anniversary several years ago. It is made up of Christian youth from the prairie provinces of Canada and from the top tier of states in the United States. There are always friends from other states and provinces in attendance. The meeting at Missoula began in the Snow Bowl Ski Lodge far above the city. It was snowing hard, and after the initial session and snack lunch, taken while sitting on the floor in front of a huge fireplace, it required a snowplow preceding us to get down to the Florence Hotel where everything else took place.

Workshops were carried on all day Saturday, and I made a speech at the lovely banquet that evening. Sunday morning everyone was up early and the Lord's Day meeting was held so that before noon the attendees could be started on the long trek back to their homes. Each one was provided with a sack lunch. I found myself greatly encouraged to know so many fine young people. The world seemed a little safer for having them.

During the last month of 1970 I went to Houston, Texas for a forum on fellowship. As there was no church building where all could attend we opted for a neutral place, and secured the auditorium of Lanier Junior High School for the night sessions. Noonday meetings were held in the Downtown Y.M.C.A. and provided an opportunity for everyone to ask the questions which they considered worthy. The meetings were attended by representatives of all the churches, but no announcement of them was made publicly by the ministers.

This was the first of two such attempts, and we reached various kinds of Churches of Christ, Christian Churches, and Disciples of Christ, with the message of peace. Some met for the first time and learned they lived on the same street. The second time I invited Ervin Waters to handle the questions with me. I have never worked with a better brother. He was sharp as a tack, having honed his mind through years of debating. It was a real privilege to be associated with him, and we have cemented our friendship as the years have come and gone.

I presented my thoughts for the year in a bound volume of the paper called "Our Living Pattern." At the conclusion of one of the articles I wrote: "If we can ever sense that Christianity is not a law but a life, that it is not a sacrificial code imposed from on high but the sharing in our lot of a God who came down from above, our fears will give way to faith, and our heartaches to hope. We will cease to ride herd on God's sheep and be willing to follow in the steps of the Shepherd. We will substitute the law of love for our love of law, and see the God of goodness demonstrated in all of the goodness of God as manifested unto us."

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Summoned to Come Up Higher

Contents

The year 1971 will be remembered by different people for various reasons. Southern Californians will recall the severe earthquake which resulted in buckled freeways, and 62 deaths, with more than a million dollars of damage. Space enthusiasts will recall it as the year when the astronauts of Apollo 14, led by Alan Shepard, spent 10 hours exploring the lunar surface. Revolutionaries will remember it as the year of the bomb in the basement of the United States Capitol, which resulted in $300,000 damage.

Indians will remember it as the time when Federal marshals occupied Alcatraz Island which had been seized by representatives of various tribes who hoped to make it a cultural center. Theatrical buffs will remember it because of the opening of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington. Felons will call to mind the occupation of the state prison in Attica, New York, when 34 of their number died with 9 of their hostages in the brief battle with state police and sheriff's deputies. Blacks will recall the death of Ralph J. Bunche, under-secretary general of the United Nations, who received the Nobel peace prize in 1950. He was the first Negro Nobel Laureate, and a man of distinction.

Only yesterday headlines screamed these events. The hearts of men palpitated with pride or failed them for fear as they read them. How much a part of the dim past they now seem. How far away they appear. How remote they are from our present busy lives. There is no Nobel prize for those who labor for spiritual peace. But there is a noble reward at the end of the way. So our own striving for peace among believers went on. It seems almost incredible that I was engaged in 24 meetings in 16 states. These were in a context that reached from ocean to ocean and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico.

I have recently read again of the travels of the pioneer proclaimers. By steamboat down the Ohio, by stagecoach through forests and across the prairies beyond, and then by horseback along faint trails they made their way. Wherever they went the light shone. Now I can board a jet in Saint Louis and I am within three hours of any place in the United States. What a responsibility this lays upon me. I seem to have accepted the challenge in 1971, for I was away from home more than I was at home. I must tell you about a few of these encounters as they are part of the warp and woof out of which the pattern of life has been woven. But first I must inject a note of sadness for the year was one in which some of my dearest friends were summoned to come up higher.

Bob Haddow was a real inspiration to me. He was completely paralyzed. Yet he became a great reader. He laboriously formed letters and words and wrote to me. He came whenever I was in California in a special van in which his bed could be hauled. His mother always accompanied him, driving the vehicle. Generally his grandmother was also along. He believed in what I was doing. He dreamed the same dreams as myself. I first met Harry Robert Fox, Jr., recently home from long service in Japan, and became convinced that I was in the presence of one of the humblest, most erudite and well-read minds I had ever had contact with. Subsequent contacts did not change my thinking. I wept when I learned that Bob Haddow's spirit had wrenched itself free from its twisted clay tabernacle.

The deaths of Dewey Elliott, of Richmond, Mo.; Noel Sutterfield, of Detroit, Michigan; and Forest Tabor, of Fairplay, Kentucky, made me realize the far-flung regions in which men lived who had affected my life. Then, in rapid succession three more were called home who had been of profound impact in my life. The first was Everett Noel, of Topeka, Kansas. He was one of the first men we met when my parents moved to Topeka. When the church divided, over what now appears to me to be trivia, he stood with us. He was always helpful to my parents during their lives. I am not sure how he looked at what I advocated as God opened my ideas to the wider vistas of His kingdom. I was gradually barred from the church of my childhood and was not invited back to where I had stood as a high school youth and parroted the party line. But I loved them then and I love them now, and I realized that the death of my brother marked the passing of an era.

Louis J. Kappelman was a true man of God. Born of immigrant Lutheran parentage as was I, he accepted the plea to become a Christian only, the first time he heard it at a little Arkansas congregation back in "the sticks." He was honest, hard-working and humble. Amidst all of the pressures and tensions of the party spirit, he "kept the even tenor of his way." I stayed in his home during some of the most dramatic periods I encountered as a preacher of the gospel, when every day brought fresh accusations woven of a tissue of falsehood, and it was refreshing to talk with someone who was unperturbed and tranquil. I learned much from him and his departure wrenched my soul.

Bertha Robinson died at the age of 87, one of the noblest Christian women to ever grace God's footstool. Her life was of no significance among the kingdoms of men, but can never be overlooked in the kingdom of heaven. The cause for which we plead in the Saint Louis area owes its inception to her. Never married to any man on earth she was free to be a member of the bride of Christ. Her entire life was dedicated to caring for others. She possessed a patience which became proverbial and "admitted openly that she was a foreigner and a refugee on earth." She did not leave home when she died, she went home. Nell and I still talk feelingly of her pilgrimage among us.

Stewart Whyte, of Alton, Illinois, was a real inspiration to me during his life. He was the victim of an incurable condition and succumbed prematurely. Homer Harvey, who was a master of the stonemason's art, and an inimitable carver, died at Middletown, Indiana. Dr. N. Rhoads, a member of an old-time family in our restoration movement died in Eugene, Oregon. I knew I would miss his encouraging letters. My life was impoverished by the deaths of these, all from different states, and different stations in life. Despite the divergency of their interests all had been very meaningful to me.

It was during this year I decided to concentrate my writing on a chapter which had deeply impressed me during my striving toward maturity. As I pointed out in my initial article, "The Ascent of Faith," Romans was the Alps of the new covenant scriptures, and chapter 8 was the Matterhorn, looming high above and towering into the clouds. I analyzed every word in this impressive part of the Book of books, and at the end of the year embodied all of the material in a volume titled "One Great Chapter." It must have touched a tender chord, since we still receive orders for it long after it has gone out of print.

I began the year at the First Christian Church in Escondido, California. The series was called "College of the Bible." It brought together people from the Church of Christ to share with those in the Christian Churches. It was a time of great fellowship. We averaged 300 per night and 150 in the morning sessions. I spoke at various civic and school gatherings with good effect. I was accompanied by Al Karges, genial and hard working.

February 1-3 I was scheduled to deliver the T. H. Johnson

Memorial Lectures at All Faiths Chapel, on the grounds of Kansas State University, under sponsorship of Manhattan Bible College. Each morning we conducted an informal question and answer session at the college. In the afternoons I had an unparalleled opportunity to meet the students at Kansas State. It was during this time I came to admire so greatly Brother William Lown, president of the Bible College. His non-sectarian attitude was refreshing to contemplate.

I went next to University Street Church of Christ at Eugene, Oregon. At the time the charismatic viewpoint was a matter of great concern and many of the questions in the daily forum dealt with the subject. I tried to be as diplomatic as possible. I took the position that I would make no test of fellowship out of one's personal experience to which he testified, nor allow anyone to measure my standing with God by His own experience. This was calculated to maintain fellowship with all and forbid judging of another by anyone on the basis of his own esoteric experience. I still think that these are the two gravest dangers, and of far more harmful tendency than any opinion relative to the work of the Spirit.

The Abilene Christian College Lectureship began on February 22, and I was scheduled to speak that night at the YWCA auditorium. I did not particularly like the arrangement. I did not want to appear in rivalry against the school, despite their opposition to me. There was little chance of my speech being assessed impartially but I made no reference to the school and dealt solely with the agonizing problem of disunity. Later I was invited to meet in an off-campus room with several students. Most of them and their parents were charismatic. The room was packed and we discussed until well after midnight.

March 3-5 found me speaking at the World Vision Crusade at Intermountain Bible College, Grand Junction, Colorado. Brother Erskine Scates was president of the school. He has since died and we have lost a friend and a good man. I was especially pleased to learn of the work among the Navahos by former students. These had gone on the reservation and lived in hogans, and shared the lives of the Indians as well as the transforming message. They found it easier to relate to these gentle tribesmen than to the world of violence outside. They had learned the language and the traditions and were accepted by even the older men of the clan.

March 15-19 I was back in Oregon, at Newport. I stayed in a home, where I could see the restless waves of the Pacific Ocean foaming out against the shore. It was decided that I should speak about the Holy Spirit because of the unrest concerning His work in our day. I decided to pitch my talks on a positive note. It seemed to me there had been enough negativism. The church had been troubled by various things with no relationship to the current issue, and I did not want to leave them divided over matters relating to the Spirit.

My talks were entitled The Person of the Spirit; The Purpose of the Spirit; The Performance of the Spirit; The Power of the Spirit; and The Peace of the Spirit. In our morning study, for which the room was filled, we attracted a mixed bag of eager students. Several clergymen of various backgrounds came. We had a large attendance from Churches of Christ. It was interesting to answer their questions and not forget my objective which was a plea for peace.

I made clear the difference between revelation and interpretation. The first is what God said. The second is what we think He meant by what He said. The first is the disclosure of the divine mind. It is perfect. The second is the application of the human mind to what was said. It may or may not be perfect. We are bound by God's Word. But no man is bound by my understanding of it. Each person upon earth must be free to engage in a private search of the divine revelation, and to deduce what it means for himself. If his deduction differs from mine, one or both of us may be wrong, but we dare not make a test of one's relationship to God out of his relationship to my understanding of the will of God.

Robert Church, who served the saints at Newport, was in agreement with my method of teaching, and we sailed through nights with a filled auditorium, in which there were Catholic priests and nuns, as well as Lutheran ministers and others. It was interesting to see how eagerly they all learned and how they grew in a love of God in five nights and four days of intense teaching.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Waging Peace

Contents

One of the greatest blessings which has come to me has been the privilege of working with the Canadian brethren. Their great hospitality, developed in part from a frontier existence not too many decades ago, is proverbial. I have been with them from the maritime provinces on the east to beautiful Victoria in the far west. It was because of this I looked forward with keen interest to speaking at the Prairie Young Peoples Association Conference, held in Yellowgrass, Saskatchewan, April 15-17, 1971.

The congregation at Yellowgrass is unique. Never very large, it has sent out more preachers than any place else I have known. Most of these were educated in the States, and most of them remained in "the lower forty-eight" as these United States are called. I had met many of them and knew a great many other brethren from Yellowgrass before I arrived. Without exception they were all sincere and sacrificing for the Cause of Christ. The conference was excellent. It made possible for the bonds of fellowship to be tightened from Winnipeg to Dawson Creek. It lapped over into the northern tier of states and drew people from all of them.

On Sunday night, after the conference had concluded in the afternoon, brethren had made arrangements for me to speak in Regina, the beautiful capital of the province. The meeting was held in the Christian Church building. The brethren were in turmoil. There was a division of sentiment as to which direction they should go on "restructure" which was the talk of the Americans in those days. We were favored by having with us four members of the Anglican clergy. They heard me declare the good news as our only hope. I pointed out that, in the final analysis, all fellowship with God was on a personal basis. It was man-to-God. Regardless of what happened to institutions it could not sever the relationship unless we consented to having it do so.

On April 26-30 I was scheduled for a fellowship rally at Phoenix, Arizona. It continued for five nights in the North High School Auditorium. By selecting a "neutral place" it was believed that more people could attend without offending their tender consciences. I was interviewed on radio twice and appeared on television in talk shows twice. In one of these people could call in and ask questions directly. It was interesting to note that while we were engaged in the great and vital issues affecting the whole world of believers, and unbelievers, that questions from members of the Church of Christ all had to do with instrumental music. The fact that we were divided and rent asunder in direct contravention to the prayer of Jesus seemed of no particular consequence. The sordid problem of division had to be aired. The question was no longer "What think ye of Christ? whose son is he?" It was now "What think ye of a piano?"

I went next to Columbus, Ohio for the Central Ohio Ministers' Fellowship, May 12-24. My theme for the series of talks was "Growing Up in Our Understanding of Christian Unity." I gathered that almost all of the men agreed with me theoretically, but lacked a knowledge of how to implement what I was saying practically. Without realizing it was happening, we have been betrayed by circumstances into becoming a non-sectarian sect. We were in partisan competition with other sects about us. We thought we were right and could not be wrong.

They thought the same thing of themselves. We looked upon one who was converted to us as being a convert to Christ. It was obvious that we were in some cases developing a "personality cult" built around the charisma of a preacher. It would take a long time until we grew up in our concept of the unity for which Jesus had petitioned.

Our problem was augmented by fear. We had become afraid to venture beyond our traditions. We were frightened at the thought of experimentation, so no new discoveries of how to work were being made. Like a cow tethered to a stake we grazed in our own restricted circles. The length of the rope determined the area we would cover. Yet, all around us was a world dying for what we could share. Meanwhile we were meeting only with those who agreed with us, and rearranging our prejudices. The only bright spot in an otherwise discouraging picture was that created by a few hearty souls who ignored the brands of men and sought to relate meaningfully to the cross of our Lord.

I stayed with Jeff and Linda Smith. They were some of my favorite people. They had been in Great Britain and we had mutual acquaintances there. It was wonderful to be in their home. Jeff was a student at the university and I got to visit it. It was a great buzzing beehive of activity. On May 24, I went to James River Chapel, south of Springfield, Missouri, where I was among friends I had known since my boyhood days. I held my first meeting in the area when I was fifteen and had returned often. For five nights I spoke on the theme, "Will the Real Jesus Please Stand Up?" I showed how we had constructed our own images of Jesus which were not real at all. We had caricatured him only to satisfy our own longings and ideas, but behind the masks we had created stood the real Jesus, still longing to help us.

June 7-11 I began at Highland Church in Louisville. Ernest Lyon ministered to it. It had known some of the great men of the past. Among them was E. L. Jorgenson, who had come from a Scandinavian settlement in Nebraska to become one of the great song compilers of his era. With his goal, the upgrading of the vocal music of the congregations, he was led to bring out Great Songs of the Church. It caught on. He had hit upon the idea of alphabetizing the hymns in several categories. It was a privilege to be in his home and to share experiences with him. He had ministered in Toronto, and had been instrumental in introducing Claude Witty and James DeForest Murch.

These two men began a series of "unity meetings" in 1936. They had agreed that "tradition, creedalism, provincialism, institutionalism, Pharisaism, extremism, indifference, self-sufficiency, ignorance, proselyting, distrust, and all the imps of Satan were running riot. The leadership of the churches were not calling for unity. There was no great uprising of the rank and file demanding it. Yet we, as a people, had preached it; we ought to practice it."

Men from both sides risked their futures and engaged in irenic discussion. I opposed it with characteristic ignorance. We were the loyal church and that was it. Finally, the radical element from both sides shot down the meetings. Foy E. Wallace had bitterly opposed them in the south. They came to nought because the brethren were thinking war instead of peace. It was war against brethren and it was much more appealing than war against Satan.

In early July I attended and spoke at the conference on unity at Atlanta Christian College, in Atlanta, Georgia. It was well attended but I came away feeling that more groundwork was needed. The questions showed a strange lack of relevance to the unity of all believers. That passion for oneness had not yet been fanned into flame. Each party was interested in unity which came its way. There was too much of the spirit of the snake and frog which promotes togetherness by the first swallowing the latter. Several years of teaching would have to be done before each was willing to move toward a common center and let Jesus become the real focal point.

August 2-6 I was back in Oregon at Camp Wi-Ne-Ma for a family camp. It is located in a beautiful spot where hills and mountains drop down to meet the ocean. From my window I could watch huge whales sporting offshore. More than a thousand people were registered. Campers covered the entire area. I was Bible lecturer for the week. In addition, I met with the young people each afternoon. The winds and waves had hollowed out a natural bowl of sand on the shore and we used it for our discussions. All other adults were barred and I could listen freely to the problems and hangups of more than two dozen teen-agers. I was, as usual, deeply impressed with their enthusiasm and potential.

Next I went to the Blue Ridge Men's Clinic, which was held not too far from Grandfather Mountain. This spot is known for its gathering of the clans every year. Dressed in tartans and colorful plaids, thousands of people of Scottish ancestry assemble for a reunion. The sound of the pipes reverberates through wild mountain glens. Scottish dances and games are carried on apace to the exultant cries and cheers from thousands of voices. I know some who have not missed attendance there in years, going back repeatedly to eat haggis and to down Scotch oatcakes.

The clinic featured Beaufort Bryant, Clarence Greenleaf and me, together with 754 other men. It was no place to go to catch up on your sleep. Some men talked virtually through the entire night, huddled around little campfires, and fortified inwardly by coffee which would dissolve shingle nails. They had often stayed up like this while fox-hunting and it was no problem for them.

I went next to Houston, Texas, one of the fastest growing urban areas in our country. What a contrast it was to the peaceful quiet of the mountain regions of the east, where one could hear the far-off crow of a rooster as he awakened in the morning. Once again, at Sidney Lanier Junior High School I conducted a Fellowship Forum for three nights. It was necessary to define fellowship again for those who had been betrayed into thinking it was something men had the power to extend or withdraw, when in reality, it was a state in which we were simply called to share. To accept one another freely was the greatest blessing to which we had been called.

I have often read a piece of reportorial writing with deep appreciation. I know that a reporter must be selective. He must be judgmental. This means that what is not said may be even more important to another than what is covered. I feel the same tensions in writing this. There was my meeting at Astoria, Illinois, and Canton, Ohio, and the Louisiana State Convention at Shreveport. Everyone of these was important. At Canton I spoke 12 times in five days and addressed three breakfast meetings. Yet space will not permit full coverage of them.

On October 20 I was back at San Jose, California, to deliver the Roy B. Shaw Memorial Lectures. These were, by terms of the will, to be about the restoration movement. My themes were: The Death of A Dream; The Recovery of Reason; and A Faith For the Future. I demonstrated that our restoration movement arose at a certain period in history. It was spontaneous and not planned. It was adapted to the cultural needs of man as he then existed on the frontier. We no longer live in those times. We must launch a new movement dedicated to renewal through recovery of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power. We must make the ageless gospel meet the needs of the Space Age.

Later I went to the Genessee Church of Christ, near Flint, Michigan, where it was my privilege to stay with Frank Rester and his good family. Then I found myself at Eldon, Missouri where Seth Wilson, Gareth Reece, Russell Boatman and I engaged in a two-day forum on "The Holy Spirit." I closed my travels for the year at Windsor, Illinois. It was close to Sand Creek, where the division all began. It was there that for the first time the opinions of men were made tests of fellowship, and those who did not conform were told that they no longer would be regarded as brethren. It seemed like a good place to go back to and proclaim the gospel of peace and seek to undo some of the tragic ills which had resulted from an ill-conceived policy.

6. God's Peace in Turbulent Times

Nothing Is As Important As Jesus

Contents

The year of 1972 will never be forgotten by Richard Nixon. It must both thrill and haunt his every waking moment. It was the time of his greatest triumph. On November 7 he was re-elected to serve a second term with a vote well in excess of forty-seven million. In February, accompanied by Henry Kissinger, he had gone to Communist China. The television screens in every American home registered the progress he made in his negotiations. It was a time of exhilaration for him. His goals were being realized. His dreams were coming true.

On the night of June 17 occurred the Watergate break-in. Those who were apprehended had electronic equipment in their possession. The incident was not at first seen in its full potential. The poison in its fangs was well concealed. On June 22, and again on August 29, President Nixon assured the nation that no one in his administration had anything to do with it. But after his re-election, the serpent began to uncoil itself, striking first at this one and then at another. Before it was over the pride of the haughty would be humbled. The dream temple would lie in shattered ruin. A hero would become a villain. And disillusionment would spread like a pall over the nation.

On May 2, J. Edgar Hoover would die of a heart attack in Washington. He was 77 years of age. He had been Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation since 1924. Hated by Communists and fellow-travelers alike, he had seemed like a towering rock against those who would undermine our national ideals. He had been at the forefront of the battle when roving gangs sought to pillage us. As he grew older, the first accusing fingers were pointed in his direction and he had to reckon with a new kind of opposition. His opponents carried briefcases filled with statistics rather than machine-guns filled with bullets. It was like an old stag brought to bay by the pack yapping at his heels, making his last stand with his back against the mountain. On May 15, Governor George C. Wallace was shot by a 21 year old drifter, Arthur Bremer, in Laurel, Maryland. The day after Christmas Harry S. Truman died in Kansas City, Missouri, at the age of 88.

I began the year in sunny California in Escondido. The "College of the Bible" attracted brethren from all over the region. I spoke each night at the congregation and held an open forum each morning. Men and women seemed intrigued by the fact that they could ask anything they desired. We did not always agree but we had a glorious time in the Lord. No one asked whether you were this or that. It seemed enough that all were in Christ, all wanted to learn, and all were teachable. Between sessions I addressed civic clubs in the area and spoke to other special groups. In all of these encounters I kept in mind the motto of Alexander Campbell: "He that would plead this heavenly cause must stand before the people with peace in his heart, union upon his lip, and truth in his eye."

The last of January I returned to Florida College for the lectureship. An attack upon the principles which I espoused was to be made and I wanted to be present for it. When I was there before, G. K. Wallace, Pat Hardeman and Bill Humble were the prominent figures. All of them had occupied really prime spots on the program. Now all of them were out. Their names were not even mentioned. I met with a number of students, at their request, in a room in the men's dormitory for several hours in the afternoon. They were full of questions. I answered them without reservation. It was suggested that I appear before everyone and take their queries. The school, which was presided over by James Cope, would not allow such an arrangement as if it were part of the lectureship proceedings. It was arranged that it be held at 10:00 o'clock after all regular activities were over. It was to be in the building of the University Church of Christ.

Standing room only was the word which went forth fifteen minutes before the scheduled time. Every conceivable niche was filled for the meeting which lasted three hours and finally ended at 1:00 o'clock a.m. It provided the greatest excitement of the lectureship. I spoke for thirty minutes on my concept of fellowship. I was followed by Robert Turner, who admitted that he had only read a copy or two of Mission Messenger. I then sat down on the platform with Brother Turner, and we were joined by Ferrell Jenkins and Harry Pickup, Jr. It was interesting to watch the men who did the questioning. Some of the older preachers imagined themselves to be prosecuting attorneys with me as defendant. Since I refused to accept the role or play their game they did not know what to do next. They were accustomed to someone who rolled over and played dead when they queried him. An occasional student seized the limelight to establish himself as one of "the faithful." But the majority of the audience listened seriously and soberly.

I am convinced that great good was done, especially with the more observant and erudite students. I have seen reports in the more partisan journals that at least fifty of the most brilliant students in the sect have been affected by my plea. It would seem that this fact alone would cause the party leaders to take thought. If only lazy and sloven students were affected it might be brushed aside as of little consequence, but when top-notch students see the value of the priorities emphasized it is another matter. Since that fateful night in the history of our modern thrust for renewal I have done a lot of thinking about the brethren who oppose support of what we call institutionalism.

I reject the brand of "antis" as applied to these brethren. It is silly and childish. All of us are "anti" on a lot of things. In some respects their contentions are but an extension of some of my own former efforts. But the charge quite frequently made by their opponents that they "out-Sommer" Daniel Sommer is not to be credited. Their position is not the same as his. I knew Daniel Sommer personally. He was often in my home. He ate at my table and shared with me his thinking. The brethren at Florida College are not espousing a warmed-over version of the Sommer ideology.

I think the rise of the party is a phenomenon which occurs at periodic intervals in every group which is based upon a legalistic stance for its survival. The only safeguard against it is the investiture of one man with infallibility, and the universal recognition of him as the authority. As long as that authority is respected and revered the organization will remain intact. It is because of the erosion of authority that the great monolithic structure of the Roman Catholic Church is faced with such problems in our day. The seeds of division are inherent in every legalistic group. Given the correct conditions they will germinate and a fracture will occur.

The regarding of the New Testament scriptures as a written code of laws coupled with the idea that God provided an exact pattern to be meticulously followed in all ages has operated in such a way as to defy the lordship of Jesus and substitute the rule of dominant men. These have generally been editors among the various segments of the Churches of Christ. Sometimes they have been elders who were inflexible. Every time the culture altered, division has occurred. Division is part and parcel of the attitude toward the plan of God. It is not at all a question of respect for the authority of the Word, but of respect for a particular way of looking at it. Many men have deep regard for the revelation of heaven who do not have the same regard for the interpretation of an editor.

As I view it, these brethren are guilty of profound errors in their reasoning. They do not distinguish between the gospel of Christ and the doctrine of the apostles. They do not understand the nature of worship. They do not understand the nature of fellowship. They have arisen as a protest movement against what they considered certain abuses, and allowed it to gravitate into a separate and exclusive party. This was the great mistake. Brethren may think as they wish about the Herald of Truth, and they will do so. They may support it or not support it. They may watch it or not watch it. But when either group creates a party around its deduction it becomes factional. And factionalism is a sin. This makes their opinion as important as the death of Jesus. One must believe it to be regarded as in the faith. It becomes an unwritten creed. But nothing is as important as Jesus— just nothing!

Of course each party attracts those persons who thrust themselves into prominence by intemperate and injudicious statements. They generally prove to be an embarrassment to those who sigh for Jerusalem and are sincerely saddened by division and strife among the saints. Partisan papers agitate the situation by publishing almost vituperative reports against those who disagree with them. H. E. Phillips wrote in Searching the Scriptures, a monthly periodical, about "the despicable doctrine of fellowship." Others were almost as uncouth in their attacks. But none of these things move me. The road of a reformer has always been a rocky route to travel. But there are great rewards.

Changing the subject, two deaths occurred during the year that were of some significance. Alexander Campbell Johnson, Jr., died at the age of 74. Maria Louise Campbell Barclay died at the age of 105. Both of them were the great-grandchildren of Alexander Campbell. Alexander himself had died on March 4, 1866. It was the Lord's Day and just as it drew to a close he was called to his eternal rest. Now his great-grandchildren were going home at an advanced age.

March 6-10 found me at La Crosse, Wisconsin. Because of a building program our meetings were held in the YMCA building. I arrived just in time to see a member of a rock music group baptized. The leader had been in the hospital as a result of a real bad drug trip, when a candy-striper met him, told him about Jesus, and changed his entire life. His conversion had a great effect upon the other members and one by one they discovered the tug of the Galilean upon their hearts and made the great transformation. They were a jovial group who had tried everything the world had to offer. They conceived the idea of writing Jesus' words to some of their tunes and belting them out to the far-out generation who made the scene.

They suggested that we make a joint appearance on the university campus where they had been "big time" before. I agreed and they secured Presidents Hall. By this time they were calling themselves HOPE, and they put up posters all over the place with our pictures and the inscription "Hope With Carl." I was astounded at the drawing power they exhibited. The great hall filled completely and students and faculty jostled for standing room around the walls. They spilled out into the hall.

For almost an hour HOPE played and sang. I did not understand a word they were saying. They testified of their faith and then introduced me as "The Answer Man." I went for fifty minutes. The questions were terrific. Some tried to trip me up as the Pharisees had done with Jesus. I sailed through the troubled waters without a break. Many of the questions were significant and penetrating. The entire thing was televised. It made the meeting. The night sessions were filled with people. The day sessions produced an interested group who were eager to know. I am pleased to report that all the members of the rock music group went back to school. One became a schoolteacher. The other four became preachers of the gospel. God works in wonderful ways and through all kinds of agencies. How wonderful of His grace to turn drug users into disciples of the Nazarene and into useful servants of His kingdom.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

1972: A Year For Renewal

Contents

On March 13-17, I was with the Northglenn Christian Church at Denver. It was served by my good friend, William Lower. I first met him and his lovely family at Fort Wayne, Indiana. He was an excellent administrator, an apt student and a competent proclaimer of the Word. I stayed in a little camper belonging to one of the brethren. It was pitched at the rear of the church building and it was in a real spot. At night I could see the star-studded canopy of the skies flung above me, unobscured by the smog of our own creation. It was a real place for meditating and I did a great deal of it. Out of my deliberations came an article which was one of my deepest. It was entitled "Spiritual Argonauts" and deals with the nature and essence of truth. It was published in the August issue of Mission Messenger, in 1972, and appears in the volume called "The Divine Purpose." I have never written another to equal it. And I could not have written it if I had not been alone at night on the plains outside "The Mile High City."

March 20-22 found me with the Northside Church of Christ at Grand Rapids, Michigan. I stayed with Patrick Miles and his good wife. They were a wonderful black brother and sister. They had two beautiful children. It must have been rather strange for them having a white man in their home. I caught them staring at me around the door facing as I wrote. Pat was an elder and a good one indeed. He had a grasp of what was transpiring and was a firm believer in the need for implementing the prayer of Jesus for unity.

While there I spoke at chapel at Great Lakes Bible College and also met with the Campus workers at Michigan State. The school was in the vanguard of the student revolution. They were taking to the streets and marching for any cause, or simply creating an artificial cause and marching anyhow. It was interesting to see them gather momentum and wave their fists and start shouting. It was a great time to be there with the message of "The Indestructible Jesus" when a lot of other things were being reduced to rubble or going up in licking flames. In times like these you need an anchor!

I went next to Newport, Oregon for the third time. I was becoming a regular fixture in this fishing town, so picturesquely sprawled above the wide Pacific. The brethren had established a coffee house mission on the waterfront. To it came sailors from every country possessing a fishing fleet. Here they could find a free copy of the scriptures, sometimes in their native tongue. There was always someone with whom to talk about the lordship of Jesus. A few steps down the wharf was Mo's chowder house, a famed place which looked like anything except a restaurant, but made clam chowder which was out of this world. If you ate too much of it you would be too!

We had decided that the lessons at night should be on the book of Romans. I worked out a series which I designated: Nonsense and Incense; Faith and Futility; The Father of the Faithful; Dead and Delivered; the "As" and "So" of Service. The auditorium was filled every night. The open forum attendance each morning was very gratifying. It was while in this town I found an old friend whom I had known from boyhood in Topeka, Kansas. He had become a judge on the circuit court judiciary.

It was my good fortune to go next to Hoxie, Kansas, where Darrel Foltz is doing such effective work. While there several members of the Dunkard Brethren attended every night. I learned that they had quite a colony at Quinlan, Kansas, where there were two congregations as the result of an unfortunate split. Realizing that they had descended from the work of Philip Jacob Spencer and Herman Francke, in protest against certain deficiencies in Reformation life and practice, I was anxious to meet with some of them. We went out to the beautiful and fertile farm of one of the leaders. I soon found that they were descendants of the Pietists, and were part of a restoration movement which preceded ours by a century.

The house was plainly furnished. Everything served a utilitarian purpose. It was spotless. There was no television set. A great many of what we consider "modern conveniences" were conspicuous by their absence. The people attired themselves in simple garments which denoted their faith and separated them from the world about them. They practice foot-washing in conjunction with their communion. They hold a love feast annually as a symbol of their affection for one another. I was blessed by being able to talk with them. It was only in recent years they had begun to attend our meetings. They could come and not offend their conscience since we did not have instrumental music. I was much impressed with the unaffectedness of their lives. It was no problem to me to recognize them as brothers and sisters.

It was about this time I learned of the death of two aged saints whose lives had impressed me greatly. One was Isaiah H. H. Moore, 91, of Louisville, Kentucky. He was killed when thrown from an automobile in a three car collision in New Lebanon, Indiana. This humble black man, a direct descendant of slaves, had long worked with College of the Scriptures at Louisville. The other was Charles Bussard, also 91, who was living near Springfield, Missouri, when summoned to his eternal home. He was of hardy pioneer stock, and had spent his entire life within a few miles of his birthplace. Generous, open and free-hearted he had roots going back to the pioneer days when the English and Scotch people crossed the Appalachians and drifted westward. He had a lot of Elizabethan words in his simple vocabulary.

I traveled next to Elgin, Oregon, for a series of studies on "The Life of the Spirit." I was met at Pendleton by a brother in a light plane. We lifted out of the valley and crossed over a high mountain which stood between us and our destination. We were so close to the ground that I could look down and see bands of wild elk grazing. It was a hunter's paradise. My stay was marred by word of a highway accident which claimed the life of Bernell Weems, of Bonne Terre, Missouri. A preacher of the Word, he died early one morning when his car struck the abutment of a bridge. I was asked to come for the funeral service but could not, as I was scheduled to be the speaker at the commencement at which our oldest granddaughter, Dawn, graduated from the high school at Aspen, Colorado. She was valedictorian of her class and made a fine speech based upon I Corinthians 13.

Following an excellent meeting at James River Chapel, south of Springfield, I was booked next for the camp near Macrorie, Saskatchewan. Word came of the death of J. C. Bunn, at the age of 90, in Washington. In my early boyhood when I was twelve years old, he had announced my first preaching appointment at the little rural church at Old Pearl, in Illinois. My work had "caught on fire" from that fateful night and my destiny was determined. At Macrorie I was associated with Ed Benoit, a member of the provincial parliament for Alberta, sitting at Edmonton. A great student of the Word, and a master of communication he did a tremendous job. We had a great time and saw much good accomplished.

I accepted an invitation to address the College-Career session at the North American Christian Convention. My theme was "The Holy Spirit in the Church Now." After finishing my assignment I was preparing to leave for home a day early. I was asked to deliver the final morning address as a substitute for Joe Barnett, of Lubbock, Texas, who called to say he was sick and could not make it. There were over 5,000 present and I had to speak primarily "off the cuff." A great many persons whose hearing was apparently defective told me it was the best I had ever done. I still run into people who were present and remind me of the speech. It is enough to discourage one from preparation.

August 11 and 12 I was accompanied by Otto Schlieper and Leroy Long, of Saint Louis, to a men's clinic at Rock Garden Camp in the beautiful Missouri Ozarks. I was associated there with Knofel Staton, currently a professor at Ozark Bible College. Since that time I have been with him in various other meetings here and in Canada. Each time I hear him I become more convinced he is one of the most articulate men among us. His research is so thorough that it leaves nothing to be desired. He is the author of a number of books, all of them good ones. His studies on marriage leave little else to be said. Fortunate indeed are those places which secure him as a speaker.

During September I was at a Family Camp at Little Galilee, near Clinton, Illinois, where Enos Dowling also spoke. The former librarian at Butler School of Religion, he had become associated with Lincoln Christian Seminary. His knowledge of the restoration movement history is unsurpassed. His hobby is collecting old song books prepared by composers in the movement. Among those he has gathered are scores of books starting with Alexander Campbell, and reaching down from the inimitable J. D. Fillmore, to brethren who are still alive and writing. The great transformation that has taken place the past several years betokens the coming of a new reformation. Every such reformation in the past has been launched upon the wings of song.

On September 8, 9 I was at Butler Springs Men's Retreat in Ohio. It was a blessing for me to be associated with James Smith and Paul Bajko. Paul is from Poland. As I write this he has just celebrated his 25th year in preaching the good news to the Polish people. In 1971 the church in Poland celebrated its 50th anniversary. Paul helped to plant a congregation in Bielsk-Podlaski in 1969. They remodeled an old building to seat about 70 persons. They have since outgrown their quarters and have applied to the government for permission to build a larger one. Since 1969, new congregations have been planted in Poland at the rate of one per year.

I went next to Hilltop Christian Service Camp and spoke at a Men's Retreat. The camp is near Columbus, Indiana, and from it I went directly to Sunbury, Ohio. Then on to Hobbs, New Mexico, where I was surprised to see Brother and Sister W. P. Hutson. They had come to take a motel room next to mine just so we could talk in spare moments. Brother Hutson grew up in a different segment of our brotherhood than had I, but he read Mission Messenger and became entranced by what I was doing. We had great times talking over our past and thinking about the future. The three of us became convinced that we were living in one of the thrilling periods of the church.

From Hobbs, I journeyed to Corvallis and Beaverton, Oregon. It was my third trip to Oregon during the year. At Corvallis I had the privilege of association with a great number of college faculty and students who were dedicated to Christ Jesus. Our association was unmarred by any kind of difference or friction. Although they came from various backgrounds, under the gentle influence of the Spirit they were drawn together. At Beaverton I was compelled to deal at length with the rise of the charismatic movement. It was beginning to make an impact upon the community. It was a great time to be alive and actively dealing with the problems of the church.

I closed the year at the little Illinois town of Astoria. We had a great series of meetings and I met some fine people. I returned home to prepare my speech on "Fellowship" for the preachers' workshop at Abilene Christian College. It was to be held January 8-10. As I looked back upon the year just spent I could rejoice in accomplishments for the Cause. I had traveled in every part of our nation, and had gone to Canada as well. Everywhere I found brethren awakening to our needs as a people. It was evident that we were moving into a brighter and better day.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Getting Acquainted in Texas

Contents

Hershel Ottwell died on Thanksgiving Day, 1972. It was a sad loss to many of the saints, and especially to me. We had grown up together as boys in the country. We used to play together on Sunday afternoons. I was older than Hershel, but we admired and loved one another. He was an excellent teacher. He had devised the fine art of making charts and used them a great deal. He loved to work with small and needy groups and to see them grow. Teddie Renollet and I conducted memorial services. As I saw him lying there with his lips sealed by death I realized that one of God's noblemen had been mustered out of the church militant. We had said farewell to one of the great proclaimers of the Good News.

The year of 1973 had hardly begun when it brought news of the death of an ex-president, Lyndon Johnson. He died of a heart attack while enroute from his ranch to a hospital in San Antonio. Always a controversial figure, the world still argues over some of his decisions. He was buried in a humble shaded family plot upon the banks of the Pedernales River. Meanwhile, his successor, Richard Nixon was becoming more involved in the Watergate scandal with each passing day. And he was forfeiting the confidence of the American people with each move he made. The "Saturday night massacre" in which he fired Archibald Cox, Attorney-General Richardson, and his deputy, Ruckelshaus, was almost the last straw.

The "long national nightmare" as Gerald Ford described it, was augmented by the conduct of the Vice President, Spiro T. Agnew. He resigned his office to avoid further prosecution. On December 6, Ford was sworn in to take his place, the first man to enter office under the terms of the 25th Amendment. The trial of the Watergate accused was televised. Each episode was like driving the knife a little deeper into the body politic.

Early in January I went with Leroy Garrett to the Preachers' Workshop at Abilene Christian College. The weather was frightful. A blizzard swept across the land leaving the roads ice-covered and hazardous. Cars were in the ditches the entire route. Plane service was completely cancelled. Despite this 700 men gathered for the event. I spoke on fellowship. Harold Hazelip, of Memphis, Tennessee, and Richard Rogers, of Lubbock, Texas responded. Then I answered questions for the rest of the morning. Due to the importance of the theme and the interest in it, J. D. Thomas had not arranged anything else and we had the full session. It was an interesting time. Some agreed with me. Others were bitterly opposed. It would be interesting to see the reaction if the speech were being made now. Great changes have occurred. The position I advocated is much more widely accepted in these days.

January 31, I went to Kentucky to Murray State College, for meetings with the Murray Christian Fellowship. As I met with the students and answered their questions I was made to appreciate the fact that the fellowship was not limited to those who were of our persuasion. It was open to all who were seeking the answer to the great question of life itself. I met many who had grown up in various religious backgrounds. They were being ministered to according to their needs. The student rebellion was grinding to a halt but there was no adequate substitute for it. Fortunately, those who attended the Bible studies of the fellowship were being pointed to Jesus, and to march for him was the real way to go.

Before I returned home I was scheduled to speak at the Christian Church in Brookport, Illinois. The town was a microcosm of the divisions of the restoration movement. Although it was but a very small Ohio River town, at one time it had three congregations, all meeting within a few blocks of one another. The hostilities and bitterness were bequeathed from one generation to another and the feud perpetuated. The situation is somewhat alleviated now, although there are often internal troubles which beset the groups. I have often wondered what would happen in such a place if there were just one person who ignored all of the divisions and simply recognized everyone who loved Jesus as his brother. This is the way Paul did at Corinth.

The month of February proved to be very busy for me. I spoke for the North Central Regional Camp Conference at Lincoln, Illinois, and went from there to Jacksonville, Florida. I was in the home of Tillman and Ellen Cavert. It was Ellen's father who gave the original money to build Florida Christian College. They feel very strongly that it was diverted from its original course, and they were "sold down the river." If the truth ever becomes apparent it will look bad for the administration. While I was in Jacksonville, some sixty brothers and sisters gathered in the Cavert home where I spoke to them on fellowship.

I went next to Patoka, Illinois, where I addressed a full house on the subject of the Holy Spirit. I addressed the Area Men's Fellowship at Gillespie, Illinois, in one of the great coal mining areas of the state, and concluded the month at Columbus, Illinois, where I spoke on "The Four Dimensional Life." For four nights I emphasized that if Christ dwells in your heart by faith, and you are rooted and grounded in love, "you may have power to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth, and length and height and depth, and to experience the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge." If you have never known this it may be indicative that you are not one of the saints.

Early in March I went to the Family Life Conference at French Lick, Indiana. Other speakers were Dr. Robert Burns and Dr. Charles Shedd. Dr. Burns was at his inimitable best and the more than 400 persons who had enrolled thoroughly enjoyed him. Dr. Shedd had recently authored the book "The Fat is in Your Head." He had formerly weighed 330 pounds, but now was down to 165, which was just half of his previous avoirdupois. He said he had "shed one Charlie."

In his introduction he told us how he was motivated to write the book. In his younger days he always had to clean up his plate. It was an unpardonable sin to leave any food on it. You always had to eat what you took out even if it made you gag. His mother hovered over him with the threat, "Clean up your plate or you will get no supper." When he got married and his children came along he could not treat them so cruelly. Still he had the neurotic aversion to food left on the plate. So he would take what the children had left, rake it out on his own plate, and eat it. This continued until one day his youngest son looked at his mother and said, "Mama, if we did not have papa we would have to keep a pig, wouldn't we?" On such casual observations hang the writing of many books. It does not take much to trigger a real writer into starting.

The Sixth Annual Missionary Reunion of Mexico was to be held south of Cuernavaca, in Morelos, Mexico. I was invited to address it each evening for three days. It was a fascinating experience for a "gringo" like myself. We stayed in an old, old inn, and the meetings were held in a large room. In the daytime we met in a group under the beautiful trees on the grounds which were fenced in. The furniture was heavy and ponderous, all of it hand-carved by artisans of the past. The water was turned on four hours per day. If you wanted a bath you had to be there. Drinking water was obtainable from huge jugs in the hall.

The waiters spoke only Spanish and I never was quite sure what I would get when I ordered. This resulted in some frantic gestures and waving of the hands. One thing I could admire was their ability to make bread. Each morning there were six to eight different kinds of delicious fresh rolls on the table for breakfast. I could have made a meal of them alone. One day some of the missionaries took me into the native section of Cuernavaca to an ice cream parlor run by a man and his wife. The ice cream was made in flavors I had never seen before— fresh corn, prunes, avocado, mango, and a host of other things too numerous to mention. I got a double dip cone, one dip being guava, and the other banana. It was delicioso!

It was interesting to hear some of the problems encountered by missionaries, especially by those who had gone to remote jungle villages, or penetrated into mountainous regions off the beaten track. It was nothing to have chickens scratching around and clucking in the buildings used for meetings, or to find a dog taking a siesta under the Lord's Table. The improvising of various things for enhancement of teaching taxed even the most fertile and inventive minds. I learned a lot about problems on the mission field. I came to appreciate the various moral standards which had developed through the ages. But I still came away with the idea that the chief problems were one's fellow missionaries. If one could learn to put up with them he generally had no trouble with the natives. It was interesting to see the "gung ho" American spirit come up against the "Mañana" attitude of the people. The latter eventually won!

I went directly from the exotic influence of our sister country to the south to my own native town, Flat River, Missouri. It had made great changes but had not yet developed into an asphalt jungle. It was near here I was born. Here I was christened in the Lutheran Church. It was a mere formality because I never remember going back. Here I grew up in childish simplicity. Here I married Nell when I was twenty. It was good to be back home again, although the rough, rude mining settlement had grown up into a more cultural city.

The boom began just eighteen years before I was born with the sinking of a shaft that uncovered incredibly rich veins of lead ore. The place was tough, the rough and tumble life of the miners centered about the Blue Goose, the Black Bear, the Klondike and Moonlight saloons. When I was a youngster someone was always being killed in a drunken brawl. It was a real pleasure to return and I felt humbled by it all. I was thankful to see the sophistication that had replaced the early days. I spoke at the Lions Club, the Kiwanis Club, to the Rotary and Optimist Clubs. In every instance I held out the hope that is ours in Christ Jesus. When there was time I answered questions. Many of them were pertinent and penetrating.

Soon thereafter I began a tour of western Texas and eastern New Mexico. My real purpose was to expose myself to some of my friends who had never met me, and to meet as many of those who opposed me as possible. I wanted to be vulnerable. I believed in what I was saying. I had confidence in what I was trying to do. Of course, I could not generally speak in church buildings as the sectarian spirit forbade that. In the divided condition of God's family I purposely opted for neutral locations since this would make it possible for all to attend regardless of conscience. I found out that generally the ones who fought my coming most desperately were the preachers. I am convinced that our brethren would have settled their differences years ago had it not been for the fact that they were kept apart by professionals.

At Borger, Texas, I was a guest of David Warren. A group of us met for dinner in an uptown restaurant and talked as fast as possible since time was short. We then adjourned to the lovely home of the Warrens to which people came from all over. The spacious living-room was crowded. We continued our talk until almost midnight. That night I went home with the Hutsons, to Friona, Texas. I spent the next day in the hospitable home of the senior Hutsons but we were blessed by the coming of their son Leland, and his family, to have luncheon and to spend the day with us. That evening we met in the Hospitality Room at the local bank. It was filled to capacity. I spoke about my growing concept of the fellowship for the whole family of God. It was generally well received. The big thing was to get someone to implement it.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Specters From the Past at Lexington

Contents

In my last installment I was in Friona, Texas. It is one of the great cattle feeding places in the United States. We visited one of the feeding pens. There were thousands of cattle. Everything was mechanized. The feed was mixed with supplements in a towering silo and fed by augers into the troughs. All the cattle did was to come and eat. It was almost like the church in a lot of places. The herd had nothing to do with selection. They had to take what was supplied. It was put into the trough and they could not question it. They must either eat it or sleep through it.

I went next to Portales, New Mexico, where I was a guest in the home of Frank Poynor, a brother with whom I had corresponded, and whom I had come to love. Our meeting was held in the Conference Room at the City Library. It was my privilege to have a number of young people from the New Mexico State College with us. A goodly number of them had recently left the large Church of Christ in the city and had started to meet to themselves. They had done so because they thought it was essential to protect their freedom from prejudice.

It all started over a Bible study held on campus. The young people were baptizing a number of other students. They obtained permission to use the baptistry at the church building. There was some objection to the dress of some of them. They wore jeans. They allowed their hair to grow a little longer than the people were accustomed to. They ignored the pews and sat down on the steps to the pulpit and on the floor surrounding the baptistry. They sang choruses. When one was baptized they lifted up their hands to God and praised Him. They hugged the person while he was still dripping wet. The deacon who was taking care of the building and unlocking the door became infuriated. He declared, "Not only did they not sit on the comfortable pews we had provided, but they sat there and sang songs that were not even in our books." So they left and began meeting where they were cemented together and not concretized.

At Lubbock our meeting was held in the Student Center at Texas Tech. It was preceded by a small gathering in the home of Dr. Thomas Langford, dean of the university, and a real man of God. A number of friends dropped in to talk about the progress of reformation. They were overjoyed with what was happening. The meeting at the center brought together a goodly number of readers of Mission Messenger in the area, some of them secretly "for fear of the Pharisees." There were also students present from Lubbock Christian College as well as from the local school of preaching. It was quite obvious I was saying some things they did not hear daily. I was "bringing certain strange things to their ears."

The question period was particularly penetrating. One young man asked if I were not afraid that I might be advocating heresy. I replied that I was even more afraid that he would confuse orthodoxy with heresy, and pointed out that it was Erasmus who said, "By identifying the new learning with heresy, you make orthodoxy synonymous with ignorance." I then mentioned that every reformer in history had been branded a heretic by the establishment. Luther, Huss, Calvin, Wesley and even Alexander Campbell. If I were a heretic I was in good company. All of these were hounded and harassed, driven out and persecuted during their lifetimes, and it was only after they had been dead a hundred years that they became heroes.

Anyone who differs with us, who does not parrot the traditional ideas, is regarded as a heretic. We mistake walking in the old paths with wallowing in the old ruts. It is not wrong to dissent. It may be wrong not to do so. The status quo is not sacred. We have to be willing to be reckoned as oddballs rather than to play ball sometimes.

It came to me that the reason these diverse people could come and hear me was because I represented no party or sect. I belonged solely to Jesus. I was continually astounded by the fact that people could grow up in the same community and know nothing about their "other brethren." There were six different groups present at Lubbock. Each of them knew only a certain group of preachers. They read only their own papers. I introduced some who had met in business transactions but did not know each other as Christians. They could hear me with a clear conscience because I no longer represented any of them. I was simply a member of the fellowship of the unashamed. My only creed was Christ, my only law was love. I did not shrink from questions of anyone.

At Ruidoso, New Mexico, the following night, we met in the Luncheon Room at the Chaparral Motel. There were not many of us but it was a thrill to sit down and discuss "kingdom matters" with those who had vowed allegiance to the king. After it was all over we went to the lovely home of Brother Teague and continued talking until it was quite late. I have often wondered about those whom I met. I have heard of none of them during the years that have elapsed. Are they still faithful to the principles about which we talked, or has the lure of the world deflected them from their goal?

After a series at Ferry Road Church of Christ in Waynesville, Ohio, I went to the banquet held in the Student Center ballroom, at the University of Kentucky, in Lexington. I never visit the city without feeling a sense of something bordering upon awe. The cause was established there by Barton

Warren Stone in 1816, with 24 members. It was here, just sixteen years later that the Disciples and Christians united in a meeting which began on New Year's Day and continued four days. On the following Lord's Day they communed together and pledged to each other their cooperation.

It was in Lexington that the debate between Alexander Campbell and N. L. Rice was held. It began at 10 o'clock, Wednesday, November 15, 1843. It lasted fifteen days. Each disputant made 64 speeches. The published account filled a book of 912 pages of closely set type. Mr. Rice proved to be the most difficult opponent Mr. Campbell had met during his whole career.

In 1847 the church in Lexington was the largest in the state. It contained 382 members. It had been beset by trouble over various things from the beginning. From 1864 to 1870 instrumental music became the most bitterly discussed issue in the Millennial Harbinger and in Lard's Quarterly. Some of its greatest antagonists were in Kentucky. Among these were J. W. McGarvey, Moses E. Lard, and I. B. Grubbs. Brother McGarvey withdrew his membership from the Broadway Church when the instrument was installed. But he never made it a test of fellowship. He still returned to Broadway to preach when invited to do so. He professed a sincere love for all of the brethren there. He was big enough to distinguish between fellowship of God's children and participation in a practice which he could not condone.

When I visit Lexington it seems that I am in a microcosm of the entire movement. Specters from the past appear to materialize out of the gloom. Heroes of yesterday who "waxed valiant in fight and turned to flight the armies of the aliens" seem to hover about. But gone is the deepseated spiritual dedication combined with intellectualism of the highest sort. What a privilege it would be to sit at the feet of Campbell, Stone and McGarvey. I spoke at the banquet on the topic "The Battle of the Pea Patch," drawn from II Samuel 23:11, 12.

I went next to Belmont Avenue congregation in Nashville. This was a unique and free congregation. Some had been excommunicated by Churches of Christ in the area because their opinions did not jibe with the establishment. Others had just grown tired and left of their own accord. They were searching for green pastures. They were tired of munching on dried hay. There were jeans-wearing, long-haired kids in the number, but there were also doctors, lawyers, professors and businessmen. All got along well. The only test of fellowship was your relation to Jesus. The service was alive unto and enlivened by the Spirit.

The congregation had a magnificent social consciousness. They supplied food, clothing and furniture to the needy on a daily basis. They had chosen to remain in the old building and it was crowded for every service. There were two meetings held on Wednesday night while I was there. Both of them filled the place to capacity. A lot of students from David Lipscomb College came to hear me. They sat on the floor, on the steps of the pulpit and in the baptistry. Some of them stood patiently in the rear.

People drove long distances to be present. I met young people who were in Nashville, hoping to make good in country or bluegrass music. The service was so unstructured that anyone could come up on the platform, or stand where he was, and tell what Jesus meant to him. Don Finto was generally responsible for the meetings. He had been a teacher at David Lipscomb College but was let out in one of their purges. He was joined by several other professors who were guillotined and who helped to start Belmont. It was a church whose time had come.

Actually the church had been there for many years. The father of Norvel Young was one of the elders. But the church was fading into the background as the community changed. It was dying rapidly. Only a handful of people were attending. Most of them were afraid to return at night. Drugs and prostitution were all around them in the streets. Stealing and vandalism took their toll. And then renewal set in. Drug users came back from a living death through Jesus. Young prostitutes found a haven of rest in Jesus. In an amazing fellowship which knew no second-class citizens of the kingdom people were baptized unto a living hope. Obviously there were risks. There are always risks where freedom is found and everything is not cut, dried and stacked beforehand. But it was a great thing to be a part of a congregation which had been resurrected from the dead.

It was while I was there that I met the father and mother of Pat Boone. They were gracious, kind and unassuming. We went out to eat together one night so they could tell me their story. They were greatly disturbed when they heard that Pat and Shirley had become wrapped up in the Holy Spirit. They prayed for them every night, asking God to bring them back. They had all been members of the Churches of Christ for years. One night the elder Brother Boone could not sleep, so in the middle of the night he slipped out to read his Bible and pray. While he was praying he became convinced of the presence of the Holy Spirit. He awakened his wife and told her that Pat was right. She arose and prayed and said she experienced the nearness of the Spirit. They were so overjoyed at the discovery that they made the mistake of telling about it next Sunday. Sister Boone was divested of her class which she taught and they were both excommunicated. They were still attending there, however, as they loved those who had treated them so unfairly.

Right after I left Nashville I went for a Talkathon to Missouri University. It lasted about nine hours in all. I began at 1:30 p.m. and closed at 10:30 p.m. Students could come and go as classes or work demanded. The room was always full and some were standing in the hall ready to take the place of those who had to vacate. There was a fifteen minute rest period every two hours. In each segment I spoke for 30 minutes and then answered questions for the remainder of the time. Some of the questions were very interesting. They were the kind you would expect from students who were part of a great university under the domination of humanistic thinking.

We discussed the relativity of truth and I suggested that in its final analysis truth was a person and not a proposition. Jesus declared that he was the way, the truth and the life. Before a proposition can be stated it has to exist first as a concept in a logical mind. I postulated that all truth had to exist in a divine mind. It was a great session.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Talking Plainly With Each Other

Contents

The eighth annual unity forum was held July 5-7, 1973, at Tulsa, Oklahoma. Local disciples had worked diligently in promoting it. Brethren were in attendance from 15 states and Canada. The interest was superb. Perry Epler Gresham, former president of Bethany College, and an authority on Alexander Campbell, spoke the same night as I did. His style was inimitable. Although he was on the board of huge corporations, his speech was given in a kind of down-home, "cracker barrel style" which made him appear as a country philosopher.

I told a simple story about an early incident in my life, in which I reacted adversely against my brother because I became unsettled as to whose child I really was. It was a homely little piece which hardly deserved a hearing in such august circumstances. Yet it seemed to impress the audience in a manner which some of my more profound reasoning failed to do. I have wondered a lot of times since that night, if it might not be the case that we are divided purely because of our lack of ability to talk plainly and simply. Only recently I had a letter from a college professor who said he was searching one night for something he could use to illustrate what fellowship was all about. He came across the article in Mission, and read it to his class. I have never been able to write another article of that kind, yet I wrote that one in one sitting. Apparently it dipped the well of communications dry.

I was impressed with the fact that few of the local members of the churches of Christ attended. I was told that they were warned not to come. Most of those who were present were "freedom fighters" who had struggled with the dogmatism and sterile orthodoxy of the institution and had wrenched themselves free. It was not yet time for people in general to get their eyes opened to the fact that they were being held as hostages to a System. That would come later. A goodly number of those who did come were self-styled "charismatics." I deplored the brand as a separatist title. It always appeared to me as being divisive in its very nature. Everyone who has a gift from God is charismatic, and that includes all. Among those who came was Ben Franklin, who was later to hold a debate with Guy N. Woods. The debate did but little good. It settled nothing. But the unity group at Tulsa was significant in that it brought together a group of saints who might not otherwise have met. They learned to listen to one another despite wide divergencies in their views.

Later, I went to the Lake Springfield Christian Assembly at Springfield, Illinois, to address a group of men. The camp was beautifully situated commanding a view of part of the lake. The brethren used it as a youth camp during the summer, and when September came, they availed themselves of the opportunity of getting together to talk over their problems and recount their victories. Generally they sought for speakers of reputation who could share with them new insights into the Word. I think that such gatherings are reminiscent of the pioneer culture of which we partook in our early years. People on the frontier felt an urge to come together to reinforce the faith, and to listen to a rehearsal of "those things most surely believed among us." It is a great loss that it becomes ever more difficult to get people to come to such meetings.

From there I went down to Cabool, Missouri in the Ozarks. It was an interesting place. It was a center of small farms from which came some of the 60,000 pounds of poultry per month, and the hundreds of cases of eggs shipped out every week. The Ozarks farmer does not try to conquer the wilderness. Instead, he makes friends with it. He is generally concerned with small plots of it that he can use for pasture and orchard. But chickens and eggs bring in the regular income. As the farmers say, "You can't rightly tell about fruit. Frost or blight is apt to get it. But not a hen. A hen works right on, rain or shine." Besides, the women can generally look after the chickens.

The congregation, like so many others in small areas, had been through some traumatic experiences. I sought to help them as much as I could. I was fortunate to have with me a dear brother and sister from Astoria, Illinois, Mr. and Mrs. Evan Price. Those who wished to do so gathered at a little restaurant daily and we talked and ate together, speaking quietly and meditatively together of our relationship to God through His marvelous grace.

I went next to Columbus, Indiana, where there are six thousand people who claim allegiance to Christ in the restoration movement. They are divided into several large congregations. I went to New Hope, which is just a short distance outside the city. The congregation dates way back in history. Immediately behind the meeting-house is an old cemetery, the markers of which indicate burials of many decades past. Daily I strolled through this hallowed spot where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep." The congregation is ably served by my good brother, Mat Malott. It was once primarily a gathering-place of rural people. Now it is growing in membership and is composed of many from the city as well as from nearby towns.

At Fairborn, Ohio a pleasant surprise awaited. The crowds were so large as to necessitate extra chairs in the aisles at night. The day sessions, which were open forums, brought in more than sixty persons. The questions were of special interest. The answers were eagerly received. It was in these daytime sessions that the greatest good was accomplished. One thing which impressed me was the similarity of the questions. Whether it was in a Christian Church or Church of Christ, whether in the city or in a rural setting, the same things troubled the people.

November 5, I went to Terre Haute, Indiana, at the invitation of the campus ministry, to deliver three addresses in a hall on the campus of the State University. It was a delightful occasion. I met with the Christian students early in the morning for prayer and Bible Study before the sun was up. An excellent audience was present each night, with brethren coming from far and near to be a part of the encounter. It was during this time I learned a great deal about Elton Trueblood and the "Yokefellow Movement" which he began. I was not too far from Richmond, Indiana. Trueblood credits C. S. Lewis with his conversion from a liberal theologian to a Christ-centered believer. In his autobiography he writes, "C. S. Lewis reached me primarily because he turned the intellectual tables."

It was about this time that a new journalistic enterprise began. It was devoted primarily to reaching Disciples of Christ, Independent Christian Churches, and Churches of Christ. It had three consulting editors, one drawn from each segment. It was aptly and significantly titled "Fellowship." Several issues were printed and they contained some meaty articles. But it never really got off the ground. I have often wondered why. I have come to the conclusion that it was because it represented the dream of a top echelon of men. No movement has ever marched which did not begin at the grass-roots level. A great many lesser, and much inferior, papers are being published in our day. And "Fellowship" seems to have been needed so much.

At Indiana University, Stanley McDaniel, who was a professor at College of the Redwoods in California, when we first met, made application to do his doctoral theme on "The Life and Preaching of W. Carl Ketcherside." Permission was granted and Stanley, who now teaches at Johnson Bible College, began collecting my materials. He did not neglect any source. The result is that he accumulated the largest body of my writings of anyone on earth. He listened to numerous tapes, besides reading every book and paper to which I had contributed. Finally, after several years he completed his thesis. I appreciate what he said, but I still wonder why the university agreed to allow it to be written about such an obscure personage.

I went next to address the annual banquet of the Eastern Lakeland Christian Campus Ministry at Charleston, Illinois. I felt while I was there that it was one of the most effective and best conducted of any such work I had seen. The students seemed to be gung-ho for Jesus. They were not Christians and students, but Christians who were students. There is a difference. The first think of their student life as separate from their Christian commitment; the second see it as merely a part of it. In my talk I sought to recapture for all their mission. They were "secret agents" for another kingdom. They were on enemy territory and in an alien land. They had been dropped behind the lines as commandos for Christ. They were on a search and rescue mission. They were members of the heavenly Central Intelligence Agency. Their allegiance was not to the school first but to their absent King. Someday He would return and rescue them from the asphalt jungle.

A short time before, the Humanist Society issued Humanist Manifesto Number Two. It was anything but complicated. It was a plain declaration of war against everything which I hold dear. It called for a freeing of the American mind from what it called the fear and dread of the supernatural. and predicted that by the year 2000, all forms of superstition and religion would pass from the scene. It was a calculated flinging down of the gauntlet in the face of those who believed that Jesus was the Son of God.

It was signed by a host of men and women who were regarded as the most erudite in our land. They were the instructors of thousands of our youth. Among them were a couple of professors at Indiana University. Recognizing the grave danger of raw humanism being dumped like raw sewage into the clear streams of thought, and realizing that it had already infiltrated our whole life structure, I welcomed the opportunity to appear on the campus of Indiana University at Bloomington, to discuss openly the implications of the manifesto.

I carefully studied the whole question until I was thoroughly conversant with its appeal to the modern scientific and technological mind. I became convinced that the inclination to place all things in the realm of relativity had laid the foundation of the theory in its modern form. So I sat down and worked out my presentation on a three-prong basis. (1) Where I agreed with humanism; (2) Where I disagreed with humanism; (3) My personal apology, in which I set forth the reasons for believing that the faith for which I make my plea is far superior to humanism. I gave a five point breakdown in developing the last. It was a privilege to be on a modern campus and to be brought into contact with some of the brilliant minds to be found there. Yet it was tragic to see how far the school had drifted since the days when David Starr Jordan was president of the institution.

I closed the year with the brethren at Washington, Illinois. They had invited me to come and speak on the theme, "Meeting Problems of Today's Youth." It was one of my favorite subjects and I was quick to accept the invitation. Reconstructing the year in my memory, it appeared to be one in which God had been rich in His abundant mercies. I had traveled all over the United States without undue incident. I had engaged in all kinds of encounters and had come out relatively unscathed. It was a great feeling to be used of God in so many different ways and for so many things. I faced the coming year with confidence in the divine mercy and compassion.

As 1834 drew to a close, Alexander Campbell wrote in *Millennial Harbinger, "We expect and hope to travel more than usual during the ensuing year, the Lord willing. On deciding the rival claims of numerous sections, we incline not to be arbitrary, and have nearly adopted this resolution— to be governed by the number of readers we have in various places, our experience hitherto proving that we can be most useful in those regions, because there is something to work upon in the minds of such communities." That said it for me also.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Jungle Fellowship

Contents

With the beginning of 1974 I knew that we had but two more years to edit the paper. We had resolved to discontinue Mission Messenger with the December issue of 1975. It had been a part of our lives for thirty-seven years. And it would be difficult to bid it farewell. There was never a time in all of those years that we were not conscious of it. We ate with the paper during the day and slept with it at night. We calculated time from one issue until the coming of the next.

For a long time I had been wanting to do a series of articles on pure speech. I was motivated in the desire by a statement of Alexander Campbell in his "Synopsis of Reformation." I could see that this was of prime importance. Accordingly, I commenced to write on the general theme. I started with a quotation from Joseph Addison in the British journal called The Spectator, which was born on March 1, 1711. I closed with the statement, "I want to be with all who are saved, and I expect to be. I care not one thing for any partisan flag over an exclusivistic rampart. My hope is in Christ Jesus. I began in the Spirit and I have no intention of trying to be made perfect in the flesh." The writings for 1974 were all gathered into a book called "Pure Speech."

It was our custom to bind about 2250 of the books each year. They have long since been sold, and seem to be even more popular now that they are out of print. It is my hope that they may continue to bear the message when I leave for worlds unknown.

My first trip in 1974 was one of great interest to me. For a number of years, missionaries from Independent Christian Churches had labored in Brazil. They had planted congregations in Brasilia, and at various other points throughout that great land. In more recent times Churches of Christ began to send in workers who tended to congregate in Sao Paulo, and to work out from there. Each of these with a common restoration heritage met for a combined conference. One year one group brought in a speaker, the following year the other group had the privilege of doing so. For several years the Christian Church brethren had been asking for the privilege of having me come. Each time they were told not to do so. I was dangerous; it was not time to have me yet. My thinking was too advanced to risk having me.

Finally, the brethren decided they were going to have me whether it was approved or not. The others said that if I came they were going to ask someone to come also. They selected Reuel Lemmons, editor of the Firm Foundation. We had never really been together, although both of us knew we should meet if possible. We had tried to do so once or twice without success. Brother Lemmons had been provoked into making an attack upon my position in his paper. I replied and three articles from each of us had appeared in both journals. He had written one entitled "Blind in One Eye," and I had also answered it. I had tried several times to get articles published in the Firm Foundation. Each time they were returned with a curt note saying that I was not welcome to write.

Realizing the influence of this fellow-editor I was anxious to meet him and to be with him. The circumstances were ideal. The camp, which had been rented from the Presbyterians, was carved out of the jungle. There was a kitchen and dining room at one end, and a circle of cabins, with a large assembly-hall at the other end. Brother Lemmons and I stayed in a very small unit together. In our bedroom we could reach out and touch each other from the bunks.

I learned a great deal about my companion while we were together. I am not sure he was as comfortable with the brethren from the Christian Churches as I was. But he was formally polite to all and gave no offense. He was brought there to do a job, and he did it, and that was it. I found him to be a mellifluous orator of the old school. Some of his presentations rivaled the best of William Jennings Bryan, "the golden voice of the Platte." This was especially true of the early morning devotionals in which we took turns speaking on one of the psalms. Since our visit I have had a longing to talk at length with Brother Lemmons about the community of saints in which we both share. There is no justifiable reason for us being apart. Certainly there is none for us appearing as enemies.

It would require too much space for me to describe all that took place in the jungle vastness, and I shall desist. It became apparent to me that the men who work there must find a solution to their problems or perpetuate among humble people a division which grew up on the frontiers of America. It is incredible that those who believe in the same Jesus, who worship the same God, who read the same Bible and sing the same songs, should project an image of alien churches upon the native minds. I worked with the young people, boys and girls who were children of the missionaries. Some of them came from remote Indian villages in the jungles of the Amazon. They were schooled by their mothers. We had a great time together.

I flew back to Saint Louis from Rio de Janeiro, in a frightful blizzard. We were bandied back and forth between airports where we were not permitted to land. We were flown to Dulles and not permitted to leave the plane. Finally we were cleared for landing at Kennedy in New York. I finally arrived in Saint Louis, having been for almost twenty-four hours without food. The next morning Nell suffered a blackout and fell with a thud in the bathroom. When I reached her I thought she was dying, from the look in her eyes. I called an ambulance and she was in the emergency room all day. They never determined the cause of the blackout, but she was in frightful pain for the ten days she stayed in the hospital, and had to be cared for when she returned home. I was glad that the providence of God brought me home when I was most needed.

It was about a month later I was scheduled to speak three times and conduct a workshop at the Christian Writers' Clinic, held at Holiday Inn North, in Cincinnati. It was a rich experience for me. The clinic was conducted by Standard Publishing. The editors of their various publications were all present, giving advice and sharing experiences with budding journalists. I have since met people all over the United States who have told me they met me there. They have expressed themselves as being appreciative of the encouragement they received. Some of them have since blossomed into authors and have brought me copies of their books. I never had the opportunity to attend such a school as I was growing up. I simply started writing down the thoughts which came to me in my moments of meditation. I never thought I would be an editor this long.

On March 7-9 I was in Kingsport, Tennessee. I stayed in the congenial home of Max E. Smith. We had a full schedule of meetings. I spoke three nights, conducted forums each morning, spoke at two luncheons, delivered three radio addresses and made two thirty minute television appearances. It was a blessing to me to be able to enjoy the hospitality of such a gracious home and the fellowship of such a fine band of disciples as I found there. I have often thought about how the sectarian spirit cheated me in not allowing me to know so many whom God loved and whom I also found it easy to love.

I was scheduled to be in Xenia, Ohio, April 3-5, and as I was flying into an airport some twenty miles away, I noticed the pilot was having a difficult time landing the plane. We were being buffeted by heavy winds. The sky outside was almost as black as night. When we got to the home of Bro. and Sister Jones where I was to stay, we learned that Xenia had experienced a frightful tornado and many homes, schools and churches had been wiped out. We hurried to the meetinghouse to find it had been turned into a rescue station. People came straggling in, dripping from the torrential rain which had followed the storm.

Some of the members had lost their homes. Included among them was Brother Isaac Flora, the minister. Many of those who came to the church building still had loved ones missing, in some cases buried in the debris. The women warmed up the chili which had been prepared for our lunch the next day. Coffee was made and thankfully received. Everyone had a tale to tell about how the storm swept in leaving devastation in its path. There were those who could not talk. The uncertainty numbed them. The tornado was one of scores which had harassed the country on that frightful day. Our meeting was cancelled and the city began the monumental task of cleaning away the rubble in preparation for rebuilding. It was a tragic thing.

I went next to Los Angeles to make a special film with the Vernon Brothers. It was made at Warner Studios. They had been making "Homestead, U.S.A." which featured their birthplace and home in the Ozarks. It was a successful presentation. The four brothers formed a real quartet. All of them had married wives who were singers and who had a quartet of their own. Then the children followed in the footsteps of the parents, and they could form almost any kind of combination of voices. They did an excellent job of sending forth the message on wings of song. Best of all, they did not strive to make it by their distinctiveness. They just got up and sang their heads off, and that was distinctive enough in our day. Besides that, all four of the boys were preachers and they could exhort and encourage their listeners to be faithful.

You will recall that it was the Vernon Brothers who led singing for me and did special numbers years before, when I was at Lakewood, California where Ernest Beam was serving when he died. I was there at the invitation of his successor, the inimitable William Jessup, who will never receive enough honor in this world to repay his noble efforts in behalf of the unity of the believers. It was great to be reunited with the brothers again. We used the old Roy Rogers set and present on the program with us was Dale Evans (Rogers), his wife. I was able to talk with her frequently during the long day of filming and I came to admire her a great deal. She told me of their desire to have children and how they had adopted so many of all races.

The night before I had spoken at Westchester to a full house. It was served by one of my favorite people on earth, Harold Thomas. He succeeded Bill Banowsky, who had resigned to become president of Pepperdine University. Harold had been a real pioneer, a trailblazer in the northeast, especially in Maine. He and his good wife were great souls, addicted to the kingdom, willing to make themselves vulnerable for the sake of Jesus. In the same congregation was Harry Robert Fox, Sr., who, with his family had spent so many years in Japan, beloved by the native peoples. I already knew Harry Robert, Jr., and Logan, both of whom were possessed of a fabulous knowledge of the Word. It was a rare privilege to see their revered father.

On May 9, I delivered the baccalaureate address for the graduating class at Cincinnati Bible Seminary, and the next week was in a meeting at Amarillo, Texas. It was my first time to actually conduct a series for brethren who had always opposed the Sunday School. Some of the brethren were a little skeptical of my coming. The preacher was David Sullins, a unique and precious brother. I stayed in his home. Dave had been in Germany during the war, charged with the repair of the motor vehicles for a contingent of motorized cavalry stationed near Berchtesgaden, the mountain retreat of Adolf Hitler, about ten miles from Salzburg. He had fallen in love with an attractive German girl and they married. It was fun attempting to "sprechen sie Deutsch" with her, especially since I only remembered from my childhood, the little warning taught all children:

Messer, glauber, schare, und licht,

Ist for kleine kinder nicht.

But we had a great meeting and talked about what God expected of all of us in this age. I went back once again for another meeting and found the brethren able to work across the lines with those who did not agree with them.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

People and Places

Contents

One of the outstanding gatherings of men in the United States is the Cavalier Men's Retreat in Virginia. I have now spoken there three times. When I went in 1974 it was held at Oak Hill Christian Assembly grounds, just outside of Richmond. Now it meets some seventy miles away, near the little village of Yale. There were 460 men present the first time I was there. Now it consistently attracts more than 500. Campers are parked all over the hillside and tents pitched throughout the pines. It is a strictly "come as you are event" and no one dresses up for it. The music is under the direction of "The Gospel Lads," who direct audience participation as well as render specials. Those who attend go back home refreshed in spirit, and ready to try and remove mountains for the Master. It is truly an inspirational something.

I flew next to Saskatoon, where brethren met me and took me way south to Macrorie. Here it is that a kind of wilderness camp has been carved out by the brethren. Room has been made in a deep valley for the pitching of tents and the parking of camping vehicles. A tractor stands by to snake the cars out in case of rain. Brethren come from all over Canada and part of the United States. All eat breakfast together. At noon camp stoves and campfires are going all over the place as every family prepares for itself. There are meetings in the morning and evening, the latter generally around a fire which is needed occasionally when the sun goes down. The pace of life is slow and relaxing with the afternoon given over to games in which anyone may feel free to participate.

During the light refreshment period at night, choruses are sung over the dying embers. The young people are exceptionally good singers, and the wooded hills resound to the sound of their voices. Cecil Bailey, from Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Harold Fox, from Malta, Montana, were the other two speakers. I was endeared to them by their seriousness of purpose and their love for the Word of God. I spoke analytically on the Ephesian Letter. It was hard to bid each other goodbye when the time of separation arrived.

I had to hurry back to the states in order to get to the School of the Ministry, an annual feature conducted at Milligan College in Tennessee. Milligan is a famous school because of its origin and its setting. It is one of the loveliest places in the world. I joined Knofel Staton, Mildred Phillips and Olin Hays on the program. The entire Vernon family was present and regularly provided us with superb music. I came to believe that Knofel Staton was one of the most capable men in the restoration movement in our day. Young and vigorous, he was also filled with knowledge. He talked about marriage and I thought I had never heard another series to equal it. Sister Phillips was excellent in her presentation of personalities she had known in the restoration movement. She is the daughter of the late P. H. Welshimer of Canton, Ohio, whose name has already become legendary. Brother Hays was also in his usual excellent form. It provided a good time for all.

It was about this time I learned that in England, Carlton Melling, who had been gradually losing his sight, resigned as editor of the *Scripture Standard. He was succeeded by the efficient James Gardiner of Edinburgh. The paper was once under the editorship of Walter Crosthwaite, so during my lifetime had been blessed by three dedicated men, capable and scholarly. It was good to realize that it had been entrusted to good hands.

The war had made a greater impact upon the British brethren than they had at first realized. Those who lived in Scotland, England and Wales, were all pacifists. During my two trips among them I found only two men who believed it was right for a Christian to bear arms in defense of his country. During World War I they had suffered indescribable physical torture because of their conscience on the matter. They had been thrown into prison and starved on bread and water. Some of them always bore the marks of their suffering.

But World War II brought among them a different breed, men from the United States, some of them in uniform, some of them conscientious objectors, but who tried never to allow anything to interfere with their devotion to the Lord. These men, and some of their contemporaries, went back to Europe after the hostilities had ceased, taking with them American ideas and methods of evangelism. In Italy, Finland, Germany, France, the Netherlands, and even behind the Iron Curtain, as well as in England, they planted congregations of believers. Neither group was as tolerant of the other as they might have been. Challenges were issued to debate, and to all intents and purposes, a divided group of believers was the result. At present it appears that both sides continue in a kind of suspended animation, watching each other, talking about each other, but seldom talking to one another. A new paper has been started, and there has been a sad polarization.

September 13, 14 I went to the Men's Retreat at Round Lake Christian Assembly, in Ohio. There were 601 men registered for the occasion. Don DeWelt was the other speaker, and he did a masterful job. Many years ago, when we first began to try and bring some degree of understanding and tolerance into an area where hostility had always raged, Leroy Garrett and I met with Don and Seth Wilson at Nowata, Oklahoma, in an epoch-making forum which was conducted openly and fairly. My brother Paul presided over it. At the time I came to have a deep appreciation for the men whose position we opposed. We have grown closer together through the years.

Don has taught at Ozark Bible College for years. He has always been an advocate of intense evangelism coupled with nurture in the Word. He has published a whole series of books devoted to helping men understand and teach the Word of God. One of his most noted accomplishments was that of bringing back the entire set of Campbell's Harbinger. His latest feat has been the returning to print of the periodicals by Walter Scott, with "The Voice of the Golden Oracle" as the final volume. I consider it one of the greatest volumes I have ever read. Don's method of public presentation is unique. One of the blessings of it comes from his ability to carry on a conversation with himself. It was a great blessing to me to be associated with him. The men all loved him!

Four days later I went to Hanover, New Mexico. To get there, it was necessary to fly to Albuquerque, and take a small commuter plane which flew by way of Truth or Consequences. We landed at Silver City, which was founded in 1870 to mine the gold and silver ores in the foothills of the Mogollon Mountains. Although the supply of these precious metals is about exhausted, copper mining has displaced the work of digging them out. It is thriving. The little town of Hanover lies in sight of a copper mine. The handful of saints meeting there were precious in their faith. The sisters brought lunch and we ate together at noon and again at night after the meetings. The Mexican-flavored food was super. We lingered on in the company of each other, unwilling to break the magic spell of fellowship which engulfed us all in its embrace.

Al Botts, who had been successful in forging a career in the Far West, had returned to Silver City, where he was engaged in his trade, while preaching for the little band of saints. He was not caught in the sectarian noose at all, and extended the love of Christ to all who deserved it. I was refreshed greatly by the simplicity of life in this remote village which was literally "the end of the trail." Ghost towns and abandoned mining villages dot the mountains. Owls fly in and out of deserted houses. Coyotes make their dens under the ruins of old taverns which once echoed to raucous laughter. But there is nothing ghostly about the fellowship of the saints. It is genuine.

The following month I went to Solsberry, Indiana, where James Root ministered. He had been a successful newspaper editor, but an inner gnawing had driven him to become a preacher of the Word. So he left the desk and went out "not knowing wither he went." He was never able to divorce himself completely from his former vocation. One who has smelled printer's ink never is. So he continued to report the news and do book reviews for the paper, but his work for Christ became very challenging and satisfying. Fortunately, he was not caught up in a lot of the political strivings which seem to be part of the religious establishment. So he and the little band of saints were making progress. This was evidenced in the capacity crowds which attended the meetings. The house was filled every night.

It was while I was there that I came to realize the urbanization of our culture and the words of Jacques Ellul struck me with full force. He said, "We are in the city even when we are in the country for today the country (and soon this will be true of the immense Asian steppe) is only an annex of the city." Solsberry had once been a quiet Hoosier village. The old country store was still there. It stocked everything from horse collars to kerosene lamps. You could still buy an ice cream cone for a nickel. There was a bench behind the stove where "the spit and argue club used to meet." But times had changed. The village was now the bedroom of the city. Every morning people arose from their sleep and headed for the city to work. Some of them were on split shifts. Times had changed and were still changing before our very eyes.

My next work was in Saint Louis, Michigan, where a congregation was thriving under the direction of Henry MacAdams. We had been together years before near South Bend, Indiana. It was good to see him again. He was loved by the people and respected in the community. I was pleased to see brethren from several wings of the non-instrument group come. Some of them were ill at ease at first, walking gingerly as if treading upon forbidden ground. But they were soon listening quite calmly and were resigned to the fact of where they were.

I went next to Beaverton, Oregon. Donald S. Cox was the minister, and I had the great privilege of staying in his wonderful home. Don is man intent upon following God's leading as he understands it. He has a tremendous grasp of the sacred scriptures and a sense of the relevance of the good news to our present age. He is an excellent administrator, but seeks to lead the flock gently home. It was a tremendous blessing to be associated with him.

On August 9, Richard M. Nixon became the first president of these United States to resign from office. The day before he had made his farewell address to the nation admitting only to poor judgment. I had defended him until a few days before. When I became convinced that he was no longer speaking the truth I could not speak up for him. I was greatly disappointed. It seems incredible that a man who had held religious services in the White House could deceive the people of our land. But I was glad when the Watergate ordeal was over and Gerald Ford took office. I think he made a grave error in political judgment when, on September 8, he announced that he had unconditionally pardoned his predecessor for all crimes against the United States he "has committed or may have committed." I do not think the public was ready for this and I do not think his reasons for doing it were all that logical.

It was December 19 before both Houses of Congress gave a majority vote of approval to Nelson Rockefeller as vice president. This came only after a lengthy and full investigation of the sources and use of his colossal wealth. For the first time the country had an unelected President and Vice President. Meanwhile two famous show personalities died after years on radio and television. Ed Sullivan passed away in New York on October 13, and Jack Benny died in Beverly Hills, California on December 26. The first was 73, the second was 80 years of age.

Change and decay were upon every hand. The small and the great were all subject to it. But it was a blessing to be in one whom it could not affect. It was with faith in Him I began what was to be the final year of publication of the *Mission Messenger.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Diverse Ministries

Contents

Before I get too far from it, I must tell you about the Thanksgiving Workshop of Evangelicals for Social Action, in which I was invited to participate as a delegate. It was held in the Downtown Y.M.C.A. in Chicago and lasted for three days. There were two men from the independent Christian Churches and one other from the Churches of Christ, Vic Hunter, who had been editor of Mission but had just resigned. It was interesting to listen to those who had been invited to speak in behalf of various groups, blacks, Orientals, and Hispanic. Some of the most fervent oratory was poured forth in behalf of a majority group in our society— women!

Among those who impressed me most were Paul Rees, Tong Gaw, and Carl F. H. Henry. The latter delivered one of the finest speeches I had ever heard. Leaving all theory aside he went straight to the Bible, and made it come alive. He seemed to be a master of the art of exposition. He developed the parable of the injured man on the road to Jericho in a truly new and exciting way. I liked the calm fashion in which he reacted to the questions and feedback which grew out of his speech. He was firm without being stubborn, practical without being pushy.

In looking back now upon the year I am describing, I find another thing which brought great satisfaction to Nell and me. I had made it a practice, when I sold enough books to pay for the printing, to start giving the remainder away to college students absolutely free. We even paid the cost of wrapping and postage. In seven years we gave away over 4200 volumes. The postage alone was a little more than fifteen hundred dollars. No one who wrote was turned down provided he personally requested the book. We refused to send them to young people at the request of preachers or parents. We did not want those who received them to feel obligated to read them. We did not propose to thrust anything down unwilling gullets. The books went to every continent. We mailed them to Cambridge, Oxford, the University of Leeds, and various other schools in England. We sent them to universities in Lebanon, Egypt, Taiwan, Amsterdam, Germany and South Africa. It was a real joy to get letters with odd-looking stamps and quaint handwriting asking for one of the books. It helped to show the circulation range of our little paper.

We were not even launched into the New Year when I received word of the death of longtime friends. M. S. Whitehead, one of the original students at the old Alabama Christian College, when G. A. Dunn was president, and the college was located at Berry, many years ago. We had become real friends. Harry Robert Fox, Sr., the gentle missionary who planted the cause so firmly in Japan, and who finally retired to Inglewood, California. He wrote me such encouraging and stimulating letters, never complaining about his own increasing age and infirmities. Elizabeth Vermilion, of Riverside, California. I used to stay at their house in Springfield, Missouri, when I was known as "the boy preacher." I played with her sons until they had to summon me into the house to get ready for evening meetings. John Hasty, the dyed-in-the-wool Republican of Nixa, Missouri. He lived to the age of 94, always kind and considerate of others. These all died in the faith, having seen the promises and embraced them afar off.

I returned to Westchester, California, the second week of the New Year. The meeting was kind of outstanding. Each night a different group sang. One night the whole Pepperdine University Chorus was there. Another night, the black choir from Figueroa Boulevard Church of Christ was present. A children's group from a day school was present one night, and still another group from Westchester. These all harmonized a half hour before the preaching began. Every night there were people present from 36 to 53 congregations. It was like old home week. Harold Thomas presided over the meetings. Those of you who have heard him know what an outstanding job he does. I spoke one day for the Southern California Christian ministers, and another for the faculty meeting at Pepperdine.

I went from there to Macomb, Illinois, to visit the campus work which was being carried on under the versatile and capable direction of John Derry at Western Illinois University. This was the thing I liked to do best. It was a real thrill to engage in a dialogue session with young people of college age. Their questions were not stereotyped. They were new, fresh and vibrant. And they demanded answers to the problems of life. A good many students seemed jaded, tired and fed up with the daily routine. I noticed that those who had come to know Jesus did not seem to fit into the groove chopped out for the "average student." Generally, they were a cut above, having added a spiritual dimension to life. And John was doing a good job in helping them to take full advantage of their new perspective.

I found a relatively small non-instrumental congregation in Macomb. Several of the members were connected with the college in the role of instructors. I sought to get them to begin clearing the ground for accomplishing some things together with brethren in the Christian Church. Their common historical roots could nourish them both. One thing I recommended was that they take turns holding their midweek Bible studies together. To me, it seemed a shame to have a mere handful of people studying in each place when they could combine for one night a week with no compromise of convictions.

The first of February found me at the World Convention of Missions at Grand Junction, Colorado. It was sponsored by Intermountain Christian College. Both the college and the convention were the fruition of the dream of Erskine Scates, the president of the school. Always an ardent advocate of sharing the Good News with the poverty-stricken people of the universe, he arranged the annual convention to inform and alert the inhabitants of the fertile Colorado Valley of the needs of the regions beyond. He has now departed to be with Jesus but he has left his sons to put wings to his words and feet to his prayers.

I had been in correspondence with Al B. Nelson, a long-time instructor at Texas A&M University, at College Station, about coming to Bryan, Texas. We had agreed upon February 19-21 as the date. The little Christian Church there had been beset by difficulties of one kind and another, and it was a pleasure to go and proclaim the good news of peace. I was agreeably surprised to see a goodly number of brethren from the Churches of Christ present, and although they tended not to agree upon some of my answers to certain questions, that was to be expected. I tried never to trim my response to please the querist, but to answer in such a manner that I would be willing to give an account if it was the last thing I ever said. I was also perfectly content to do as Martin Luther said, "Give men time." We did not arrive at our present state in one day, nor would we get out of our predicament by sunset.

I made my home with Brother and Sister Nelson, and it was a lovely and quiet place. As we breakfasted together I could look out on the rear courtyard where Sister Nelson kept the birds well supplied with an "avian smorgasbord." Some of them were so tame and had been regular customers for so long they would go up on the windowsill and watch us as we ate. Brother Nelson and I wasted no time. It was a literary blessing for me to be with one who knew Texas so well, and we talked about two realms— heaven and the Lone Star State— without stopping.

I went next to Lake Wales, Florida, for the Lake Aurora Christian Assembly meeting. Brethren reported later that it was the largest in attendance of any Men's Retreat they had ever held. I spoke three times and held open forums for questions twice. The questions were especially good. The men had gravitated to Florida from every part of the north. They brought with them the sectional bias of each area, and they wanted to know the truth about their views. I pointed out that every movement begun by men to unite the believers inevitably passes through the same sequence— charity, innovation, debate, division, sectarianism, and charity again. This starts the whole process over. We are just now emerging from our period of hibernation in the deep freeze of sectarianism. It is difficult for us to be charitable. We are afraid of going too far, of denying what our parents fought to achieve. But our parents were not perfect and a lot of things which they willed us are questionable. We need not fear being lost at sea as long as we cling to the Rock. Jesus Christ is Lord. If we steer by Him instead of by history we will be safe.

At Lexington, Ohio, I was scheduled to speak on three themes which were particularly relevant to our times: "Do Demons Inhabit the Bodies of Men Today?"; "Can the Planets Decide Our Fate?"; and "Resurrection and the Life Beyond." These were on everyone's mind because of "The Exorcist." The house was filled for every service and more than a hundred gathered for the question periods each day. It was a real blessing to be associated with such generous, warmhearted saints, and I thrilled to their companionship in the Lord Jesus.

I had been issued an invitation to speak at the International Convention of Christian Endeavor which was to be held at Portland. More than a thousand persons were in attendance. After I addressed the entire group they split into two equal sections and I met with about 500 of them to answer questions about the faith in Christ Jesus. There were a good many delegates from foreign countries. As a result of speaking for the gathering I have three times been invited to address the Easter Sunrise Service which they sponsor in one of the most beautiful parks in Saint Louis. It attracts some 2500 persons.

I went next to Bloomington, Minnesota where I spoke to the congregation of which Robert Cash is the able minister. Fortunately, it was far enough to the north that the party spirit did not prevail with the same bitterness and intensity in which it is found farther to the south. As a result we had in attendance a great number of Church of Christ brethren. This always makes the question forums of particular interest. Both sides tend to ask about things of which the others have not the faintest inkling of knowledge. Because of their long years of isolation and insulation, both have accepted their own distinctives.

April 23-25 found me at the Colony Heights congregation in Fort Wayne, Indiana, with George L. Shull. It had been a long time since I had been in Fort Wayne. I had made three trips there previously. I found a town which had known the impact of change. The men who had been laboring there when I had originally visited were all gone. But Jesus was there alive and well. It was interesting to see how He could adapt to various circumstances and conditions, and influence them.

Less than two weeks later I was in Lansing, Michigan, for the State Christian Convention. This made it possible for me to meet a great many good friends I had made through the years. Michigan was always very interesting to me. It was in Detroit that Brother Malcolmson, an elder who had come over from Scotland to become wealthy in the coal importing business, had staked Henry Ford to his first $50,000 when Ford was beginning to experiment with his motor vehicle. Ford used to attend services with him. Legend has it that he immersed Ford. They had no preacher for they were staunch believers in mutual ministry. Malcolmson spoke on the theme once at the Abilene Christian College lectureship. It was a masterful address.

In 1856, Isaac Errett left Warren, Ohio, with a group interested in the lumber business. He had to travel by stage from Detroit far back into the timber country. The business failed and Errett started planting churches instead of cutting down trees. He brought about 1000 new members into the body before leaving for Cleveland to edit the Christian Standard. Before he left he was under fire for a sign on his door which read "Rev." Isaac Errett. He was the first man in the Restoration Movement to adopt a title. I went to Michigan with a lot of history behind me. I tried to make a little while I was there.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

The Wonders of Koinonia

Contents

As the time drew near for the announced demise of Mission Messenger, we were besieged by offers to take it over and continue it. A good many of these offered to continue it in the manner to which it had been accustomed. I steadfastly refused all of these. It was my contention that no one else could edit the paper as I had done. Thirty-seven years of trial and error had stamped it with the impress of my personality and thought. It was a baby which Nell and I had conceived and to which we had given birth. It was a part of us. The transfer of it to another was as unthinkable as it would have been to give one of our grandchildren to someone else to raise.

When that did not work we kept getting offers to buy our mailing list. It was just under ten thousand and consisted of many who had already been introduced to buying books by mail. I stubbornly refused to sell it. It seemed to me it would be a complete betrayal of trust. Those who sent a subscription want the paper. They did not want to receive a fistful of mail every day advertising everything from neckties to cheese. When I announced that the mailing list was not for sale, I was told that everyone else was doing it. Some even became a little huffy and sarcastic. But none of these things moved me and we quit with our list— and our honor— intact.

Of course, a great many who lamented our planned discontinuance wrote begging us to continue. This was especially true of those who had recently started to read the little journal and wanted to absorb more of my thinking. It was also the case with those who had been subscribers from the beginning. It had been like one of the family to them. I wrote them all, thanking them for their confidence, but telling them that I wanted the paper to die in my arms and lay it gently to rest. I did not want to see it go out with its back against the wall and the baying hounds moving in for the kill. A great many editors have continued too long and have done as much damage in their final few years as they did good in all of the previous decades of their writing.

Besides that, I had a lot of reading I wanted to do, and a lot of personal work that I wanted to perform. There were miles to go before I could sleep. There had always been certain inhibitions created by having to get out the paper. I felt that when I mailed out the last issue and laid down the pen it would give me a sense of freedom I had not known for years. But meanwhile I was in the final year and I made some serious and far-reaching suggestions to the brethren which would get us off the sectarian hook on which we had impaled ourselves. These were all bound together in the book "One in Christ." It has long ago sold out.

In August of 1975, I went to the congregation at New Liberty, near Windsor, Illinois for their centennial. It was a beautiful old meetinghouse out in the country. I had held meetings there when I was just coming into manhood. I had baptized scores of people in the nearby Kakaskia River. It was only about three miles from Sand Creek, where Daniel Sommer had read his fateful Address and Declaration which started us down the long road of fighting and division. Only eternity will reveal the cost of the strife which began with that lethal dose. When I first went to the area I was not only a victim, but an actual practitioner of the sectarian spirit. Now I rejoiced to see the descendants of those who had sued each other in the courts sitting together in heavenly places.

Less than a week later I was back at a family camp in Mechanicsville, near Richmond, Virginia. I delivered four addresses which were entitled: "Can the Home Survive the Shock?"; "How to Keep From Coming Unglued"; "Who Is Raising Whom These Days?"; and "Darling, You Are Growing Old." I ran the entire gamut of life experiences from the purpose of the home through marriage, parenthood and old age. It was easy to talk to those who were eager to listen and we rejoiced to be with each other in the Lord.

I went next to the Area Men's Meeting in Chicago. It was great to be back with the men who worked in the city which Carl Sandburg called "Hog Butcher of the World, Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat." I went over to visit the inner city work. It was doing good but I came away with a feeling that culturally we are ill-adapted as a people to penetrate the hard shell of the city. There are no doubt enough people in Chicago from a restoration movement background to make a congregation many times the size of any we have there. But they are hiding. They are running from themselves. Our rural, Southern-oriented, social culture and life-style has not equipped us to face the problems of a black, Oriental and Southern European conglomeration. It was great to talk and visit and eat with men who had accepted Satan's dare. But it was obvious that we needed a radical reformation, one that cut to the bone.

My very next work was a totally different kind. I was with the Northland Christian Church in Danville, Illinois. The congregation had a lovely structure in which to meet, and was composed of good middle-class Americans. It was a distinct change from the drug-pushing, prostitute-ridden, gang-harassed Chicago streets. It made me feel the force of "East is east and West is west, and never the twain shall meet." I will confess that this has been a source of a lot of anxiety to me. I have always held that the blood of Jesus will cleanse anyone regardless of how filthy, dirty and scabby his sins may have made him. I have an almost unconquerable urge to button-hole people on the streets and tell them about the grace of God. I'm drawn by a deep inner compulsion, a sense of destiny, a real deep-down feeling that makes me want to go down highways and alleys and compel them to come in.

Next I went to Orrville, Ohio. If you do not know, this is the home of Smucker's— the jam people. Years ago the German family of Smucker began making apple butter on a small scale for sale to the neighbors. As time went on their fame spread and their business grew in Ohio like that of Walter Knott had in California. Now they produce thousands of tons of fruit, as well as making sorghum, honey and peanut butter. They have become "jam merchants to the world." Several of the members worked for them. The Smuckers had Anabaptist roots and this is evidenced in the town. It is a lovely and clean place, like German-oriented towns often are. Kenneth Baldwin ministered to a congregation of gracious and diversified folk.

The following week I was in Flora, Illinois to address the Southern Illinois Christian Convention. The town was named after the Roman goddess of flowers, whose festival, the Floralia, was inaugurated in Rome 250 years before Jesus was born. The meetings were held at First Christian Church which has in excess of 1250 members. I taught an afternoon workshop and spoke at night. The auditorium was filled to capacity.

I went next to Piqua, Ohio, which has a history reaching back before we gained our freedom from English domination. In 1749 a fort and trading post were established here. The town was incorporated as Washington in 1807, the same year Thomas Campbell left Ireland for America on the good ship Brutus. The name of the town was changed to Piqua in 1823. Dave Huddlestun was working with the congregation while I was there with the brethren.

It was while I was there I met Dr. Marcus Miller. He had just written a book "Roots By the River." He sent me a copy. I devoured it. I read it with such avidity I could hardly put it down until I had read every word of it. The preface begins with these words: "This is a commentary and a history of the Tunkers or the Old German Baptist Brethren who settled in the upper Great Miami and Stillwater Valleys of Ohio. It attempts to reveal a little of the personalities and human nature of those who lived in these valleys, a little of the physical and a little of the spiritual sufferings which they encountered, and a little of the thinking that went into some of the courses which they chose to take."

The book details the divisions which beset the "old Brethren." Like ourselves they were caught up in the frightful tensions which tore at a movement that was far removed from the social climate of ancient Judea, and like ourselves they had their "progressives" and "Faithful Brethren." They had problems with protracted or revival meetings, with Sunday Schools and with Social Meetings. They resisted bitterly a "salaried or paid ministry which was believed to be against the apostolic order." They had problems with the bicycle which was designated "a modern invention, popular in the world and creeping into the church." In 1925 they wrestled with the radio, and later with television as "an influence for evil." One of the biggest hassles was over the starting of Christian schools. Another was over the introduction of the automobile. Hours were spent in denouncing Ford and Chevrolet for leading us down a road with no ending. As I read this interesting volume, I could see our own movement on almost every page of this much older and more venerable attempt to "restore the primitive order." I was deeply indebted to Dr. Miller who still wears the "plain clothes" including the coat with the standing collar.

Incidentally, the Dunkard Brethren, in 1911, reached a dress decision which has been binding ever since. It includes the following statement: "That the brethren wear their hair and beard in a plain and sanitary manner. That the mustache alone is forbidden. Parting the hair in the middle or combing it straight back is recommended for both brethren and sisters." The Dunkard Brethren should not be confused with the Old Order German Baptist Brethren. They have a common origin, but there have arisen differences which have driven them apart. Does that sound familiar to you?

My next trip was to Meadville, Pennsylvania. I found the congregation meeting a couple of blocks from the campus of Allegheny College. The college was started in 1815 and chartered in 1817. It was loosely affiliated with the Methodist Church and was noted for its library of 140,000 volumes. Ida M. Tarbell, who was a native of Erie County, had written "A Life of Abraham Lincoln" in 1900. In preparing for it she amassed a tremendous collection of Lincolniana which she left to the school. I went to the campus and was walking across it when I heard my name called. I was surprised to see a man whom I knew. He had grown up in the Churches of Christ but had long since gone to the Disciples of Christ. He was head of a department at the school. We felt that it was providential that I just happened to be walking across the campus so we could meet.

There were several brethren from the non-instrumental congregations who attended the meetings. Some came from as far away as Youngstown, Ohio. The auditorium was filled each night and we had a glorious time. Nothing marred our kinship with one another and the fellowship was unabated. I stayed with Brother and Sister Hessler and it was truly "a home away from home." After the meetings at night a group of brethren would go with us to the hospitable home, and we would talk until almost midnight.

I have thought a lot about the wonders of koinonia. As William Barclay says, it is such a rich word that no single English term can describe it. It literally means "to share a common life." The New English Version so renders it every time it occurs. But the common life we share is that of the Spirit. It is not just putting up with one another, or enduring each other. It is at once so beautiful and thrilling that nothing else can ever take its place in the association of Christians. I think it was one of the grandest things that God ever did for us, the providing of a relationship that is so intimate and full it transcends our differences.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Mormons and Jews

Contents

Nell and I received a blow when we learned of the almost sudden death of Brother Melvin Burton at Escondido, California. We had known Melvin and Gladys most of their lives. They moved to Saint Louis shortly after we did and our families grew up together. Their son Curtis married our daughter Sue. Bro. Burton had served until retirement in the criminal investigation division of the Internal Revenue Service. He had helped to close the case against Tom Pendergast, the racketeering boss of Missouri, and had worked on the Al Capone case in Chicago. When he retired he was honored by the President of the United States as well as by many others in the political spectrum. There was never a breath of scandal against him.

In Oct., 1975, the Saint Louis Realtors' Association decided to have a prayer breakfast. It was to become an annual event if it was successful. They asked me to speak at it. A great deal depended upon the reaction. It was at 6:30 in the morning at a prominent hotel. Many of those who came had been "out on the town" the night before. A great many were smoking cigarettes as if their life depended on it, rather than the opposite. The president was a consecrated Christian gentleman. After breakfast he made a few remarks, led a prayer for God's guidance, and introduced me. I have never before felt the same nearness of the Spirit. I spoke about 18 minutes. After the first five the attention was riveted. At the close there was a standing ovation. I am glad to report that the prayer breakfast is a regular thing now.

I was invited to come next to the Kentucky State Teen Convention at Lexington. It was great to see the hundreds of youthful Christians gathering for the occasion. The singing was rousing, the spirit encouraging and the atmosphere was excellent. It gave me a great thrill to touch so many lives while they were still in the dewy freshness of young manhood and womanhood. The courage, faith and hope of such people is a tremendous source of strength to me.

I went from there to Canada to the Ontario Christian Seminary. The president was Alan Larue. I had first met him years ago at a little rural congregation in Ohio. He was always a man of vision and foresight. He had gone to Toronto and built the school up to its present rating. It was a brilliant move. Toronto, an Indian name meaning "a place of meeting," was already the second city in Canada, in point of population. It had just begun to expand. A great medical, museum and musical center, it was also the home of Toronto University, one of the great educational centers of our day. The city was small in number, but had an impact beyond its size. It was great to be able to talk with the students between sessions and to share in their plans and ambitions.

December 3-5 found me at Wickliffe, Ohio. Here I was permitted to be with Jack Ashworth, who previously labored with the Church of Christ, but who had been delivered from a lot of the sectarian hang-ups. Because of the freedom and openness of the congregation it was under suspicion by many others in the general Cleveland area. The very first morning six of the preachers came together to question me. Just as soon as I announced we were ready for queries from the audience they "hogged the show" and sought to dominate the proceedings. It was rather interesting. They followed the pattern I have seen so often. One would ask a leading question, and the other would have his hand in the air before I answered it. They laid down a barrage of questions but fortunately I had heard all of them before, many times.

One of the most interesting features about this kind of tactic which I have experienced so often is the reaction upon those who attend my meetings and who did not grow up in an exclusivistic Church of Christ atmosphere. They can hardly believe their ears. In most cases the questioners keep an eye on their watches and about five minutes before quitting time "they fold their tents like the Arabs, and as silently steal away." When they leave, someone is almost certain to burst out with, "Who in the world are those men, and what do they represent?" Of course, these men cannot eat luncheon in the meetinghouse, so they never meet people informally and personally. They can only hit and run, so they appear cowardly to those who cannot understand either their purpose or their method of trying to attain it. The sectarian spirit makes cowards of men who ought to be brave.

Since Kirtland was quite close, I was eager to go over and see this place which Joseph Smith made quite famous. It was very near the home of Sidney Rigdon, who was a Baptist preacher at Mentor originally. He was an eloquent man who was led into what was called "the current reformation" by Alexander Campbell, after an all night talk on the front porch at Bethany. He became very close to Campbell, even traveling with him by horseback to Washington, Kentucky, to take notes on the debate with McCalla.

Rigdon was led into Mormonism by Parley P. Pratt, who with his brother Orson, was another defector from the Campbell movement. Rigdon had a profound effect upon the developing Mormon faith and is credited with a lot of the theology which became part of it. He expected to become its head, succeeding Smith, who was shot to death in the jail at Nauvoo, Illinois, by enraged citizens who resented his ambitious attitude and his taking of other wives. But he was shouldered aside by Brigham Young, and at the age of sixty returned a broken man to his boyhood home in Friendship, New York. Here he worked as a shingle-packer, disillusioned and upset, referring to himself as an "exile."

The "saints" as they refer to themselves, built a "temple" in Kirtland. It is still maintained by the "Reorganized Church" of Independence, Missouri, one of the five branches into which the movement separated. The caretakers and guides try to make it appear that the blueprint was inspired and the Lord acted as foreman in its erection. It is evident that this is only part of the myth of which the whole false system has been constructed. It has been built into one of the most cleverly-contrived fabrications ever devised to fool and deceive an unsuspecting world.

On two consecutive Tuesdays in December I was scheduled to be the speaker at the Messianic Forum luncheon in Saint Louis. These are held every Tuesday at noon at the Downtown Holiday Inn. They began on May 14, 1948, the day that Israel became a nation, following a resolution by the United Nations General Assembly, on Nov. 29, 1947. This called for an end to the British Mandate for Palestine which had been established by the League of Nations in 1922. I have now spoken about 36 times to the group, which is attended by Jews with a great deal of love for Jerusalem. Some of these are believers in Jesus, but a great many are opposed to him. They are held together by a mutual love for Israel, although their reasons for that love differ widely. I have been privileged to meet teachers and writers exiled from Russia, as well as presidents of large manufacturing concerns, and persons from every walk of life. The most versatile and articulate presentation I have ever heard in answer to my presentation about the Lordship of Jesus, was made by a manufacturer of men's pants.

Once I was invited to speak by the United Jewish Men of Saint Louis. I appeared with a popular and respected rabbi, who presented counter-arguments to my contention that Jesus was the Messiah. There were 800 men present for the dinner and program which followed. The thing which impressed me was the number of Jews who were humanists. The rabbi was in almost as much trouble as I was. The question period lasted an hour and he was attacked for his belief in the existence of God about as severely as I was for urging that Jesus was His Son.

The last event of the year was the Saint Louis Forum. This had always been an honest effort to discuss anything, regardless of how "sticky" it was, without qualm. Any person could feel free to state anything or to ask any question. In 1975 we stretched the program to the point that we engaged in open discussion of moral questions and obligations such as we had not discussed before. We had twice invited women to appear as speakers in a survey of women's rights and privileges in the church. But this time we invited two men who were doctors to frankly discuss the abortion issue; and two persons who were involved in the political spectrum to talk about the Christian's role in modern politics. We asked them to address frankly the problem of whether a Christian had the right to march in peace demonstrations, or to use the power of organized revolt to overthrow laws that were unjust.

Two students of prophecy talked about modern Israel in the plan of God. One of them felt that Jerusalem was destined to play a dramatic role in the future dealings of God with the world; the other felt that Jerusalem meant no more to God than Saint Louis or New York. This made for a good question period. There were two more who spoke on the subject of marriage and divorce especially as divorce and remarriage applied to one who was chosen to serve as an elder. I made an announcement of the forum in the paper but there was no coverage given it because by the time it was held the Mission Messenger was no more.

On December 1, Nell had addressed and wrapped the final paper and I had placed it in the proper bag according to the zip code. I loaded the nine mail sacks in the car as I had been doing each month for thirty-seven years and drove to the loading dock at the main post office in Saint Louis. I am sure it must have come as a great relief to Nell, and to Brother and Sister Ratliff, who had faithfully helped us wrap them for months. Sister Ratliff continued to do so after she had partially recovered from a paralytic stroke. I am not sure how we would have made it without the ministrations of this faithful pair. I said goodbye to the mail handlers on the dock and went into the weighing office and bade farewell to the men who had helped me so much. Only one was left who had been there when I started. I climbed in the car and started for home with mixed emotions. More than a third of a century lay behind me.

I could not help but think of the changes I had made in those years. In my next, and last article in this series, I hope to detail some of the changes in my perception of the will of God which have occurred to me. I have been attacked and abused for stating them. It appears that we are often more comfortable with one who continues to wear the rags and tatters of a disproven theology than with one who dons a new suit provided by the Spirit of God. If one tells the truth about changes to which he has been driven he becomes the victim of a verbal assault; if he lies or cavils or conceals his true feelings he becomes a recognized, if uneasy, party hero.

In the remainder of this space I want to thank all those who have helped us in any manner. Many of you are still doing so. Your encouragement and sharing are wonderful. I have often thought what I would say if I were requested to name the five persons who have most affected my life. I have reached the conclusion it would be impossible to answer. Surely God has brought all of you into my life for an eternal purpose. You have touched my life for good and I am forever grateful. I have survived three wars, and even two world depressions. I have lived to see numerous changes in "the higher powers" that govern. Men have come, and men have gone, but I have continued with unabated faith in Him "who puts down kings and raises them up."

From one who was an intolerant debater and defender of the party line I have been delivered and made to see the earnest attempt to please God of many who have never heard of the Campbells. I have been led to see the inherent good in the youth of our land and have been able to properly appreciate the strength of middle age, and the wisdom and experience of old age. I am thrilled that I was invited to share this "Pilgrimage of Joy" with you, and since the journey is not completed I trust that you will pray for me that it may be finished as it began.

7. The Last Years of Mission Messenger

Last Time Around

Contents

In this my final article in the present series, I want to suggest some of the things which I think I learned, and which have made such a noteworthy change in my attitude toward others. I constantly hear the charge that I am not the same man I used to be. I always answer that if I learn more tomorrow I will not be the same as I am now. I realize that I could skip these things. By doing so, my stock would rise greatly in some circles, but I would neither be faithful to my own convictions, nor loyal to Jesus, who is my only Lord.

Perhaps the most profound change came with the realization that the Church of Christ was simply another denomination and a sect. There is a difference. To denominate means to give a name or title to. To do this in order to separate and segregate those who wear it from other believers in Jesus is sectarian. To select a title that is found in the scriptures gives added weight to the divisive arguments which always result. And, while the expression "the church of Christ" does not occur in the sacred book, this does not deter some of the trivial arguments used to justify it as the name of the family of God.

It became obvious to me quite early that we had built up a System around the name we had selected, and we were seeking to save a man by getting him into that system. We were going the same route as the Church of God, the Nazarene Church, or the Church of God in Christ. We had been betrayed into thinking that by conforming to a few items one becomes pleasing to God. But each sect has a different set of items. Each party in the church of Christ has a different set. All of these are determined by honest, but stubborn men, who value their own distinctives above the unity of God's people. But one is not saved by being orthodox. He is not saved by a System, but by a Savior.

I was made to realize that the sheep of God were not all in any sectarian fold, but were scattered over the partisan hills. Various things have been done to bring them together. Reformations have occurred at various times. These inevitably produced movements which were doomed to multiply the divisions. One reason for this was the designation "churches" for the various sects. They are not churches by any stretch of the imagination. There is only one church. There never has been but one. There will never be another. Every saved person on earth is a member of the one body. By the will of God we are all one, by the actions of men we are all divided.

People in the sects are not necessarily our enemies. They are flesh and blood. They hurt, feel pain, and have nosebleed. And we wrestle not against flesh and blood. It is easier to fight persons than to fight principalities and powers. It is easier to war against persons than to go up against the unseen power that controls this dark world. We are carnal and we like to see our shots reach home. We can see people wince, dodge and grow angry, and it makes us exult. We must completely change our battle strategy. We have been fighting other believers.

People in the sects worship the same God, believe in the Sonship of Jesus, read the same Bible, sing the same songs, meet on the same day and hour, strive for the same heaven and fear the same hell as do we. Surely it was the malevolence of Satan which caused us to direct our weapons against them instead of "against spiritual agents from the very headquarters of evil." There is not one indication in God's Word that Paul, if he had been confronted with the same situation as ourselves would have turned his hand against every man and rejoiced that every man had turned his hand against him.

These people are hostages to Systems. From birth they have grown up and been reared in such Systems. Or in manhood, in the midst of the tragedy of the human predicament, they have fled to these Systems, as to cities of refuge. Our task is not to beat or belabor hostages. It is not to get the better of them. It is not to kill them. Any nation which kills hostages is inhumane, a violater of all basic human rights. We are to free hostages. But we cannot do so by contriving another System. Our walls are no better than those of other prisons. We must bring them to Christ and not introduce them to another custodian. This is the most difficult thing to do in our generation. It requires a vision of the unseen, a faith which looks beyond.

Another thing which I learned had to do with worship. I had grown up believing there were five acts of "public worship." These had to be performed on the first day of the week when the brethren met together, almost as a ritual. One of the insights I received from my study of the Word was that with the coming of Christ all things were made new. At the same time "old things had passed away." I guess it was just too much to believe that all things were made new. They may have passed away, but I needed them for a security blanket. I held on to some of them like a baby retains the habit of "thumb-sucking." I continued to do so until I came to trust in Jesus like Abraham did.

I shall never forget the afternoon that I was reading and meditating upon Jesus' visit with the Samaritan woman at the well curb at Sychar. It suddenly became clear to me that he lifted the subject of worship completely out of the realm of "the proper place." It was no longer a question of this mountain or Jerusalem. It was no longer what our fathers worshipped. It was not a question of being in the right place. There was no right place for the simple reason that there was no wrong place. It was a matter of Spirit and truth for the true worshipper.

I could see that in Christ there were no holy places, holy things, or holy days. The idea of dedicating or consecrating a pile of brick or stone to God eventually became obnoxious to me. I came to truly believe that "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with men's hands." No carpenters, no brick masons, no hod-carriers could negate that statement. I separated myself completely from the Jewish concept of speaking about a certain part of the building as a sanctuary. The idea of dedicating an organ, or a fountain, or something else to the God of the universe became silly, and what is worse, a sin. It became obvious that wherever I was it was a holy place because I was there. God dwelt in me. It was not a matter of going to a temple. I was the temple!

Whatever I did in my body became worship, when done in deference to the majesty and glory of God. The passage, "Whatsoever you do in word or deed," took on a new and deeper meaning. God was as interested in how I talked to my grandchildren on Monday as he was in what I said to a group sitting solemnly and gravely before me on Sunday mornings. He was as concerned in how I mowed my lawn, fixed a flat tire, or shopped at the grocery, as he was in what I did in Bible Class. It was a mind-boggling experience, a kind of explosive high to realize that everything— and I do mean everything— was worship of the Almighty.

I could see clearly how the "five acts" had been blown up into something that could be used as a hoe handle or baseball bat to beat people into submission. One of the best examples is "the act of giving." Out of the reasoning on this point came an accumulation of money, or hoarding. This created a treasury which necessitated a treasurer. This demanded business meetings and the reading of the treasurer's report, and so on, ad infinitum. I do not think that any of these are wrong. They are not sinful. But the idea that they are a part of God's revelation, or that they are found in I Corinthians 16, is about as far-fetched as the idea that the synthesis of Thomas Aquinas is God's plan for his people. All of this talk about who can be helped out of "the treasury" and who must be helped before it gets to "the treasury" is just so much poppycock. It has all been distilled from feverish, factional hearts. It is divisive by its very nature.

One thing which helped to free me from the insufferable slavery of the sect was the realization that fellowship with God is on the basis of a personal covenant with the divine. We are not in fellowship with Christ because we are in fellowship with others, but we are in fellowship with others because we are in fellowship with Christ. The vertical relationship precedes and makes possible the horizontal and not the reverse. The vertical is primary, the horizontal is secondary. Fellowship is the sharing of a common life, and the life in which we share is eternal life. Men have no control over eternal life. They cannot admit one to it. They cannot discharge one from it. It is foolish for mere weak mortals to talk about receiving one into the fellowship. It is absurd to talk about withdrawing fellowship from him. That is institutional or organizational twaddle. It is a demonstration of "peanut-sized" thinking.

God did not entrust so wonderful a thing as the salvation of a single soul to the whim or discretion of sinful and changeable man, although He made men as His human agents to carry the Good News. But He enters into a personal and direct covenant with each one of us. He does so on the basis of divine grace. No human intermediary is required. No parent can make a covenant for his child. No one in authority can make a covenant for those who are subjects. Human favor has nothing to do with it. It is tragic that we have done with the word "testament" what we have done with many other majestic terms utilized by the Holy Spirit. We have whittled them down in our attempt to make them relevant to our human predicament. It does not take a lot of study to see the old covenant does not consist of 39 books, nor the new covenant of 27.

We are distinctly told that the new covenant was not written with ink. All of the records, epistles, and even the apocalypse were written with ink. On this we have the testimony of the writers. There is a difference between the new covenant and the new covenant scriptures which grew out of it. The new covenant is written on fleshly tablets of the heart. It consists of the Agreement into which I entered with God and to which I subscribed. I surrendered to Him absolutely, unequivocally, until death silences my tongue or forces me to drop the pen from my nerveless fingers. The new covenant is not a written code. It is not a compilation of laws, statutes and judgments. We are not under law but under grace.

Along with this I learned the difference between the gospel and the doctrine of the apostles. The gospel is the euaggelion, the good news of what God did for us when we were helpless to do anything for ourselves. It is to be proclaimed. It is God's message for the unsaved. One cannot evangelize saved persons. The doctrine is for those in the body. It is not for the world any more than the gospel is for the church. I learned this from Alexander Campbell. Then I found out that he had learned it from Dr. George Campbell of Aberdeen, and from Dr. James McKnight of Edinburgh. So I obtained their valuable works and studied them, all the while becoming more convinced of the distinction.

Indeed I am thoroughly agreed with Alexander Campbell that there can never be a thorough reformation, so long as we ignore this vital principle. It is foundational to our goal. It is basic to its achievement. It is vastly more than a mere argument over semantics, or an empty discussion of words. The profundity of it, once seen, will commend itself to the genuine scholar as possessing the greatest potential for unity. It is saddening to see shallow minds which never had an original thought, denying it as a kind of joke.

Now that I have run my little course from birth up to the time when I discontinued publication of Mission Messenger, I shall bow out gently thanking you for the great patience you have exhibited in reading these monthly accounts. Brother Garrett has shown more than ordinary longsuffering with me and I appreciate it a great deal. Nell joins with me in this farewell and in the fervent prayer that God will bless all of you very richly indeed. Grace and peace be unto you!

BIBLIOGRAPHY of Principal Works

by W. Carl Ketcherside

Main Menu

Collections of Radio Sermons

Radio Talks (1944)
Radio Talks (Number Two) (1944)
Seeking the Old Paths (1944)
The Sermon on the Mount (1944)
Clean Churches (1945)
The Sound of the Trumpet (1945)
Timely Topics (1945)
The Bible vs. False Theories (1945)
Shadows (1946)
Storm Clouds Over America (1946)
Actions in Acts (1946)
Happy Homes (1946)
Proven Proverbs (1947)

Other Works

Fighting Christians (1942): Written during World War II, this 26 page booklet addresses the issue facing Christians as to whether they could scripturally engage in what was referred to as "carnal" (as opposed to 'spiritual") warfare." Taking direct aim at the position of David Lipscomb, who rejected the idea that the Christian could participate in civil government or in carnal warfare, Ketcherside parsed all the arguments to which his opponents appealed, citing Foy E. Wallace in his defense. Ketcherside maintained that if the sword belongs to the civil government, that he is party to its sword-wielding by virtue of being a part of that government. While expressing an awareness of the seriousness of recommending that one "take up arms in defense of democracy and the American way of life," he was convinced that such was the right thing to do. The book was published by Mission Messenger.

Concerning Christian Colleges (1945): In this 56 page booklet the author asserts that the scriptural responsibility of the church for the religious education of its members and their children cannot be usurped by a human institution. Responding to arguments in favor of Christian colleges by A. G. Hobbs—included as chapter 2 of this book, Ketcherside makes his case for a church based system of religious education. "No Bible college was ever born of faith in God's plan," he wrote. "We must create again the concept of the church as God's Bible college for the training of the Christian workers." A portion of the booklet is taken up in opposition to the one-man pastor system which, according to author, relies upon the Christian colleges for training. It was his conviction that without the colleges, the pastor system would not persist. The book was published by Mission Messenger.

A Clean Church (1948): A series of essays on church discipline in which the author first describes the problem created by public sin within the local church and then outlines what he considers to be the appropriate approach to correcting the problem. Examines references in the NT scriptures to maintaining public order at the congregational level. Although this title has since been reprinted by other publishers, the position set forth is that of an earlier period in the author's life and does not reflect the views he came to hold in his later years. The book contains 165 pages divided among the following 14 chapters: Preface (Why I wrote this book), Sin in the Camp, What is Discipline, Personal Offences, Going to Law, Public Offences (Restoration of Offenders), The Effect of Discipline, Walking Disorderly, The Corinthian Example, The Results at Corinth, Congregational Autonomy, Principles of Procedure, Objections Considered, How to Avoid Public Discipline. The book was originally published by Mission Messenger.

Ketcherside-Porter Debate (Ozark, Missouri, March 23-26, 1937). Ketcherside's introduction to public disputation took place when he was only 29 years old. Rue Porter was approaching his 48th birthday and had already engaged in 25 debates. Propositions for the debate were related to the "erection and maintenance of schools or colleges . . . for the purpose of teaching the Bible," and the "erection and maintenance of orphans homes . . . for the purpose of . . . caring for orphan children." Porter maintained that they were both authorized by the New Testament, whereas Ketcherside denied that such was the case. D. Austen Sommer reviewed the debate in Macedonian Call for April 1937, p. 2. The Gospel Advocate announced the upcoming debate, on page 7 of the February 23rd issue for 1937, but there appears to have been no follow-up report. Ketcherside fills several pages of his autobiography providing background and subsequent insight into the debate (see, "Chapter 3. Debates at Home & Fellowship Abroad: The Debating Years Begin"). The book, containing 174 pages, was printed by Rush Printing Co., Barnard, Missouri, 1937.

Wallace-Ketcherside Debate (Paragould, Arkansas, June 30-July 4, 1952): The first of two debates with G. K Wallace, of Temple Terrace, Florida, which took place from June 30— July 4, 1952, in a field near Paragould, Arkansas, from which it came to be called "the cow pasture debate." The debate covered four propositions: (1) The employment of a preacher to preach for the congregation as now practiced by the church of Christ, at 2nd and Walnut Streets, in Paragould, Ark., is scriptural. (2) The New Testament authorizes an evangelist to exercise authority in a congregation which he has planted until men are qualified and appointed as bishops. (3) The organization, by Christians, of schools such as Freed-Hardeman College is in harmony with the New Testament Scriptures. (4) The organization, by Christians, of schools such as Freed-Hardeman College is contrary to the New Testament Scriptures. (Ketcherside denied propositions 1 and 3, and affirmed 2 and 4.) The first proposition was taken up over two nights, whereas the remaining three were covered in one night each. Although Ketcherside never substantially changed any of the views he expressed during these debates, his subsequent understanding of the significance of our differing views of scripture prevented him from ever again regarding them as tests of spiritual fellowship. The book, published by Telegram Book Company in Longview, Texas, contains 286 pages.

Wallace-Ketcherside Debate (St. Louis, Missouri, October 26-30, 1953). The follow-up debate with G. K. Wallace took place the following year in St. Louis, MO, October 26-30. The St. Louis debate covered the same propositions as in the Arkansas debate. The book containing the debate was published by the same company, Telegram Book Company, as the Arkansas debate. It contains 278 pages.

Colley-Ketcherside Debate (Dallas, Texas, December 1-4, 1953): The transcription of a debate held in the Beckley Theater in Dallas, Texas, December 1-4, 1953, with Flavil L. Colley over the question of whether securing a preacher as a minister of a congregation having elders, as generally practiced among the Churches of Christ in Dallas, is scriptural— a position which Ketcherside denied. Ketcherside's concern in the debate may best be reflected in his contention that "every man who has the ability to teach must have the right to exercise that gift, and he has an equal right with every other who possesses the same gift, if he is faithful." The debate fills 211 pages and was originally published in 1954 by Flavil L. Colley of Dallas, Texas.

The Royal Priesthood (First edition, 1956): This is the first book written by the author following the radical change in his understanding of spiritual fellowship and the unity of all believers, which began in 1951. The first edition, released in November of 1956, was followed in 1969 by a second, revised edition. The latter was included in the printed 12 volume edition of *The Writings of W. Carl Ketcherside, published by College Press in 1997. The book examines the biblical teaching relative to the priesthood of all believers. The first half traces the necessity of a priesthood, its nature, rise and development under the Patriarchal and Jewish dispensations, and its culmination and perfection in the present era, styled "the ends of the ages." The second half of the book contains an analysis and reply to the Roman Catholic postulate of a special priesthood or clergy as set forth by Dr. John A. O'Brien in *The Priesthood: A Divine Institution. Prior to the publication of *The Royal Priesthood, Ketcherside announced, "The chapters on 'Priesthood and Ministry' and 'The Royal Priesthood' will commend themselves to all lovers of restoration." The first edition of the book, published by Mission Messenger, contained 193 pages. The second edition, by the same publisher, contains 199 pages. This is one of only two books that Ketcherside ever copyrighted (to protect copyrighted material quoted from a third party). The other was *The Kingdom of the Messiah.

The Kingdom of the Messiah (Print edition, 1957; Kindle edition, 2011): Traces the concept of the kingdom of God through the Old Testament, shows how God prepared for its coming, and discusses its nature and character. It is a study of the rule of heaven in all ages and contains an analysis of Revelation 20, concerning which the author states: "In regard to the millennium, it will establish that I do not hold the view that our Lord will return to earth and reign here a thousand years. I give the reasoning by which I reach that conclusion." The book contains 222 pages and was published by Mission Messenger. It is one of only two books every copyrighted by the author— the other being *The Kingdom of the Messiah. Two of his other books were published and copyrighted by Standard Publishing Company.

Thoughts on Fellowship (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1957-58)

Covenants of God (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1959-60)

The Path of Peace (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1961-62)

The Unity of the Spirit (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1963)

The Brotherhood of Faith (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1964)

The Twisted Scriptures (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1965)

Deep Roots (Bound volume of *Mission Messenger, 1966)

Apples of Gold (Bound volume of *Mission Messenger, 1967)

God's Community (Bound volume of *Mission Messenger, 1968)

The Royal Priesthood (Second edition, 1969; Kindle edition, 2011): See above description of first edition

Simple Trusting Faith (Print edition, 1969; Kindle edition, 2011): At the time this volume was published, the author wrote: "For a number of years I wanted to write . . . a volume of apologetics written in popular style so that college young people would read it. When the time came to write I decided that I would deal with the theme of God's existence, the manifestation of the Word in flesh, the virgin birth, the question of miracles, and the present possession of eternal life. I do not hold that we must discard all the values of the arguments made by our fathers for the genuineness and authenticity of the word." The thesis of the book, he had explained in a pre-publication announcement, is "that we need not surrender all of the apologetic approaches of the past in this intellectual age with its theories of relativism and liberalism." It is the intention of the book, he further explained, "to build faith and strengthen conviction" by providing "a clear depiction of the reasons for our belief in God, the genuineness and authenticity of the scriptures, the miracles by which the claims of the apostles were validated and other related matters." Hundreds of copies of this title were sent, free of charge, to college and university students who personally requested a copy from the publisher, Mission Messenger. The book contains 148 pages.

Christian Commandos (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1969)

Our Living Pattern (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1970)

One Great Chapter (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1971)

The Parable of the Telstar (1972; 2012, Kindle Edition): Contains 16 essays taken from speeches given by the author throughout the country in 1971. The title of the book is taken from the first talk. "The Parable of Telstar" is assumed to be the kind of talk Jesus would make today to a Rotary Club luncheon, or to a high school assembly, which, in years past, was permitted. It is a parable up in the clouds and down to earth. The second talk, "My Only Creed," was made at the Unity Forum, conducted at Atlanta Christian College. The next four talks, given at Camp Wi-Ne-Ma, represent an exposition of chapter one of 1 Thessalonians, and are entitled: "Grace and Peace," "Three Things to Remember," "The Dynamite of God," and "Examples and Models." The next four talks, prepared for a convocation of college and high school young people, some of the latter identified with the "Jesus Folk," are: "The Real Revolutionary," "Moving Into the Twentieth Century," "The Fellowship of the Unashamed," and "Walled in or Walled Out." Additional talks included are: "Space Age Religion," "The Vitality of Christianity," "The Scarlet Line," "Is There Power in the Blood?" and "The Greatest Counterfeiter." Published by Mission Messenger, the book contains 224 pages.

The Divine Purpose (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1972)

The Question Box (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1973)

Heaven Help Us (Print edition, 1974; Kindle edition, 2010): The purpose of this book is to stimulate thought and promote a deeper study of the revealed will of God as it relates to the person and work of the Holy Spirit in his relationship to the believer, to the Word, and to God. Since the author believes that God has spoken, and the revelation of what He has said is contained in the Bible, he maintains that experiences must be judged in the light of the Scripture, and not the reverse. Consequently, it is to Scripture that he turns to answer such questions as: Is the Holy Spirit a who or what? What are the implications of the Holy Spirit as Comforter? What is the sin against the Holy Spirit? How should the Spirit's presence affect daily living? Ketcherside wrote: "If this volume leads you into a life of sharing with the Father and all the other members of His family— our brothers and sisters; if it brings freedom from fear of the present; and if it strengthens your faith, it will have achieved its goal and God will be praised." Originally published and copyrighted by The Standard Publishing Company, publication rights were subsequently assigned to the Ketcherside family. Contains 176 pages.

Pure Speech (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1974)

One in Christ (Bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1975) (2011, Kindle Edition)

The Death of the Custodian (1976; 2010, Kindle Edition): Is the New Testament a code of laws which the professing Christian must follow? If not, what about the commandments of Jesus? What is the nature of the "new covenant"? How does the "new covenant" compare with the "old covenant"? In answering these and other questions, the author expounds upon the teaching of scripture regarding law and grace. This volume offers thought-provoking reading and serves as a study guide for every Christian. Originally published and copyrighted by The Standard Publishing Company which later relinquished publishing rights to the author's family, the book is 152 pages in length. Over the years, numerous editions have followed from several publishers under different titles.

The Twisted Scriptures (First edition, 1977; Diversity Press edition, 1992; Kindle edition, 2009): Introduced by the author as "a revised edition of my former volume under that name," he described it as dealing with "the tragic misuse of the sacred scriptures to justify our carnal strife and division." Referring to the book as "An exposure of the sectarian spirit that abuses the Bible in defense of divisions among Christians," Leroy Garrett regarded it as "One of [Carl's] most liberating books"— "as excellent as anything he ever wrote." The book examines each of the passages of scripture that have been used over the years to justify division within the Stone-Campbell restoration brotherhood over matters of doctrine. Shows how none of those passages has been interpreted correctly when used to divide brothers from one another. Concludes that scripture provides only three grounds for the dissociation of a congregation from one previously accepted as one of the redeemed: (1) denial of gospel facts, (2) moral turpitude, and (3) the factional spirit. The book contains eleven chapters titled: "The Twisted Scriptures," "Except They Be Agreed," "Another Gospel," "Gospel and Doctrine," "Conformity or Diversity," "Contrary to the Doctrine," "Withdraw Yourselves," "Walking in the Light,"

"Receive Him Not," "The One Faith," "The Great Problem." There were 194 pages in the original publication.

Talks to Jews and Non-Jews (1977; 2011, Kindle Edition): Shares his thoughts on several questions including: Are there three Gods? Did the prophets indicate that the Messiah to come was to be a person? Cannot the principles of Judaism accomplish the unifying of mankind? How can Jesus Christ be the 'Prince of Peace' in a world of strife and war? The discussion of these questions by the author with his Jewish audiences is fascinating reading for Jews and non-Jews alike. It offers an opportunity to gain a deeper appreciation of Jesus, as well as a better understanding of the Scriptures. The author also scrutinizes the Epistle to the Hebrews in which he enumerates the various ways in which the new state under Christ supersedes the old state under the law. Originally published and copyrighted by The Standard Publishing Company which subsequently relinquished publishing rights to the author's family.

Adventure of Faith (1978; 2011, Kindle Edition): Seeks to challenge faith that is not transformational, specifically faith that has been bottled up in traditional forms of Christianity in which the deep wells of koinonia and *diakonia, which the Spirit dug for our sustenance, have been filled up, leaving us to drink from shallow surface-water contaminated by theological waste which has been drained into it. The author suggests that one of the great adventures of our age could be the digging anew of these wells. He presents compelling evidence from Scripture that mediocrity is not to be the lot of any of God's children, since they have all been called and empowered to be God-containers, imitators of God, travelers on the road to high adventure. Contains 199 pages, published by Mission Messenger.

Colony of Heaven (1979; 2010, Kindle Edition): This work, published by the author four years after he ceased publication of his monthly journal, *Mission Messenger, is a running commentary in which Paul's letter to the Philippians is examined in the three-fold context of geography, history, and revelation. It is a treatment of spiritual and social values drawn from Philippians— described by Paul as "a colony of heaven"— in which the author puts the entire letter in the context of our own age and problems. 153 pages, published by Mission Messenger.

In the Beginning (1980; 2011, Kindle Edition): This is the last book the author ever published (his autobiography was published posthumously). Its title has reference to the beginning of a new approach to unity which was first proposed by the founders of what later came to be known as the Stone-Campbell restoration movement (reputedly the largest religious movement indigenous to North America). It includes essays and speeches dating from around the year 1957, the year that marks a new "beginning" in the direction of the author's own mission and message. It contains the most comprehensive statement to be found of his views on Christian fellowship (chapters 13-21). It was in the nature of Christian fellowship that he perceived Christian unity to be grounded, and that a unity, by nature, tolerates a diversity of doctrinal deductions--due to the nature of Christian fellowship. With reference to his earliest essays of this period Ketcherside wrote in his autobiography: "They represented my crossing of the Rubicon, the burning of my bridges behind me. They were the first guns fired in my commitment to an unrelenting war against sectarianism, and especially against my own." Published by Mission Messenger, the book contains 216 pages.

Pilgrimage of Joy (1991; 2010, Kindle Edition): The last of Ketcherside's book, his autobiography, was published in installments by *Restoration Review, from January 1976 through December of 1981. It was later published posthumously in a single volume as Pilgrimage of Joy by College Press in 1991 and by SCM e-prints in 2010 in Kindle format. In this volume, the author tells the story of his own transformation from an advocate of unity in conformity to one of unity in diversity. He was an ecumenist, but he was convinced that unity would never become a kind of organizational get-together. In the final analysis it is personal, he would say. This book reflects the changes in his thinking over the years, from accepting others upon the basis of their conformity to his thinking to accepting others upon the same basis upon which God had accepted him—with all of his ignorance and imperfection. In 1947, and again in 1951, he was invited to spend several months teaching in the British Isles. He later spoke at conferences in Brazil, Mexico, and Puerto Rico. While he held no academic degrees, the author spent much of his time on college and university campuses across the country, confronting the philosophical forces that ally themselves against the sovereignty of God. In his latter years, his attention was focused on serving the needs of those who had been marginalized in the inner city of his own St. Louis. His autobiography covers the period of his life from birth (1908) through the year he ceased publishing his monthly journal, Mission Messenger (1975).

Books Published by Mission Messenger

History of the Church Through the Ages, by Robert Brumback (1957)

Where Jesus Walked, by Robert Brumback (1959)

Voices of Concern, edited by Robert Meyers (1966)

The Holy Spirit in Our Lives Today, edited by W. Carl Ketcherside (1967)

Thoughts on Unity, Edited by Stanley Paregien (1971)

Declaration and Address | Last Will and Testament, by Thomas Campbell | Barton W. Stone (1972, 1975)

Availability of Works by W. Carl Ketcherside

All of the essays and books appearing in the above bibliography are available in the "Ketcherside Collection" of archive.org, from where they may be freely downloaded in a variety of formats. Many of Ketcherside's works may also be found in e-book format on the websites of Amazon and Barnes and Noble.